c. 650.—"The circumference of the Five Indies is about 90,000 li; on three sides it is bounded by a great sea; on the north it is backed by snowy mountains. It is wide at the north and narrow at the south; its figure is that of a half-moon."—Huen Tsang, in Pél. Boudh. ii. 58.

1298.—"India the Greater is that which extends from Maabar to Kesmacoran (i.e. from Coromandel to Melkan), and it contains 13 great kingdoms. . . . India the Lesser extends from the Province of Champa to Mutfali (i.e. from Cochin-China to the Kistna Delta), and contains 8 great Kingdoms. . . . Abash (Abyssinia) is a very great province, and you must know that it constitutes the Middle India."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 34, 35.

c. 1328.—"What shall I say? The greatness of this India is beyond description. But let this much suffice concerning India the Greater and the Less. Of India Tertia I will say this, that I have not indeed seen its many marvels, not having been there. . . ."—Friar Jordano, p. 41.

India Minor, in Clavijo, looks as if it were applied to Afghanistan:
1404.—"And this same Thursday that the said Ambassadors arrived at this great River (the Oxus) they crossed to the other side. And the same day . . . came in the evening to a great city which is called Termen (Termeh), and this used to belong to India Minor, but now belongs to the empire of Samarkand, having been conquered by Tamurbec."—Clavijo, § ciii. (Markham, 119.)

c. 1601.—"He does smile his face into more lines than are in the new map with the augmentation of the Indies."—Twelfth Night, Act iii. sc. 2.

1653.—"I was thirteen times captive and seventeen times sold in the Indies."—Trans. of Pinto, by H. Cogan, p. 1.

1826.—". . . Like a French lady of my acquaintance, who had so general a notion of the East, that upon taking leave of her, she enjoined me to get acquainted with a friend of hers, living as she said quelque part dans les Indes, and whom, to my astonishment, I found residing at the Cape of Good Hope."—Hajji Baba, Introd. Epistle, ed. 1835, p. ix.

c. 1567.—"Di qui (Collan) a Cao Comeri si fanno settanta due miglia, e qui si finisce la costa dell'India."—Ces. Federici, in Ramisio, iii. 390.

1598.—"At the end of the country of Cambia beginneth India and the lands of Decam and Cuncam . . . from the island called Das Vagrua (read Fayqu) . . . which is the righte coast that in all the East Countries is called India. . . . Now you must understand that this coast of India beginneth at Damas, or the Island Das Vagruas, and stretched South and by East, to the Cape of Comorin, where it endeth."

Linschoten, ch. ix.-x.; [Hak. Soc. i. 62. See also under ABADA].

c. 1610.—"Il y a grand nombre des Portugais qui demeurent ès ports de cette costa de Bengale . . . Ils n'osoin retouner en l'Inde, pour quelques fautes qu'ils y ont commis."—Pyrrard de Laval, i. 239; [Hak. Soc. i. 394].

1615.—"Sociorum literis, qui Mogoris Regiam incolunt audium est in India de celeberrimo Regne illo quod Saraceni Catholic vocant."—Trigonius, De Christianop Expeditione apud Sinas, p. 544.

1644.—"(Speaking of the Daman district above Bombay.): . . . "The fruits are nearly all the same as those that you get in India, and especially many Mungo and Cassarous (?), which are like chestnuts."—Boccaccio, M.S.

It is remarkable to find the term used, in a similar restricted sense, by the Court of the E.I.C. in writing to Fort St. George. They certainly mean some part of the west coast.

1670.—They desire that dungarees may be supplied thence if possible, as "they were not procurable on the Coast of India, by reason of the disturbances of Sevajee."—Notes and Ects., Pt. i. 2.

1673.—"The Portugus . . . might have subdued India by this time, had not we fallen out with them, and given them the first Blow at Ormuz . . . they have added some Christians to those formerly converted by St. Thomas, but it is a loud Report to say all India."—Freyer, 137.

1851.—In a correspondence with Sir R. Morier, we observe the Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs calls their Goa Viceroy "The Governor General of India."

1876.—The Dorian "is common throughout all India."—Filet, Plant-Kunding Woordeboek, 196.

Indies applied to America.

1563.—"And please to tell me . . . which is better, this (Rodux Chinea) or the quiaçao of our Indies as we call them. . . . "—Garcia, f. 177.

INDIAN. This word in English first occurs, according to Dr. Guest, in the following passage:

A.D. 433-440.

"Mid israelum ic waes Mid ebreum and indeum, and mid egypturn."

In Guest's English Rhythms, ii. 86-87. But it may be queried whether indeum is not here an error for indeum; the converse error to that supposed to have been made in the printing of Otheno's death-speech—

Like the base Judean threw a pearl away."

Indian used for Mahout.

B.C. ? 116-105.—"And upon the beasts (the elephants) there were strong towers of wood, which covered every one of them, and were girt fast unto them with devices; there were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, beside the Indian that ruled them."—L. Maccabees, vi. 37.

B.C. c. 150.—"Of Beasts (i.e. elephants) taken with all their Indians there were ten; and of all the rest, which had thrown their Indians, he got possession after the battle by driving them together."—Polyb. Bk. i. ch. 40; see also iii. 46, and xi. 1. It is very curious to see the drivers of Carthaginian elephants thus called Indians, though it may be presumed that this is only a Greek application of the term, not a Carthaginian use.

B.C. c. 20.—"Tertio die . . . ad Thabu- sion castellum imminens fluvio Indo ventum est; cui fecerat nomen Indus ab elephanto dejectus."—Liv. Bk. xxxviii. 14. This Indus or "Indian" river, named after the Mahout thrown into it by his elephant, was somewhere on the borders of Phrygia.

A.D. c. 210.—"Along with this elephant was brought up a female one called Nikaia. And the wife of their Indian being near death placed her child of 30 days old beside this one. And when the woman died a certain marvellous attachment grew up of the Beast towards the child. . . . "—Athenaeus, xiii. ch. 8.

Indian, for Anglo-Indian.

1816.—". . . our best Indians. In the idleness and obscurity of home they look back with fondness to the country where they have been useful and distinguished, like the ghosts of Homer's heroes, who prefer the exertions of a labourer on the earth to all the listless enjoyments of Elysium."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 367.

INDIGO. s. The plant Indigofera tinctoria, L. (N.O. Leguminosae), and the dark blue dye made from it. Greek ιδικωός. This word appears from Hippocrates to have been applied in his time to pepper. It is also applied by Dioscorides to the mineral substance (a variety of the red oxide of iron) called Indian red (F. Adams, Appendix to Dunbar's Lexicon). [Liddell & Scott call it "a dark-blue dye, indigo." The dye was used in Egyptian mummy-cloths (Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt, ed. 1878, ii. 163).]

A.D. c. 60.—"Of this which is called ιδικωός one kind is produced spontaneously, being as it were a scum thrown out by the Indian reeds; but that used for dyeing is a purple efflorescence which floats on the brazen cauldrons, which the craftsmen skim off and dry. That is deemed best which is blue in colour, succulent, and smooth to the touch."—Dioscorides, v. cap. 107.

c. 70.—"After this . . . Indico (Indicum) is a colour most esteemed; out of India it commeth; whereupon it tooke the name; and it is nothing els but a slime mud (leaving to that gathered about canes and reeds: while it is panned or ground, it looketh blacke; but being dissolved it yeeldeth a woonderfull lovely mixture of purple and azur . . . Indico is valued at 20 denarii the pound. In physike there is use of this Indico; for it doth assuage swellings that doe stretch the skin."—Pline, by Ph. Holland, ii. 531.

c. 80-90.—"This river (Sinthus, i.e. Indus) has 7 mouths . . . and it has none of them navigable except the middle one only, on which there is a coast mart called Barbaricon . . . The articles imported into this mart are . . . On the other hand there are exported Costus, Bedellium . . . and Indian Black (ιδικωό μελαν, i.e. Indigo)."—Periplus, 38, 39.

1298.—(At Colium) "They have also abundance of very fine indigo (yute). This is made of a certain herb which is gathered and [after the roots have been removed] is put into great vessels upon which they pour water, and then leave it till the whole of the plant is decomposed . . . . "—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.
INTERLOPER.

1584.—"Indico from Zindl and Cambala."—Barrett, in Hakl. ii. 413.

[1605-6.—"... for all which we shall buy Ryse, Indico, Lapes Bezar which theatre in abundances to be had."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 71.

[1616.—"Indigo is made thus. In the prime June they sow it, which the rains bring up about the prime September: this they cut and it is called the Newty (H. naedib, 'a young plant'), formerly mentioned, and is a good sort. Next year it sprouts again in the prime August, which they cut and is the best Indigo, called Jerry (H. jar, 'growing from the root (jar)')."—Foster, Letters, iv. 241.

[1670.—Tavernier gives a detailed account of the manufacture as it was in his time. "They that sif this Indigo must be careful to keep a Linnen-claouth before their faces, and that their nostrils be well stopt. ... Yet ... they that have sifed Indigo for 9 or 10 days shall spit nothing but blee for a good while together. Once I laid an egg in the morning among the siters, and when I came to break it in the evening it was all blee within."—E.T. ii. 128-9; [ed. Bull, ii. 11].

1788.—"Indergo—a drug of no estimation that grows wild in the woods."—This is H. Finder, Skt. indra-yaka, "barley of Indra," the Wrightia tinctoria, from the leaves of which a sort of indigo is made. See Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 316. "Indergo of the species of warm bitters."—Hathed, Code, ed. 1781, p. 9.

1818.—"Découvertes et Inventions.—Décidément le cabinet Gladstone est pourvu par la malechance. Voici un savant chimiste de Munich qui vient de trouver le moyen se preparer artificiellement et à très bon marché le bleu Indigo. Cette découverte peut amener la ruine du gouvernement des Indes anglaises, qui est déjà menacé de la banqueroute. L'Indigo, en effet, est le principal article de commerce des Indes (1); dans l'Allemagne, on en importe par an pour plus de cent cinquante millions de francs."—Nouve Commercial Paper, quoted in Pioneer Mail, Feb. 3.

INGLEES, s. Hind. Inglis and Inqis. Wilson gives as the explanation of this: "Invalid soldiers and sipahis, to whom allotments of land were assigned as pensions; the lands so granted." But the word is now used as the equivalent of (sepoys') pension simply. Mr. Carnegie, [who is followed by Platts], says the word is "probably a corruption of English, as pensions were unknown among native Governments, whose rewards invariably took the shape of land assignments." This, however, is quite unsatisfactory; and Sir H. Elliot's suggestion (mentioned by Wilson) that the word was a corruption of invalid (which the sepoys may have confounded in some way with English) is most probable.

INTERLOPER, s. One in former days who traded without the license, or outside the service, of a company (such as the E.I.C.) which had a charter of monopoly. The etymology of the word remains obscure. It looks like Dutch, but intelligent Dutch friends have sought in vain for a Dutch original. Onderloopen, the nearest word we can find, means 'to be inundated.' The hybrid etymology given by Bailey, though allowed by Skeat, seems hardly possible. Perhaps it is an English corruption from ontloopen, 'to evade, escape, run away from.' [The N.E.D. without hesitation gives interlope, a form of leap. Skeat, in his Concise Dict., 2nd ed., agrees, and quotes Low Germ. and Dutch enterloper, 'a runner between.']

1650.—"The commissions relating to the Interloper, or private trader, being considered, it is resolved that a notice be fixed up warning all the Inhabitants of the Towne, not, directly or indirectly, to trade, negotiate, aid, assist, countenance, or hold any correspondence, with Captain William Alley or any person belonging to him or his ship without the license of the Honorable Company. Whoever shall offend herein shall answer it at their Peril."—Notes and Exts., Pt. iii. 29.

1683.—"The Shippe Expectation, Capt. Ally Comand, an Interloper, arrived in ye Downes from Porto Novo."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 15].
[1862.—"The Agent having notice of an Interloper lying in Titticoriin Bay, immediately sent for ye Counsell to consult about it. . . .—Pringle, Diary of Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 68."

"The Spirit of Commerce, which sees its drifts with eagle's eyes, formed associations at the risk of trying the consequence at law . . . since the statutes did not authorize the Company to seize or stop the ships of these adventurers, whom they called Interlopers."—O'regan's Fragments, 127.

1683.—"If God gives me life to get this Phirmaund into my possession, ye Honble. Compy. shall never more be much troubled with Interlopers."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 62].

"May 28. About 9 this morning Mr. Littleton, Mr. Nedham, and Mr. Douglass came to ye factory, and being sent for, were asked 'Whether they did now, or ever intended, directly or indirectly, to trade with any Interlopers' that shall arrive in the Bay of Bengall?"

"Mr. Littleton answered that, 'he did not, nor ever intended to trade with any Interloper.'

"Mr. Nedham answered, 'that at present he did not, and that he came to get money, and if any such offer should happen, he would not refuse it.'

"Mr. Douglass answered, he did not, nor ever intended to trade with them; but he said 'what Estate he should get here he would not scruple to send it home upon any Interloper.'

"And having given their respective answers they were dismissed."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. i. 90-91.

1694.—"Whether ye souldiers lately sent up hath created any jealousy in ye Interloper: or their own Actions or guilt I know not, but they are so cautious ye every 2 or 3 bales ye are pack't they immediately send on board."—Ms. Letter from Edited, Here at Hugley to the Rt. Worship Charles Eves Esq. Agent for Affairs of the Rt. Honble. East India Comp'y, in Bengall, &c. (9th Sept.). MS. Record in India Office.

1719.—". . . their business in the South Seas was to sweep those coasts clear of the French interlopers, which they did very effectually."—Shevocke's Voyage, 29.

"I wish you would explain yourself; I cannot imagine what reason I have to be afraid of any of the Company's ships, or Dutch ships, I am no interloper."—Robinson Crusoe, Pt. ii.

1730.—"To Interlope [of inter, L. between, and loorp, Du. to run, q.d. to run in between, and intercept the Commerce of others], to trade without proper Authority, or interfere with a Company in Commerce."—Bailey's English Dict. s.v.

1760.—"Enterlooper. Term of Commerce de Mer, for en usage parmi les Compagnies des Pays du Nord, comme l'Angleterre, la Hollande, Hambourg, le Danemark, &c. It signifies a vaisseau d'un particulier qui pratique et frequente les Côtes, et les Havres ou Ports de Mer eloignés, pour y faire un commerce clandestin, au prejudice des Compagnies qui sont autorisées elles seules a le faire dans ces mêmes lieux. . . . Ce mot se prononce comme s'il etoit écrit Entreloupe. Il est emprunté de l'Anglois, de enter qui signifie entre et entreprendre, et de Loopier, Courreur."—Savary des Bruslons, Dict. Univ. de Commerce, Nouv. ed., Copenhagen, s. v.

c. 1812.—"The fault lies in the clause which gives the Company power to send home interlopers . . . and is just as reasonable as one which should forbid all the people of England, except a select few, to look at the moon."—Letter of Dr. Carey, in William Carey, by James Culross, D.D., 1881, p. 165.

IPECACUANHA (WILD), s. The garden name of a plant (Asclepias curassavica, L.) naturalised in all tropical countries. It has nothing to do with the true ipecacuanha, but its root is a powerful emetic, whence the name. The true ipecacuanha is cultivated in India.

IRON-WOOD. This name is applied to several trees in different parts; e.g. to Mesua ferrea, L. (N.O. Chiusavicae), Hind. nagkesar; and in the Burmese provinces to Xylia dolabriformis, Benth.

ISAY. The Chinese mob used to call the English soldiers A'says or Isays, from the frequency of this apostrophe in their mouths. (The French gamins, it is said, do the same at Boulogne.) At Amoy the Chinese used to call out after foreigners Akee! Akee! a tradition from the Portuguese Aqui! 'Here!' In Java the French are called by the natives Orang deendong, i.e. the dites-done people. (See Fortune's Two Visits to the Two Countries, 1853, p. 52; and Notes and Queries in China and Japan, ii. 176.)

[1863.—"The Sepoys were . . . invariably called 'Achas.' Acha or good is the constantly recurring answer of a Sepoy when spoken to. . . .—Fisher, Three Years in China, 146.]

ISKAT, s. Ratlines. A marine term from Port. escaula (Roebuck).

[1616.—"Dated in Achen 1025 according to the rate of Slam."—Foster, Letters, iv. 125.]
[1617.—"I demanded the debts... one [of the debtors] for the sale of 110 rials is termed Slam."—Letter of E. Young, from Jacatra, Oct. 9, I.O. Records: O.C. No. 541.]

ISTOOP, s. Oakum. A marine term from Port. estopa (Roebuck).

ISTUBBUL, s. This usual Hind. word for 'stable' may naturally be imagined to be a corruption of the English word. But it is really Ar. ḳiṣṭābī, though that no doubt came in old times from the Latin stabulum through some Byzantine Greek form.

ITZEBOO, s. A Japanese coin, the smallest silver denomination. ḳiṣṭābī, 'one drachm.' [The N.E.D. gives itsa, itche, 'one,' bū, 'division, part, quarter']. Present value about 1ś. Marsden says: "Itzebo, a small gold piece of oblong form, being 0'61 inch long, and 0'3 broad. Two specimens weighed 2 dwt. 3 grs. only" (Numism. Orient., 814-5). See Cock's Diary, i. 176, ii. 77. [The coin does not appear in the last currency list; see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 99.]

[1859.—"We found the greatest difficulty in obtaining specimens of the currency of the country, and I came away at last the possessor of a solitary Itziboo. These are either of gold or sliver: the gold Itziboo is a small oblong piece of money, intrinsically worth about seven and sixpence. The intrinsic value of the gold half-itziboo, which is not too large to convert into a shirt-stud, is about one and tenpence."—L. Oliphant, Narr. of Mission, ii. 232.]

IZAM MALUCO, n.p. We often find this form in Correa, instead of Nizamaluco (q.v.).

J

JACK, s. Short for Jack-Sepoy; in former days a familiar style for the native soldier; kindly, rather than otherwise.

1853.—"... he should be leading the Jacks."—Oakfield, ii. 66.

J A C K, s. The tree called by botanists Artocarpus integrifolia, L. fil., and its fruit. The name, says Drury, is "a corruption of the Skt. word Tchacka, which means the fruit of the tree" (Useful Plants, p. 55). There is, however, no such Skt. word; the Skt. names are Kantaka, Phala, Panasa, and Phalasa. [But the Malayāl. chakka is from the Skt. chakra, 'round."

Rheede rightly gives Tsjaka (chakkā) as the Malayālam name, and from this no doubt the Portuguese took jaca and handed it on to us. "They call it," says Garcia Orta, "in Malavar jaes, in Canareese and Guzerati panas" (f. 111). "The Tamil form is sakkēi, the meaning of which, as may be adduced from various uses to which the word is put in Tamil, is 'the fruit abounding in rind and refuse.'" (Letter from Bp. Coldwell.)

We can hardly doubt that this is the fruit of which Pliny writes: "Major alia pomo et suavitate praeccellentior; quo sapientiores Indorum vivunt. (Folium alas avium imitantur longitudine trium cubitorum, latitudine duum). Fructum e cortice mittit admirabilem succi dulcedine; ut uno quaternos satisit. Arbori nomen palata, pomo arienae; plurima est in Sydraci, expeditionum Alexandri termino. Est et alia similis huic; dulcior pomo; sed interaneorum valetudini infesta" (Hist. Nat. xii. 12). Thus rendered, not too faithfully, by Philemon Holland: "Another tree there is in India, greater yet than the former; bearing a fruit much fairer, bigger, and sweeter than the figs aforesaid; and whereof the Indian Sages and Philosophers do ordinarily live. The leaf resembleth birds' wings, carrying three cubits in length, and two in breadth. The fruit it putteth forth at the bark, having within it a wonderfull pleasant juice: insomuch as one of them is sufficient to give four men a competent and full refection. The tree's name is Pala, and the fruit is called Arienae. Great plenty of them is in the country of the Sydraci, the utmost limit of Alexander the Great his expeditions and voyages. And yet there is another tree much like to this, and beetle a fruit more delectable that this Arienae, albeit the guts in a man's belly it wringeth and breeds the blondie flux" (i. 361).

Strange to say, the fruit thus described has been generally identified with the plantain: so generally that is about two cubits. . . . (3) There is another tree the fruit of which is long, and not straight but crooked, and sweet to the taste. But this gives rise to colic and dysentery ("\'Αλλα τέ ἐστιν οὗ ὁ καρπὸς \(\mu\)κρός καὶ οὗ εὐθύς ἄλλα σκόλιος, ἐσθιόμενος δὲ γλυκὸς. Ὡστος ἐν τῇ κοιλίᾳ δηγμόν ροεί καὶ δύσετράν . . .") wherefore Alexander published a general order against eating it."—(Hist. Plant. iv. 4-5).

It is plain that Pliny and Theophrastus were using the same authority, but neither copying the whole of what he found in it.

The second tree, whose leaves were like birds' wings and were used to fix upon helmets, is hard to identify. The first was, when we combine the additional characters quoted by Pliny but omitted by Theophrastus, certainly the jack; the third was, we suspect, the mango (q.v.). The terms long and crooked would, perhaps, answer better to the plantain, but hardly the unwholesome effect. As regards the uno quaternos satiet, compare Friar Jordanus below, on the jack: "Sufficit circiter pro quinque personis." Indeed the whole of the Friar's account is worth comparing with Pliny's. Pliny says that it took four men to eat a jack, Jordanus says five. But an Englishman who had a plantation in Central Java told one of the present writers that he once cut a jack on his ground which took three men—not to eat—but to carry!

As regards the names given by Pliny it is hard to say anything to the purpose, because we do not know to which of the three trees jumbled together the names really applied. If pala really applied to the jack, possibly it may be the Skt. phalasa, or panasa. Or it may be merely p'hala, 'a fruit,' and the passage would then be a comical illustration of the persistence of Indian habits of mind. For a stranger in India, on asking the question, 'What on earth is that?' as he well might on his first sight of a jack-tree with its fruit, would at the present day almost certainly receive for answer: 'Phal hai khudawa!'—'It is a fruit, my lord!' Ariena looks like hiranya, 'golden,' which might be an epithet of the jack, but we find no such specific application of the word.

Omitting Theophrastus and Pliny, the oldest foreign description of the (we presume) the Linnaean name of the plantain Musa sapientum, was founded upon the interpretation of this passage. (It was, I find, the excellent Rumphius who originated the erroneous identification of the ariena with the plantain). Lassen, at first hesitatingly (i. 262), and then more positively (ii. 678), adopts this interpretation, and seeks ariena in the Skt. védra. The shrewder Gilde- meister does the like, for he, sans phrase, uses arienae as Latin for 'plantains.' Ritter, too, accepts it, and is not staggered even by the uno quaternos satiet. Humboldt, quoth he, often saw Indians make their meal with a very little manioc and three bananas of the big kind (Platano-arton). Still less sufficed the Indian Brahmins (sapientes), when one fruit was enough for four of them (v. 876, 877). Bless the venerable Prince of Geographers! Would one Kartoffel, even "of the big kind," make a dinner for four German Professors? Just as little would one plantain suffice four Indian Sages.

The words which we have italicised in the passage from Pliny are quite enough to show that the jack is intended; the fruit growing e cortice (i.e. piercing the bark of the stem, not pendent from twigs like other fruit), the sweetness, the monstrous size, are in combination inaffilible. And as regards its being the fruit of the sages, we may observe that the jack fruit is at this day in Travancore one of the staples of life. But that Pliny, after his manner, has jumbled things, is also manifest. The first two clauses of his description (Major alia, &c.; Folium alas, &c.) are found in Theophrastus, but apply to two different trees. Hence we get rid of the puzzle about the big leaves, which led scholars astray after plantains, and originated Musa sapientum. And it is clear from Theophrastus that the fruit which caused dysentery in the Macedonian army was yet another. So Pliny has rolled three plants into one. Here are the passages of Theophrastus:—

"(1) And there is another tree which is both itself a tree of great size, and produces a fruit that is wonderfully big and sweet. This is used for food by the Indian Sages, who wear no clothes. (2) And there is yet another which has the leaf of a very long shape, and resembling the wings of birds, and this they set upon helmets; the length JACK.

Jack that we find is that by Hwen T'sang, who met with it in Bengal:

c. A.D. 650.—"Although the fruit of the pum-pan-so (panaza) is gathered in great quantities, it is held in high esteem. These fruits are as big as a pumpkin; when ripe they are of a reddish yellow. Split in two they disclose inside a quantity of little fruits as big as crane's eggs; and when these are broken there exudes a juice of reddish-yellow colour and delicious flavour. Sometimes the fruit hangs on the branches, as with other trees; but sometimes it grows from the roots, like the jutting (Radix Chinca), which is found under the ground."—Julien, iii. 75.

c. 1328.—"There are some trees that bear a very big fruit called chaqui; and the fruit is of such size that one is enough for about five persons. There is another tree that has a fruit like that just named, and it is called Bloqui [a corruption of Malaygal. varikka, 'superior fruit'], quite as big and as sweet, but not of the same species. These fruits never grow upon the twigs, for these are not able to bear their weight, but only from the main branches, and even from the trunk of the tree itself down to the very roots."—Friar Jordanae, 13-14.

c. 1390.—"And there be also trees which produce fruits so big that two will be a load for a strong man. And when they are eaten you must oil your hands and your mouth; they are of a fragrant odour and very savoury; the fruit is called chobassii." The name is probably corrupt (perhaps choacassi?). But the passage about oiling the hands and lips is aptly elucidated by the description in Baber's Memoirs (see below), a description matchless in its way, and which falls off sadly in the new translation by M. Pavet de Courteille, which quite omits the "haggises."—

c. 1395.—"The Shaki and Barki. This name is given to certain trees which live to a great age. Their leaves are like those of the walnut, and the fruit grows directly out of the stem of the tree. The fruits borne nearest to the ground are the barki; they are sweeter and better-flavoured than the Shaki . . . " etc. (much to the same effect as before).— Ibn Batuta, iii. 127; see also iv. 228.

c. 1360.—"There is again another wonderful tree called Chake-Baruke, as big as an oak. Its fruit is produced from the trunk, and not from the branches, and is something yellow to be seen, being as big as a great lamb, or a child of three years old. It has a hard rind like that of our pine-cones, so that you have to cut it open with a hatchet; inside it has a pulp of surpassing flavour, with the sweetness of honey, and of the best Italian melon; and this also contains some 500 chestnuts of like flavour, which are capital eating when roasted."— John de' Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., 363.

c. 1440.—"There is a tree commonly found, the trunk of which bears a fruit resembling a pine-cone, but so big that a man can hardly lift it; the rind is green and hard, but still yields to the pressure of the finger. Inside there are some 250 or 300 pippins, as big as figs, very sweet in taste, and contained in separate membranes. These have each a kernel within, of a windsy quality, of the consistence and taste of chestnuts, and which are roasted like chestnuts. And when cast among embers (to roast), unless you make a cut in them they will explode and jump out. The outer rind of the fruit is given to cattle. Sometimes the fruit is also found growing from the roots of the tree underground, and these fruits excel the others in flavour, wherefore they are sent as presents to kings and petty princes. These (moreover) have no kernels inside them. The tree itself resembles a large fig-tree, and the leaves are cut into fingers like the hand. The wood resembles box, and so it is esteemed for many uses. The name of the tree is Cachi" (i.e. Cachi or Tsacchi).—Nicolo de' Conti.

The description of the leaves . . . "foliis da medium palmi interieisis"—is the only slip in this admirable description. Conti must, in memory, have confounded the Jack with its congener the bread-fruit (Artocarpus incisa or incifolia). We have translated from Poggio's Latin, as the version by Mr. Winter Jones in India in the XVth Century is far from accurate.

1530.—"Another is the kadhil. This has a very bad look and flavour (odour?). It looks like a sheep's stomach stuffed and made into a baggis. It has a sweet sickly taste. Within it are stones like a filbert . . . The fruit is very adhesive, and on account of this adhesive quality many rub their mouths with oil before eating them. They grow not only from the branches and trunk, but from its root. You would say that the tree was all hung round with haggises!"—Leiden andTickCount's India, 325. Here kadhil represents the Hind. name kathal. The practice of oiling the lips on account of the "adhesive quality" (or as modern mortals would call it, 'stickiness') of the jack, is still usual among natives, and is the cause of a proverb on premature precautions: Gitch'm en Kathal, honth m'en tele! "You have oiled your lips while the jack still hangs on the tree!" We may observe that the call of the Indian cuckoo is in some of the Gaonetic districts rendered by the natives as Kathal pakkat Kathal pakkâ! i.e. "Jack's ripe," the bird appearing at that season.

[1547.—"I consider it right to make over to them in perpetuity . . . one palm grove and an area for planting certain mango trees and jack trees (mangueiras e jaqueiras) situate in the village of Calanguite. . . . —Archivo. Port. Orient., fasc. 5, No. 88.]

c. 1590.—"In Sircar Hajjypoore there are plenty of the fruits called Kathul and JACKAL.

Buddhal; some of the first are so large as to be too heavy for one man to carry."— Gladwin's Ayen, ii. 25. In Blochmann's ed. of the Persian text he reads barhal, [and so in Jarrett's trans. (i. 152)], which is a Hind.
name for the Artocarpus Lacoocha of Roxb.

1563. — "R. What fruit is that which is as big as the largest (coco) nuts?
"O. You just now ate the chestnuts from inside of it, and you said that roasted they were like real chestnuts. Now you shall eat the envelopes of these . . .
"R. They taste like a melon; but not so good as the better melons.
"O. True. And owing to their viscos nature they are ill to digest; or say rather they are not digested at all, and often issue from the body quite unchanged. I don't much use them. They are called in Malavar jacas; in Canarin and Gusurate pandu. . . .
The tree is a great and tall one; and the fruits grow from the wood of the stem, right up to it, and not on the branches like other fruits."—Garcia, t. 111.

[1598.— "A certain fruit that in Malabar is called iaca, in Canara and Gusurate Panar and Panasat, by the Arabians Panae, by the Persians Panau."—Linschoten, Hak.
Soc. ii. 30.

weighty Fruit."—Fryer, 40.

1810. — "The jack-wood . . . at first yellow, becomes on exposure to the air of the colour of mahogany, and is of as fine a grain."—Marla Graham, 101.

1878.—"The monstrous jack that in its eccentric bulk contains a whole magazine of tastes and smells."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49-50.

It will be observed that the older authorities mention two varieties of the fruit by the names of shaki and barki, or modifications of these, different kinds according to Jordanus, only from different parts of the tree according to Ibn Batuta. P. Vincenzo Maria (1672) also distinguishes two kinds, one of which he calls Giacha Barco, the other Giacha papo or girasole. And Rheede, the great authority on Malabar plants, says (iii. 19):

"Of this tree, however, they reckon more than 30 varieties, distinguished by the quality of their fruit, but all may be reduced to two kinds; the fruit of one kind distinguished by plum and succulent pulp of delicious honey flavour, being the varaka; that of the other, filled with softer and more flabby pulp of inferior flavour, being the Tjakapa."

More modern writers seem to have less perception in such matters than the old travellers, who entered more fully and sympathetically into native tastes. Drury says, however, "There are several varieties, but what is called the Honey-jack is by far the sweetest and best."

"He that desireth to see more hereof let him reade Ludovicus Romanus, in his fifth Booke and fifteene Chapter of his Navigations, and Christopherus a Costa in his cap. of iaca, and Gracia ab
Horto, in the Second Booke and fourth Chapter," saith the learned Paladanus
. . . And if there be anybody so unreasonable, so say we too—by all means let him do so! [A part of this article is derived from the notes to Jordanus by one of the present writers. We may also add, in aid of such further investigation, that Paladanus is the Latinised name of v.d. Broecke, the commentator on Linschoten. "Ludovicus Romanus" is our old friend Varthema, and "Gracia ab Horto" is Garcia De Orta.]

JACKAL. s. The Canis aureus, L., seldom seen in the daytime, unless it be fighting with the vultures for carrion, but in shrieking multitudes, or rather what seem multitudes from the noise they make, entering the precincts of villages, towns, of Calcutta itself, after dark, and startling the newcomer with their hideous yells. Our word is not apparently Anglo-Indian, being taken from the Turkish chakal. But the Pers. shaghal is close, and Skt. srigda, ‘the howler,’ is probably the first form.
The common Hind. word is gidar, [‘the greedy one,’ Skt. griikh]. The jackal takes the place of the fox as the object of hunting ‘meets’ in India; the indigenous fox being too small for sport.

Tureae Giacale vocant. . . ."—Busbeg, Epist. i. p. 78.

1615.—"The inhabitants do nightly house their goats and sheep for fear of iackals (in my opinion no other than Foxes), whereof an infinite number do lurk in the obscure vaults."—Sundys, Relation, &c., 205.

1616.—". . . those jacalls seem to be

1672.—"There is yet another kind of beast which they call Jackalz; they are horribly greedy of man's flesh, so the in-habitants beset the graves of their dead with heavy stones."—Baldens (Germ. ed.), 429.

1673.—"An Hollish concert of Jackals (a kind of Fox)."—Fryer, 53.

1681.—"For here are many Jackalls, which catch their Henes, some Tigres that destroy their Cattle; but the greatest of all is the King; whose occasion is to keep them poor and in want."—Knox, Ceylon, 87. On p. 20 he writes Jacobs.

1711.—"Jackalls are remarkable for Howling in the Night; one alone making as much noise as three or four Cur Dogs, and in different Notes, as if there were half a Dozen of them got together."—Lockyer, 382.

1820.—"The mention of Jackal-hunting in one of the letters (of Lord Minto) may remind some Anglo-Indians still living, of the days when the Calcutta hounds used to throw off at gun-fire."—Sat. Rev. Feb. 14.

JACK-SNIPE of English sportsmen is Gallinago gallinula, Linn., smaller than the common snipe, G. scolopacinus, Bonap.

JACKASS COPAL. This is a trade name, and is a capital specimen of Hobson-Jobson. It is, according to Sir R. Burton, Zanzibar, i. 357, a corruption of chakázi. There are three qualities of copal in the Zanzibar market. 1. Sundaruti m'iti, or 'Tree Copal,' gathered directly from the tree which exudes it (Trachylobium Mossambicense). 2. Chakázi or chakazzi, dug from the soil, but seeming of recent origin, and priced on a par with No. 1. 3. The genuine Sundarust, or true Copal (the Anisé of the English market), which is also fossil, but of ancient production, and bears more than twice the price of 1 and 2 (see Sir J. Kirk in J. Linn. Soc. (Botany) for 1871). Of the meaning of chakázi we have no authentic information. But considering that a pitch made of copal and oil is used in Kutch, and that the cheaper copal would naturally be used for such a purpose, we may suggest as probable that the word is a corr. of jaházi, and = 'ship-copal.'

JACQUETE, Town and Cape, n.p. The name, properly Jakad, formerly attached to a place at the extreme west horn of the Kathiawar Peninsula, where stands the temple of Dwarka (q.v.). Also applied by the Portuguese to the Gulf of Cutch. (See quotation from Camoes under DIUL-SIND.) The last important map which gives this name, so far as we are aware, is Aaron Arrow-smith's great Map of India, 1816, in which Dwarka appears under the name of Juggut.

1555.—"Whilst the tide was at its greatest height we arrived at the gulf of Chakad, where we descried signs of fine weather, such as sea-horses, great snakes, turtles, and sea-weeds."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 77.

1726.—In Valentyn's map we find Jaquette marked as a town (at the west point of Kathiawar) and Encedada da Jaquete for the Gulf of Cutch.

1727.—"The next sea-port town to Bael, is Jigat. It stands on a Point of low Land, called Cape Jigat. The City makes a good Figure from the Sea, showing 4 or 5 high Steeples."—A. Hamilton, i. 135; [ed. 1744].

1813.—"Jigat Point . . . on it is a pagoda; the place where it stands was formerly called Jigat More, but now by the Hindoos Dorcreur (i.e. Dwarka, q.v.). At a distance the pagoda has very much the appearance of a ship under sail . . . Great numbers of pilgrims from the interior visit Jigat pagoda. . ."—Milburn, i. 150.

1841.—"Jigat Point called also Dwarka, from the large temple of Dwarka standing near the coast."—Horsburgh, Directory, 5th ed., i. 480.

JADE, s. The well-known mineral, so much prized in China, and so wonderfully wrought in that and other Asiatic countries; the yaslim of the Persians; nephrite of mineralogists.

The derivation of the word has been the subject of a good deal of controversy. We were at one time inclined to connect it with the yada-tish, the yada stone used by the nomads of Central Asia in conjuring for rain. The stone so used was however, according to P. Hyakinth, quoted in a note with which we were favoured by the lamented Prof. Anton Schiefner, a bezar (q.v.).

Major Raverty, in his translation of the Tabakît-i-Naşiri, in a passage referring to the regions of Tukhâristân and Bâmiân, has the following: "That tract of country has also been famed and celebrated, to the uttermost parts of the countries of the world, for its mines of gold, silver, rubies, and crystal, bejâdâ [jade], and other [precious] things" (p. 421). On bejâdâ his note runs: "The name of a gem, by some said to be a species of ruby, and by others a species of sapphire; but jade is no doubt meant." This interpretation seems however chiefly, if not altogether, suggested by the name; whilst the epithets compounded of bejâdâ, as given in dictionaries, suggest a red mineral, which jade rarely is. And Prof. Max Müller, in an interesting letter to the Times, dated Jan. 10, 1880, states that the name jade was not known in Europe till after the discovery of America, and that the jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards piedra de ijada, because it was supposed to cure pain in the groin (Sp. iâda); for like reasons to which it was called lapis nephriticus, whence nephrite (see Bailey, below). Skeat, s.v.: "It is of unknown origin; but probably Oriental. Prof. Cowell finds yelâ a material out of which ornaments are made, in the Divyâvâdâna; but it does not seem to be Sanskrit." Prof. Müller's etymology seems incontrovertible; but the present work has afforded various examples of curious etymological coincidences of this kind. [Prof. Max Müller's etymology is now accepted by the N.E.D. and by Prof. Skeat in the new edition of his Concise Dict. The latter adds that ijada is connected with the Latin ilia.]

1595.—"A kinda of greed stones, which the Spaniards call Piedras hijadas, and we use for spleene stones."—Raleigh, Discov. Guiana, 24 (quoted in N.E.D.).

1730.—"Jade, a greenish Stone, bordering on the colour of Olive, esteemed for its Hardness and Virtues by the Turks and Poles, who adorn their fine Sabres with it; and said to be a preservative against the nephritick Colick."—Bailey's Eng. Dict. s.v.

1820.—"'Pray, sir,' said the barber, 'is that Sanscrit, or what language!' 'May be it is jadooc,' I replied, in a solemn and deep voice."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1878, i. 127.

JADOOGUR, s. Properly Hind. jâdâg-hâr, 'conjuring-house' (see the last). The term commonly applied by natives to a Freemasons' Lodge, when there is one, at an English station. On the Bombay side it is also called Shaitân khâna (see Burton's Sind Revisited), a name consonant to the ideas of an Italian priest who intimated to one of the present writers that he had heard the raising of the devil was practised at Masonic meetings, and asked his friend's opinion as to the fact. In S. India the Lodge is called Talai-vetta-Kovil, 'Cut-head Temple,' because part of the rite of initiation is supposed to consist in the candidate's head being cut off and put on again.

JAFNA, JAFNAPATÁM, n.p.
The very ancient Tamil settlement, and capital of the Tamil kings on the singular peninsula which forms the northernmost part of Ceylon. The real name is, according to Emerson Tennent, Valpannad, and it is on the whole probable that this name is identical with the Galiba (Prom.) of Ptolemy. [The Madras Gloss. gives the Tamil name as Täzhippätam, from yazkJ-paññam, 'a lute-player'; "called after a blind minstrel of that name from the Chola country, who by permission of the Singhalese king obtained possession of Jaffna, then uninhabited, and introduced there a colony of the Tamil people."]

c. 1666.—In Cesare de' Federici it is written Gianifanpatan.—Ramusio, iii. 3900.
JAGFRY, s. A screen or lattice-work, made generally of bamboo, used for various purposes, such as a fence, a support for climbing plants, &c. The ordinary Pers. ja'farı is derived from a person of the name of Ja'far; but Mr. Platts suggests that in the sense under consideration it may be a corr. of Ar. ẓafirat, ẓafir, 'a braided lock.'

[1832.—"Of vines, the branches must also be equally spread over the jaffry, so that light and heat may have access to the whole."—Trans. Agric. Hort. Soc. Ind. ii. 202.]

JAGGERY, s. Coarse brown (or almost black) sugar, made from the sap of various palms. The wild date tree (Phoenix sylvestris, Roxb.), Hind. khajuria, is that which chiefly supplies palm-sugar in Guzerat and Coromandel, and almost alone in Bengal. But the palmyra, the caryota, and the coco-palm all give it; the first as the staple of Tinnevelly and northern Ceylon; the second chiefly in southern Ceylon, where it is known to Europeans as the Jaggery Palm (kital of natives); the third is much drawn for toddy (q.v.) in the coast districts of Western India, and this is occasionally boiled for sugar. Jaggery is usually made in the form of small round cakes. Great quantities are produced in Tinnevelly, where the cakes used to pass as a kind of currency (as cakes of salt used to pass in parts of Africa, and in Western China), and do even yet to some small extent. In Bombay all rough unrefined sugar-stuff is known by this name; and it is the title under which all kinds of half-prepared sugar is classified in the tariff of the Railways there. The word jaggery is only another form of sugar (q.v.), being like it a corr. of the Skt. sarkara, Konkani sakkarad, [Malayal. chakkara, whence it passed into Port. jagara, jagra].

1516.—"Sugar of palms, which they call xagara."—Barbosa, 59.

1553.—Exports from the Maldives "also of fish-oil, coco-nuts, and jagara, which is made from these after the manner of sugar."—Barroso, Dec. iii. liv. iii. cap. 7.

1561.—"Jagre, which is sugar of palm-trees."—Correa, Lendas, i. 2, 592.

1563.—"And after they have drawn this pot of cura, if the tree gives much they draw another, of which they make sugar, prepared either by sun or fire, and this they call jagra."—Garcia, t. 67.

c. 1567.—"There come every yeere from Cochin and from Cannanor tenne or fifteene great Shippes (to Chaul) laden with great nuts . . . and with sugar made of the same nuts called Giagra."—Caesar Frederike, in Hakl. ii. 344.

1598.—"Of the aforesaid sūra they likewise make sugar, which is called ḫagra; they seeth the water, and set it in the sun, whereof it becometh sugar, but it is little esteemed, because it is of a browne colour."—Linnebolten, 102; [Hak. Soc. ii. 40].

1616.—"Some small quantity of wine, but not common, is made among them; they call it ḫa'ak (see ARRACK), distilled from Sugar, and a spicy rinde of a tree called ḫagra."—Terry, ed. 1685, p. 365.

1727.—"The Produce of the Samorin's Country is . . . Cocoa-Nut, and that tree produceth Jaggery, a kind of sugar, and Copera (see COPRAH), or the kernels of the Nut dried."—A. Hamilton, i. 506; [ed. 1744, i. 308].

c. 1750-60.—"Arrack, a coarse sort of sugar called Jagree, and vinegar are also extracted from it" (coco-palm).—Grose, i. 47.

1807.—"The Turi or fermented juice, and the Jaggory or ininspissated juice of the Pal- mira tree . . . are in this country more esteemed than those of the wild date, which is contrary to the opinion of the Bengalese."—F. Buchanan, Myssore, &c., i. 5.

1860.—"In this state it is sold as jaggery in the bazaars, at about three farthings per pound."—Tennent's Ceylon, iii. 524.

JAGHEER, JAGHIRE, s. Pers. jāgīr, lit. 'place-holding.' A hereditary assignment of land and of its rent as annuity.

[c. 1590.—"Fermann-i-zabatu are issued for . . . appointments to jāgīrs, without military service."—Ain, i. 281.]

c. 1617.—"Hee quittes diuers small Jaggers to the King."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 449.

1696.—". . . Not to speak of what they finger out of the Pay of every Horseman, and of the number of the Horses; which certainly amounts to very considerable Pensions, especially if they can obtain good Jah-ghirs, that is, good Lands for their Pensions."—Bernier, E.T. 66; [ed. Constable, 213].

1673.—"It (Surat) has for its Maintenance the Income of six Villages; over which the Governor sometimes presides, sometimes not, being in the Jagheer, or diocese of another."—Fryer, 120.

1674.—"Jageah, an Annuity."—Ibid. Index, vi.

1768.—"I say, Madam, I know nothing of books; and yet I believe upon a land-carriage fishery, a stamp act, or a jaghire, I can talk my two hours without feeling the want of them."—Mr. Lofty, in The Good-Natured Man, Act ii.
JAGHEERDAR. 447 JAM.

1778.—"Should it be more agreeable to the parties, Sir Matthew will settle upon Sir John and his Lady, for their joint lives, a jaghire.

"Sir John.—A Jaghire?
"Thomas.—The term is Indian, and means an annual Income."—Foote, The Nabob, i. 1.

We believe the traditional stage pronunciation in these passages is Jag Hire (assonant in both syllables to Quag Mire); and this is also the pronunciation given in some dictionaries.

1778.—"... Jaghires, which were always rents arising from lands."—Orrus, ed. 1803, ii. 52.

1809.—"He was nominally in possession of a larger Jaghire."—Ld. Valetud, i. 401.

A territory adjoining Fort St. George was long known as the Jaghire, or the Company's Jaghire, and is often so mentioned in histories of the 18th century. This territory, granted to the Company by the Nabob of Arcot in 1750 and 1763, nearly answers to the former Collectorate of Chenganpur and present Collectorate of Madras.

[1900.—"No doubt upon the occasion of Lord Curzon's introduction to the Waziris and the Mohminds, he will inform their Jagirs that he has long since written a book about them."—Contemporary Rec. Aug. p. 282.]

JAGHEERDAR, s. P.—H. jagirdar, the holder of a jagheer.

[1813.—"... in the Mahrratta empire the principal Jaghirepars, or nobles, appear in the field. ..."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 328.]

1826.—"The Resident, many officers, men of rank... jagheerpars, Brahmans, and Pandits, were present, assembled round my father."—Pandurang Hari, 389; [ed. 1873, ii. 259].

1883. — "The Sikhs administered the country by means of jagheerpars, and paid them by their jagheers; the English administered it by highly paid British officers, at the same time that they endeavoured to lower the land-tax, and to introduce grand material reforms."—Bosworth Smith, L. of Ld. Lawrence, i. 378.

JAIN, s. and adj. The non-Brahmanical sect so called; believed to represent the earliest heretiees of Buddhism, at present chiefly to be found in the Bombay Presidency. There are a few in Mysore, Canara, and in some parts of the Madras Presidency, but in the Middle Ages they appear to have been numerous on the coast of the Peninsula generally. They are also found in various parts of Central and Northern India and Behar. The Jains are generally merchants, and some have been men of enormous wealth (see Colebrooke's Essays, i. 375 seqq.; [Lassen, Ind. Antiq. ii. 193 seqq., 258 seqq.]). The name is Skt. jaina, meaning a follower of jina. The latter word is a title applied to certain saints worshipped by the sect in the place of gods; it is also a name of the Buddhists. An older name for the followers of the sect appears to have been Nirgrantha, 'without bond,' properly the title of Jain ascetics only (otherwise Yatis), and in particular of the Digambara or 'sky-clad,' naked branch. (Burnell, S. Indian Palaeography, p. 47, note.)

[c. 1590.—"Jaina. The founder of this wonderful system was Jina, also called Arhat, or Arhant."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, iii. 188.]

JALEEBOTE, s. Jâlibot. A marine corruption of jolly-boat (Roebeck). (See GALLEVAT.)

JAM, s. Jâm. a. A title borne by certain chiefs in Kutch, in Kâthiâwar, and on the lower Indus. The derivation is very obscure (see Elliott, i. 495). The title is probably Bilâch originally. There are several Jâms in Lower Sind and its borders, and notably the Jâm of Las Bela State, a well-known dependency of Kelat, bordering the sea. [Mr. Longworth Dames writes: "I do not think the word is of Balochi origin, although it is certainly made use of in the Balochi language. It is rather Sindhi, in the broad sense of the word, using Sindhi as the natives do, referring to the tribes of the Indus valley without regard to the modern boundaries of the province of Sind. As far as I know, it is used as a title, not by Baloches, but by indigenous tribes of Râjput or Jat origin, now, of course, all Musulmans. The Jâm of Las Bela belongs to a tribe of this nature known as the Jâmhat. In the Dera Ghâzi Khân District it is used by certain local notables of this class, none of them Baloches. The principal tribe there using it is the Udhâna. It is also an honorific title among the Mochis of Dera Ghâzi Khân town."]
b. A nautical measure, Ar. zam, pl. azwām. It occurs in the form āzam in a quotation of 1614 under JASK. It is repeatedly used in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali, published in the J. As. Soc. Bengal. It would appear from J. Prinsep's remarks there that the word is used in various ways. Thus Baron J. Hammer writes to Prinsep: "Concerning the measure of azwām the first section of the 11th chapter explains as follows: 'The zam is either the practical one (īrfi), or the rhetorical (iṣṭilāhi—but this the acute Prinsep suggests should be aṣṭarūbāḥ, pertaining to the divisions of the astrolabe). The practical is one of the 8 parts into which day and night are divided; the rhetorical (but read the astrolabic) is the 8th part of an inch (iṣāba) in the ascension and declension of the stars; . . . an explanation which helps me not a bit to understand the true measure of a zam, in the reckoning of a ship's course." Prinsep then elucidates this: The zam in practical parlance is said to be the 8th part of day and night; it is in fact a nautical watch or Hindu pahar (see Puhur). Again, it is the 8th part of the ordinary inch, like the jau or barleycorn of the Hindus (the 8th part of an angul or digit), of which jau, zam is possibly a corruption. Again, the iṣāba or inch, and the zam or ⅛ of an inch, had been transferred to the rude angle-instruments of the Arab navigators; and Prinsep deduces from statements in Sidi 'Ali's book that the iṣāba 'was very nearly equal to 96° and the zam to 12°. Prinsep had also found on enquiry among Arab mariners, that the term zam was still well known to nautical people as ⅛ of a geographical degree, or 12 nautical miles, quite confirmatory of the former calculation; it was also stated to be still applied to terrestrial measurements (see J.A.S.B. v. 642-3).

1554. "26th Voyage from Calicut to Karfudun" (see Guardafui).

"... you run from Calicut to Kolsaini (i.e. Kalpeni, one of the Laccadive Isds.) two zams in the direction of W. by S., the 8 or 9 zams W.S.W. (this course is in the 9 degrees South through the Laccadives), then you may rejoice as you have got clear of the islands of Fāl, from thence W. by N. and W.N.W. till the pole is 4 inches and a quarter, and then true west to Karfudun."
to the rose-apple and the guava, and Wilkinson (Dict. s.v.) notes a large number of fruits to which the name jambh is applied."

Garcia de Orta mentions the rose-apple under the name Iambps, and says (1563) that it had been recently introduced into Goa from Malacca. This may have been the Eugenia Malaccensis, L., which is stated in Forbes Watson’s Catalogue of nomenclature to be called in Benga Malaka Jamra, and in Tamil Malakam maram i.e. ‘Malacca tree.’ The Skt. name jambh is, in the Malay language, applied with distinguishing adjectives to all the species.

[1598.—"The trees whereon the Iambps do grow are as great as Plumptrees."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 31.]

1672.—P. Vincenzo Maria describes the Giambo di India with great precision, and also the Giambo di China—no doubt J. malaccensis—but at too great length for extract, pp. 351-352.

1727.—"Their Jambo Malacco (at Goa) is very beautiful and pleasant."—A. Hamilton, i. 255; [ed. 1744, i. 258].

1810.—"The jumbo, a species of rose-apple, with its flower like crimson tassels covering every part of the stem."—Maria Graham, 22.

JAMES AND MARY, n.p. The name of a famous sand-bank in the Hoogly R. below Calcutta, which has been fatal to many a ship. It is mentioned under 1748, in the record of a survey of the river quoted in Long, p. 10. It is a common alligation that the name is a corruption of the Hind. words jai mar, with the supposed meaning of ‘dead water.’ But the real origin of the name dates, as Sir G. Birdwood has shown, out of India Office records, from the wreck of a vessel called the "Royal James and Mary," in September 1694, on that sand-bank (Letter to the Court, from Chuttanuttet, Dec. 19, 1694). [Report on Old Records, 90.] This shoal appears by name in a chart belonging to the English Pilot, 1711.

JAMMA, s. P.—H. jama, a piece of native clothing. Thus, in composition, see PYJAMMAS. Also stuff for clothing, &c., e.g. mom-jama, wax-cloth. ['“The jama may have been brought by the Aryans from Central Asia, but as it is still now seen it is thoroughly Indian and of ancient date" (Rajendralala Mitra, Indo-Aryans, i. 187 seq.)]

[1813.—"The better sort (of Hindus) wear . . . a jama, or long gown of white calico, which is tied round the middle with a fringed or embroidered sash."—Forbes, Or. Men., 2nd ed. i. 52].

JAMMOON, s. Hind. jaman, jaman, jami, &c. The name of a poor fruit common in many parts of India, and apparently in E. Africa, the Eugenia jambolana, Lamk. (Calypranthes jambolana of Willdenow, Syzygium jambolanum of Decand.) This seems to be confounded with the Eugenia jambos, or Rose-apple (see JAMBOO, above), by the author of a note on Leyden’s Baber which Mr. Erskine justly corrects (Baber’s own account is very accurate), by the translators of Ibn Batuta, and apparently, as regards the botanical name, by Sir R. Burton. The latter gives jambil as the Indian, and zam as the Arabic name. The name jambh appears to be applied to this fruit at Bombay, which of course promotes the confusion spoken of. In native practice the stones of this fruit have been alleged to be a cure for diabetes, but European trials do not seem to have confirmed this.

c. 13.—"The inhabitants (of Mombasa) gather also a fruit which they call jamun, and which resembles an olive; it has a stone like the olive, but has a very sweet taste."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. Elsewhere the translators write点钟 (iii. 128, iv. 114, 229), a spelling indicated in the original, but surely by some error.

c. 1530.—"Another is the jaman. . . . It is on the whole a fine looking tree. Its fruit resembles the black grape, but has a more acid taste, and is not very good."—Baber, 325. The note on this runs: "This, Dr. Hunter says, is the Eugenia Jambolana, the rose-apple (Eugenia jambolana, but not the rose-apple, which is now called Eugenia jambus.—D.W.). The jaman has no resemblance to the rose-apple; it is more like an oblong sloe than anything else, but grows on a tall tree." 1562.—"I will eat of those olives, . . . at least they look like such; but they are very astrigent (ponticus) as if bending, . . . and yet they do look like ripe Cordova olives.

"O. They are called jambolones, and grow wild in a wood that looks like a myrtle grove; in its leaves the tree resembles the arbutus; but like the jack, the people of the country don’t hold this fruit for very wholesome."—Garcia, f. 111y.
1859.—"The Indian jamli. . . It is a noble tree, which adorns some of the east villages and plantations, and it produces a damson-like fruit, with a pleasant sub-acid flavour."—Burton, in J.R.G.S. ix. 36.

JANCADA. s. This name was given to certain responsible guides in the Nair country who escorted travellers from one inhabited place to another, guaranteeing their security with their own lives, like the Bhāts of Guzerat. The word is Malayal. channātām (i.e. changngadam, [the Madras Gloss. writes channattam, and derives it from Skt. sanghāta, 'union'), with the same spelling as that of the word given as the origin of jangar or jangada, 'a raft.' These jangadas or jangadas seem also to have been placed in other confidential and dangerous charges. Thus:

1643.—"This man who so resolutely died was one of the jangadas of the Pagode. They are called jangades because the kings and lords of those lands, according to a custom of theirs, send as guardians of the houses of the Pagodes in their territories, two men as captains, who are men of honour and good cavaliers. Such guardians are called jangadas, and have soldiers of guard under them, and are as it were the Counsellors and Ministers of the affairs of the pagodes, and they receive their maintenance from the establishment and its revenues. And sometimes the king changes them and appoints others."—Correa, iv. 328.

c. 1610.—"I travelled with another Captain . . . who had with him these Jangai, who are the Nair guides, and who are found at the gates of towns to act as escort to those who require them. . . . Every one takes them, the weak for safety and protection, those who are stronger, and travel in great companies and well armed, take them only as witnesses that they are not aggressors in case of any dispute with the Nairs."—Pyrrad de Laval, ch. xxv.; [Hak. Soc. i. 339, and see Mr. Gray's note in loco.]

1672.—"The safest of all journeyings in India are those through the Kingdom of the Nairs and the Samorin, if you travel with Giancadas, the most perilous if you go alone. These Giancadas are certain heathen men, who venture their own life and the lives of their kinsfolk for small remuneration, to guarantee the safety of travellers."—P. Vincento Maria, 127.

JANGAR. s. A raft. Port. jangada. ["A double platform canoe made by placing a floor of boards between two boats, with a bamboo railing." (Madras Gloss.)] This word, chiefly colloquial, is the Tamil-Malayal. shangddam, channātām (for the derivation of which see JANCADA). It is a word of particular interest as being one of the few Dravidian words, [but perhaps ultimately of Skt. origin], preserved in the remains of classical antiquity, occurring in the Periplus as our quotation shows. Bluteau does not call the word an Indian term.

c. 80-90.—"The vessels belonging to these places (Camara, Podoué, and Sopotna on the east coast) which hug the shore to Limryico (Dimyrico), and others also called 2αγγαρα (= those which consist of the largest canoes of single timbers lashed together; and again those biggest of all which sail to Chryse and Ganges, and are called Κολανδιαμομα)."—Periplus, in Müller's Geog. Gr. Min., i. "The first part of this name for boats or ships is most probably the Tam. κουντίνα (= hollowed: the last 6αμ.=boat."—Burnell, S.I. Palaeography, 612.

c. 1504.—"He held in readiness many jangadas of timber."—Correa, Lendas, i. 476.

c. 1540.—". . . and to that purpose he had already commanded two great Rafts (jangadas), covered with dry wood, barrels of pitch and other combustible stuff, to be placed at the entering into the Port."—Pinto (orig. cap. xlvii.), in Cogan, p. 56.

1553.—"The fleet . . . which might consist of more than 200 rowing vessels of all kinds, a great part of them combined into jangadas in order to carry a greater mass of men, and among them two of these contrivances on which were 150 men."—Barros, II. i. 5.

1598.—"Such as stayed in the ship, some tooke bords, deals, and other peeces of wood, and bound them together (which ye Portingals cal Jangadas) every man what they could catch, all hoping to save their lives, but of all those there came but two men safe to shore."—Linckoten, p. 147; [Hak. Soc. ii. 181; and see Mr. Gray on Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 53 seq.]

1602.—"For his object was to see if he could rescue them in jangadas, which he ordered him immediately to put together of baulks, planks, and oars."—Couto, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

1756.—". . . having set fire to a jungodo of Boats, these driving down towards the Fleet, compelled them to weigh."—Capt. Jackson, in Dallymingle's Or. Rep. i. 199.

c. 1790.—"Sangarie." See quotation under HACKERY.

c. 1798.—"Nous nous remimes en chemin à six heures du matin, et passâmes la rivière dans un sangarie ou cantok fuit d'un palmier creusé."—Haafner, ii. 77.

JAPAN, n.p. Mr. Giles says: "Our word is from Jeh-pun, the Dutch orthography of the Japanese Ni-pon." What the Dutch have to do with the matter is hard to see. ["Our word 'Japan' and the Japanese Nihon or Nippon, are alike corruptions of Jih-pen, the Chinese pronunciation of the characters (meaning) literally 'sun-origin.'" (Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 221.)] A form closely resembling Japân, as we pronounce it, must have prevailed, among foreigners at least, in China as early as the 13th century; for Marco Polo calls it Chi-pan-gu or Jipan-ku, a name representing the Chinese Zhi-pên-K'ue (Sun-origin-Kingdom), the Kingdom of the Sunrise or Extreme Orient, of which the word Nipon or Niphon, used in Japan, is said to be a dialectic variation. But as there was a distinct gap in Western tradition between the 14th century and the 16th, no doubt we, or rather the Portuguese, acquired the name from the traders at Malacca, in the Malay forms, which Crawford gives as Jâping and Jâpang.

1505. "... and not far off they took a ship belonging to the King of Callichut; out of which they have brought me certain jewels of good value; including Mococo, pearls worth 8,000 ducats; also three astrological instruments of silver, such as are not used by our astrolgers, large and well-wrought, which I hold in the highest estimation. They say that the King of Callichut had sent the said ship to an island called Saponin to obtain the said instruments. ...": Letter from the K. of Portugal (Dom Manuel) to the K. of Castile (Ferdinand). Reprint by A. Burnell, 1881, p. 8.

1521. "In going by this course we passed near two very rich islands; one is in twenty degrees latitude in the antarctic pole, and is called Cipanghu."—Pigafetta, Magellan's Voyage, Hak. Soc. 67. Here the name appears to be taken from the chart or Mappe-Monde which was carried on the voyage. Cipanghu appears by that name on the globe of Martin Behaim (1492), but 20 degrees north, not south, of the equator.

1545. "Now as for us three Portugals, having nothing to sell, we employed our time either in fishing, hunting, or seeing the Temples of these Gentiles, which were very sumptuous and rich, whereinto the Bonzes, who are their priests, received us

mai or Kiang-mai, &c., is so called in narratives of the 17th century. Serious efforts to establish trade with this place were made by the E. I. Company in the early part of the 17th century, of which notice will be found in Purchas, Pilgrimage, and Sainsbury, e.g. in vol. i. (1614), pp. 311, 325; (1615) p. 425; (1617) ii. p. 90. The place has again become the scene of commercial and political interest; an English Vice-Consulate has been established; and a railway survey undertaken. [See Hallett, A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 74 seq.]

c. 1544.—"Out of this Lake of Singapom... do four very large and deep rivers proceed, whereof the first... runneth Eastward through all the Kingdoms of Sorrow and Siam...; the Second, Jangumaa... disimbreaking into the Sea by the Bar of Martubano in the Kingdom of Pegu..."—Pinto (in Ozan, 165).

1553.—(Barros illustrates the position of the different kingdoms of India by the figure of a (left) hand, laid with the palm downwards) "And as regards the western part, following always the sinew of the forefinger, it will correspond with the ranges of mountains running from north to south along which lie the kingdom of Ava, and Bremá, and Jangómá."—III. ii. 5.

c. 1587.—"I went from Pegu to Jamahyey, which is in the Country of the Langiennes, whom we call Langomes; it is five and twenty days journey to Northeast from Pegu... Hither to Jamahyey come many Merchants out of China, and bring great store of Muske, Gold, Silver, and many things of China worke."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii.

c. 1606.—"But the people, or most part of them, fled to the territories of the King of Jangoma, where they were met by the Padre Friar Francisco, of the Annunciation, who was there negotiating..."—Bocear, 136.

1612.—"The Siamese go out with their heads shaven, and leave long mustachios on their faces; their garb is much like that of the Peguans. The same may be said of the Jangomá and the Laocjos" (see LAN JOHN).—Couto, V. vi. 1.

c. 1615.—"The King (of Pegu) which now reigneth... hath in his time recovered from the King of Siam... the town and kingdom of Jangomay, and therein an Englishman called Thomas Samuel, who not long before had been sent from Siam by Master Lucas Anthonison, to discover the Trade of that country by the sale of certain goods sent along with him for that purpose."—W. Method, in Purchas, v. 1006.

1553.—" After leaving to the eastward the isles of the Lequios (see LEW CHEW) and of the Japons (dos Japões), and the great province of Meaco, which for its great size we know not whether to call it Island or Continent, the coast of China still runs on, and those parts pass beyond the antipodes of the meridian of Lisbon."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1727.—"Japon, with the neighbouring Islands under its Dominions, is about the magnitude of Great Britain."—A. Hamilton, ii. 306; [ed. 1744, ii. 305].

JARGON, JARCOON, ZIRCON, s.
The name of a precious stone often mentioned by writers of the 16th century, but respecting the identity of which there seems to be a little obscurity. The English Encyclopaedia, and the Times Reviewer of Emanuel's book On Precious Stones (1866), identify it with the hyacinth or jacinth; but Lord Stanley of Alderley, in his translation of Barboa (who mentions the stone several times under the form giagonza and jagonzan), on the authority of a practical jeweller identifies it with corundum. This is probably an error. Jagonza looks like a corruption of jacinthus. And Haiy's Mineralogy identifies jargon and hyacinth under the common name of zircon. Dana's Mineralogy states that the term hyacinth is applied to these stones, consisting of a silicate of zirconia, "which present bright colours, considerable transparency, and smooth shining surfaces. . . The variety from Ceylon, which is colourless, and has a smoky tinge, and is therefore sold for inferior diamonds, is sometimes called jargon" (Syst. of Mineral., 3rd ed., 1850, 379-380; [Encycl. Britt. 9th ed. xxiv. 789 seq.]).

The word probably comes into European languages through the Span. azarcon, a word of which there is a curious history in Dozy and Engelmann. Two Spanish words and their distinct Arabic originals have been confounded in the Span. Dict. of Cobarruvias (1611) and others following him. Sp. azarca is 'a woman with blue eyes,' and this comes from Ar. zarka, fem. of azrak, 'blue.' This has led the lexicographers above referred to astray, and azarcon has been by them defined as a 'blue earth, made of burnt lead.' But azarcon really applies to 'red-lead,' or vermilion, as does the Port. zarco, azarcão, and its proper sense is as the Dict. of the Sp. Academy says (after repeating the inconsistent explanation and etymology of Cobarruvias), "an intense orange-colour, Lat. color aureus." This is from the Ar. zarkân, which in Ibn Baitar is explained as synonymous with salîkûn, and asrân, "which the Greeks call sandiza," i.e. cinnabar or vermilion (see Sonheimer's Eln Beithar, i. 44, 530). And the word, as Dozy shows, occurs in Pliny under the form syricum (see quotations below). The eventual etymology is almost certainly Persian, either zarĝân, 'gold colour,' as Marcel Devic suggests, or azarjân (perhaps more properly azargân, from âzar, 'fire'), 'flame-colour,' as Dozy thinks.

1796.—"The artists of Ceylon prepare rings and heads of canes, which contain a complete assortment of all the precious stones found in that island. These assemblages are called Jargons de Ceilan, and are so called because they consist of a collection of gems which reflect various colours."—Fra Paoloino, Eng. ed. 1800, 393. (This is a very loose translation. Fra Paoloino evidently thought Jargon was a figurative name applied to this mixture of stones, as it is to a mixture of languages).

1813.—"The colour of Jargons is grey, with tinges of green, blue, red, and yellow."—I. Maior, A Treatise on Diamonds, &c. 119.

1860.—"The 'Matura Diamonds,' which are largely used by the native jewellers, consist of zircon, found in the syenite, not only uncoloured, but also of pink and yellow tints, the former passing for rubies."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 38.

JAROOL, s. The Lagerstroemia reginæ, Roxb. H.-Beng. jārāl, jāral. A tree very extensively diffused in the forests of Eastern and Western India and Pegu. It furnishes excellent boat-timber, and is a splendid flowering tree. "An exceedingly glorious tree of the Concans jungles, in the month of May robed as in imperial purple, with its terminal panicles of large showy purple flowers. I for the first time introduced it largely into Bombay gardens, and called it Flóss reginæ"—Sir G. Birdwood, MS.

1850.—"Their forests are frequented by timber-cutters, who fell jarlool, a magnificent tree with red wood, which, though soft, is durable under water, and therefore in universal use for boat building."—Hooker, Hist. Journals, ed. 1855, ii. 318.

1855.—"Much of the way from Rangoon also, by the creeks, to the great river, was through actual dense forest, in which the jarol covered with purple blossoms, made a noble figure."—Blackwood's Mag., May 1856, 538.

JASK, JASQUES, CAPE, n.p. Ar. Rás Jâšák, a point on the eastern side of the Gulf of Ömán, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, and 6 miles south of a port of the same name. The latter was frequented by the vessels of the English Company whilst the Portuguese held Ormus. After the Portuguese were driven out of Ormus (1622) the English trade was moved to Gombroon (q.v.). The peninsula of which Cape Jask is the point, is now the terminus of the submarine cable from Bushire; and a company of native infantry is quartered there. Jâšak appears in Yâkût as "a large island between the land of Ömán and the Island of Kish." No island corresponds to this description, and probably the reference is an incorrect one to Jask (see Dict. de la Perse, p. 149). By a curious misapprehension, Cape Jasques seems to have been Englished as Cape James (see Dunn's Or. Navigator, 1780, p. 94).

JAUN, s. This is a term used in Calcutta, and occasionally in Madras, of which the origin is unknown to the present writers. [Mr. H. Beveridge points out that it is derived from H.—Beng. yān, defined by Sir G. Haughton: "a vehicle, any means of conveyance, a horse, a carriage, a palkee." It is Skt. yāna, with the same meaning. The initial ya in Bengali is usually pronounced ja. The root is yā, 'to go.' It is, or was, applied to a small palanquin carriage, such as is commonly used by business men in going to their offices, &c.

JAVA, n.p. This is a geographical name of great antiquity, and occurs, as our first quotation shows, in Ptolemy's Tables. His iâsâbâv represents with singular correctness what was probably the Prakrit or popular form of Yava-drîpa (see under DIU and MALDIVES), and his interpretation of the Sanskrit is perfectly correct. It will still remain a question whether Yava was not applied to some cereal more congenial to the latitude than barley,* or was (as is possible) an attempt to give an Indian meaning to some aboriginal name of similar sound. But the sixth of our quotations, the transcript and translation of a Sanskrit inscription in the Museum at Batavia by Mr. Holle, which we owe to the kindness of Prof. Kern, indicates that a significaition of wealth in cereals was attached to the name in the early days of its Indian civilization. This inscription is most interesting, as it is the oldest dated inscription yet discovered upon Javanese soil. Till a recent time it was not known that there was any mention of Java in Sanskrit literature, and this was so when Lassen published the 2nd vol. of his Indian Antiquities (1849). But in fact Java was mentioned in the Râmâyana, though a perverted reading disguised the fact until the publication of the Bombay edition in 1863. The passage is given in our second quotation; and we also give passages from two later astronomical works whose date is approximately known. The Yava-Koṭī, or Java Point of these writers is understood by Prof. Kern to be the eastern extremity of the island.

We have already (see BENJAMIN) alluded to the fact that the terms Jāva, Jâvi were applied by the Arabs to the Archipelago generally, and often with specific reference to Sumatra. Prof. Kern, in a paper to which we are largely indebted, has indicated that this larger application of the term was originally Indian. He has discussed it in connection with the terms "Golden and Silver Islands" (Suvarna dvîpa and Rûrya dvîpa), which occur in the quotation from the Râmâyana, and elsewhere in Sanskrit literature, and which evidently were the basis of the Chrysē and Argyrē, which take various forms in the writings of the Greek and Roman geographers. We cannot give the details of his discussion, but his condensed conclusions are as follows:—

(1.) Suvarna-dvîpa and Yava-dvîpa were according to the prevalent representations the same; (2.) Two names of islands originally distinct were confounded with one another; (3.) Suvarna-dvîpa in its proper meaning is Sumatra, Yava-dvîpa in its proper meaning is Java; (4.) Sumatra, or a part of it, and Java were regarded as one whole, doubtless because they were politically united; (5.) By Yava-koṭī was indicated the east point of Java.

This Indian (and also insular) identification, in whole or in part, of Sumatra with Java explains a variety of puzzles, e.g. not merely the Arab application of Java, but also the ascription, in so many passages, of great wealth of gold to Java, though the island, to which that name properly belongs, produces no gold. This tradition of gold-produce we find in the passages quoted from Ptolemy, from the Râmâyana, from the Holle inscription, and from Marco Polo. It becomes quite intelligible when we are taught that Java and Sumatra were at one time both embraced under the former name, for Sumatra has always been famous for its gold-production. [Mr. Skeat notes as an interesting fact that the standard Malay name Jâvi and the Javanese Jâwa preserve the original form of the word.]

* The Teutonic word Corn affords a handy instance of the varying application of the name of a cereal to that which is, or has been, the staple grain of each country. Corn in England familiarly means 'wheat'; in Scotland 'oats'; in Germany 'rye'; in America 'maize.'
(Ancient).—"Search carefully Yava dvipa, adorned by seven Kingdoms, the Golden and Silver Island, rich in mines of gold. Beyond Yava dvipa is the Mountain called Sisira, whose top touches the sky, and which is visited by gods and demons."—Rāmāyana, IV. xI. 36 (from Kern).

A.D. c. 150.—"Iabadiu (Iaβαδιον), which means 'Island of barley,' most fruitful the island is said to be, and also to produce much gold; also the metropolis is said to have the name Argyrō (Silver), and to stand a: the western end of the island."—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 29.

414.—"Thus they voyaged for about ninety days, when they arrived at a country called Ya-va-di [i.e. Yava-devipa]. In this country heretics and Brahmins flourish, but the Lw of Buddha hardly deserves mentioning."

A.D. 630.—"When the sun rises in Ceylon it is sunset in the City of the Blessed (Siddha-pura, i.e. The Fortunate Islands, noon at Yava-koti, and midnight in the Land of the Romans."—Arjuyatha, IV. v. 13 (from Kern).

A.D. 3. 650.—"Eastward by a fourth part of the earth's circumference, in the world-quarter of the Bhadrāśvas lies the City famous under the name of Yava koti whose walls and gates are of gold."—Surya-Siddhānta, XII. v. 38 (from Kern).

Saka, 654, i.e. A.D. 672.—"Dvipavaram Yavakhyam atulan dhān-yādīvājāḥikam sampannam kanakākaraḥ . . . i.e. the incomparable splendid island called Java, excessively rich in grain and other seeds, and well provided with gold-mines."—Inscription in Batavia Museum (see above).

943.—"Eager . . . to study with my own eyes the peculiarities of each country, I have with this object visited Sind and Zanj, and Sanf (see CHAMPA) and Sin (China), and Zabaj—Masūdī; i. 5.

"This Kingdom (India) borders upon that of Zabaj, which is the empire of the Mahārāj, King of the Isles."—Ibid. 163.

992.—"Djaya is situated in the Southern Ocean. . . . In the 12th month of the year (992) their King Maradjī sent an embassy . . . to go to court and bring tribute."—Groeneveel's Notes from Chinese Sources, pp. 15-17.

1298.—"When you sail from Ziamba (Chamba) 1500 miles in a course between south and south-east, you come to a very great island called Java, which, according to the statement of some good mariners, is the greatest Island that there is in the world, seeing that it has a compass of more than 3000 miles, and is under the dominion of a great king. . . . Pepper, nutmegs, spice, galangal, eucalyptus, cloves, and all the other good spices are produced in this island, and it is visited by many ships with quantities of merchandise from which they make great profits and gain, for such an amount of gold is found there that no one would believe it or venture to tell us."—Marco Polo, in Ramusio, ii. 51.

c. 1350.—"In the neighbourhood of that realm is a great island, Java by name, which hath a compass of a good 3000 miles. Now this island is populous exceedingly, and is the second best of all islands that exist. . . . The King of this island hath a palace which is truly marvellous. . . . Now the great Khan of Cathay many a time engaged in war with this King; but this King always vanquished and got the better of him."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 75-87.

c. 1349.—"She clandestinely gave birth to a daughter, whom she made when grown up Queen of the finest island in the world, Saba by name. . . ."—John de Marignoli, ibid. 391.

1444.—"Sunt insulae duas in interiori Indiae, e aeneis extembris orbis finibus, ambae Java nomenque, quae etiam tribus alternis tribuunt duobus millibus milliarii pretiandit orientem versus: sed Majoris, Minorisque cognomine discernunt."—N. Conti, in Poggio, De Var. Fortunae.

1503.—The Syrian Bishops Thomas, Jaballaha, Jacob, and Denha, sent on a mission to India in 1503 by the (Nestorian) Patriarch Elias, were ordained to go to the land of the Indians and the islands of the seas which are between Dabag and Sin and Masin (see MACHEEN).—Assem. III. Pt. i. 662. This Dabag is probably a relic of the Zabaj (see Technology of, of Masūdī, and of Al-birūnī.

1516.—"Further on. . . . there are many islands, small and great, amongst which is one very large which they call Java the Great. . . . They say that this island is the most abundant country in the world. . . . There grow pepper, cinnamon, ginger, bamboo, cubeb, and gold. . . ."—Bardosa, 197.

Referring to Sumatra, or the Archipelago in general.

Saka, 575, i.e. A.D. 656.—"The Prince Adityadharmā is the Deva of the First Java Land (prathama Yava-bha). May he be great! Written in the year of Saka, 575. May it be great!"—From a Sanskrit Inscript. from Pager-Ruyong, in Menang Karbau (Sumatra), pubd. by Friedrich, in the Batavian Transactions, vol. xxiii.

1224.—"Ma'bar (q.v.) is the last part of India; then comes the country of China (Sin), the first part of which is Jáwa, reached by a difficult and fatal sea."—Yakut, i. 516.

"This is some account of remotest Sin, which I record without vouching for its truth. . . . for in sooth it is a far off land. I have seen no one who had been so far into it; only the merchants seek its currying parts, to win the country known as Jáwa on the sea-coast, like to India; from it are brought Aloeswood ("ud"), camphor, and nard (swent), and clove, and mace (basbām), and China drugs, and vessels of china-ware."—Ibid. iii. 445.
Kazwini speaks in almost the same words of Jawa. He often copies Yākūt, but perhaps he really means his own time (for he uses different words) when he says: "Up to this time the merchants came no further into China than to this country (Jawa) on account of the distance and difference of religion"—ii. 18.

1298.—"When you leave this Island of Pentam and sail about 100 miles, you reach the Island of Java the Less. For all its name 'tis none so small but that it has a compass of 2000 miles or more. . . ." &c.—Marco Polo, bk. iii. ch. 9.

c. 1300.—". . . In the mountains of Jawa scented woods grow. . . . The mountains of Jawa are very high. It is the custom of the people to puncture their hands and entire body with needles, and then rub in some black substance."—Rashíd-uddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

1328.—"There is also another exceeding great island, which is called Jawa, which is in circumference more than seven thousand miles as I have heard, and where are many world's wonders. Among which, besides the finest aromatic spices, this is one, to wit, that there be found pygmy men. . . . There are also trees growing cloves, when which they are in flower emit an odour so pungent that they kill every man who cometh among them, unless he shut his mouth and nostrils. . . . In a certain part of that island they delight to eat white and fat men when they can get them. . . ."—Friar Jordanus, 30-31.

c. 1330.—"Parmi les îles de la Mer de l'Inde il faut citer celle de Djawa, grande île offerte par l'abondance de ses drogues . . . au sud de l'île de Djawa on remarque la ville de Fansour, d'où le campbre Fansotiri tire son nom."—Géog. d'Aboulfeda, II. pt. ii. 127. [See CAMPHOR].

c. 1346.—"After a passage of 25 days we arrived at the Island of Jawa, which gives its name to the fulān jāwiy (see BENJAMIN). . . . We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say the city of Sumatra; a fine large town with a wall of wood and towers also of wood."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 228-230.

1559.—"And so these, as well as those of the interior of the Island (Sumatra), are all dark, with lank hair, of good nature and countenance, and not resembling the Javanese, although such near neighbours, indeed it is very notable that at so small a distance from each other their nature should vary so much, all the more because all the people of this Island call themselves by the common name of Javis (Jaúis), because they hold it for certain that the Javanese (or Jōs) were formerly lords of this great Island. . . ."—Barros, III. v. 1.

1555.—"Beyond the Island of Jawa they sailed along by another called Bali; and then came also unto other called Ajuane, Cambaba, Solor. . . . The course by these islands is about 500 leagues. The ancient cosmographers call all these Islands by the name fānos; but late experience hath found the names to be very dieru as you see."—Antonio Galvano, old E.T. in Halk. iv. 423.

1856.—"It is a saying in Goozerat,— 'Who goes to Java Never returns. If by chance he return, Then for two generations to live upon, Money enough he brings back.' "—Rās Mālā, ii. 82; [ed. 1878, p. 418].

JAVA-RADISH, s. A singular variety (Raphanus caudatus, L.) of the common radish (R. sativus, L.), of which the pods, which attain a foot in length, are eaten and not the root. It is much cultivated in Western India, under the name of mugra [see Badon-Powell, Punjab Products, i. 260]. It is curious that the Hind. name of the common radish is mālā, from māl, 'root,' exactly analogous to radīs from radix.

[JAVA-WIND, s. In the Straits Settlements an unhealthy south wind blowing from the direction of Java is so called. (Compare SUMATRA, b.])

JAWAUB, s. Hind. from Ar. jawab, 'an answer.' In India it has besides this ordinary meaning, that of 'dismissal.' And in Anglo-Indian colloquial it is especially used for a lady's refusal of an offer; whence the verb passive 'to be jawaubd.' [The Jawaub Club consisted of men who had been at least half a dozen times 'jawaubd.']

1830.—"'The Juwawbd Club,' asked Elsmere, with surprise, 'what is that?'

'Tis a fanciful association of those melancholy candidates for wedlock who have fallen in their pursuit, and are smarting under the sting of rejection."—Orient. Sport. Mag., reprint 1878, i. 424.]

Jawab among the natives is often applied to anything erected or planted for a symmetrical double, where

"Grove nods at grove, each alley has a brother, And half the platform just reflects the other."

"In the houses of many chiefs every picture on the walls has its jawab (or duplicate). The portrait of Scindiah now in my dining-room was the jawab (copy in fact) of Mr. C. Landseer's picture, and hung opposite to the original in the Darbar room" (M.-Gen. Keatinge). ["The masjid with three domes of white marble occupies the left wing and has a counterpart (jawāb) in a precisely similar building on the right hand side of the Taj. This last is sometimes called the false masjid; but it is in no sense dedicated to religious purposes."—Führer, Monumental Antiquities, N.W.P., p. 64.]

JAY, s. The name usually given by Europeans to the Corocais Indica, Linn., the Nilkanth, or 'blue-throat' of the Hindus, found all over India.

[1875.—"They are the commonality of birdoom, who furnish forth the mobs which bewilder the drunken-flighted jay when he jinks, shrieking in a series of blue hyphen-flashes through the air . . ."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 3.]

JEEL, s. Hind. jhil. A stagnant sheet of inundation; a mere or lagoon. Especially applied to the great sheets of remnant inundation in Bengal. In Eastern Bengal they are also called bheel (q.v.).

[1757.—"Towards five the guard waked me with notice that the Nawab would presently pass by to his palace of Mootee jeel."—Holtwell's Letter of Feb. 28, in Wheeler, Early Records, 250.]

The Jhils of Silhet are vividly and most accurately described (though the word is not used) in the following passage:

c. 1778.—"I shall not therefore be disbelieved when I say that in pointing my boat towards Sylhet I had recourse to my compass, the same as at sea, and steered a straight course through a lake not less than 100 miles in extent, occasionally passing through villages built on artificial mounds: but so scanty was the ground that each house had a canoe attached to it."—Hon. Robert Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindseys, iii. 106.

1824.—"At length we . . . entered what might be called a sea of reeds. It was, in fact, a vast jeel or marsh, whose tall rushes rise above the surface of the water, having depth enough for a very large vessel. We sailed briskly on, rustling like a greyhound in a field of corn."—Heber, i. 101.

1850.—"To the geologist the Jeels and Sunderbunds are a most instructive region, as whatever may be the mean elevation of their waters, a permanent depression of 10 to 15 feet would submerge an immense tract."—Hooker's Himalayan Journal, ed. 1855, ii. 265.

1855.—"You attribute to me an act, the credit of which was due to Lieut. George Hutchinson, of the late Bengal Engineers.* That able officer, in company with the late Colonel Berkeley, H.M. 32nd Regt., laid out the defences of the Alum Bagh camp, remarkable for its bold plan, which was so well devised that, with an apparently dangerous extent, it was defensible at every point by the small but ever ready force under Sir James Outram. A long interval . . . was defended by a post of support called 'Moir's Picket' . . . covered by a wide expanse of jheel, or lake, resulting from the rainy season. Foreseeing the probable drying up of the water, Lieut. Hutchinson, by a clever inspiration, marched all the transport elephants through and through the lake, and when the water disappeared, the dried clay-bed, pierced into a honey-combed surface of circular holes a foot in diameter and two or more feet deep, became a better protection against either cavalry or infantry than the water had been. . . ."—Letter to Lt.-Col. P. R. Innes from F. M. Lord Napier of Magdala, dd. April 15.

Jeele and bheel are both applied to the artificial lakes in Central India and Bundelkhand.

JEETUL, s. Hind. jital. A very old Indian denomination of copper coin, now entirely obsolete. It long survived on the western coast, and the name was used by the Portuguese for one of their small copper coins in the forms ceüils and zoiüoles. It is doubtful, however, if ceüil is the same word. At least there is a medieval Portuguese coin called ceüil and ceüit (see Fernandes, in Memorias da Academia Real das Sciences de Lisboa, 2da Classe, 1856); this may have got confounded with the Indian Jital. The jital of the Delhi coinage of A½-ud-din (c. 1300) was, according to Mr. E. Thomas's calculations, 1/3 of the silver tanga, the coin called in later days the rupee. It was therefore just the equivalent of our modern pice. But of course, like most modern denominations of coin, it has varied greatly.

c. 1193-4.—"According to Kutb-ud-Din's command, Nizam-ud-Din Mohammad, on his return, brought them [the two slaves] along with him to the capital, Dhilli; and Malik Kutb-ud-Din purchased both the Turks for the sum of 100,000 jital."—Raurety, Tabačal-i-Nāşiri, p. 603.

c. 1290.—"In the same year . . . there was dearth in Delhi, and grain rose to a jital per sir (see SEE)."—Zhād-ud-din Barnî in Elliot, iii. 149.

JEHAUD, s. Ar. jihād, [‘an effort, a striving’}; then a sacred war of Muslims against the infidel; which Sir Herbert Edwardes called, not very neatly, ‘a crescentade.’

[c. 630 A.D.—“Make war upon such of those to whom the Scriptures have been given who believe not in God, or in the last day, and who forbid not that which God and his Prophet have forbidden, and who profess not the profession of the truth, until they pay tribute (jizyā) out of hand, and they be humbled.”—Korān, Surah ix. 29.]

1880.—“When the Athenians invaded Ephesus, towards the end of the Peloponnesian War, Tissaphernes offered a mighty sacrifice at Artemis, and raised the people in a sort of Jehad, or holy war, for her defence.”—Sat. Review, July 17, 844.

[1901.—“The matter has now assumed the aspect of a ‘Schad,’ or holy war against Christianity.”—Times, April 4.]

JELAUBEE, s. Hind. jalebī, [which is apparently a corruption of the Ar. zalābīya, P. zalābitiya]. A rich sweetmeat made of sugar and ghee, with a little flour, melted and trickled into a pan so as to form a kind of interlaced work, when baked.

[1870.—“The poison is said to have been given once in sweetmeats, Jelabees.”—Chevers, Med. Jurisp. 178.]

JELLY, s. In South India this is applied to vitrified brick refuse used as metal for roads. [The Madras Gloss. gives it as a synonym for kunkur.] It would appear from a remark of C. P. Brown (MS. notes) to be Telugu zallī, Tam. shalli, which means properly ‘shivers, bits, pieces.’

JELUM, n.p. The most westerly of the “Five Rivers” that give their name to the Punjab (q.v.), (among which the Indus itself is not usually included). Properly Jatlam or Jilam, now apparently written Jhilam, and taking this name from a town on the right bank. The Jilam is the Yūsān of Alexander’s historians, a name corrupted from the Skt. Vīlāsā, which is more nearly represented by Ptolemy’s Bōsān. A still further (Prakritic) corruption of the same is Behat (see BEHUT).

1037.—“Here he (Mahmūd) fell ill, and remained sick for fourteen days, and got no better. So in a fit of repentance he forsook wine, and ordered his servants to throw all his supply ... into the Jailam ...”—Battāfi, in Elliot, ii. 139.

1204.—“... in the height of the conflict, Shams-ud-din, in all his panoply, rode right into the water of the river Jilam ... and his warlike feats while in that water reached such a pitch that he was despatching those infidels from the height of the waters to the lowest depths of Hell ...”—Tabakat, by Ravery, 604-5.

1856.—“Hydaspe! often have thy waves run tuned To battle music, since the soldier King, The Macedonian, dipped his golden casque And swam thy swollen flood, until the time When Night the peace-maker, with pious hand, Unclasping her dark mantle, smoothed it soft O’er the pale faces of the brave who slept Cold in theirelay, on Chillian’s bloody field.”—The Banyan Tree.

JEMADAR, JEMAUTDAR, &c. Hind. from Ar.—P. jama’dar, jama’ meaning ‘an aggregate,’ the word indicates generally, a leader of a body of individuals. [Some of the forms are as if from Ar.—P. jam’d’at, ‘an assemblage.’] Technically, in the Indian army, it is the title of the second rank of native officer in a company of sepoyos, the Sūbadār (see SOUBADAR) being the first. In this sense the word dates from the re-organisation of the army in 1768. It is also applied to certain officers of police (under the dārogha), of the customs, and of other civil depart-JENNYRICKSHAW, s. Read Capt. Gill's description below. Giles states the word to be taken from the Japanese pronunciation of three characters, reading jin-rik-i-sha, signifying 'Man—Strength—Curt.' The term is therefore, observes our friend E. C. Baber, an exact equivalent of "Pullman-Curt"! The article has been introduced into India, and is now in use at Simla and other hill-stations. [The invention of the vehicle is attributed to various people—to an Englishman known as "Public-spirited Smith" (8 ser. Notes and Queries, viii. 325); to native Japanese about 1868-70, or to an American named Goble, "half-cobbler and half-missionary." See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 236 seq.]

1876.—"A machine called a jinnyrickshaw is the usual public conveyance of Shanghai. This is an importation from Japan, and is admirably adapted for the flat country, where the roads are good, and coolie hire cheap. . . . In shape they are like a buggy, but very much smaller, with room inside for one person only. One coolie goes into the shafts and runs along at the rate of 6 miles an hour; if the distance is long, he is usually accompanied by a companion who runs behind, and they take it in turn to draw the vehicle."—W. Gill, River of Golden Sand, i. 10. See also p. 163.

1880. —"The Kuruma or jin-ri-ki-sha consists of a light ramambulator body, an adjustable hood of oiled paper, a velvet or cloth lining and cushion, a well for parcels under the seat, two high slim wheels, and a pair of shafts connected by a bar at the ends."—Miss Bird, Japan, i. 18.

1885. —"We . . . got into rickshaws to make an otherwise impossible descent to JEZYA, s. Ar. jizya. The poll-tax which the Musulman law imposes on subjects who are not Moslem.

[O. 630 A.D. See under JEAUD.]

e. 1300. — "The Káti replied... ‘No doctor but the great doctor (Hanifa) to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of Jizya on Hindus. Doctors of other schools allow of no alternative but ‘Death or Islam.’""—Zia-ud-din Barni, in Elitiot, iii. 184.

1683. — "Understand what custom ye English paid formerly, and compare ye difference between that and our last order for taking custom and Judgea. If they pay no more than they did formerly, they complain without occasion. If more, write what it is, and there shall be an abatement."
—Vizier’s Letter to Nubob, in Judges, Diary, July 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 100].

1686.—'‘Books of accounts received from Dacca, with advice that it was reported at the Court there that the Poll-money or Judgea lately ordered by the Mogul would be exacted of the English and Dutch. . . . Among the orders issued to Pattana Cossumbar, and Dacca, instructions are given to the latter place not to pay the Judgea or Poll-tax, if demanded."—Lt. St. Geo. Consns. (on Tour) Sept. 29 and Oct. 10; Notes and Extracts, No. i. p. 49.

1785.—"When the Hindoo Rajahs... submitted to Tamarlane; it was on these capital stipulations: that the... emperors should never impose the jesserah (or poll-tax) upon the Hindoos."—Holwell, Hist. Events, i. 37.

JHAUMP, s. A hurdle of matting and bamboo, used as a shutter or door. Hind. jhāṇp, Mahr. jhānpya; in connection with which there are verbs, Hind. jhānp-nā, jhānpū, jhānpnā, ‘to cover.’ See jhōprā, s.v. ak; [but there seems to be no etymological connection].

JHOOM, s. jhōm. This is a word used on the eastern frontiers of Bengal for that kind of cultivation which is practised in the hill forests of India and Indo-China, under which a tract is cleared by fire, cultivated for a year or two, and then abandoned— for another tract, where a like process is pursued. This is the Kumari (see COOMRY) of S.W. India, the Chena of Ceylon (see Emerson Tennent, ii. 463), the toung-gyan of Burma (Gazetteer, ii. 72, 757, the dahya of North India (Skt. dah, ‘to burn’), ponam (Tam. pun, ‘inferior’), or ponacaud (Mal. punakkātu, pun, ‘inferior,’ kātu, ‘forest’) of Malabar. In the Philippine Islands it is known as garinges; it is practised in the Ardennes, under the name of sartage, and in Sweden under the name of svejande (see Marsh, Earth as Modified by Human Action, 346).

[1800.—"In this hilly tract are a number of people... who use a kind of cultivation called the Cotowaru, which a good deal resembles that in which the Eastern parts of Bengal is called Jumea."—C Buchanan, Musory, ii. 177.]

1883. — "It is now many years since Government, seeing the waste of forest caused by juming, endeavoured to put a stop to the practice. . . . The people jumed as before, regardless of orders."—Indian Agriculturist, Sept. (Calcutta).

1885.—"Juming disputes often arose, one village against another, both desiring to jum the same tract of jungle, and these cases were very troublesome to deal with. The juming season commences about the middle of May, and the air is then darkened by the smoke from the numerous clearings. . . ." (Here follows an account of the process)—Lt. Col. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, 348 seqq.

JILLMILL, s. Venetian shutters, or as they are called in Italy, persiane. The origin of the word is not clear. The Hind. word ‘jhalmla’ seems to mean ‘sparkling,’ and to have been applied to some kind of gauze. Possibly this may have been used for blinds, and thence transferred to shutters. [So Platts in his H. Dict.] Or it may have been an onomatopoea, from the rattle of such shutters; or it may have been corrupted from a Port. word such as janella, ‘a window.’ All this is conjecture.

[1832.—"Besides the purdahs, the openings between the pillars have blinds nearly made of bamboo strips, wove together with coloured cords: these are called jhillmuns or cheeks" (see CHICK, a).—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 306.]

1874.—"The front of (a Bengali house) is generally long, exhibiting a pillared verandah, or a row of French casements, and jillmilled windows."—Calc. Review, No. cvii. 207.

JOCOLE, s. We know not what this word is; perhaps ‘toys?’ [Mr.
W. Foster writes: "On looking up the L.O. copy of the Pt. St. George Consultatia for Nov. 22, 1703, from which Wheeler took the passage, I found that the word is plainly not jocoles, but jocolet, which is a not unusual form of chocolate." The N.E.D. s.v.* Chocolate*, gives as other forms jococolat, jacolat, jocolat.]

1703.—"... sent from the Patriarch to the Governor with a small present of jocoles, oil, and wines."—In Wheeler, ii. 32.

JOGEE, s. Hind. jogi. A Hindu ascetic; and sometimes a 'conjuror.' From Skt. yogin, one who practises the yoga, a system of meditation combined with austerities, which is supposed to induce miraculous power over elementary matter. In fact the stuff which has of late been propagated in India by certain persons, under the names of theosophy and esoteric Buddhism, is essentially the doctrine of the Jogis.

1343.—"We east anchor by a little island near the main, Anchediva (q.v.), where there was a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. ... We found a jogi leaning against the wall of a budhkhâna or temple of idols" (respecting whom he tells remarkable stories).—Ibn Battuta, vi. 62-63, and see p. 275.

c. 1442.—"The Infidels are divided into a great number of classes, such as the Bramins, the Joghis and others."—Abdurrazzâk, in India in the XVth Cent., 17.

1510.—"The King of the Loghe is a man of great dignity, and has about 30,000 people, and he is a pagan, he and all his subjects; and by the pagan Kings he and his people are considered to be saints, on account of their lives, which you shall hear ..."—Varthema, p. 111. Perhaps the chief of the Gorakhnâtha Gosains, who were once very numerous on the West Coast, and have still a settlement at Kadri, near Mangalore. See P. della Valle’s notice below.

1516.—"And many of them noble and respectable people, not to be subject to the Moors, go out of the Kingdom, and take the habit of poverty, wandering the world ... they carry very heavy chains round their necks and waists, and legs; and they smear all their bodies and faces with ashes. ... These people are commonly called jogues, and in their own speech they are called Zamne (see SWAMY) which means Servant of God. ... These jogues eat all meats, and do not observe any idolatry."—Bandosa, 99-100.

1553.—"Much of the general fear that affected the inhabitants of that city (Goa before its capture) proceeded from a Gentoo, of Bengal by nation, who went about in the habit of a Joge, which is the strictest sect of their Religion ... saying that the City would speedily have a new Lord, and would be inhabited by a strange people, contrary to the will of the natives."—De Barros, Dec. ii. liv. v. cap. 8.

"For this reason the place (Adam’s Peak) is so famous among all the Gentile-dom of the East yonder, that they resort thither as pilgrims from more than 100 leagues, and chiefly those whom they call Jogues, who are as men who have abandoned the world and dedicated themselves to God, and make great pilgrimages to visit the Temples consecrated to him."—Ibid. Dec. III. liv. ii. cap. 1.

1563.—"... to make them fight, like the cobres de capello which the jogues carry about asking alms of the people, and these jogues are certain heathen (Gentios) who go begging all about the country, powdered all over with ashes, and venerated by all the poor heathen, and by some of the Moors also ..."—Garcia, f. 156, 157.

[c. 1610.—"The Gentiles have also their Abdulasses (Abd-Allah), which are like to our hermits, and are called Jogues."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 343.]

1624.—"Finally I went to see the King of the Jogis (Gioghi) where he dwelt at that time, under the shade of a cottage; and I found him roughly occupied in his affairs as a man of the field and husbandman ... they told me his name was Batunato, and that the hermitage and the place generally was called Cadira (Kadri)."—P. della Valle, ii. 724; [Hak. Soc. ii. 350, and see i. 37, 75].

[1667.—"I allude particularly to the people called Jauguis, a name which signifies 'united to God.'"—Bernier, ed. Constable, 316.]

1673.—"Near the Gate in a Choultry sate more than Forty naked Jogies, or men united to God, covered with Ashes and pleated Turbats of their own Hair."—Fryer, 160.

1727.—"There is another sort called Jogies, who ... go naked except a bit of Cloth about their Loys, and some deny themselves even that, delighting in Nastiness, and an holy Obscurity, with a great

"Fate work'd its own the while. A band Of Yogeeza, as they roamed the land Seeking a spouse for Jaga-Naut their God, Stray'd to this solitary glade."

c. 1812.—"Scarceyly . . . were we seated when beheld, there poured into the space before us, not only all the Yogeesa, Fakders, and rogues of that description . . . but the King of the Beggars himself, wearing his peculiar badge."—Mrs. Shortwood, (describing a visit to Henry Martyn at Cawnpore), Autobiog., 415.

"Aprā gānā ḍā jōgi ư gānā ḍā sidh." Hind. proverb: "The man who is a jōgi in his own village is a deity in another."—Quoted by Elliot, ii. 207.

JOHN COMPANY, n.p. An old personification of the East India Company, by the natives often taken seriously, and so used, in former days. The term Company is still applied in Sumatra by natives to the existing (Dutch) Government (see H. O. Forbes, Naturalist's Wanderings, 1885, p. 204).

[Dohā Company Bahādur ċā] is still a common form of native appeal for justice, and Company Bāgh is the usual phrase for the public garden of a station. It has been suggested, but apparently without real reason, that the phrase is a corruption of Company Jahān, "which has a fine sounding smack about it, recalling Shah Jehān and Jehāngir, and the golden age of the Moguls" (G. A. Sala, quoted in Notes and Queries, 8 ser. ii. 37). And Sir G. Birdwood writes: "The earliest coins minted by the English in India were of copper, stamped with a figure of an irradiated lingam, the phallic 'Roī Soleī.' The mintage of this coin is unknown (?) Madras), but, without doubt it must have served to ingratiate us with the natives of the country, and may have given origin to their personification of the Company under the potent title of Kumpani Jahān, which, in English mouths, became 'John Company.'" (Report on Old Records, 222, note.)

[1784.—"Further, I knew that as simple Hottentots and Indians could form no idea of the Dutch Company and its government and constitution, the Dutch in India had given out that this was one mighty ruling prince who was called Jan or John, with the surname Company, which also procured for them more reverence than if they could have actually made the people understand that they were, in fact, ruled by a company of merchants."—Andreas Spruermann, Travels to the Cape of Good Hope, the South-Polar Lands, and round the World, p. 347; see 9 ser. Notes and Queries, vii. 34.]

1803.—(The Nawab) "much amused me by the account he gave of the manner in which my arrival was announced to him. . . 'Lord Schāb Ka bhānja, Company ki navaa nasib fārzī lai'; literally translated, 'The Lord's sister's son, and the grandson of the Company, has arrived.'—Lord Valentia, i. 137.

1808.—"However the business is pleasant now, consisting principally of orders to countermand military operations, and preparations to save Johnny Company's cash."—Lord Minto in India, 184.

1818-19.—"In England the ruling power is possessed by two parties, one the King, who is Lord of the State, and the other the Honourable Company. The former governs his own country; and the latter, though only subjects, exceed the King in power, and are the directors of mercantile affairs."—Sadāsīkha, in Elliot, viii. 411.

1826.—"He said that according to some accounts, he had heard the Company was an old Englishwoman . . . then again he told me that some of the Topee wallas say 'John Company,' and he knew that John was a man's name, for his master was called John Brice, but he could not say to a certainty whether Company was a man's or a woman's name."—Pandawraya Harti, 60; [ed. 1873, i. 88, in a note to which the phrase is said to be a corruption of Joint Company].

1836.—"'The jargon that the English speak to the natives is most absurd. I call it 'John Company's English,' which rather affronts Mrs. Staunton.'—Letters from Madras, 42.

1852.—"John Company, whatever may be his faults, is infinitely better than Downing Street. If India were made over to the Colonial Office, I should not think it worth three years' purchase."—Mem. Col. Mountain, 293.

1888.—"It fares with them as with the sceptics once mentioned by a South-Indian villager to a Government official. Some men had been now and then known, he said, to express doubt if there were any such person as John Company; but of such it was observed that something had soon happened to them."—Sat. Review, Feb. 14, p. 220.

JOMPON, s. Hind. jāṃpaṇ, japāṇ, [which are not to be found in Platt's Dict.]. A kind of sedan, or portable chair used chiefly by the ladies at the Hill Sanitaria of Upper India. It is carried by two pairs of men (who are called Jompunies, i.e. jāṃpaṇī or japāṇī), each pair bearing on their shoulders a short bar from which the shaghs of the chair are slung. There is some perplexity as to the origin of the word. For we find in Crawford's Malay Dict. "Jampana (Jav. Jampana), a kind of litter." Also the Javanese Dict. of P. Jansz. (1876) gives: "Djempana—dragstool (i.e. portable chair), or sedan of a person of rank." [Klinkert has jempaana, djempaana, sempaana as a State sedan chair, and he connects sempaana with Skt. sam-patna, 'that which has turned out well, fortunate.' Wilkinson has: "jempana, Skt.? a kind of State carriage or sedan for ladies of the court." The word cannot, however, have been introduced into India by the officers who served in Java (1811-15), for its use is much older in the Himalaya, as may be seen from the quotation from P. Desideri.

It seems just possible that the name may indicate the thing to have been borrowed from Japan. But the fact that dpyān means 'hang' in Tibetan may indicate another origin.

Wilson, however, has the following: "Jhampān, Bengali. A stage on which snake-catchers and other juggling vagabonds exhibit; a kind of sedan used by travellers in the Himalaya, written Jāmpaun (?)" [Both Platts and Fallon give the word jhappān as Hind.; the former does not attempt a derivation; the latter gives Hind. jamp, 'a cover,' and this on the whole seems to be the most probable etymology. It may have been originally in India, as it is now in the Straits, a closed litter for ladies of rank, and the word may have become appropriated to the open conveyance in which European ladies are carried.]

1716.—"The roads are nowhere practicable for a horseman, or for a Jampan, a sort of palanquin."—Letter of P. Ippolo Desideri, dated April 10, in Lettres Edif., xv. 184.

1783.—(After a description) "... by these central poles the litter, or as here called, the Sampan, is supported on the shoulders of four men."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, ii. 3.

[1822.—"The Chumpaan, or as it is more frequently called, the Chumpala, is the usual vehicle in which persons of distinction, especially females, are carried."—Lloyd, Gerard, Narr. i. 105.]

[1849.—"A Jhappan is a kind of arm chair with a canopy and curtains; the canopy, &c., can be taken off."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 103.]

1879.—"The gondola of Simla is the 'jampan' or 'jampot,' as it is sometimes called, on the same linguistic principle as that which converts asparagus into sparrow-grass. Every lady on the hills keeps her jampan and jampanees just as in the plains she keeps her carriage and footmen."—Letter in Times, Aug. 17.

JOOL, JHOOLO, s. Hind. jhal, supposed by Shakespear (no doubt correctly) to be a corrupt form of the Ar. jull, having much the same meaning; [but Platts takes it from jhalina, 'to dangle'] Housings, body clothing of a horse, elephant, or other domesticated animal; often a quilt, used as such. In colloquial use all over India. The modern Arabs use the plur. jilāl as a singular. This Dozy defines as "couverture en laine plus ou moins ornée de dessins, très large, très chaude et enveloppant le poitrail et la croupe du cheval" (exactly the Indian jhal)—also "ornement de soie qu'on étend sur la croupe des chevaux aux jours de fête."

1880.—"Horse Jhools, &c., at shortest notice."—Adv. in Madras Mail, Feb. 13.

JOOLA, s. Hind. jhūlā. The ordinary meaning of the word is 'a swing'; but in the Himalaya it is specifically applied to the rude suspension bridges used there.

[1812.—"There are several kinds of bridges constructed for the passage of strong currents and rivers, but the most common are the Sāngha and Jhula" (a description of both follows).—Asiat. Res. xi. 475.]

1830.—"Our chief object in descending to the Sutlej was to swing on a Joolah bridge. The bridge consists of 7 grass ropes, about twice the thickness of your thumb, tied to a single post on either bank. A piece of the hollowed trunk of a tree, half a yard long, slips upon these ropes, and from this 4 loops from the same grass rope depend. The passenger hangs in the loops, placing a couple of ropes under each thigh, and holds on by pegs in the block over his head; the signal is given, and he is drawn over by an eighth rope."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 114.

JOSS, s. An idol. This is a corruption of the Portuguese Deus, 'God,' first taken up in the 'Pidgin' language. of the Chinese ports from the Portuguese, and then adopted from that jargon by Europeans as if they had got hold of a Chinese word. [See CHIN-CHIN.]

1659.—"But the Devil (whom the Chinese commonly called Joosje) is a mighty and powerful Prince of the World." — Walter Schulz, 17.

"In a four-cornered cabinet in their dwelling-rooms, they have, as it were, an altar, and thereon an image... this they call Josin." — Saar, ed. 1672, p. 27.

1677.—"All the Sinese keep a limning of the Devil in their houses. They point him with two horns on his head, and commonly call him Josie (Joosje)." — Groot Vermeulen, Oost Indische Voyagie, 33.

1711.—"I know but little of their Religion, more than that every Man has a small Joss or God in his own House." — Lockyer, 181.

1727.—"Their Josses or Demi-gods some of human shape, some of monstrous Figure." — A. Hamilton, ii. 296; [ed. 1744, ii. 265].

"Down with dukes, earls, and lords, these pagan Josses, False gods! I away with stars and strings and crosses." — Peter Pindar, Ode to Kien Long.

1798.—"The images which the Chinese worship are called jossie by the Dutch, and joss by the English seamen. The latter is evidently a corruption of the former, which being a Dutch nickname for the devil, was probably given to these idols by the Dutch who first saw them." — Stavorinus, E.T. i. 173.

This is of course quite wrong.

JOSSE-HOUSE, s. An idol temple in China or Japan. From joss, as explained in the last article.

1750-52.—"The sailors, and even some books of voyages... call the pagodas Yoss-houses, for of inquiring of a Chinese for the name of the idol, he answers Grande Yoss, instead of Gran Dios." — Olof Toreen, 232.

1790-1810.—"On the 8th, 18th, and 28th day of the Moon those foreign barbarians may visit the Flower Gardens, and the Honam Joss-house, but not in drees of over ten at a time." — 8 Regulations’ at Canton, from The Fankwsea at Canton (1882), p. 29.

1840.—"Every town, every village, it is true, abounds with Joss-houses, upon which large sums of money have been spent." — Mem. Col. Mountain, 186.

1876.—"... the fantastic gables and tawdry ornaments of a large joss-house, or temple." — Fortnightly Review, No. cliii. 222.

1876.—"One Tim Wang he makee-travel, Makee stop one night in Joss-house." — Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 42.

Thus also in "pidgin," Joss-house-man or Joss-pidgin-man is a priest, or a missionary.

JOSTICK, JOSSTICK, s. "A stick of fragrant tinder (powdered costus, sandalwood, &c.) used by the Chinese as incense in their temples, and formerly exported for use as cigar-lights. The name appears to be from the temple use. (See PUTCHECK.)

1876.—"Burnee joss-stick, talkee plitty." — Leland, Pidgin-English Sing-Song, p. 43.

1879.—"There is a recess outside each shop, and at dusk the joss-sticks burning in these fill the city with the fragrance of incense." — Miss Bird, Golden Chersones, 49.

JOW, s. Hind. Ḫān. The name is applied to various species of the shrubby tamarisk which abound on the low alluvials of Indian rivers, and are useful in many ways, for rough basket-making and the like. It is the usual material for gabions and fascines in Indian siege-operations.

[c. 1809.—"... by the natives it is called Ḫān; but this name is generic, and is applied not only to another species of Tamarisk, but to the Casuarina of Bengal, and to the cone-bearing plants that have been introduced by Europeans." — Buchanan-Hamilton, Eastern India, ii. 597.]

1840.—"... on the opposite Jhow, or bastard tamarisk jungle... a native... had been attacked by a tiger. ..." — Davidson, Travels, ii. 326.

JOWAILLA MOOKHEE, n.p. Skt.—Hind. Jwalá-mukhi, ‘flame-mouthed’; a generic name for quasi-volcanic phenomena, but particularly applied to a place in the Kangra district of the Punjab mountain country, near the Bías River, where jets of gas issue from the ground and are kept constantly burning. There is a shrine of Devī, and it is a place of pilgrimage famous all over the Himālaya as well as in the plains of India. The famous fire-jets at Baku are sometimes visited by more adventurous Indian pilgrims, and known as the Great Jwalá-mukhi. The author of the following passage was evidently ignorant of the phenomenon worshipped, though the name indicates its nature.

c. 1360.—"Sultān Firoz... marched with his army towards Nagarkot (see NUG-GURCOTE)... the idol Jwalá-mukhi, much worshipped by the infidels, was situated on the road to Nagarkot... Some of the infidels have reported that Sultan Firoz went specially to see this idol, and held a golden umbrella over its head. But... the infidels slandered the Sultan. Other infidels said that Sultan Muhammad Shah bin Tughluk Shah held an umbrella over this same idol, but this also is a lie. "—Shama-i-Shahj Afzif, in Elliot, iii, 318.

1616.—"... a place called Jalla mokee, where out of cold Springs and hard Rocks, there are daily to be seen incessant Eruptions of Fire, before which the Idolatrous people fall down and worship."—Terr, in Purchas, ii, 1467.

1783.—"At Taullah Mhokee (sic) a small volcanic fire issues from the side of a mountain, on which the Hindoos have raised a temple that has long been of celebrity, and favourite resort among the people of the Punjab."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1798, i, 308.

1799.—"Prason Poory afterwards travelled... to the Maha or Buree (i.e. larger) Jowalla Mookhi or Juula Muchi, terms that mean a 'Flaming Mouth,' as being a spot in the neighbourhood of Buke (Baku) on the west side of the (Caspian) Sea... whence fire issues; a circumstance that has rendered it of great veneration with the Hindus."—Jonathan Duncan, in As. Res. v. 41.

JOWAUR, JOWARREE, s. Hind. jowār, juār, [Skt. yava-prakāra or akāra, 'of the nature of barley';] Sorgum vulgare, Pers. (Holcus sorgum, L) one of the best and most frequently grown of the tall millets of southern countries. It is grown nearly all over India in the unlooded tracts; it is sown about July and reaped in November. The reedy stems are 8 to 12 feet high. It is the chōlam of the Tamil regions. The stalks are kirbee. The Ar. dura or dhura is perhaps the same word ultimately as jowār; for the old Semitic name is dōkn, from the smoky aspect of the grain. It is an old instance of the looseness which used to pervade dictionaries and glossaries that R. Drummond (Illus. of the Gram. Parts of Gujaratee, &c, Bombay, 1808) calls "Jooar, a kind of pulse, the food of the common people."

[c. 1560.—In Khandesh "Jovāri is chiefly cultivated of which, in some places, there are three crops in a year, and its stalk is so delicate and pleasant to the taste that it is regarded in the light of a fruit."—Ait, ed. Jarrett, ii, 223.]

1760.—"En suite manuvs chemin sur des levées faites de boue dans des quarrés de Jowa and des champs de Nelis (see NELLY) remplis d'eau."—Anquetil du Perron, 1. ccclxxxiii.

1800.—"... My industrious followers must live either upon jowarry, of which there is an abundance everywhere, or they must be more industrious in procuring rice for themselves."—Wellington, i. 175.

1813.—Forbes calls it "juarree or cuss-cuss" (?). [See CUSCUS.—Or. Mem. ii, 406; [2nd ed. ii, 35, and i, 23.]

1819.—"In 1797-8 jowaree sold in the Muehoo Kaual at six rupees per cullsee (see CULSEY) of 24 maunds."—Maclurdo, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. i, 287.

[1826.—"And the sabre began to cut away upon them as if they were a field of Jooane (standing corn)."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873 p. 66.]

JOY, s. This seems from the quotation to have been used on the west coast for jewell (Port. jóio).

1810.—"The vanity of parents sometimes leads them to dress their children, even while infants, in this manner, which affords a temptation... to murder these helpless creatures for the sake of their ornaments or joys."—Marie Graham, 3.

JUBTEE, JUPTEE, &c., s. Guz. japti, &c. Corrupt forms of zabiti. ["Watan-zabiti, or -japti, Mahr., Produce of lands sequestered by the State, an item of revenue; in Guzerat the lands once exempt, now subject to assessment" (Wilson).] (See ZUBT.)

1808.—"The Sindias as Sovereigns of Broach used to take the revenues of Moog-moondars and Denovy (see DESSAYE) of that district every third year, amounting to Rs. 58,390, and called the periodical confiscation Juptee."—R. Drummond. [Majmūdār "in Guzerat the title given to the keepers of the pargana revenue records, who have held the office as a hereditary right since the settlement of Todar Mal, and are paid by fees charged on the villages." (Wilson).

JUDEA, ODIA, &c., n.p. These names are often given in old writers to the city of Ayuthia, or Ayodhya, or Yuthia (so called apparently after the Hindu city of Ramā, Ayodhya, which we now call Oudh), which was the capital of Siam from the 14th century down to about 1767, when it was destroyed by the Burmese, and the Siamese royal residence was transferred to Bangkok [see BANCOCK].

1522.—"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the King of Siam, who is named Siri Zabbedera, and who inhabits India."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 156.
c. 1546.—"The capital City of all this Empire is Odia, whereof I have spoken heretofore: it is fortified with walls of brick and mortar, and contains, according to some, four hundred and fifty-two streets, whereof an hundred thousand are strangers of diverse countries."—Pinto, in Cogan's E.T. p. 285; orig. cap. cxxxix.

1553.—"For the Realm is great, and its Cities and Towns very populous; insomuch that the city Hudia alone, which is the capital of the Kingdom of Siam (Siđo), and the residence of the King, furnishes 50,000 men of its own."—Barros, III. ii. 5.

1614.—"As regards the size of the City of Odia... it may be guessed by an experimental made by a curious engineer with whom we communicated on the subject. He says that... he embarked in one of the native boats, small, and very light, with the determination to go all round the City (which is entirely compassed by water), and that he started one day from the Portuguese settlement, at dawn, and when he got back it was already far on in the night, and he affirmed that by his calculation he had gone more than 8 leagues."—Couto, VI. vii. 9.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangama (see JANGOMAY) arrived at 'the city of Judea' before Eaton's coming away from thence, and brought great store of merchandize."—Saixbury, ii. 90.

1639.—"The chief of the Kingdom is Judea by some called Odia... the city of Judea, the ordinary Residence of the Court is seated on the Menam."—Mandelslo, Travels, E.T. ii. 122.

1693.—"As for the City of Siam, the Siamese do call it Si-yo-thi-ya, the o of the syllable yo being closer than our (French) Diphthong au."—La Louère, Siam, E.T. i. 7.

1727.—"... all are sent to the City of Siam or Odia for the King's Use... The City stands on an Island in the River Memnon, which by Turnings and Windings, makes the distance from the Bar about 50 Leagues."—A. Hamilton, ii. 160; [ed. 1744].

1774.—"Ayuttaya with its districts Dvaravati, Yodaya and Kankanapuk."—Insc. in Ind. Antiq. xxii. 4.

1827.—"The powerful Lord... who dwells over every head in the city of the sacred and great kingdom of Si-a-yoo-tha-ya."—Treaty between E.I.C. and King of Siam, in Wilson, Documents of the Burmese War, App. lxxvii.

JUGBOOLAK, s. Marine Hind. for jack-block (Roebuck).

JUGGURNAUT, n.p. A corruption of the Skt. Jagannatha, 'Lord of the Universe,' a name of Krishna worshipped as Vishṇu at the famous shrine of Pūrī in Orissa. The image so called is an amorphous idol, much like those worshipped in some of the South Sea Islands, and it has been plausibly suggested (we believe first by Gen. Cunningham) that it was in reality a Buddhist symbol, which has been adopted as an object of Brahmanical worship, and made to serve as the image of a god. The idol was, and is, annually dragged forth in procession on a monstrous car, and as masses of excited pilgrims crowded round to drag or accompany it, accidents occurred. Occasionally also persons, sometimes sufferers from painful disease, cast themselves before the advancing wheels. The testimony of Mr. Stirling, who was for some years Collector of Orissa in the second decade of the last century, and that of Sir W. W. Hunter, who states that he had gone through the MS. archives of the province since it became British, show that the popular impression in regard to the continued frequency of immolations on these occasions—a belief that has made Juggurnaut a standing metaphor—was greatly exaggerated. The belief indeed in the custom of such immolation had existed for centuries, and the rehearsal of these or other cognate religious suicides at one or other of the great temples of the Peninsula, founded partly on fact, and partly on popular report, finds a place in almost every old narrative relating to India. The really great mortality from hardship, exhaustion, and epidemic disease which frequently ravaged the crowds of pilgrims on such occasions, doubtless aided in keeping up the popular impressions in connection with the Juggurnaut festival.

1831.—"Annually on the recurrence of the day when that idol was made, the folk of the country come and take it down, and put it on a fine chariot; and then the King and Queen, and the whole body of the people, join together and draw it forth from the church with loud singing of songs, and all kinds of music... and many pilgrims who have come to this feast cast themselves under the chariot, so that its wheels may go over them, saying that they desire to die for their god. And the car passes over them, and crushes them, and cuts them in sunder, and so they perish on the spot."—Friar Odoric, in Calhay, &c. i. 83.
c. 1430.—"In Bizengaliga (see Bis-NAGAR) also, at a certain time of the year, this idol is carried through the city, placed between two chariots . . . accompanied by a great concourse of people. Many, carried away by the fervour of their faith, cast themselves on the ground before the wheels, in order that they may be crushed to death,
—a mode of death which they say is very acceptable to their god."—N. Conti, in India in X V th Cent., 28.

c. 1581.—"All for devotion attach themselves to the trace of the car, which is drawn in this manner by a vast number of people . . . and on the annual feast day of the Pagod this car is dragged by crowds of people through certain parts of the city (Negapatam), some of whom from devotion, or the desire to be thought to make a devoted end, cast themselves down under the wheels of the cars, and so perish, remaining all ground and crushed by the said car."—Gasparo Balbi, t. 84. The preceding passages refer to scenes in the south of the Peninsula.

c. 1590.—"In the town of Pursoton on the banks of the sea stands the temple of Jagnaut, near to which are the images of Kishen, his brother, and their sister, made of Sandal-wood, which are said to be 4,000 years old . . . The Brahmins . . . at certain times carry the image in procession upon a carriage of sixteen wheels, which in the Hindoe language is called Rubyth (see RUT); and they believe that whoever assists in drawing it along obtains remission of all his sins."—Gedneton's Ayese, li. 10-19; [ed.
Jarrett, li. 127.]

—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. li. 538.]

1632.—"Vnto this Pagod or house of Sathen . . . doe belong 9,000 Brammines or Priests, which doe daily offer sacrifice unto their great God Iaggarnat, from which Idoll the City is so called. . .
And when it (the chariot of Iaggarnat) is going along the city, there are many that will offer themselves a sacrifice to this Idoll, and desperately lye downe on the ground, that the Chariot wheels may runne over them, whereby they are killed outright; some get broken arms, some broken legs, so that many of them are destroyed, and by this means they thinke to merit Heauen."—W. Bruton, in Hakl.
v. 57.

1667.—"In the town of Jagnat, which is seated upon the Gulf of Bengata, and where is that famous Temple of the Idol of the same name, there is yearly celebrated a certain Feast . . . The first day that they shew this Idol with Ceremony in the Temple, a great crowd is usually great to see it, that there is not a year, but some of those poor Pilgrims, that come afar off, tired and harassed, are suffocated there;
all the people blessing them for having been so happy . . . And when this Hellish Triumphant Chariot marsheth, there are found (which is no Fable) persons so foolishly credulous and superstitious as to throw themselves with their bellies under those large and heavy wheels, which bruise them to death. . ."—Bernier, a Letter to Mr. Chaplain, in Eng. ed. 1684, 97; [ed.
Constable, 304 seq.].

[1669-79.—"In that great and Sumptuous Diabolicall Pagod, there Standeth there a car, which they call Gernar, whence ye Pagod received that name alse."—MS. Asia, &c., by T. B. f. 12. Col. Temple adds:
"Throughout the whole MS. Jagannath is repeatedly called Jne. Gernae, which obviously stands for the common transposition Jagnayth."]

1682.—"We lay by last night till 10 o'clock this morning, ye Captain being desirous to see ye Jagernon Pagodas for his better satisfaction. . ."—Hedges, Diary, July 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 30].

1727.—"His (Jagarnath's) Effigy is often carried abroad in Procession, mounted on a Coach four stories high . . . they fasten small Ropes to the Cable, two or three Fathoms long, so that upwards of 2,000 People have room enough to draw the Coach, and some of Zealots, as it passes through the Streets, fall flat on the Ground, to have the Honour to be crushed to Pieces by the Couch Wheels."—A. Hamilton, i. 387; [ed. 1744].

1809.—"A thousand pilgrims strain Arm, shoulder, breast, and thigh, with might and main,
To drag that sacred wain,
And scarce can draw along the enormous load.
Prone fall the frantic votaries on the road,
And calling on the God
Their self-devoted bodies there they lay
To pave his chariot way.
On Jaga-Naut they call,
The ponderous car rolls on, and crushes all, Through flesh and bones it ploughs its dreadful path.
Groans rise unheard; the dying cry.
A And death, and agony
Are trodden under foot by you mad throng, Who follow close and thrust the deadly wheels along."

Curse of Kehawa, xiv. 5.

1814.—"The sight here beggars all description. Though Juggernaut made some progress on the 19th, and has travelled daily ever since, he has not yet reached the place of his destination. His brother is ahead of him, and the lady in the rear.
One woman has devoted herself under the wheels, and a shocking sight it was.
Another also intended to devote herself, missed the wheels with her body, and had her arm broken. Three people lost their lives in the crowd."—In Asiatic Journal—quoted in Beveridge, Hist. of India, ii. 54, without exacte reference.

c. 1818.—"That excess of fanaticism which formerly prompted the pilgrims to courth death by throwing themselves in crowds under the wheels of the car of Jagannath has happily long ceased to actuate the worshippers of the present day. During 4 years that I have witnessed the ceremonies, only three cases only of this revolting species of immolation have occurred, one of which I may observe is doubtful, and should probably be ascribed to accident; in the other the victims had long before suffered from some excruciating complaints, and chose this method of lodging themselves of the burden of life in preference to other modes of suicide so prevalent with the lower orders under similar circumstances."—A. Stirling, in As. Res. xv. 324.

1827.—March 28th in this year, Mr. Poynder, in the E. I. Court of Proprietors, stated that "about the year 1790 no fewer than 28 Hindoes were crushed to death at Ishera on the Ganges, under the wheels of Juggernaut."—As. Journal, 1821, vol. xxiii. 762.

[1864.—"On the 7th July 1864, the editor of the Friend of India mentions that, a few days previously, he had seen, near Serampore, two persons crushed to death, and another frightfully lacerated, having thrown themselves under the wheels of a car during the Rath Jatra festival. It was afterwards stated that this occurrence was accidental."—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 665.]

1876.—"Le monde en marchant n'a pas beaucoup plus de souci de ce qu'il écrase que le cheval d'idole de Jaggarnath de Jagannathpur. R. Renou, in Revue des Deux Mondes, 8th Series, xviii. p. 504.

JULIBDAR, s. Pers. jiladádár, from jilav, the string attached to the bridle by which a horse is led, the servant who leads a horse, also called jani- baddár, janibakhash. In the time of Hedges the word must have been commonly used in Bengal, but it is now quite obsolete.

[c. 1590.—"For some time it was a rule that, whenever he (Akbar) rode out on a khashah horse, a rupee should be given, viz., one dám to the Átbeég, two to the Jiladádár ..."—Áin, ed. Blochmann, i. 142. (And see under FYKE.)] 1673.—"In the heart of this Square is raised a place as large as a Mountebank's Stage, where the Gelabdar, or Master Mulieer, with his prime Passengers or Servants, have an opportunity to view the whole Cúphala."—Fryer, 341.

1683.—"Your Jylibdard, after he had received his letter would not stay for the Genä, but stood upon departure."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 112]."

"We admire what made you send peons to force our Gyllibdard back to your Factory, after he had gone 12 cords on his way, and dismiss him again without any reason for it."—Hedges, Diary, Sept. 26; [Hak. Soc. i. 120].

1754.—"100 Gildodar; those who are charged with the direction of the couriers and their horses."—Hawway's Travels, i. 171; 262.

[1812.—"I have often admired the courage and dexterity with which the Persian Jelowdars or grooms throw themselves into the thickest engagement of angry horses."—Morier, Journey through Persia, 33 seq.]

1880.—"It would make a good picture, the surroundings of camels, horses, donkeys, and men ... Pascal and Remise cooking for me; the Jeladodars, enveloped in felt coats, smoking their kallittas, amid the half-light of fast fading day ..."—MS. Journal in Persia of Capt. W. Gill, R.E.

JUMBEEA, s. Ar. janbíya, probably from jamb, 'the side'; a kind of dagger worn in the girdle, so as to be drawn across the body. It is usually in form slightly curved. Sir R. Burton (Câmões, Commentary, 413) identifies it with the agomia and gomio of the quotations below, and refers to a sketch in his Pilgrimage, but this we cannot find, [it is in the Memorial ed. i. 236], though the jambiyah is several times mentioned, e.g. i. 347, iii. 72. The term occurs repeatedly in Mr. Egerton's catalogue of arms in the India Museum. Jambwa occurs as the name of a dagger in the Áin (orig. i. 119) ; why Blochmann in his translation [i. 110] spells it jihanwah we do not know. See also Dozy and Eng s.v. jambette. It seems very doubtful if the latter French word has anything to do with the Arabic word.

c. 1328.—"Taktud-dín refused roughly and pushed him away. Then the maimed man drew a dagger (khánjâr) such as is called in that country jambwa, and gave him a mortal wound."—Tim Bátûta, i. 534.

1498.—"The Moors had erected palisades of great thickness, with thick planking; and fastened so that we could not see them within. And their people paraded the shore with targets, agayas, agomias, and bows and slings from which they slung stones at us."—Rôteiro do Vasco da Gama, 32.

1516.—"They go to fight one another bare from the waist upwards, and from the waist downwards wrapped in cotton cloths drawn tightly round, and with many folds, and with their arms, which are swords, bucklers, and daggers (gomios)."—Barbosa, p. 80.

1774.—"Autour du corps ils ont un ceinturon de cuir brodé, ou garni d'argent, au milieu duquel sur le devant ils passent un couteau large recourbé, et pointu (jambae), dont la pointe est tournée du côté droit."—Niebuhr, Desc. de l’Arabie, 54.

JUMUD, s. H. jamdad, jamdhar. A kind of dagger, broad at the base and slightly curved, the hilt formed with a cross-grip like that of the Katdr (see KUTTAUR). [A drawing of what he calls a jamdhar katdr is given in Egerton’s Catalogue (Pl. IX. No. 344-5.).] F. Johnson’s Dictionary gives jamdar as a Persian word with the suggested etymology of jamb-dar, ‘flank-render.’ But in the Ain the word is spelt jamdhar, which seems to indicate Hind. origin; and its occurrence in the poem of Chand Barda (see Ind. Antq. i. 281) corroborates this. Mr. Beames there suggests the etymology of Yama-dant ‘Death’s Tooth.’ The drawings of the jamhad or jamdhar in the Ain illustrations show several specimens with double and triple toothed points, which perhaps favours this view; but Yama-dhara, ‘death-wielder,’ appears in the Sanskrit dictionaries as the name of a weapon. [Rather, perhaps, yama-dhara, ‘death-bearer.”]

c. 1526.—“Jamdher.” See quotation under KUTTAUR.

1813.—“...visited the jamdar khana, or treasury containing his jewels... curious arms...” —Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 469.

JUMMA, s. Hind. from Ar. jama’. The total assessment (for land revenue) from any particular estate, or division of country. The Arab. word signifies ‘total’ or ‘aggregate.’

1781.—“An increase of more than 26 lacks of rupees (was) effected on the former jumma.”—Fifth Report, p. 8.

JUMMABUNDEE, s. Hind. from P.—Ar. jamabandi. A settlement (q.v.), i.e. the determination of the amount of land revenue due for a year, or a period of years, from a village, estate, or parcel of land. [In the N.W.P. it is specially applied to the annual village rent-roll, giving details of the holding of each cultivator.]

1814.—“Jummadundee.” See under Patel.

JUMNA, n.p. The name of a famous river in India which runs by Delhi and Agra. Skt. Yamuna, Hind. Jamuna and Jamna, the Διαμοβα of Ptolemy, the Ησαφης of Arrian, the Jamanes of Pliny. The spelling of Ptolemy almost exactly expresses the modern Hind. form Jamuna. The name Jamuna is also applied to what was in the 18th century, an unimportant branch of the Brahmaputra R. which connected it with the Ganges, but which has now for many years been the main channel of the former great river. (See JENNY.) Jamuna is the name of several other rivers of less note.

1616-17.—“I proposed for a water works, wh might give the Chief Citizen of the Mogores content... wh is to be don vpon the River Ieminy wh passeth by Agra...” —Birdwood, First Letter Book, 360.

1619.—“The river Gemini was nght to set a Myll vpon.”—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 477.

1663.—“... the Gemma, a river which may be compared to the Loire...” —Bernier, Letter to M. de la Mothe le Vayer, ed. Constable, 241.

[JUMNA MUSJID, n.p. A common corruption of the Ar. jáme‘ masjid, ‘the cathedral or congregational mosque,’ Ar. jama’, ‘to collect.’ The common form is supposed to represent some great mosque on the Jumna R.

1785.—“The Jumna-musjid is of great antiquity...” —Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 448.

1849.—“In passing we got out to see the Jamna Masjid, a very fine building now used as a magazine.” —Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 170.

1865.—“...the great mosque or Djamia... this word Djamia means literally ‘collecting’ or ‘uniting,’ because here attends the great concourse of Friday worshippers...” —Palgrave, Central and E. Arabia, ed. 1868, 206.

JUNGEERA, n.p., i.e. Janjira. The name of a native State on the coast, south of Bombay, from which the Fort and chief place is 44 m. distant. This place is on a small island, rising in the entrance to the Ràjpúri inlet, to which the name Janjira properly pertains, believed to be a local corruption of the Ar. jazira, ‘island.’ The State is also called Habüsân, meaning ‘Hubshees’ land,’ from the fact that for 3 or 4 centuries its chief has been of that race. This was not at first continuous, nor have the chiefs, even when of African blood, been always of one family; but they have apparently been so for the last 200 years. 'The Sidi' (see SEEDY) and 'The Habshi,' are titles popularly applied to this chief. This State has a port and some land in Kâthiâswâr.

Gen. Keatinge writes: 'The members of the Sidi's family whom I saw were, for natives of India, particularly fair.' The old Portuguese writers call this harbour Danda (or as they write it Damda), e.g. João de Castro in Prâimeiro Roteiro, p. 48. His rude chart shows the island-fort.

'JUNGLE, s. Hind. and Mahr. jangal, from Skt. jangala (a word which occurs chiefly in medical treatises). The native word means in strictness only waste, uncultivated ground; then, such ground covered with shrubs, trees or long grass; and thence again the Anglo-Indian application is to forest, or other wild growth, rather than to the fact that it is not cultivated. A forest; a thicket; a tangled wilderness. The word seems to have passed at a rather early date into Persian, and also into use in Turkistan. From Anglo-Indian it has been adopted into French as well as in English. The word does not seem to occur in Fryer, which rather indicates that its use was not so extremely common among foreigners as it is now.

c. 1200.—''... Now the land is humid jungle (jangalâh), or of the ordinary kind.'—Susruta, i. ch. 35.

c. 1370.—''Elephants were numerous as sheep in the jangal round the Râj's dwelling.'—Turâkhi-Firâz-Shâhi, in Elliot, iii. 314.

c. 1450.—''The Kings of India hunt the elephant. They will stay a whole month or more in the wilderness, and in the jungle (jangal).'—Abdurrazâk, in Not. et Ext. xiv. 51.

1474.—''... Bichenegor. The vast city is surrounded by three ravines, and intersected by a river, bordering on one side on a dreadful jungle.'—Ath. Yikitin, in India in XVth Cent., 29.

1776.—''Land waste for five years... is called jungle.'—Halhad's Gentoo Code, 190.

1809.—"They built them here a bower of jointed cane, Strong for the needful use, and light and long Was the slight framework rear'd, with little pain; Little creepers then the wicker sides supply, And the tall jungle grass fit roofing gave Beneath the genial sky."—Curse of Kehama, xiii. 7.

c. 1830.—''C'est là que je rencontrai les jungles... J'avoue que je fus très désappointé.'—Jacquemont, Correspond. i. 154.

c. 1833-38.—''L'Hippopotame au large ventre Habite aux jungles de Java, Ou grondent, au fond de chaque antre Plus de monstres qu'on ne rêva.'

Theoph. Gautier, in Poésies Complètes, ed. 1876, i. 325.

1848.—''But he was as lonely here as in his jungle at Boggleywala.'—Thackery, Vanity Fair, ch. iii.

''... 'Was there ever a battle won like Salamanca? Hey, Dobbin? But where was it he learnt his art? In India, my boy. The jungle is the school for a general, mark me that.'—Ibid., ed. 1863, i. 312.

c. 1858.—''La bête formidable, habitante des jungles S'endort, le vent en l'air, et dilate ses ongles.'—Lecoute de Lisle.

''Des djungles du Pendj-Ab... Aux sables du Karnate.'—Ibid.

1865.—''To an eye accustomed for years to the wild wastes of the jungle, the whole country presents the appearance of one continuous well-ordered garden.'—Waring, Tropical Resident at Home, 7.

1867.—''... here are no cobwebs of plea and counterplea, no jungles of argument and brakes of analysis.'—Swinburne, Essays and Studies, 133.

1873.—''Jungle, derived to us, through the living language of India, from the Sanskrit, may now be regarded as good English.'—Fitz-Edward Hall, Modern English, 306.

1879.—''The owls of metaphysics hooted from the gloom of their various jungles.'—Fortnightly Rev. No. clxv., N.S., 19.

JUNGLE-FEVER, s. A dangerous remittent fever arising from the malaria of forest or jungle tracts.

1808.—''I was one day sent to a great distance, to take charge of an officer who had been seized by jungle-fever.'—Letter in Morton's L. of Leyden, 48.

JUNGLE-FOWL, s. The popular name of more than one species of those of Barkope, which is nearly in the centre of the Jungle Terry, we entered the hills... in the great famine which raged through Indostan in the year 1770... the Jungle
Terry is said to have suffered greatly.—
Hodges, pp. 90-95.

1784. — "To be sold... that capital collection of Paintings, late the property of A. Cleveland, Esq., deceased, consisting of the most capital views in the districts of Monghyr, Rajemehal, Bogliopo, and the Jungleterry, by Mr. Hodges..." — In Seton-Karr, i. 64.

1788. — "To the Memory of AUGUSTUS CLEVELAND, Esq., late Collector of the Districts of Bhaugul-pore and Rajamahall, who without Bloodshed or the Terror of Authority, Employing only the Means of Conciliation, Confidence, and Benevolence, Attempted and Accomplished
The entire Subjection of the Lawless and Savage Inhabitants of the Jungleterry of Rajamahall..." (etc.)

Inscription on the Monument erected by Government to Cleveland, who died in 1784.

1817. — "These hills are principally covered with wood, excepting where it has been cleared away for the natives to build their villages, and cultivate jowar, plants of yams, which together with some of the small grains mentioned in the account of the Jungleterry, constitute almost the whole of the productions of these hills." — Sutherland's Report on the Hill People (in App. to Long, 560).

1824. — "This part, I find (he is writing at Monghyr), is not reckoned either in Bengal or Bahar, having been, under the name of the Jungleterry district, always regarded, till its pacification and settlement, as a sort of border or debatable land."—Heber, i. 151.

JUNGLO, s. Guz. Junglo. This term, we are told by R. Drummond, was used in his time (the beginning of the 19th century), by the less polite, to distinguish Europeans; "wild men of the woods," that is, who did not understand Guzerati!

1800. — "Joseph Maria, a well-known scribe of the order of Topeolallas... was actually mobbed, on the first circuit of 1806, in the town of Pittan, by parties of curious old women and young, some of whom gazing upon him put the question, Are Jungla, too/mane pirrmeen? "O wild one, wilt thou marry me?" He knew not what they asked, and made no answer, whereupon they declared that he was indeed a very Jungla, and it required all the address of Kripoom (the worthy Brahmin who related this anecdote to the writer, uncontradicted in the presence of the said Senhor) to draw off the dames and damsels from the astonished Joseph."—R. Drummond, Illns. (s.v.).
JUNK, s. A large Eastern ship; especially (and in later use exclusively) a Chinese ship. This indeed is the earliest application also; any more general application belongs to an intermediate period. This is one of the oldest words in the European-Indian vocabulary. It occurs in the travels of Friar Odoric, written down in 1331, and a few years later in the rambling reminiscences of John de' Marignolli. The great Catalan World-map of 1375 gives a sketch of one of those ships with their sails of bamboo matting and calls them چوین, no doubt a clerical error for چوی. Dobner, the original editor of Marignolli, in the 18th century, says of the word (junkos): "This word I cannot find in any medieval glossary. Most probably we are to understand vessels of platted reeds (a juncis texta) which several authors relate to be used in India." It is notable that the same erroneous suggestion is made by Amerigo Vespucci in his curious letter to one of the Medici, giving an account of the voyage of Da Gama, whose squadron he had met at C. Verde on its way home. The French translators of Ibn Batuta derive the word from the Chinese چوین (چوین), and Littré gives the same etymology (s.v. jonque). It is possible that the word may be eventually traced to a Chinese original, but not very probable. The old Arab traders must have learned the word from Malay pilots, for it is certainly the Javanese and Malay چوین and چوین, 'a ship or large vessel.' In Javanese the Great Bear is called چوینچوین, 'The Constellation Junk,' [which is in Malay چوینچوین. The various forms in Malay and cognate languages, with the Chinese words which have been suggested as the origin, are very fully given by Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 59 seq.].

c. 1300.—"Large ships called in the language of China 'Junks' bring various sorts of choice merchandize and cloths from Chín and Mächín, and the countries of Hind and Sind."—Rashduluddin, in Elliot, i. 69.

1381.—"And when we were there in harbour at Polumb, we embarked in another ship called a Junk (alia nam in nomine Zuncum). . . . Now on board that ship were good 700 souls, what with sailors and with merchants."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 75.

c. 1343.—"They make no voyages on the China Sea except with Chinese vessels . . . of these there are three kinds; the big ones which are called junk, in the plural چوینک, . . . Each of these big ships carries from three up to twelve sails. The sails are made of bamboo slips, woven like mats; they are never hauled down, but are shifted round as the wind blows from one quarter or another."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 51. The French translators write the words as gonk (and gonouk). Ibn Batuta really indicates چوینک (and چوینک); but both must have been quite wrong.

c. 1348.—"Wishing them to visit the shrine of St. Thomas the Apostle . . . we embarked on certain Junks (ascendentes Junkos) from Lower India, which is called Minubar."—Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 356.

1459.—"About the year of Our Lord 1420, a Ship or Junk of India, in crossing the Indian Sea, was driven . . . in a westerly and south-westerly direction for 40 days, without seeing anything but sky and sea. . . . The ship having touched on the coast to supply its wants, the mariners beheld there the egg of a certain bird called crocro, which egg was as big as a butt."—Rubric on Fra Mauro's Great Map at Venice.

"The Ships or Junks (Zonchi) which navigate this sea, carry 4 masts, and others besides that they can set up or strike (at will); and they have 40 to 60 little chambers for the merchants, and they have only one rudder. . . ."—Ibid.

1516.—"Many Moorish merchants reside in it (Malacca), and also Gentiles, particularly Chetios (or ETTY), who are natives of Ch Omendel.; and they are all very rich, and have many large ships which they call jungsos."—Barbosa, 191.

1663.—"Juncos are certain long ships that have stern and prow fashioned in the same way."—Garcia, i. 586.

1591.—"By this Negro we were advertised of a small Barke of some thirtie tunnes (which the Moors call a Junko)."—Barker's Ac. of Lancaster's Voyage, in Halk. ii. 589.

1616.—"And doubtless they had made havoc of them all, had they not presently been relieved by two Arabian Junks (for so their small ill-built ships are named. . . .)"

—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 342.

[1627.—"China also, and the great Atlantis (that you call America), which have now but Junks and Canoes, abounded then in tall Ships."—Bacon, New Atlantis, p. 12.]

1630.—"So repairing to Jases (see JASK), a place in the Persian Gulp, they obtained a flotte of Seaven Juncs, to convey them and theirs as Merchants bound for the Shores of India."—Lord, Religion of the Perses, 3.
1673.—Fryer also speaks of "Portugal Junks." The word had thus come to mean any large vessel in the Indian Seas. Barker's use for a small vessel (above) is exceptional.

JUNKAMEER, s. This word occurs in Wheeler, i. 300, where it should certainly have been written Juncaneer. It was long a perplexity, and as it was the subject of one of Dr. Burnell's latest, if not the very last, of his contributions to this work, I transcribe the words of his communication:

"Working at improving the notes to v. Linschoten, I have accidentally cleared up the meaning of a word you asked me about long ago, but which I was then obliged to give up—'Jonkanmir.' It = 'a collector of customs.'"

"(1745). — Notre Supérieur qui sçavoit qu'à moitié chemin certains Jonquaniërs mettoient les passans à contribution, nous avoit donné un ou deux famons (see PANAM) pour les payer en allant et en revenant, au cas qu'ils l'exigeassent de nous."—P. Norbert, Memôres, pp. 159-160.

"The original word is in Malayalam chungakaravan, and do, in Tamil, though it does not occur in the Dictionaries of that language; but chungam (= 'Customs') does.

"I was much pleased to settle this curious word; but I should never have thought of the origin of it, had it not been for that rascally old Capuchin P. Norbert's note."

My friend's letter (from West Stratton) has no date, but it must have been written in July or August 1882.—[H.Y.] (See JUNKANEER.)

1680.—"The Didocean (see DEWAUN) returned with Lingapis Ruecas (see ROOKKA) upon the Aualdar (see HAVILAND) at St. Thoma, and upon the two chief Juncaneers in this part of the country, ordering them not to stop goods or provisions coming into the town."—Fort St. Geo. Consn., Nov. 22, Notes and Extracts, iii. 39.

1746—"Given to the Governor's Servants, Juncaneers, &c., as usual at Christmas, Salampores (see SALEMPOOY) 18Ps. P. 13."—Act of Extra Charges at Fort St. David, to Dec. 31. M.S. Report, in India Office.

JUNK-CEYLON, n.p. The popular name of an island off the west coast of the Malay Peninsula. Forrest (Voyage to Mergui, pp. iii. and 29-30) calls it Jan-Sylan, and says it is properly Ujong (i.e. in Malay, 'Cape') Sylang. This appears to be nearly right. The name is, according to Crawford (Malay Dict. s.v. Salang, and Dict. Ind. Archip. s.v. Ujung) Ujung Salang, 'Salang Headland.' [Mr. Skeat doubts the correctness of this. "There is at least one quite possible alternative, i.e. jong salang, in which jong means 'a junk,' and salang, when applied to vessels, 'heavily tossing' (see Klinkert, Dict. s.v. salang). Another meaning of salang is 'to transfix a person with a dagger,' and is the technical term for Malay executions, in which the kris was driven down from the collar-bone to the heart. Parles in the first quotation is now known as Perlis.']

1539.—"There we crossed over to the firm Land, and passing by the Port of Junjun (Junculan) we sailed two days and a half with a favourable wind, by means whereof we got to the River of Parles in the Kingdom of Queda..."—Pinto (orig. cap. xix.) in Cogyn, p. 22.

1592.—"We departed thence to a Baie in the Kingdom of Iunsalaom, which is between Malaqua and Pegu, 8 degrees to the Northward."—Barber, in Hakl. ii. 591.

1727.—"The North End of Jonk Ceylon lies within a mile of the Continent."—A. Hamilton, 69; [ed. 1744, ii. 67.]

JUNKEON, s. This word occurs as below. It is no doubt some form of the word chungam, mentioned under JUNKAMEER. Wilson gives Telugu Sunkarn, which might be used in Orissa, where Bruton was. [Shungun (Mal. chunkan) appears in the sense of toll or customs duties in many of the old treaties in Logan, Malabar, vol. iii.]

1638.—"Any Junkeon or Custome."—Bruton's Narrative, in Hakl. v. 59.

1676.—"These practices (claims of perquisite by the factory chiefs) hath occasioned some to apply to the Governor for relief, and chosen rather to pay Junckan than submit to the unreasonable demands aforesaid."—Major Packe's Proposals, in Fort St. Geo. Consn., Feb. 16. Notes and Extracts, i. 39.

—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 392.]

JURIBASSO, s. This word, meaning 'an interpreter,' occurs constantly in the Diary of Richard Cocks, of the English Factory in Japan, admirably edited for the Hakluyt Society by Mr. Edward Maunde Thompson (1883). The word is really Malayo-Javanese jurubahasa, lit. ‘language-master,’ juru being an expert, ‘a master of a craft,’ and bahasa the Skt. bhāṣā, ‘speech.’ [Wilkinson, Dict., writes Juru-bhāsa; Mr. Skeat prefers juru-bhāsa.]

—in Rec. du Voyages, ed. 1703, ii. 667. See also pp. 672, 675.

1613.—‘(Said the Mandarin of Ançoao) . . . ‘Captain-major, Auditor, residents, and juru baçaças, for the space of two days you must come before me to attend to these instructions (capitulos), in order that I may write to the Alláto. . . .’

‘These communications being read in the Chamber of the City of Macau, before the Viceroy, the people, and the Captain-Major then commanding in the said city, João Serrão da Cunha, they sought for a person who might be charged to reply, such as had knowledge and experience of the Chinese, and of their manner of speech, and finding Lourenço Carvalho . . . he made the reply in the following form of words . . . To this purpose we the Captain-Major, the Auditor, the Viceroy, the Padres, and the Jurubassa, assembling together and beating our foreheads before God. . . .’—Bocarro, pp. 725-729.

‘The fourteenth, I sent M. Cockes, and my Jurebassa to both the Kings to entreat them to provide me of a dozen Seamen.’—Capt. Soris, in Purchas, 378.

1615.—‘. . . his desire was that, for his sake, I should give over the pursuit of this matter against the sea bongar, for that ye it were followed, of force the said bongar must cut his bellie, and then my Jurubassa must do the lyke. Unto which his request I was content to agree. . . .’—Cocks’s Diary, i. 33.

JUTE, s. The fibre (gunny-fibre) of the bark of Corchorus capsularis, L., and Corchorus oktories, L., which in the last 45 years has become so important an export from India, and a material for manufacture in Great Britain as well as in India. “At the last meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society, Professor Skeat commented on various English words. Jute, a fibrous substance, he explained from the Sanskrit jāta, a less usual form of juta, meaning, 1st, the matted hair of an ascetic; 2ndly, the fibrous roots of a tree such as the banyan; 3rdly, any fibrous substance” (Academy, Dec. 27, 1879). The secondary meanings attributed here to jata are very doubtful.*

The term jute appears to have been first used by Dr. Roxburgh in a letter dated 1795, in which he drew the attention of the Court of Directors to the value of the fibre “called jute by the natives.” [It appears, however, as early as 1746 in the Log of a voyage quoted by Col. Temple in J.R.A.S., Jan. 1900, p. 158.] The name in fact appears to be taken from the vernacular name in Orissa. This is stated to be properly jhata, but jhata is used by the uneducated. See Report of the Jute Commission, by Babu Hemchundra Kerr, Calcutta, 1874; also a letter from Mr. J. S. Cotton in the Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

JUTKA, s. From Dak.—Hind. jhathā, ‘quick.’ The native cab of Madras, and of Mofussil towns in that Presidency; a conveyance only to be characterised by the epithet ramshackle, though in that respect equalled by the Calcutta cranchee (q.v.). It consists of a sort of box with venetian windows, on two wheels, and drawn by a miserable pony. It is entered by a door at the back. (See SHIGRAM, with like meanings).

JUZAIL, s. This word jasail is generally applied to the heavy Afghan rifle, fired with a forked rest. If it is Ar. it must be jazail, the plural of jazil, ‘big,’ used as a substantive. Jazil is often used for a big, thick thing, so it looks probable. (See GINGALL.) Hence jazailchī, one armed with such a weapon.

[1812.—“The jezaerchi also, the men who use blunderbusses, were to wear the new Russian dress.”—Morier, Journey through Persia, 30.

JYEDAD, s. P. —H. ājādād. Territory assigned for the support of troops.

[1824.—“Rampoora on the Chumbul . . . had been granted to Dudermaine, as Jaidad, * This remark is from a letter of Dr. Burnell’s dd. Tanjore, March 16, 1880. or temporary assignment for the payment of his troops."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 223.]

JYSHE. s. This term, Ar. jaish, ‘an army, a legion,’ was applied by Tippoo to his regular infantry, the body of which was called the Jaish Kachari (see under CUTCHERRY).

c. 1782.—"About this time the Bar or regular infantry, Kutcheri, were called the Jyshe Kutcheri."—Hist. of Tipú Sultán, by Hussejn Ali Khan Kermání, p. 32.

1786.—"At such times as new levies or recruits for the Jyshe and Piadeks are to be entertained, you two and Syed Peer assembling in Kuchurry are to entertain none but proper and eligible men."—Tippoo's Letters, 256.

K

KAJEE, s. This is a title of Ministers of State used in Nepaul and Sikkim. It is no doubt the Arabic word (see CAZEE for quotations). Kāji is the pronunciation of this last word in various parts of India.

[KALA JUGGAH, s. Anglo-H. kālà jagah for a 'dark place,' arranged near a ball-room for the purpose of flirtation.

[1885,—"At night it was rather cold, and the frequenters of the Kala Jagah (or dark places) were unable to enjoy it as much as I hoped they would."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 91.

KALLA-NIMMACK, s. Hind. kālā-namak, ‘black salt,’ a common mineral drug, used especially in horse-treatment. It is muriate of soda, having a mixture of oxide of iron, and some impurities. (Royle.)

KAPAL, s. Kāpāl, the Malay word for a ship, [which seems to have come from the Tam. kappal,] "applied to any square-rigged vessel, with top and top-gallant mast" (Marsden, Memoirs of a Malay Family, 57).

KARBAREE, s. Hind. kārbārī, ‘an agent, a manager.’ Used chiefly in Bengal Proper.

[c. 1857,—"The Foujdar's report stated that a police Carbaree was sleeping in his own house."—Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurip. 467.]

1867.—"The Lushai Karbaris (literally men of business) duly arrived and met me at Kassalong."—Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 283.

KARCANNA, s. Hind. from Pers. kār-khāna, ‘business-place.’ We cannot improve upon Wilson’s definition: "An office, or place where business is carried on; but it is in use more especially applied to places where mechanical work is performed; a workshop, a manufactory, an arsenal; also, fig., to any great fuss or bustle." The last use seems to be obsolete.

[1663.—"Large halls are seen in many places, called Kar-Kanays or workshops for the artisans."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 258 seq. Also see CARCANA.]

[1842.—’I further insist upon the offending Kardar being sent a prisoner to my head-quarters at Sukkur within the space of five days, to be dealt with as I shall determine.’—Sir C. Napier, in Napier's Conquest of Scinde, 149.]

KAREETA, s. Hind. from Ar. kharīta, and in India also khalīta. The silk bag (described by Mrs. Parkes, below) in which is enclosed a letter to or from a native noble; also, by transfer, the letter itself. In 2 Kings v. 23, the bag in which Naaman bound the silver is kharīt; also in Isaiah iii. 22, the word translated ‘crisping-pins’ is kharītīm, rather ‘purces.’

1388.—"Her Highness the Bāīza Bāi did me the honour to send me a Kharitā, that is a letter enclosed in a long bag of Kūnkhwāb (see KINCOB), crimson silk brocaded with flowers in gold, contained in another of fine muslin; the mouth of the bag was tied with a gold and tasseled cord, to which was appended the great seal of her Highness."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim (Mrs. Parkes), ii. 250.

In the following passage the thing is described (at Constantinople).

1673.—"... le Visir prenant un sacchet de beau brocado d'or à fleurs, long tout au moins d'une demi aulne et large de cinq ou six doigts, lié et scellé par le haut avec une in the heart of the forest." — Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 342.

s. Hind. khichri, a mess of rice, cooked with butter and dāl (see DHALL), and flavoured with a little spice, shread onion, and the like; a common dish all over India, and often served at Anglo-Indian breakfast tables, in which very old precedent is followed, as the first quotation shows. The word appears to have been applied metaphorically to mixtures of sundry kinds (see Fryer, below), and also to mixt jargon or lingua franca. In England we find the word is often applied to a mess of re-cooked fish, served for breakfast; but this is inaccurate. Fish is frequently eaten with kedgeere, but is no part of it. ["Fish Kitcherie" is an old Anglo-Indian dish, see the recipe in Riddell, Indian Domestic Economy, p. 437.]

c. 1340.— "The munj (Moong) is boiled with rice, and then buttered and eaten. This is what they call Kishi, and on this dish they breakfast every day."— Ibn Batuta, iii. 181.

c. 1448.— "The elephants of the palace are fed upon Kitchi."— Abdurrazzaq, in India in X V th Cent. 27.

c. 1475.— "Horses are fed on pease; also on Kichiris, boiled with sugar and oil; and early in the morning they get shahenerva" (?).— Athan. Nikitin, in do., p. 10.

The following recipe for Kedgere is by Abu'l Fazl:

c. 1590.— "Khichiri, Rice, split dāl, and ghi, 5 ser of each; ½ ser salt; this gives 7 dishes."— Afn, i. 59.

c. 1648.— "Their daily gains are very small, and with these they fill their hungry bellies with a certain food called Kitcherye."— Van Twist, 57.

c. 1653.— "Kichiri est vne sorte de legume dont les Indiens se nourrissent ordinairemen— De la Boulaye-le-Gous, ed. 1657, p. 545.

1672.— Baldaeus has Kitsery, Tavernier Quicheri [ed. Balf., i. 282, 391].

1673.— "The Diet of this Sort of People admits not of great Variety or Cost, their deliciousest Food being only Cutcherry a sort of Pulse and Rice mixed together, and boiled in Butter, with which they grow fat."— Fryer, 81.

Again, speaking of pearls in the Persian Gulf, he says: "Whatever is of any Value is very dear. Here is a great Plenty of what they call Ketchery, a mixture of all together, or Refuse of Rough, Yellow, and Unequal, which they sell by Bushels to the Russians."— Ibid. 920.
1727.—"Some Doll and Rice, being mingled together and boiled make Kitcheree, the common Food of the Country. They eat it with Butter and Atchar (see ACHAR)."—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162].

1750-60.—"Kitcheree is only rice stewed, with a certain pulse they call Dohl, and is generally eaten with salt-fish, butter, and pickles of various sorts, to which they give the general name of Atchar."—Grose, i. 150.

[1813.—"He was always a welcome guest ... and ate as much of their rice and Cutcheree as he chose."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 502.]

1880.—"A correspondent of the Indian Mirror, writing of the annual religious fair at Ajmere, thus describes a feature in the proceedings: "There are two tremendous copper pots, one of which is said to contain about eighty maunds of rice and the other forty maunds. To fill these pots with rice, sugar, and dried fruits requires a round sum of money, and it is only the rich who can afford to do so. This year His Highness the Nawab of Tonk paid Rs. 3,000 to fill up the pots, ... After the pots filled with khichri had been inspected by the Nawab, who was accompanied by the Commissioner of Ajmere and several Civil Officers, the distribution, or more properly the plunder, of khichri commenced, and men well wrapped up with clothes, stuffed with cotton, were seen leaping down into the boiling pot to secure their share of the booty."—Pioneer Mail, July 8. [See the reference to this custom in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 314, and a full account in Rajputana Gazetteer, ii. 63.]

KEDGEREE-POT, s. A vulgar expression for a round pipkin such as is in common Indian use, both for holding water and for cooking purposes. (See CHATTY, GHURRA.)

1811.—"As a memorial of such misfortunes, they plant in the earth an ear bearing a cudgeri, or earthen pot."—Soleyns, Les Hindous, III.

1830.—"Some natives were in readiness with a small raft of Kedgeree-pots, on which the pulpees were to be ferried over."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 110.

KEDGEREE, n.p. Khijiri or Kijari, a village and police station on the low lands near the mouth of the Hoogly, on the west bank, and 68 miles below Calcutta. It was formerly well known as a usual anchorage of the larger Indiamen.

1683.—"This morning early we weighed anchor with the tide of Ebb, but having little wind, got no further than the Point of Kegaria Island."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 64].

1684.—"Signor Nicolò Pareres, a Portugal Merchant, assured me their whole community had wrote ye Vice King of Goa ... to send them 2 or 3 Frigates with Soldiers to possess themselves of ye Islands of Kegoria and Inigelio."—Ibid. Dec. 17; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1727.—"It is now inhabited by Fishers, as are also Ingelie and Kidgerie, two neighbouring Islands on the West Side of the Mouth of the Ganges."—A. Hamilton, ii. 2; [ed. 1744]. (See HIDGELEE.)

1753.—"De l'autre côté de l'entrée, les rivières de Cajori et de l'Ingeli (see HIDGELEE), puis plus au large la rivière de Pipi et celle de Balasar (see BALASORE), sont avec Tombali (see TUMLOOK), rivière mentionnée plus haut, et qu'on peut ajouter ici, des dérivations d'un grand fleuve, dont le nom de Ganga lui est commun avec le Gange.

... Une carte du Golfe de Bengale insérée dans Blaeu, fera même distinguer les rivières d'Ingeli et de Cajori (si on prend la peine de l'examiner) comme des bras du Gange."—D'Anville, p. 86.

As to the origin of this singular error, about a river Ganga flowing across India from W. to E., see some extracts under GODAVERY. The Rupnarain River, which joins the Hoogly from the W., just above Diamond Harbour, is the grand fluve here spoken of. The name Gonga or Old Gonga is applied to this in charts late in the 18th century. It is thus mentioned by A. Hamilton, 1727: "About five leagues farther up on the West Side of the River of Hughly, is another Branch of the Ganges, called Ganga, it is broader than that of the Hughly, but much shallower."—ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

KENNERY, n.p. The site of a famous and very extensive group of cave-temples on the Island of Salsette, near Bombay, properly Kankeri.

1602.—"Holding some conversation with certain very aged Christians, who had been among the first converts there of Padre Fr. Antonio do Porto, ... one of them, who alleged himself to be more than 120 years old, and who spoke Portuguese very well, and read and wrote it, and was continually reading the Flós Sacramentorum, and the Lives of the Saints, assured me that without doubt the work of the Pagoda of Canari was made under the orders of the father of Saint Josafat the Prince, whom Barlaam converted to the Faith of Christ. ..."—Conto, VII. iii. cap. 10.

1673.—"Next Morn before Break of Day we directed our steps to the anciently fam'd, but now ruin'd City of Canoreen ... all cut out of a Rock,"—Fryer, 71-72.

KERSEYMERE, s. This is an English draper's term, and not Anglo-Indian. But it is through forms like cassimere (also in English use), a corruption of cashmere, though the corruption has been shaped by the previously existing English word kersey for a kind of woollen cloth, as if kersey were one kind and kerseymere another, of similar goods. Kersey is given by Minshew (2nd ed. 1627), without definition, thus: "Arsic cloth, G. (i.e. French) carise." The only word like the last given by Littre is "Carisil, sorte de canevas." . . . This does not apply to kersey, which appears to be represented by "Cresseau — Terme de Commerce; etoffe de laine croissee a deux envers; etym. croiser." Both words are probably connected with croiser or with carre. Planche indeed (whose etymologies are generally worthless) says: "made originally at Kersey, in Suffolk, whence its name." And he adds, equal to the occasion, "Kerseymere, so named from the position of the original factory on the mere, or water which runs through the village of Kersey" (!) Mr. Skeat, however, we see, thinks that Kersey, in Suffolk, is perhaps the origin of the word kersey: (and this he repeats in the new ed. (1901) of his Concise Etym. Dict., adding, "Not from Jersey, which is also used as the name of a material." Kerseymere, he says, is "a corruption of Cashmere or Cassimere, by confusion with kersey").

1583.—"I think cloth, Kerseys and tinne have never bene here at so lowe prices as they are now." —Mr. John Newton, from Babylon (i.e. Bagdad) July 20, in Hakl. 378.

1603.—"I had as liefe be a list of an English kersey, as be pil'd as thou art pil'd, for a French velvet." —Measure for Measure, i. 2.

1625.—"Ordanet the thesaurer to tak aff to ilk ane of the officers and to the drummer and pyper, ilk ane of thame, fyve elne of reid Kairisie claithe." —Exts. from Reeds of Glasgow, 1876, p. 347.

1626.—In a contract between the Factor of the King of Persia and a Dutch "Opper Koopman" for goods we find: "2000 Persian ells of Carsey at 1 eocr (!) the ell." —Valentijn, v. 285.

1754.—"For sale—superfine cambrians and edgings . . . scarlet and blue Kassimeres." —In Seton-Kerr, i. 47.

c. 1880.—(no date given) "Kerseymere. Cassimere. A finer description of kersey . . . (then follows the absurd etymology as given by Planche). . . . It is principally a manufacture of the west of England, and except in being tweedled (sic) and of narrow width it in no respect differs from superfine cloth." —Draper's Dict. s.v.

KHAKEE, vulgarly KHARKI, KHARKEE, s. or adj. Hind. khākī, 'dusty or dust-coloured,' from Pers. khāk, 'earth,' or 'dust'; applied to a light drab or chocolate-coloured cloth. This was the colour of the uniform worn by some of the Punjab regiments at the siege of Delhi, and became very popular in the army generally during the campaigns of 1857-58, being adopted as a convenient material by many other corps. [Gubbins (Mutinies in Oudh, 296) describes how the soldiers at Lucknow dyed their uniforms a light brown or dust colour with a mixture of black and red office inks, and Cave Brown (Punjab and Delhi, ii. 211) speaks of its introduction in place of the red uniform which gave the British soldier the name of "Lal Coorte Wallahs."]

[1858.—A book appeared called "Service and Adventures with the Khakee Ressalah, or Meerut Volunteer Horse during the Mutinies in 1857-8," by R. H. W. Dunlop.

[1859.—"It has been decided that the full dress will be of dark blue cloth, made up, not like the tunic, but as the native ungreekah (angarkha), and set off with red piping. The undress clothing will be entirely of Khakee." —Madras Govt. Order, Feb. 18, quoted in Calcutta Rev. ci.iiii. 407.

1878.—"The Amir, we may mention, wore a khaki suit, edged with gold, and the well-known Herati cap." —Sat. Review, Nov. 30, 083.

[1899.—"The batteries to be painted with the Kirkee colour, which being similar to the roads of the country, will render the vehicles invisible." —Times, July 12.

[1890-91.—The newspapers have constant references to a khaki election, that is an election started on a war policy, and the War Loan for the Transvaal Campaign has been known as "khakis."

Recent military operations have led to the general introduction of Khaki as the service uniform. Something like this has been used in the East for clothing from a very early time:

[1611.—"See if you can get me a piece of very fine brown calico to make me clothes." —Hawkes, Letters, i. 109.]

KHALSA. s. and adj. Hind. from Ar. KHAL (properly KHALA 'pure, genuine.') It has various technical meanings, but, as we introduce the word, it is applied by the Sikhs to their community and church (so to call it) collectively.

1783.—"The Sioques salute each other by the expression Wah Gooro, without any inclination of the body, or motion of the hand. The Government at large, and their armies, are denominated Khalsa and Khalsajee."—Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 307.

"And all the Punjab knows me, for my father's name was known in the days of the conquering Khalsa when I was a boy half-grown."
Attar Singh Loghoutor, by Sower, in an Indian paper; name and date lost.

KHAN. s. a. Turki through Pers. Khân. Originally this was a title, equivalent to Lord or Prince, used among the Mongol and Turk nomad hordes. Besides this, sense, and an application to various other chiefs and nobles, it has still become in Persia, and still more in Afghanistan, a sort of vague title like "Esq." whilst in India it has become a common suffix to, or in fact part of, the name of Hindustanis out of every rank, properly, however, of those claiming a Pathân descent. The tendency of swelling titles is always thus to degenerate, and when the value of Khân had sunk, a new form, Khân-Khadâm (Khân of Khâns) was devised at the Court of Delhi, and applied to one of the high officers of State.

1675.—"Cawn." See under GINGI."

b. Pers. Khân. A public building for the accommodation of travellers, a caravanserai. [The word appears in English as early as about 1400; see Stanf. Dict. s.v.]

1827.—"He lost all hope, being informed by his late fellow-traveller, whom he found at the Khan, that the Nuwaub was absent on a secret expedition."—W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

KHANNA. CONNAH. &c. s. This term (Pers. khânna, 'a house, a compartment, apartment, department, receptacle,' &c.) is used almost ad libitum in India in composition, sometimes with most incongruous words, as bobachee (for bâwarchi) connah, 'cook-house,' buggy-connah, 'buggy, or coach-house,' bottle-khanna, toshakhana (q.v.), &c. &c.

1784.—"The house, cook-room, *bottle-connah, godown, &c., are all puckle built."—In Seton-Karr, i. 41.

KHANUM. s. Turki, through Pers. khânum and khânim, a lady of rank; the feminine of the title Khân, a (q.v.)

1404.—"... la mayor delles avia nôbre Cañon, que quiere dezir Reyna, o Señora grande."—Clavijo, f. 52r.

"The great wall and tents were for the use of the chief wife of the Lord, who was called Caño, and the other was for the second wife, called Quinchichi Caño, which means the "little lady.""—Markham's Clavijo, 145.

KHASS, KAUSS, &c., adj. Hind. from Ar. kūs, 'special, particular, Royal.' It has many particular applications, one of the most common being to estates retained in the hands of Government, which are said to be held kūs. The kūsamah again, in a native house, is the women's apartment. Many years ago a white-bearded kūsamān (see CONSMAH), in the service of one of the present writers, indulging in reminiscences of the days when he had been attached to Lord Lake's camp, in the beginning of the last century, extolled the sāhibs of those times above their successors, observing (in his native Hindustani): "In those days I think the Sāhibs all came from London kūs; now a great lot of Liverpoolewālās come to the country!"

There were in the Palaces of the Great Mogul and other Mahomedan Princes of India always two Halls of Audience, or Durbar, the Devān-i-Ām, or Hall of the Public, and the Devān-ī-Khās, the Special or Royal Hall, for those who had the entrée, as we say.

In the Indian Vocabulary, 1788, the word is written Coss.

KHŚYA, n.p. A name applied to the oldest existing race in the cis-Tibetan Himalaya, between Nepal and the Ganges, i.e. in the British Districts of Kumān and Garhwal. The Khśyas are Hindu in religion and customs, and probably are substantially Hindu also in blood; though in their aspect there is some slight suggestion of that of their Tibetan neighbours. There can be no ground for supposing them to be connected with the Mongoloid nation of Kasias (see COSSYA) in the mountains south of Assam.

[1526. — "About these hills are other tribes of men. With all the investigation and enquiry I could make. . . All that I could learn was that the men of these hills were called Kās. It struck me that as the Hindustanis frequently confound śāh and sīn and as Kashmir is the chief . . . city in those hills, it may have taken its name from that circumstance." — Leyden's Baber, 313.]

1799. — "The Vakeel of the rājā of Comanh (i.e. Kumān) of Almora, who is a learned Fundit, informs me that the greater part of the zemindars of that country are Chāsas. . . They are certainly a very ancient tribe, for they are mentioned as such in the Institutes of Menu; and their great ancestor C'hasa or Chasya is mentioned by Sanchoniathon, under the name of Cassius. He is supposed to have lived before the Flood, and to have given his name to the mountains he seized upon." — Wilford (Wilfordizing !), in As. Res. vi. 456.

1824. — "The Khāsya nation pretend to be all Rajpoots of the highest caste . . . they will not even sell one of their little mountain cows to a stranger. . . They are a modest, gentle, respectful people, honest in their dealings." — Heber, i. 264.

KHELĀT, n.p. The capital of the Bilūch State upon the western frontier of Sind, which gives its name to the State itself. The name is in fact the Ar. kālā 'a fort.' (See under KILLADAR.) The terminal t of the Ar. word (written kālā) has for many centuries been pronounced only when the word is the first half of a compound name meaning 'Castle of . . .'. No doubt this was the case with the Bilūch capital, though in its case the second part has been completely dropped out of use. Khelāt (Kālā)-i-Ghālji is an example where the second part remains, though sometimes dropped.

KHIRĀJ, s. Ar. kharāj (usually pron. in India khirāj), is properly a tribute levied by a Muslim lord upon conquered unbelievers, also land-tax; in India it is almost always used for the land-revenue paid to Government; whence a common expression (also Ar.) lākhārāj, treated as one word, lākhārāj, 'rent-free.'

[c. 1590. — "In ancient times a capitation tax was imposed, called kharāj." — Ām, ed. Jarrett, ii. 55. "Some call the whole produce of the revenue kharāj." — Ibid. ii. 57.]

1784. — " . . . 136 beegahs, 18 of which are Lackherage land, or land paying no rent." — Seton-Karr, i. 49.

KHOA, s. Hind. and Beng. khōt, a kind of concrete, of broken brick, lime, &c., used for floors and terrace-roofs.

KHOT, s. This is a Mahrātī word, khot, in use in some parts of the Bombay Presidency as the designation of persons holding or farming villages on a peculiar tenure called khot, and coming under the class legally defined as 'superior holders.'

The position and claims of the khots have been the subject of much debate and difficulty, especially with regard to the rights and duties of the tenants under them, whose position takes various forms; but to go into these questions would carry us much more deeply into local technicalities than would be consistent with the scope of this work, or the knowledge of the editor. Practically it would seem that the khot is, in the midst of provinces where ryotwarry is the ruling system, an exceptional person, holding much the position of a petty zamindar in Bengal (apart from any question of permanent settlement); and that most of the difficult questions touching khoti have arisen from this its exceptional character in Western India.

The khot occurs especially in the Konkan, and was found in existence when, in the early part of the last century, we occupied territory that had been subject to the Mahratta power. It is apparently traceable back at least to the time of the 'Adil Shahi (see DALCAN) dynasty of the Deccan. There are, however, various denominations of khot. In the Southern Konkan the khoti has long been a hereditary zamindar, with proprietary rights, and also has in many cases replaced the ancient patel as headman of the village; a circumstance that has caused the khoti to be sometimes regarded and defined as the holder of an office, rather than of a property. In the Northern Konkan, again, the khotis were originally mere revenue-farmers, without proprietary or hereditary rights, but had been able to usurp both.

As has been said above, administrative difficulties as to the khotis have been chiefly connected with their rights over, or claims from, the ryots, which have been often exorbitant and oppressive. At the same time it is in evidence that in the former distracted state of the country, a Khoti was sometimes established in compliance with a petition of the cultivators. The Khoti "acted as a buffer between them and the extortionate demands of the revenue officers under the native Government. And this is easily comprehended, when it is remembered that formerly districts used to be farmed to the native officials, whose sole object was to squeeze as much revenue as possible out of each village. The Khot bore the brunt of this struggle. In many cases he prevented a new survey of his village, by consenting to the imposition of some new patti. This no doubt he recovered from the ryots, but he gave them their own time to pay, advanced them money for their cultivation, and was a milder master than a rapacious revenue officer would have been" (Candy, pp. 20-21). See Selections from Records of Bombay Government, No. cxxxiv., N.S., viz., Selections with Notes, regarding the Khoti Tenure, compiled by E. T. Candy, Bo. C. S. 1873; also Abstract of Proceedings of the Govt. of Bombay in the Revenue Dept., April 24, 1876, No. 2474.

KhuD, KUDD. s. This is a term chiefly employed in the Himalaya, kuDd, meaning a precipitous hill-side, also a deep valley. It is not in the dictionaries, but is probably allied to the Hind. khât, 'a pit,' Dakh. —Hind. khaDdla. [Platts gives Hind. khad, This is from Skt. khaDa, 'a gap, a chasm,' while khät comes from Skt. khâta, 'an excavation.'] The word is in constant Anglo-Indian colloquial use at Simla and other Himalayan stations.

1837.—"The steeps about Mussoori are so very perpendicular in many places, that a person of the strongest nerve would scarcely be able to look over the edge of the narrow footpath into the Khud, without a shudder." —Bacon, First Impressions, ii. 146.

1838.—"On my arrival I found one of the ponies at the estate had been killed by a fall over the precipice, when bringing up water from the khud."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 240.

1866.—"When the men of the 43d Regt. refused to carry the guns any longer, the Eurasian gunners, about 20 in number, accompanying them, made an attempt to bring them on, but were unequal to doing so, and under the direction of this officer (Capt. Cockburn, R.A.) threw them down a Khud, as the ravines in the Himalaya are called . . ."—Bhotan and the H. of the Doorn War, by Surgeon Rennie, M.D. p. 199.

1879.—"The commander-in-chief . . . is perhaps alive now because his horse so judiciously chose the spot on which suddenly to swerve round that its hind hoofs were only half over the chud" (sic).—Times Letter, from Simla, Aug. 15.

KHURREEF, s. Ar. kharif, 'autumn'; and in India the crop, or harvest of the crop, which is sown at the beginning of the rainy season (April and May) and gathered in after it, including rice, the tall millets, maize, cotton, rape, sesameum, &c. The obverse crop is rubbee (q.v.).

[1899.—"Three weeks have not elapsed since the Kureef crop, which consists of Bajru (see BAJRA), Jowar (see JOWAUR), several smaller kinds of grain and cotton, was cleared off from the fields, and the same ground is already ploughed . . . and sown for the great Rubbee crop of wheat, barley and channa (see GRAM)."—Broughton, Letters from a Makratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 216.]

KHUTPUT, s. This is a native slang term in Western India for a prevalent system of intrigue and corruption. The general meaning of khatpat in Hind. and Mahr. is rather 'wrangling' and 'worry,' but it is in the former sense that the word became famous (1850-54) in consequence of Sir James Outram's struggles with the rascality, during his tenure of the Residency of Baroda.

[1881.—"Khutput, or court intrigue, rules more or less in every native State, to an extent incredible among the more civilised nations of Europe."—Frazer, Records of Sport, 204.]

KHUTTRY, KHEHTRY, CUTTRY, s. Hind. Khatri, Khatri, Skt. Kshatriya. The second, or military caste, in the theoretical or fourfold division of the Hindus. [But the word is more commonly applied to a mercantile caste, which has its origin in the Punjab, but is found in considerable numbers in other parts of India. Whether they are really of Kshatriya descent is a matter on which there is much difference of opinion. See Crooke, Tribes and Castes of N.W.P., iii. 264 seqq.] The Xarpatios whom Ptolemy locates apparently towards Rajputana are probably Kshatriyas.

[1623.—"They told me Ciautru was a title of honour."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 312.

1630.—"And because Cuttery was of a martial temper God gave him power to sway Kingdames with the scepter."—Lord, Banians, 5.

1633.—"Les habitans . . . sont la plus part Benyans et Ketteris, tisserans, teinturiers, et autres ouuriers en cotton."—Mandelso, ed. 1659, 130.

[1671.—"There are also Cuttarees, another Sort Principally about Agra and those parts up the Country, who are as the Banian Gentooes here."—In Yule, Hodges' Diary, Hak. Soc. n.p. cccxi.]

1870.—"Opium is frequently eaten in great quantities by the Rashpoots, Quateries, and Patans."—Fryer, 198.

1726.—"The second generation in rank among these heathen is that of the Settreas."—Valentijn, Chorom. 57.

1782.—"The Chittery occasionally betakes himself to traffic, and the Sooder has become the inheritor of principalities."—G. Forster's Journey, ed. 1808, i. 64.

1836.—"The Banians are the merchanthial caste of the original Hindoos. . . . They call themselves Shudderis, which signifies innocent or harmless (!)"—Sir R. Phillips, Million of Facts, 322.

KHYBER PASS, n.p. The famous gorge which forms the chief gate of Afghanistan from Peshawar, properly Khaibar. [The place of the same name near Al-Madinah is mentioned in the Ain (iii. 57), and Sir R. Burton writes: "Khybar in Hebrew is supposed to mean a castle. D'Herbelot makes it to mean a pact or association of the Jews against the Moslems."

1519.—"Early next morning we set out on our march, and crossing the Kheiber Pass, halted at the foot of it. The Khizer-Khal had been extremely licentious in their conduct. Both on the coming and going of our army they had shot upon the stragglers, and such of our people as lagged behind, or separated from the rest, and carried off their horses. It was clearly expedient that they should meet with a suitable chastisement."—Burton, p. 277.

1519.—"On Thursday Jamrud was our encamping ground.

"On Friday we went through the Khaibar Pass, and encamped at 'Ali Musjid."—Jahangir, in Elliot, vi. 314.

1783.—"The stage from Timrood (read Jimrood) to Dickah, usually called the Hyber-pass, being the only one in which much danger is to be apprehended from banditti, the officer of the escort gave orders to his party to . . . march early on the next morning . . . Timur Shah, who used to pass the winter at Peshaur . . . never passed through the territory of the Hybers, without their attacking his advanced or rear guard."—Forster's Travels, ed. 1808, ii. 65-66.

And crowding through the Khyber's rocky strait, Sweep like a bloody harrow o'er the land."—The Banyan Tree, p. 6.
KILLUT, KILLAUT.

KIDDERPORE, n.p. This is the name of a suburb of Calcutta, on the left bank of the Hooghly, a little way south of Fort William, and is the seat of the Government Dockyard. This establishment was formed in the 18th century by Gen. Kyd, "after whom," says the Imperial Gazetteer, "the village is named." This is the general belief, and was mine [H. Y.] till recently, when I found from the chart and directions in the English Pilot of 1711 that the village of Kidderpore (called in the same chart Kitherepore) then occupied the same position, i.e. immediately below "Gobarnapore" and that immediately below "Chittannute" (i.e. Govindpûr and Chatanatî (see CHUTTANUTTY)."

1711.—"... then keep Rounding Chittîl Poe (Chitpore) Bite down to Chittî Nutty Point (see CHUTTANUTTY). ... The Bite below Gover Napore (Govindpûr) is Shoal, and below the Shoal is an Eddy; therefore from Gover Napore, you must stand over to the Starboard-Shore, and keep it aboard till you come up almost with the Point opposite to Kiddery-pore, but no longer. ..."—The English Pilot, p. 65.

KIL, s. Pitch or bitumen. Tam. and Mal. kîl, Ar. kîr, Pers. kir and kîl.

C. 1330.—"In Persia there are some springs, from which flows a kind of pitch which is called kîr (read kir) (pîx dîcî suc pegna), with which they smear the skins in which wine is carried and stored."—Friar Jordamius, p. 10.

C. 1560.—"These are pitched with a bitumen which they call quîl, which is like pitch."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 240.

KILLADAR, s. P.—H. kîl'dar, from Ar. ka'a, 'a fort.' The commandant of a fort, castle, or garrison. The Ar. ka'a is always in India pronounced kîla. And it is possible that in the first quotation Ibn Batuta has misinterpreted an Indian title; taking it as from Pers. kil'îd, 'a key.' It may be noted with reference to ka'a that this Ar. word is generally represented in Spanish names by Alala, a name borne by nine Spanish towns entered in K. Johnstone's Index Geographici; and in Sicilian ones by Calata, e.g. Calatafini, Callunissetta, Calatigiron.

C. 1340.—"... Kâdhî Khân, Sadr-al-Jhân, who became the chief of the Amirs, and had the title of Kalît-dâr, i.e. Keeper of the keys of the Palace. This officer was accustomed to pass every night at the Sultan's door, with the bodyguard."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 196.

1757.—"The fugitive garrison ... returned with 500 more, sent by the Kellidar of Vindivash."—Orme, ed. 1803, ii. 217.

1817.—"The following were the terms ... that Arni should be restored to its former governor or Killadar."—Mill, iii. 340.

1829.—"Among the prisoners captured in the Fort of Hattrass, search was made by us for the Keeladar."—Mem. of John Sipp, ii. 210.

KILLA-KOTE, s. pl. A combination of Ar.—P. and Hind. words for a fort (kiâ for ka'a, and kôt), used in Western India to imply the whole fortifications of a territory (R. Drummond).

KILLUT, KILLAUT, &c., s. Ar.—H. khîlât. A dress of honour presented by a superior on ceremonial occasions; but the meaning is often extended to the whole of a ceremonial present of that nature, of whatever it may consist. [The Ar. khîl-'a'h properly means 'what a man strips from his person.'] "There were (among the later Moguls) five degrees of khîlât, those of three, five, six, or seven pieces; or they might as a special mark of favour consist of clothes that the emperor had actually worn." (See for further details Mr. Irvine in J.R.A.S., N.S., July 1896, p. 533.)

The word has in Russian been degraded to mean the long loose gown which forms the most common dress in Turkistan, called generally by Schuyler 'a dressing-gown' (Germ. Schlafock). See Frachn, Wolga Bulgarea, p. 43.

1411.—"Several days passed in sumptuous feasts. Khilâts and girdles of royal magnificence were distributed."—Abdurazzâk, in Not. et Exta. xiv. 209.

1673.—"Sir George Oxenden held it ... He defended himself and the Merchants so bravely, that he had a Collat or Seerpaw, (q.v.) A Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him from the Great Mogul."—Fryer, 87.

1765.—"This is the Wardrobe, where the Royal Garments are kept; and from whence the King sends for the Calaat, or a whole Habit for a Man, when he would honour any Stranger. ..."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 46; [ed. Bull, ii. 98].

1774.—"A flowered satin gown was brought me, and I was dressed in it as a khîlât."—Boyle, in Markham's Tibet, 25.

1786.—"And he the said Warren Hastings did send kellauts, or robes of honour (the most public and distinguished mode of acknowledging merit known in India) to the said ministers in testimony of his approbation of their services."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, vii. 25.

1809.—"On paying a visit to any Asiatic Prince, an inferior receives from him a complete dress of honour, consisting of a khelaut, a robe, a turban, a shield and sword, with a string of pearls to go round the neck."—Ed. Valentinia, i. 99.

1813.—"On examining the khelauts . .
from the great Maharajah Madajee Sindia, the serpetch (see SIKKIM) presented to Sir Charles Malt, was found to be composed of false stones."—Forbes, Or.
Mem. iii. 50; [2nd ed. ii. 418].

KINCOB. s. Gold brocade. P.—H. hamklidb, kamkhab, vulgarly kimkhab.
The English is perhaps from the Guja-ratii, as in that language the last syllable is short.

This word has been twice imported from the East. For it is only another form of the medieval name of an Eastern damask or brocade, cammoca. This was taken from the medieval Persian and Arabic forms kemkhā or kimkhab, 'damasked silk,' and seems to have come to Europe in the 13th century.
F. Johnson's Dict. distinguishes between kemkā, 'damask silk of one colour,' and kimkā, 'damask silk of different colours.' And this again, according to Dozy, quoting Hoffmann, is originally a Chinese word kin-kha; in which doubtless kin, 'gold,' is the first element. Kim is the Fuhkien form of the word; qu, kim-hoa, 'gold-flower'? We have seen kimkhab derived from Pers. kem-khab, 'less sleep,' because such cloth is rough and prevents sleep! This is a type of many etymologies. 'The ordinary derivation of the word supposes that a man could not even dream of it who had not seen it (kām, 'little,' khab, 'dream')' (Yusuf Ali, Mono. on Silk, 86). Platt's and the Madras Gloss, take it from kām, 'little,' khabāb, 'nap.'
Ducange appears to think the word survived in the French mocade (or moquette); but if so the application of the term must have degenerated in England. (See in Draper's Dict. mockado, the form of which has suggested a sham stuff.)

Kamkā in Cathay, 246.

C. 1340.—"You may reckon also that in Cathay you get three or three and a half pieces of damasked silk (cammoca) for a s copno."—Pegolotti, ibid. 295.

1342.—"The King of China had sent to the Sultan 100 slaves of both sexes for 500 pieces of kamkā, of which 100 were made in the City of Zaitûn . . ."—Ibn Bututa, iv. 1.

C. 1375.—"Thei seten this Ydole upon a Chare with gret reverence, wel arrayed

1411.—"We have sent an ambassador who carries you from us kimkā."—Letter from Emp. of Chian to Shah Rukh, in Not. et Ext.
xiv. 214.

1474.—"And the King gave a signe to him that wayted, confounding him to give to the dauncer a peec of Cacmato.
And he taking this peec throwe it about the head of the dauncer, and of the men and women: and using certain wordes in praiseng the King, throwe it before the mynthstrellas."—Josapha Barbaro, Travels in Persia, 1688.—"Kακούχας, Xακούχας, Pan-

Kingcob Waistcoat, and Crimson Velvet Breeches with Gold Garters, is nowa butt to the shafts of Macaroni ridicule."—Letter

1786—"... but not until the nabob's mother aforesaid had engaged to pay for the said change of prison, a sum of £10,000 ... and that she would ransom the zena'nah ... for Kincobs, muslins, clothes, &c. &c., &c."—Articles of Charge against Hastings, in Burke's Works, 1852, vili. 25.

1809.—"Twenty trays of shawls, kheen-kaubs ... were tendered to me."—Lo. Valentia, i. 177.

1829.—"Tired of this service we took possession of the town of Muttra, driving them out. Here we had glorious plunder—shawls, silks, satins, klehemkaubs, money, &c.;—Mem. of John Skipp, i. 124.

KING-CROW, s. A glossy black bird, otherwise called Drongo shrike, about as large as a small pigeon, with a long forked tail, Dicrurus macrocerucus, Vieillot, found all over India. "It perches generally on some bare branch, whence it can have a good look-out, or the top of a house, or post, or telegraph-wire, frequently also on low bushes, hedges, walks, or ant-hills" (Jerdon).

1883.—"... the King-crow ... leaves the whole bird and beast tribe far behind in originality and force of character. ... He does not come into the house, the telegraph wire suits him better. Perched on it he can see what is going on ... drops, beak foremost, on the back of the kite ... spits a bee-eater capturing a goodly moth, and after a hot chase, forces it to deliver up its booty."—The Tribes on My Frontier, 143.

KIOSQUE, s. From the Turk and Pers. kishk or kushk; 'a pavilion, a villa,' &c. The word is not Anglo-Indian, nor is it a word, we think, at all common in modern native use.

c. 1350.—"When he was returned from his expedition, and drawing near to the capital, he ordered his son to build him a palace, or as those people call it a kushk, by the side of a river which runs at that place, which is called Afghanpur."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 212.

1629.—"There is (in the garden) running water which issues from the entrance of a great kiosck, or covered place, where one may stay to take the air, which is built at the end of the garden over a great pond which adjoins the outside of the garden, so that, like the one at Surat, it serves also for the public use of the city."—P. della Valle, i. 585; [Hak. Soc. i. 68].

KIRBEE, KURBEE, s. Hind. karbi, kirbi, Skt. kadamba, 'the stalk of a pot-herb.' The stalks of ju'ur (see JOWAUR), used as food for cattle.

[1809.—"... We also fell in with large racks of kurbee, the dried stalks of Bajiri and Joor, two inferior kinds of grain; an excellent fodder for the camels."—Broughton, Letters from a Makratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 41.]

KISHM, n.p. The largest of the islands in the Persian Gulf, called by the Portuguese Queixome and the like, and sometimes by our old travellers, Kishmish. It is now more popularly called Jazirat-al-tawila, in Pers. Jaz. darâz, 'the Long Island' (like the Lewes), and the name of Kishm is confined to the chief town, at the eastern extremity, where still remains the old Portuguese fort taken in 1622, before which William Baillie the Navigator fell. But the oldest name is the still not quite extinct Borokht, which closely preserves the Greek Oaracta.

B.C. 325.—"... And setting sail (from Harmoiseia), in a run of 300 stadii they passed a desert and bushy island, and moored beside another island which was large and inhabited. The small desert island was named Organa (no doubt Ormuz, afterwards the site of N. Hormuz—see ORMUS); and the one at which they anchored Odara, planted with vines and date-palms, and with plenty of corn."—Arria, Voyage of Nearchus, ch. xxxvii.

1538.—"... so I hastened with him in the company of divers merchants for to go from Babylon (orig. Babylonia) to Caixen, whence he carried me to Ormuz ..."—F. M. Pinto, chap. vi. (Cogan, p. 9).

1553.—"Finally, like a timorous and despairing man ... he determined to leave the city (Ormuz) deserted, and to pass over to the Isle of Queixome. That island is close to the mainland of Persia, and is within sight of Ormuz at 3 leagues distance."—Barros, III. vii. 4.

KITMUTGAR, s. Hind. khidmut-gar, from Ar.—P. khidmat, 'service,' therefore 'one rendering service.' The Anglo-Indian use is peculiar to the Bengal Presidency, where the word is habitually applied to a Musulman servant, whose duties are connected with serving meals and waiting at table under the Consumah, if there be one. Kitmutgar is a vulgarism, now perhaps obsolete. The word is spelt by Hadley in his Grammar (see under MOORS) khzumutgdr. In the word khidmat, as in khilat (see KILLUT), the terminal t in uninflected Arabic has long been dropped, though retained in the form in which these words have got into foreign tongues.

1759.—The wages of a Khedmutgar appear as 3 Rupees a month.—In Long, p. 182.

1765.—."... they were taken into the service of Sooraj Dowlat as immediate attendant on his person; Hodjee (see HADJEE) in capacity of his first Kistmutgar (or valet)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 60.

KITTSOL, KITSOL. 8. This word survived till lately in the Indian Tariff, but it is otherwise long obsolete. It was formerly in common use for 'an umbrella,' and especially for the kind, made of bamboo and paper, imported from China, such as the English fashion of to-day has adopted to screen fire-places in summer. The word is Portuguese, quita-sol, 'bar-sun.' Also tirosó occurs in Scott's Discourse of Java, quoted below from Purchas. See also Hulsius, Coll. of Voyages, in German, 1602, i. 27. [Mr. Skeat points out that in Howison's Malay Dict. (1801) we have, s.v. Payong: 'A Kittasol, sombrera,' which is nearer to the Port. original than any of the examples given since 1611. This may be due to the strong Portuguese influence at Malacca.]

1615.—"The China Capt., Andrea Dittis, returned from Langasque and brought me a present from his brother, viz., 1 faire Kitesol . . ."—Cocks's Diary, i. 28.

KING, n.p. This is the name (Kaling) applied in the Malay countries, including our Straits Settlements, to the people of Continental India who trade thither, or are settled in those regions, and to the descendants of those settlers. [Mr. Skeat remarks: “The standard Malay form is not Kaling, which is the Suntran form, but Keling (Kling or Kling). The Malay use of the word is, as a rule, restricted to Tamils, but it is very rarely used in a wider sense.”]

The name is a form of Kalinga, a very ancient name for the region known as the “Northern Circars” (q.v.), i.e. the Telugu coast of the Bay of Bengal, or, to express it otherwise in general terms, for that coast which extends from the Kistna to the Mahanadi. “The Kalingas” also appear frequently, after the Pauranic fashion, as an ethnic name in the old Sanskrit lists of races. Kalinga appears in the earliest of Indian inscriptions, viz. in the edicts of Asoka, and specifically in that famous edict (XII.) remaining in fragments at Girnär and Kapurdi-giri, and more completely at Khàlsì, which preserves the link, almost unique from the Indian side, connecting the histories of India and of the Greeks, by recording the names of Antiochus, Ptolemy, Antigonus, Magas, and Alexander.

Kalinga is a kingdom constantly mentioned in the Buddhist and historical legends of Ceylon; and we find commemoration of the kingdom of Kalinga and of the capital city of Kalinganagara (e.g. in Ind. Antiq. iii. 152, x. 243). It was from a daughter of a King of Kalinga that sprang, according to the Mahavanso, the famous Wijayo, the civilizer of Ceylon and the founder of its ancient royal race.

Kalingapatam, a port of the Ganjam district, still preserves the ancient name of Kalinga, though its identity with the Kalinganagara of the inscriptions is not to be assumed. The name in later, but still ancient, inscriptions appears occasionally as Tri-Kalinga, “the Three Kalingas”; and this probably, in a Telugu version Mâdu-Kalinga, having that meaning, is the original of the Modoqalinga of Pliny in one of the passages quoted from him. (The possible connection which obviously suggests itself of this name Trikalinga with the names Tilinga and Tilin̄gâna, applied, at least since the Middle Ages, to the same region, will be noticed under TELINGA).

The coast of Kalinga appears to be that part of the continent whence commerce with the Archipelago at an early date, and emigration thither, was most rife; and the name appears to have been in great measure adopted in the Archipelago as the designation of India in general, or of the whole of the Peninsular part of it. Throughout the book of Malay historical legends called the Siyâra Malayu the word Kalîng or Kling is used for India in general, but more particularly for the southern parts (see Journ. Ind. Archip. v. 133). And the statement of Forrest (Voyage to Mervî Archip. 1792, p. 82) that Macassar “Indostàn” was called “Neegree Telînga” (i.e. Nâgarâ Telînga) illustrates the same thing and also the substantial identity of the names Telenga, Kalinga.

The name Kling, applied to settlers of Indian origin, makes its appearance in the Portuguese narratives immediately after the conquest of Malacca (1511). At the present day most, if not all of the Klings of Singapore come, not from the “Northern Circars,” but from Tanjore, a purely Tamil district. And thus it is that so good an authority as Roorda van Eijisînga translates Kaling by ‘Coromandel people.’ They are either Hindus or Labbais (see LUBBYE). The latter class in British India never take domestic service with Europeans, whilst they seem to succeed well in that capacity in Singapore. “In 1876,” writes Dr. Burnell, “the head servant at Bekker’s great hotel there was a very good specimen of the Nagûr Labbais; and to my surprise he recollected me as the head assistant-collector of Tanjore, which I had been some ten years before.” The Hindu Klings appear to be chiefly drivers of hackney carriages and keepers of eating-houses. There is a Siva temple in Singapore, which is served by Pandàrâms (q.v.). The only Brahmas there in 1876 were certain convicts. It may be noticed that Calingas is the name of a heathen tribe of (alleged) Malay origin in the east of N. Luzon (Philippine Islands).

B.C. c. 250.—“Great is Kalinga conquered by the King Payadasi, beloved of the Devas. There have been hundreds of thousands of creatures carried off... KOABANG, s. The name (lit. ‘greater division’) of a Japanese gold coin, of the same form and class as the obang (y.v.). The coin was issued occasionally from 1580 to 1860, and its most usual weight was 222 grs.
trroy. The shape was oblong, of an average length of 2½ inches and width of 4½.

iv. 356.

KOEL, s. This is the common name in northern India of Eudynamys orientalis, L. (Fam. of Cuckoos), also called kokild and koklid. The name koel is taken from its cry during the breding season, “ku-il, ku-il, . . .” increasing in vigour and intensity as it goes on. The male bird has also another note, which Blyth syllables as Hochehe-ho, or Ho-a-o, or Ho-o-o. When it takes flight it has yet another somewhat melodious and rich liquid call;
all thoroughly excruciating.” (Jerdon.)

c. 1526.—“Another is the Koel, which in length may be equal to the crow, but is much thinner. It has a kind of song, and is the nightingale of Hindistan. It is respected by the natives of Hindstan as much as the nightingale is by us. It habits gardens where the trees are close planted.”—Bober, p. 323.

1590.—“The Koël resembles the myneh (see MYNA), but is blacker, and has red eyes and a long tail. It is fabled to be ennomoured of the rose, in the same manner as the nightingale.”—Aween, ed. Gladwin, ii. 381; [ed. Jarrett, iii. 121].

1790.—“Le plaisir que cause la fraicheur dont elle jouit sous cette belle verdure est aggravé encore par le gazouillement des oiseaux et les cris clairs et perçants du Koewil . . .”—Haufler, ii. 9.

1810.—“The Kokeela and a few other birds of song.”—Maria Graham, 22.

1888.—“This same crow-pheasant has a second or third cousin called the Koel, which deposits its eggs in the nest of the crow, and has its young brought up by that discreditable foster-parent. Now this bird supposes that it has a musical voice, and devotes the best part of the night to vocal exercise, after the manner of the nightingale.
You may call it the Indian nightingale if you like. There is a difference however in its song . . . when it gets to the very top of its pitch, its voice cracks and there is an end of it, or rather there is not, for the persevering musician begins again. . . .”
Does not the Maratha novelist, dwelling on the delights of a spring morning in an Indian village, tell how the air was filled with the dulcet melody of the Koel, the green parrot, and the peacock?”—Tribes on My Frontier, 156.
KOHINOR, n.p. Pers. Koh-i-nār, 'Mountain of Light'; the name of one of the most famous diamonds in the world. It was an item in the Deccan booty of Alāndin Khilji (dd. 1316), and was surrendered to Baber (or more precisely to his son Humāyūn) on the capture of Agra (1526). It remained in the possession of the Moghul dynasty till Nādir extorted it at Delhi from the conquered Mahommed Shāh (1739). After Nādir's death it came into the hands of Ahmed Shāh, the founder of the Afghan monarchy. Shāh Shujā', Ahmed's grandson, had in turn to give it up to Ranjit Singh when a fugitive in his dominions. On the annexation of the Punjab in 1849 it passed to the English, and is now among the Crown jewels of England. Before it reached that position it ran through strange risks, as may be read in a most diverting story told by Bosworth Smith in his Life of Lord Lawrence (i. 327-8). In 1850-51, before being shown at the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, it went through a process of cutting which, for reasons unintelligible to ordinary mortals, reduced its weight from 186½ carats to 106½. [See an interesting note in Ball's Tavernier, ii. 431 seqq.]

1526.—"In the battle in which Ibrāhīm was defeated, Bīrkermājī (Raja of Gwalior) was sent to hell. Bīrkermājī's family . . . were at this moment in Agra. When Ḥāmādīn arrived . . . (he) did not permit them to be plundered. Of their own free will they presented to Ḥāmādīn a peskehsh (see Peshcush), consisting of a quantity of jewels and precious stones. Among these was one famous diamond which had been acquired by Sūltān Aḥmedīn. It is so valuable that a judge of diamonds valued it at half the daily expense of the whole world. It is about eight mishkals. . . ."—Baber, p. 906.

1676.—(With an engraving of the stone.) "This diamond belongs to the Great Mogul . . . and it weighs 619 Ratis (see Rottie) and a half, which make 279 and nine 16ths of our Carats; when it was rough it weighed 907 Ratis, which make 793 carats."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 148; [ed. Ball, ii. 123].

KOONBEE, KUNBEE, KOOL-UMBEE, n.p. The name of the prevalent cultivating class in Guzerat and the Konkan, the Kurmi of N. India. Skt. kutumba. The Kurbi is the pure Sudra, [but the N. India branch are beginning to assert a more respectable origin]. In the Deccan the title distinguished the cultivator from him who wore arms and preferred to be called a Maharatta (Dummmond).

KOSHOON, s. This is a term which was affected by Tippoo Sahib in his military organisation, for a brigade, or a regiment in the larger Continental use of that word. His Piddah 'askar, or Regular Infantry, was formed into 5 Kachahris (see CUTCHEERY), composed in all of 27 Kushains. A MS. note on the copy of Kirkpatrick's Letters in the India Office Library says that Kushoon was properly Skt. kshuni or kshanini, 'a grand division of the force of an Empire, as used in the Mahabharata. But the word adopted by Tippoo appears to be Turki. Thus we read in Quatremère's transl. from Abdurrazzak: "He (Shah Rukh) distributed to the emirs who commanded the tomans (corps of 10,000), the koshun (corps of 1000), the saude (of 100), the dekeh (of 10), and even to the private soldiers, presents and rewards" (Nots. et Exts. xiv. 91; see also p. 89).

Again: "The soldiers of Isfahan having heard of the amnesty accorded them, arrived, koshun by koshun." (Ibid. 130.) Vambéry gives koshun as Or. Turki for an army, a troop (literally whatever is composed of several parts).

[1753.—"... Kara-kushun, are also foot soldiers... the name is Turkish and signifies black guard."—Hawway, 1. pt. ii. 292.]

[1782.—"In the time of the deceased Nawab, the exercises... of the regular troops were... performed, and the word given according to the French system... but now, the Sultan (Tippoo)... changed the military code... and altered the technical terms or words of command... to words of the Persian and Turkish languages... From the regular infantry 5000 men being selected, they were named Kushoon, and the officer commanding that body was called a Sipahdar..."—Rist of Tipu Sultan, p. 31.]

KOTOW, KOWTOW, s. From the Chinese k'o-tou, lit. 'knock-head'; the salutation used in China, before the Emperor, his representatives, or his symbols, made by prostrations repeated a fixed number of times, the forehead touching the ground at each prostration. It is also used as the most respectful form of salutation from children to parents, and from servants to masters on formal occasions, &c.

This mode of homage belongs to old Pan-Asiatic practice. It was not, however, according to M. Pauthier, of indigenous antiquity at the Court of China, for it is not found in the ancient Book of Rites of the Chou Dynasty, and he supposes it to have been introduced by the great destroyer and reorganiser, Tsin shi Hwangti, the Builder of the Wall. It had certainly become established by the 8th century of our era, for it is mentioned that the Ambassadors who came to Court from the famous Harûn-al-Rashîd (a.d. 798) had to perform it. Its nature is mentioned by Marco Polo, and by the ambassadors of Sháh Rukh (see below). It was also the established ceremonial in the presence of the Mongol Khans, and is described by Baber under the name of kornish. It was probably introduced into Persia in the time of the Mongol Princess of the house of Hulâkî, and it continued to be in use in the time of Sháh 'Abbâs. The custom indeed in Persia may possibly have come down from time immemorial, for, as the classical quotations show, it was of very ancient prevalence in that country. But the interruptions to Persian monarchy are perhaps against this. In English the term, which was made familiar by Lord Amherst’s refusal to perform it at Pekin in 1816, is frequently used for servile acquiescence or adulation.

Ko-tou-k’o-tou! is often colloquially used for ‘Thank you’ (E. C. Barber).

c. B.C. 484.—“And afterwards when they were come to Susa in the king’s presence, and the guards ordered them to fall down and do obeisance, and went so far as to use force to compel them, they refused, and said they would never do any such thing, even were their heads thrust down to the ground, for it was not their custom to worship men, and they had not come to Persia for that purpose.” —Herodotus, by Rawlinson, vii. 136.

c. B.C. 464.—“Themistocles... first meets with Artabanus the Chiliarch, and tells him that he was a Greek, and wished to have an interview with the king. But quoth he; ‘Stranger, the laws of men are various. You Greeks, ‘tis said, most admire liberty and equality, but to us of our many and good laws the best is to honour the king, and adore him by prostration, as the Image of God, the Preserver of all things.’... Themistocles, on hearing these things, says to him: ‘But I, O Artabanus, will myself obey your laws.’...” —Plutarch, Themistoc., xxvii.

c. B.C. 390.—“Conon, being sent by Pharnabazus to the king, on his arrival, in accordance with Persian custom, first presented himself to the Chiliarch Tithraustes who held the second rank in the empire, and stated that he desired an interview with the king; for no one is admitted without this. The officer replied: ‘It can be at once; but consider whether you think it best to have an interview, or to write the business on which you come. For if you come into the presence you must needs worship the king (what they call προσκυνεῖν). If this is disagreeable to you you may commit your wishes to me, without doubt of their being as well accomplished.’ Then Conon says: ‘Indeed it is not disagreeable to me to pay the king any honour whatever. But I fear lest I bring discredit upon my city, if belonging to a state which is wont to rule over other nations I adopt manners which are not her own, but those of foreigners.’ Hence he delivered his wishes in writing to the officer.” —Corn. Nepos, Conon, c. iv.

B.C. 324.—“But he (Alexander) was now downhearted, and beginning to be despairing towards the divinity, and suspicious towards his friends. Especially he dreaded Antipater and his sons. Of these Iolas was the Chief Cupbearer, whilst Kasander had come but lately. So the latter, seeing certain Barbarians prostrating themselves (προσκυνοῦντες), a sort of thing which he, having been brought up in Greek fashion, had never witnessed before, broke into fits of laughter. But Antipater, in a rage gripped him fast by the hair with both hands, and knocked his head against the wall.” —Plutarch, Alexander, lixiv.

A.D. 798.—“In the 14th year of Tchin yuan, the Khalif Galun (Hārān) sent three ambassadors to the Emperor; they performed the ceremony of kneeling and beating the forehead on the ground, to salute the Emperor. The earlier ambassadors from the Khalifs who came to China had at first made difficulties about performing this ceremony. The Chinese history relates that the Mahomedans declared that they knelt only to worship Heaven. But eventually, being better informed, they made scruple no longer.” —Gaukil, Alvéole de l'Histoire des Thaungs, in Anyo Mémories cons. les Chinois, xvi. 144.

c. 1245.—“Tartari de mandato ipsius principes suos Baiochonoy et Bato violenter ab omnibus nunculis ad Ipsos venientibus faciunt adorari cum triplici genuum flexione, triplici quoque capitu suorum in terram allisione.” —Vincent Delarosnés, Spec. Historiale, l. xxix. cap. 74.

1298.—“And when they are all seated, each in his proper place, then a great prelate rises and says with a loud voice: ‘Bow and adore!’ And as soon as he has said this, the company bow down until their foreheads touch the earth in adoration towards the Emperor as if he were a god. And this adoration they repeat four times.” —Marco Polo, Bk. ii. ch. 15.

1404.—“E fierionele vestir dos ropas de camozin (see KINCOB), é la usanza era, quando estas roupat ponian por el Señor, de facer un gran yantar, é despues de comer de les vesc les de las ropas, é entonces de fincar los finjos tres veces de las hestores del reverencia del gran Señor.”—Clavijo, § xci.

“...And the custom was, when these robes were presented as from the Emperor, to make a great feast, and after eating to clothe them with the robes, and then that they should touch the ground three times with the knees to show great reverence for the Lord.”—See Markham, p. 104.

1421.—“His worship Hajji Yusuf the Kazi, who was... chief of one of the twelve imperial Councils, came forward accompanied by several Musulmans acquainted with the languages. They said to the ambassadors: ‘First prostrate yourselfs, and then touch the round three times with your heads.’” —Embassy from Shah Rukh, in Cathay, p. ccc.

1502.—“My uncle the elder Khan came three or four farsangs out from Tashkend, and having erected an awning, seated himself under it. The younger Khan advanced... and when he came to the distance at which the kornish is to be performed, he knelt nine times...” —Baber, 106.
c. 1590.—The kornish under Akbar had been greatly modified:

"His Majesty has commanded the palm of the right hand to be placed upon the forehead, and the head to be bent downwards. This mode of salutation, in the language of the present age, is called Kornish."—Ann. of Blackford, i. 158.

But for his position as the head of religion, in his new faith he permitted, or claimed prostration (ajdah) before him:

"As some perverse and dark-minded men look upon prostration as blasphemous man-worship, His Majesty, from practical wisdom, has ordered it to be discontinued by the ignorant, and remitted it to all ranks. . . . However, in the private assembly, when any of those are in waiting, upon whom the star of good fortune shines, and they receive the order of seating themselves, they certainly perform the prostration of gratitude by bowing down their foreheads to the earth."—Ibid., p. 159.

1618.—"The King (Shah 'Abbas) halted and looked at the Sultan, the latter on both knees, as is their fashion, near him, and advanced his right foot towards him to be kissed. The Sultan having kissed it, and touched it with his forehead . . . made a circuit round the king, passing behind him, and making way for his companions to do the like. This done the Sultan came and kissed a second time, as did the other, and this they did three times."—P. della Valle, i. 446.

[c. 1866.—"Job (Charnock) made a salam Kooris, or low obeisance, every second step he advanced."—Orme, Fragments, quoted in Yule, Holies' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. xcvi.]

1816.—"Lord Amherst put into my hands . . . a translation . . . by Mr. Morrison of a document received at Tongchow with some letters from Chang, containing an official description of the ceremonies to be observed at the public audience of the Ambassador. . . . The Ambassador was then to have been conducted by the Mandarins to the level area, where kneeling . . . he was next to have been conducted to the lower end of the hall, where facing the upper part . . . he was to have performed the ko-tou with 9 prostrations; afterwards he was to have been led out of the hall, and having prostrated himself once behind the row of Mandarins, he was to have been allowed to sit down; he was further to have prostrated himself with the attendant Princes and Mandarins when the Emperor drank. Two other prostrations were to have been made, the first when the milk-tea was presented to him, and the other when he had finished drinking."—Ellis's Journal of (Lord Amherst's) Embassy to China, 213-214.

1824.—"The first ambassador, with all his following, shall then perform the ceremonial of the three kneelings and the nine prostrations; they shall then rise and be led away in proper order."—Ceremonial observed at the Court of Peking for the Reception of Ambassadors, ed. 1824, in Panthier, 192.

1855.—" . . . The spectacle of one after another of the aristocracy of nature making the kotow to the aristocracy of the accident."—H. Martineau, Autobiog. ii. 377.

1860.—"Some Seiks, and a private in the Buffs having remained behind with the grog-carts, fell into the hands of the Chineses. On the next morning they were brought before the authorities, and commanded to perform the kotou. The Seiks obeyed; but Moyso, the English soldier, declaring that he would not prostrate himself before any Chinaman alive, was immediately knocked upon the head, and his body thrown upon a dunghill" (see China Correspondent of the Times). This passage prefaces some noble lines by Sir F. Doyle, ending:

"Vain mightiest fleets, of iron framed;
Vain those all-shattering guns;
Unless proud England keep, untamed,
The strong heart of her sons.
So let his name through Europe ring—
A man of mean estate,
Who died, as firm as Sparta's king, Because his soul was great."

Macmillan's Mag. iii. 130.

1876.—"Neba more kowtow big people."—Leland, 46.

1879.—"We know that John Bull adores a lord, but a man of Major L'Estrange's social standing would scarcely kowtow to every shabby little title to be found in sturdy little rooms in Mayfair."—Sat. Review, April 19, p. 505.

KOTUL, s. This appears to be a Turki word, though adopted by the Afghans. Kotul, 'a mountain pass, a col.' Pavet de Courteille quotes several passages, in which it occurs, from Baber's original Turki.

[1554.—"Koutel." See under RHINOCEROS.]

[1809.—"We afterwards went on through the hills, and crossed two Cotuls or passes."

—Elphinstone, Cautul, ed. 1842, i. 51.]

KUBBER, KHubBER, s. Ar.—P.—H. khabar, 'news,' and especially as a sporting term, news of game, e.g. "There is pucka khabber of a tiger this morning."

[1828.—" . . . the servant informed us that there were some gong whales, or villagers, in waiting, who had some khabber (news about tigers) to give us."—Murray, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 53.]

1878.—"Khabar of innumerable black partridges had been received."—Life in the Moghul, i. 159.

1879.—"He will not tell me what khabbar has been received."—Vanity Fair, Nov. 29, p. 299.
KUBBERDAUR. An interjedional exclamation, 'Take care!' Pers. khobar-dar! 'take heed!' (see KUBBER). It is the usual cry of chokidar's to show that they are awake. [As a substantive it has the sense of a 'scout' or 'spy.']

c. 1664.—"Each owrah causeth a guard to be kept all the night long, in his particular camp, of such men that perpetually go the round, and cry Kaber-dar, have a care."—Bernier, E.T. 119; [ed. Constable, 369].

c. 1685.—"Les archers crient ensuite une pleine tête, Caberdar, c'est à dire prends garde."—Theeuenot, v. 58.

[1813.—"There is a strange custom which prevails at all Indian courts, of having a servant called a khubur-dar, or newsman, who is an admitted spy upon the chief, about whose person he is employed."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahattu Camp, ed. 1892, p. 25.]

KUHÁR, s. Hind. Kahár, [Skt. skandha-kâra, 'one who carries loads on his shoulders']. The name of a Sídâr caste of cultivators, numerous in Bahâr and the N.W. Provinces, whose speciality is to carry palankins. The name is, therefore, in many parts of India synonymous with 'palankin-bearer,' and the Hindu body-servants called bearers (q.v.) in the Bengal Presidency are generally of this caste.

c. 1850.—"It is the custom for every traveller in India . . . also to hire kahârs, who carry the kitchen furniture, whilst others carry himself in the palanquin, of which we have spoken, and carry the latter when it is not in use."—Ibu Bâdû, iii. 415.

c. 1550.—"So saying he began to make ready a present, and sent for bulks, roots, and fruit, birds and beasts, with the finest of fish . . . which were brought by kahârs in baskets."—Râmâyana of Tulsî Dâs, by Grove, 1878, ii. 101.

1673.—"He (the President of Bombay) goes sometimes in his Coach, drawn by large Milk-white Oxen, sometimes on Horse-back, other times in Palankeens, carried by Cohors, Mussulmen Porters."—Fryer, 68.

1810.—"The Câhar, or palanquin-bearer, is a servant of peculiar utility in a country where, for four months, the intense heat precludes Europeans from taking much exercise."—Williamson, V. M. 1. 209.

1873.—"Ekh Kahár. A widely spread caste of rather inferior rank, whose occupation is to carry palkis, dólís, water-skins, &c.; to act as Porters . . . they eat flesh and drink spirits; they are an ignorant but industrious class. Buchanan describes them as of Telinga descent. . . ."—Dr. H. V. Carter's Notices of Castes in Bombay Pr., quoted in Ind. Antiq. ii. 154.

KULÁ, KLÁ, n.p. Burmese name of a native of Continental India; and hence misapplied also to the English and other Westerns who have come from India to Burma; in fact used generally for a Western foreigner.

The origin of this term has been much debated. Some have supposed it to be connected with the name of the Indian race, the Kols; another suggestion has connected it with Kalinga (see KLING); and a third with the Skt. kula, 'caste or tribe'; whilst the Burmese popular etymology renders it from kâ, 'to cross over,' and la, 'to come,' therefore 'the people that come across (the sea). But the true history of the word has for the first time been traced by Professor Forchhammer, to Gola, the name applied in old Pegu inscriptions to the Indian Buddhist immigrants, a name which he identifies with the Skt. Gâvade, the ancient name of Northern Bengal, whence the famous city of Gaur (see GOUR, c).

11th cent.—"The Heroes Sona and Uttarn were sent to Râmañña, which forms a part of Suvanna-Bhâni, to propagate the holy faith. . . . This town is called to this day Golamautikânagâra, because of the many houses it contained made of earth in the fashion of houses of the Gola people."—Insyr. at Kátâdî, near Pegu, in Forchhammer, ii. 3.

1795.—"They were still anxious to know why a person consulting his own amusement, and master of his own time, should walk so fast; but on being informed that I was a 'Colar,' or stranger, and that it was the custom of my country, they were reconciled to this. . . ."—Symes, Embassy, p. 290.

1855.—"His private dwelling was a small place on one side of the court, from which the women peeped out at the Kalâs; . . . "—Yule, Mission to the Court of Ava (Phayres'), p. 5.

"By a curious self-delusion, the Burmans would seem to claim that in theory at least they are white people. And what is still more curious, the Bengalees appear indirectly to admit the claim; for our servants in speaking of themselves and their countrymen, as distinguished from the Burmans, constantly made use of the term kâla adwa—'black man,' as the representative of the Burmese kâla, a foreigner."—Ibid. p. 37.

KUMPÁSS, s. Hind. kumpâs, corruption of English compass, and hence applied not only to a marine or a surveying compass, but also to theodolites, levelling instruments, and other elaborate instruments of observation, and even to the shaft of a carriage. Thus the sextant used to be called tikunta kumpass, “the 3-cornered compass.”

[1866.—“Many an amusing story did I hear of this wonderful kumpass. It possessed the power of reversing everything observed. Hence if you looked through the doorbeen at a fort, everything inside was revealed. Thus the Feringhees so readily took forts, not by skill or by valour, but by means of the wonderful power of the doorbeen.”—Confess. of an Orderly, 175.]

KUNKUR, CONKER, &c., s. Hind. konkar, ‘gravel.’ As regards the definition of the word in Anglo-Indian usage it is impossible to improve on Wilson: “A coarse kind of limestone found in the soil, in large tabular strata, or interspersed throughout the superficial mould, in nodules of various sizes, though usually small.” Nodular kunkur, wherever it exists, is the usual material for road metalling, and as it binds when wetted and rammed into a compact, hard, and even surface, it is an admirable material for the purpose.

c. 1781.—“Etaya is situated on a very high bank of the river Jumna, the sides of which consist of what in India is called conchus, which is originally sand, but the constant action of the sun in the dry season forms it almost into a vitrification” (i)—Hodges, 110.

1794.—“Konker” appears in a Notification for tenders in Calcutta Gazette. In Seton-Karr, i. 135.

c. 1809.—“We came within view of Cawnpore. Our long, long voyage terminated under a high konkur bank.”—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 381.

1810.—“. . . a weaker kind of lime is obtained by burning a substance called kunkur, which, at first, might be mistaken for small rugged flints, slightly coated with soil.”—Williamson, V. M. ii. 13.

KUREEF, KHURREEF, s. Hind. adopted from Ar. kharif (‘autumn’). The crop sown just before, or at the beginning of, the rainy season, in May or June, and reaped after the rains in November—December. This includes rice, maize, the tall millets, &c. (See RUBBEE).

[1824.—“The basis on which the settlements were generally founded, was a measurement of the Khurreef, or first crop, when it is cut down, and of the Rubbee, or second, when it is about half a foot high. . . .”—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 29.]

KURNOOL, n.p. The name of a city and territory in the Deccan, Karnal of the Imp. Gazetteer; till 1838 a tributary Nawabship; then resumed on account of treason; and now since 1858 a collectorate of Madras Presidency. Properly Kandhnur; Canoul of Orme. Kirkpatrick says that the name Kurnool, Kunnool, or Kundnool (all of which forms seem to be applied corruptly to the place) signifies in the language of that country ‘fine spin, clear thread,’ and according to Meer Husain it has its name from its beautiful cotton fabrics. But we presume the town must have existed before it made cotton fabrics? This is a specimen of the stuff that men, even so able as Kirkpatrick, sometimes repeat after those native authorities who “ought to know better,” as we are often told. [The Madras Gloss. gives the name as Tam. karnulu, from kandana, ‘a mixture of lamp-oil and burnt straw used in greasing cart-wheels’ and prolo, ‘village,’ because when the temple at Alampur was being built, the wheels of the carts were greased here, and thus a settlement was formed.]

KUTTAUR, s. Hind. katdr, Skt. kattara, ‘a dagger,’ especially a kind of dagger peculiar to India, having a solid blade of diamond-section, the handle of which consists of two parallel bars with a cross-piece joining them. The hand grips the cross-piece, and the bars pass along each side of the wrist. [See a drawing in Egerton, Hand-Book, Indian Arms, pl. ix.] Ibn Battuta’s account is vivid, and perhaps in the matter of size there may be no exaggeration. Through the kindness of Col. Waterhouse I have a phototype of some Travancore weapons shown at the Calcutta Exhibition of 1883-4; among them two great katdras, with sheaths made from the snouts of two saw-fishes (with the teeth remaining in). They are done to scale, and one of the blades is 20 inches long, the other 26. There is also a plate in the Ind. Antig. (vii. 193) representing some curious weapons from the Tanjore Palace Armoury, among which are katdr-hilted daggers evidently of great length, though the entire length is not shown. The plate accompanies interesting notes by Mr. M. J. Walhouse, who states the curious fact that many of the blades mounted katdr-fashion were of European manufacture, and that one of these bore the famous name of Andrea Ferrara. I add an extract. Mr. Walhouse accounts for the adoption of these blades in a country possessing the far-famed Indian steel, in that the latter was excessively brittle. The passage from Stavorinus describes the weapon, without giving a native name. We do not know what name is indicated by 'belly piercer.'

c. 1345. — "The villagers gathered round him, and one of them stabbed him with a kattāra. This is the name given to an iron weapon resembling a plough-share; the hand is inserted into it so that the fore-arm is shielded; but the blade beyond is two cubits in length, and a blow with it is mortal."—Jon Batatu, iv. 81-32.

1442. — "The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked. . . . In one hand they hold an Indian poignard (kattārah—Hindi), and in the other a buckler of oxhide . . . this costume is common to the king and the beggar."—Abderrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent., p. 17.

c. 1526. — "On the whole there were given one tipchāk horse with the saddle, two pairs of swords with the belts, 25 sets of enameled daggers (khānan—see HANGER), 16 enameled kitārēhs, two daggers (jamukher—see JUMUD) set with precious stones."—Buber, 338.

[6. 1590.—In the list of the Moghul arms we have: "10. Katārah, price ½ R. to 1 Muhur."—Ain, ed. Blockmann, i. 110, with an engraving, No. 9, pl. xii.,]

1679. — "They go rich in Attire, with a Poniard, or Catarre, at their girdle."—Fryer, 98.

1690. — "... which chafes and ferments him to such a pitch; that with a Catarre or Bagonet in his hands he first falls upon those that are near him . . . killing and stabbing as he goes."—Ovington, 287.

1754. — "To these were added an enameled dagger (which the Indians call cuttarrī) and two words..."—H. of Nadir, in Hanway’s Travels in the Himalaia, ii. 20.

1768-71. — "They (the Moguls) on the left side . . . wear a weapon which they call by a name that may be translated belly-piercer; it is about 14 inches long; broad near the hilt, and tapering away to a sharp point; it is made of fine steel; the handle has, on each side of it, a catch, which, when the weapon is gripped by the hand, shuts round the wrist, and secures it from being dropped."—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 457.

1813. — "After a short silent prayer, Lul- labhy, in the presence of all the company, waved his catarrā, or short dagger, over the bed of the expiring man... . The patient continued for some time motionless; in half an hour his heart appeared to beat, circulation quickened... at the expiration of the third hour Lullabhy had effected his cure."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 249; [2nd ed. ii. 272, and see i. 69].

1856. — "The manners of the bardic tribe are very similar to those of their Rajpoot clients; their dress is nearly the same, but the bard seldom appears without the 'Kutār,' or dagger, a representation of which is scrawled beside his signature, and often rudely engraved upon his monumental stone, in evidence of his death in the sacred duty of Trāgā" (p. vi.).—Forbes, Risā Mālī, ed. 1878, pp. 559-560.

1878. — "The ancient Indian smiths seem to have had a difficulty in hitting on a medium between this highly refined brittle steel and a too soft metal. In ancient sculptures, as in Srisanganaram Trichinapalli, life-sized figures of armed men are represented, bearing Kuttras or long daggers of a peculiar shape; the handles, not so broad as in the later Kuttras, are covered with a long narrow guard, and the blades 24 inches broad at bottom, taper very gradually to a point through a length of 18 inches, more than ⅔ of which is deeply channelled on both sides with 6 converging grooves. There were many of these in the Tanjor armoury, perfectly corresponding... and all were so soft as to be easily bent."—Ind. Antiq. vii.

KUZZANNA, s. Ar.—H. khasīna, or khasānā, ‘a treasury.’ [In Ar. khasīnāh, or khasnah, means ‘a treasure,’ representing 1000 kis or purses, each worth about £5 (see Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 405.)] It is the usual word for the district and general treasuries in British India; and khasānchi for the treasurer.

1683. — "Ye King’s Duan (see DEWAUN) had demanded of them 8000 Rupees on account of remains of last year’s Tallecas (see TALLICA) . . . ordering his Peasdaast (Peshdast, an assistant) to see it suddenly paid in ye King’s Cuzzanna."—Hedjaya, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 103.

[1757.—"A mint has been established in Calcutta; continue coining gold and silver into Sicos and Mohurs ... they shall pass current in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, and be received into the Cadganna..."—Perwannah from Jaffier Ally Khan, in Verelst, App. 145.]

KUZZILBASH, n.p. Turki kizilbash, ‘red-head.’ This title has been since the days of the Safavi (see SOPHY) dynasty in Persia, applied to the Persianized Turks, who form the ruling class in that country, from the red caps which they wore. The class is also settled extensively over Afghanistan. "At Kābul," writes Bellew (Races of Afghanistan, 107), "he (Nādir) left as chandaal, or 'rear guard,' a detachment of 12,000 of his Kiziltbāsh (so named from the red caps they wore), or Mughal Persian troops. After the death of Nādir they remained at Kābul as a military colony, and their descendants occupy a distinct quarter of the city, which is called Chandaal. These Kiziltbāsh hold their own ground here, as a distinct Persian community of the Shia persuasion, against the native population of the Sunni profession. They constitute an important element in the general population of the city, and exercise a considerable influence in its local politics. Owing to their isolated position and antagonism to the native population, they are favourably inclined to the British authority." Many of them used to take service with the Delhi emperors; and not a few do so now in our frontier cavalry regiments.

c. 1510.—"L'vansana loro è di portare vna berretta rossa, ch'avanza sopra la testa mezzo braccio, a guisa d'vn zon ("like a top"), che dalla parte, che si mette in testa, vine a essar larga, ristringendosi tuttaula sino in cima, et à fatta con dodici coste grosse vn dito... ne mai tagliano barba ne mostacchi."—G. M. Angioletto, in Ramusio, ii. f. 74.

1550.—"Oltra il deserto che è sopra il Corassam fino a Samarcand... signorreggiano Isewil bas, cioè le berrette verdi, le quali benette verdi sono alcuni Tartari Musulmani che portano le loro berrette di felto verde acuto, e così si fanno chiamare à differenza de Soffiani suoi capitali nemici che signorreggiano la Persia, pur anche essi Musulmani, i quali portano le berrette rosse, quali berrette verdi e rosse, hanno continuamente hauuta fra se guerra crudelissima per causa di diversità di opinione nella loro religione."—Oghghi Memet, in Ramusio, ii. f. 18r. "Beyond the desert above Corassam, as far as Samarkand and the idolatrous cities, the Yeshikbas (Isebilbas) or 'Green-caps,' are predominant. These Green-caps are certain Musulman Tartars who wear pointed caps of green felt, and they are so called to distinguish them from their chief enemies the Soffians, who are predominant in Persia, who are indeed also Musulmans, but who wear red caps."

1574.—"These Persians are also called Red Turks, which I believe is because they have behind on their Turbants, Red Marks, as Cotton Ribbands &c. with red Brims, whereby they are soon discerned from other Nations."—Rawwolff, 173.

1673.—"Those who compose the Main Body of the Cavalry, are the Cusie-bashees, or with us the Chevaliers."—Fryer, 356. Fryer also writes Cusselbash (Index).

1815.—"The seven Turkish tribes, who had been the chief promoters of his (Ismail's) glory and success, were distinguished by a particular dress; they wore a red cap, from which they received the Turkish name of Kuzzelbash, or 'golden heads,' which has descended to their posterity."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, ii. 502-3.

1828.—"The Kuzzalbash, a Tale of Khorasan. By James Baillie Fraser."

1833.—"For there are rats and rats, and a man of average capacity may as well hope to distinguish scientifically between Ghilizas, Kuki Khelys, Logar Maliks, Shigwals, Ghazis, Jezailchis, Hazaras, Logaris, Wardaks, Mandaos, Lepel-Griffin, and Kizilbashees, as to master the division of the great race of rats."—Tribes on My Frontier, 15.

KYFE, n. One often meets with this word (Ar. kaif) in books about the Levant, to indicate the absolute enjoyment of the dolce far niente. Though it is in the Hindustani dictionaries, we never remember to have heard it used in India; but the first quotation below shows that it is, or has been, in use in Western India, in something like the Turkish sense. The proper meaning of the Ar. word is 'how?' 'in what manner?' the secondary is 'partial intoxication.' This looks almost like a parallel to the English vulgar slang of 'how comed you so?' But in fact a man's kaif is his 'howness,' i.e. what pleases him, his humour; and this passes into the sense of gaiety caused by hashish, &c.

1808.—"... a kind of confectio Japonica loaded with opium, Gauje or Bang, and causing keif, or the first degree of intoxication, lulling the senses and disposing to sleep."—R. Drummond.

Portuguese in India (p. 88). I cannot explain it. [See BAO.]

1792.—"The kiousums or convents of the Rhaheans are different in their structure from common houses, and much resemble the architecture of the Chinese; they are made entirely of wood; the roof is composed of different stages, supported by strong pillars," &c.—Syntoms, p. 210.

KYTHEE, s. Hind. Kaithī. A form of cursive Nagari character, used by Bunyas, &c., in Gangetic India. It is from Kāyath (Skt. Kāyastha), a member of the writer-caste.

LAC, s. Hind. lākh, from Skt. lakṣa, for rákṣaḥ. The resinous incrustation produced on certain trees (of which the dhák (see DHAWK) is one, but chiefly Peepul, and khusum [kusum, kusumā], i.e. Schleicheru bijuga, trijuga) by the puncture of the Lac insect (Coccus Lacca, L.). See Roxburch, in Vol. III. As. Res., 384 seqq.; [and a full list of the trees on which the insect feeds, in Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 410 seqq.]. The incrustation contains 60 to 70 per cent. of resinous lac, and 10 per cent. of dark red colouring matter from which is manufactured lac-dye. The material in its original crude form is called stick-lac; when boiled in water it loses its red colour, and is then termed seed-lac; the melted clarified substance, after the extraction of the dye, is turned out in thin irregular laminae called shell-lac. This is used to make sealing-wax, in the fabrication of varnishes, and very largely as a stiffening for men's hats.

Though lākh bears the same sense in Persian, and lak or luk are used in modern Arabic for sealing-wax, it would appear from Dozy (Glos., pp. 295-6, and Oosterlingen, 57), that identical or approximate forms are used in various Arabic-speaking regions for a variety of substances giving a red dye, including the coccus stelis or Kermes. Still, we have seen no evidence that in India the word was applied otherwise than to the lac of our heading. (Garcia says that the Arabs called it loc-sumutri, 'lac of Sumatra'; probably because the Pegu lac was brought to the ports of Sumatra, and purchased there.) And this the term in the Periplus seems unquestionably to indicate; whilst it is probable that the passage quoted from Aelian is a much misconceived account of the product. It is not nearly so absurd as De Monfart's account below. The English word lake for a certain red colour is from this. So also are lacquer and lacquered ware, because lac is used in some of the varnishings with which such ware is prepared.

c. A.D. 80-90.—These articles are imported (to the ports of Barbariō, on the W. of the Red Sea) from the interior parts of Ariaḵā:—

"Σίδηρος Ινδίκου καὶ στέμαμα (Indian iron and steel).

Λάκκος χρωμάτινος (Lac-dye)."

c. 250.—"There are produced in India animals of the size of a beetle, of a red colour, and if you saw them for the first time you would compare them to cinnabar. They have very long legs, and are soft to the touch; they are produced on the trees that bear electrux, and they feed on the fruit of these. The Indians catch them and crush them, and with these dye their red cloaks, and the tunics under these, and everything else that they wish to turn to this colour, and to dye. And this kind of clothing is carried also to the King of Persia."—Aelius, de Nat. Animal. iv. 46.

c. 1343.—The notice of lacca in Pegolotti is in parts very difficult to translate, and we do not feel absolutely certain that it refers to the Indian product, though we believe it to be so. Thus, after explaining that there are two classes of lacca, the mutura and açera, or ripe and unripe, he goes on: "It is produced attached to stalks, i.e. to the branches of shrubs, but it ought to be clear from stalks, and earthy dust, and sand, and from cattail (†). The stalks are the twigs of the wood on which it is produced, the costiere or figs, as the Catalans call them, are composed of the dust of the thing, which when it is fresh heals together and hardens like pitch; only that pitch is black, and those costiere or figs are red and of the colour of unripe lacca. And more of these costiere is found in the unripe than the ripe lacca," and so on.—Della Decima, iii. 365.

1510.—"There also grows a very large quantity of lacca (or lura) for making red colour, and the tree of this is formed like our trees which produce walnuts."—Varthema, 238.

1516.—"Here (in Pegu) they load much fine laquar, which grows in the country."—Barbosa, Lisbon Acad., 366.
LACCADIVE ISLANDS.

1519.—"And because he had it much in charge to get all the lac (alacre) that he could, the governor knowing through information of the merchants that much came to the Coast of Choromandel by the ships of Pegu and Martaban that frequented that coast. . . .—Correa, ii. 567.

1563.—"Now it is time to speak of the lacre, of which so much is consumed in this country in closing letters, and for other seals, in the place of wax."—Carcia, f. 112v.

1582.—"Laker is a kind of gum that proceeded of the ant."—Custard, tr. by N.L., f. 33.

c. 1590.—(Recipe for Lac varnish). "Lac is used for chigghs (see CHICK, a). If red, 4 scr of lac, and 1 s. of vermilion; if yellow, 4 s. of lac, and 1 s. varnish."—Alv, ed. Blochmann, i. 228.

1615.—"In this Island (Goa) is the hard Waxe made (which we call Spanish Waxe), and is made in the manner following. They inclose a large plotte of ground, with a little trench filled with water; then they stick up a great number of small stubs upon the sayd plot, that being done they bring thither a sort of pismires, farre bigger than ours, which being debar'd by the water to issue out, are constrained to retire themselves vpon the said staves, where they are kil'd with the Heate of the Sunne, and thereof it is that Lacka is made."—De Montfort, 55-56.

c. 1610.—". . . Vne maniere de boete ronde, vernie, et lacrée, qui est vne ouvrage de ces isles."—Pyraud de Lavat, i. 127; [Hak. Soc. i. 170]

1637.—"Lac is a strange drugg, made by certain winged Pismires of the gumme of Trees."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 569.

1644.—"There are in the territories of the Mogor, besides those things mentioned, other articles of trade, such as Lacre, both the insect lacre and the cake" (de forniqa e de paste).—Bocarro, MS.

1663.—"In one of these Halls you shall find Embroiderers . . . in another you shall see Goldsmiths . . . in a fourth Workmen in Lacca."—Bernier F.T. 88; [ed. Constable, 269].

1727.—"Their lackt or japon'd Ware is without any Doubt the best in the World."—A. Hamilton, ii. 305; [ed. 1744].

LACCADIVE ISLANDS, n.p. Probably Skt. Lakṣadvipa, '100,000 Islands'; a name however which would apply much better to the Maldives, for the former are not really very numerous. There is not, we suspect, any ancient or certain native source for the name as specifically applied to the northern group of islands. Barbosa, the oldest authority we know as mentioning the group (1516), calls them Maladvina, and the Maldives Palandiva. Several of the individual islands are mentioned in the Tahfzat-al-Majahidin (E.T. by Rowlinson, pp. 150-53), the group itself being called "the islands of Malabar."

LACK. s. One hundred thousand, and especially in the Anglo-Indian colloquial 100,000 Rupees, in the days of better exchange the equivalent of £10,000. Hind. lakh, lak, &c., from Skt. laksha, used (see below) in the same sense, but which appears to have originally meant "a mark." It is necessary to explain that the term does not occur in the earlier Skt. works. Thus in the Talavakara Brhat-maṇḍā, a complete series of the higher numerical terms is given. After satā (10), sahasra (1000), comes ayuta (10,000), prayuta (now a million), niyuta (now also a million), arbuda (100 millions), nyarbuda (not now used), vikarna (do.), and padma (now 10,000 millions). Laksha is therefore a modern substitute for prayuta, and the series has been expanded. This was probably done by the Indian astronomers between the 5th and 10th centuries A.D.

The word has been adopted in the Malay and Javanese, and other languages of the Archipelago. But it is remarkable that in all of this class of languages which have adopted the word it is used in the sense of 10,000 instead of 100,000 with the sole exception of the Lampungs of Sumatra, who use it correctly. (Crawfurd). (See CRORE.)

We should observe that though a lack, used absolutely for a sum of money, in modern times always implies rupees, this has not always been the case. Thus in the time of Akbar and his immediate successors the revenue was settled and reckoned in lahs of dams (q.v.). Thus:

c. 1594.—"In the 40th year of his majesty's reign (Akbar's), his dominions consisted of 105 Sirrars, subdivided into 2737 Kusaba (see CUSBH), the revenue of which he settled for ten years, at the annual rent of 3 Arriba, 62 Crore, 97 Lack, 55,246 Dams. . . ."—Aayan, ed. Gladwin, ii. 1; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115].

At Ormuz again we find another lack in vogue, of which the unit was apparently the dinār, not the old gold coin, but a degenerate dinār of small value. Thus:
1554.—"(Money of Ormuz).—A leque is equivalent to 50 pardaos of gadi, which is called "bad money," and this leque is not a coin but a number by which they reckon at Ormuz): and each of these pardaos is equal to 2 azares, and each azar to 10 gadi, each gadi to 100 dinars, and after this fashion they calculate in the books of the Custom-house. . . ."—Nunier, Lyrico dos Persas, 28; 25.

Here the azar is the Persian hazir or 1000 (dinares); the gadi Pers. sud or 100 dinar; the leque or lak, 100,000 (dinares); and the tomán (see TOMAUN), which does not appear here, is 10,000 (dinares).

c. 1300.—"They went to the Käfiön's tent, killed him, and came back into the town, whence they carried off money belonging to the Sultan amounting to 12 laks. The lak is a sum of 100,000 (silver) dinar, equivalent to 10,000 Indian gold dinar."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 106.

c. 1340.—"The Sultan distributes daily two laks in alms, never less; a sum of which is equivalent in money of Egypt and Syria would be 160,000 pieces of silver."—Shihabuddin Dimishki, in Nota e Extas., xiii. 192.

In these examples from Pinto the word is used apart from money, in the Malay form, but not in the Malay sense of 10,000:

c. 1540.—"The old man desiring to satisfy Antonio de Faría's demand, Sir, said he . . . the chronicles of those times affirm, how in only four years and an half sixteen Lacazaas (lacaas) of men were slain, every Lacaza containing an hundred thousand."—Pinto (orig. cap. xiv.) in Cogan, p. 53.

c. 1546.—". . . he ruined in 4 months space all the enemies countries, with such a destruction of people as, if credit may be given to our histories . . . there died fifty Laquessaes of persons."—Ibid. p. 224.

1615.—"And the whole present was worth ten of their Leakes, as they call them; a Leake being 10,000 pounds sterling; the whole 100,000 pounds sterling."—Coryat's Letters From India (Credities, iii. f. 25e).

1616.—"He received twenty lecks of roupies towards his charge (two hundred thousand pounds sterling)."—Sir T. Roe, reprint, p. 35; [Hak. Soc. i. 201, and see i. 95, 183, 287].

1665.—"Il faut cent mille roupies pour faire un lek, cent mille leks pour faire un couron, cent mille courous pour faire un padan, et cent mille padans pour faire un nat."—Thenenot, v. 54.

1673.—"In these great Solemnities, it is usual for them to set it around with Lamps to the number of two or three Leques, which is so many hundred thousand in our account."—Fraer, [p. 104, reading Leques].

1684.—"They have by information of the servants dug in several places of the house, where they have found great sums of money. Under his bed were found Lacks 43. In the House of Office two Lacks. They in all found Ten Lacks already, and make no doubt but to find more."—Hedges, Diary, Jan. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 145].

1692.—". . . a lack of Pagodas. . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 262.

1747.—"The Nabob and other Principal Persons of this Country are of such an extreme lucrative (sic) Disposition, and . . . are so exceedingly avurant, occasioned by the large Proffers they have received from the French, that nothing less than Lacks will go near to satisfy them."—Letter from P. St. David to the Court, May 2 (MS. Records in India Office).

1778.—"Sir Matthew Mite will make up the money already advanced in another name, by way of future mortgage upon his estate, for the entire purchase, 5 lacks of roupies."—Foote, The Nabob, Act I. sc. i.

1785.—"Your servants have no Trade in this country; neither do you pay them high wages, yet in a few years they return to England with many lacs of pagodas."—Nabob of Arcot, in Burke's Speech on his Debts, Works, iv. 18.

1833.—"Tout le reste (et dans le reste il y a des intendants riches de plus de vingt laks) s'assied par terre."—Jacquemont, Correspond. ii. 120.

1879.—"In modern times the only numbers in practical use above 'thousands' are laka ('lak' or 'lakh') and koti ('crore') and an Indian sum is wont to be pointed thus: 123, 45, 67, 890, to signify 123 crores, 45 laks, 67 thousand, eight hundred and ninety."—Whitney, Sansk. Grammar, 161.

The older writers, it will be observed (c. 1600-1620), put the lakh at £10,000; Hamilton (c. 1700) puts it at £12,500; Williamson (c. 1810) at the same; then for many years it stood again as the equivalent of £10,000; but (1850) it is little more than £3000; [now (1901) about £6668].

LACKERAGE. (See KHIRAJ.)

LALL-SHRUB, s. Englishman's Hind. lâl-shárib, 'red wine.' The universal name of claret in India.

[c. 1780.—"To every plate are set down two glasses; one pyramidal (like hobnob glasses in England) for Loll Shrub (scitieut, claret); the other a common sized wineglass for whatever beverage is most agreeable."—Diary of Mrs. Fay, in Busted, Echoes, 123.]

LALLA, s. P.—H. lâld. In Persia this word seems to be used for a kind of domestic tutor; now for a native nurse, or as he would be called in India, 'child's bearer.' In N. India it is usually applied to a native clerk writing the vernacular, or to a respect-ABLE MERCHAND. [For the Pers. usage see Blockmann, Ain, i. 426 note.]

[1841.—"Where there are no tigers, the Lalla (scribe) becomes a shikaree."—Society in India, ii. 176.]

LAMA, s. A Tibetan Buddhist monk. Tibet. blama (b being silent). The word is sometimes found written Llama; but this is nonsense. In fact it seems to be a popular confusion, arising from the name of the S. American quadruedach which is so spelt. See quotation from Times below.

c. 1590.—"Fawning Court doctors... said it was mentioned in some holy books that men used to live up to the age of 1000 years... and in Thibet there were even now a class of Lamas or Mongolian devotees, and recluses, and hermits that live 200 years and more...."—Budhāni, quoted by Blockmann, Ain, i. 201.

1664.—"This Ambassador had in his suit a Physician, which was said to be of the Kingdom of Laos, and of the Tribe Lamy or Lama, which is that of the men of the Law in that country, as the Brahmons are in the Indies... he related of his great Lama that when he was old, and ready to die, he assembled his council, and declared to them that now he was passing into the Body of a little child lately born..."—Berner, E.T. 135; [ed. Constable, 424.]

c. 1818.—"The Parliament of Thibet met—The little Lama, called before it, Did there and then his whipping get, And, as the Nursery Gazette Assures us, like a hero bore it."—T. Moore, The Little Grand Lama.

1876.—"... Hastings... touches on the analogy between Tibet and the high valley of Quito, as described by De la Condamine; an analogy which Mr. Markham brings out in interesting detail.... But when he enlarges on the wool which is a staple of both countries, and on the animals producing it, he risks confusing in careless readers that popular impression which might be expressed in the phraseology of Flueelen—"Tis all one; tis alike as my fingers is to my fingers, and there is Llamas in both."—Rev. of Markham's Tibet, in Times, May 15.

The passage last quoted is in jesting vein, but the following is serious and delightful:

1879.—"The landlord prostrated himself as reverently, if not as lowly, as a Peruvian before his Grand Llama."—Patty's Dream, a novel reviewed in the Academy, May 17.

LAMASERY, LAMASERIE, s. This is a word, introduced apparently by the French R. C. Missionaries, for a lama convent. Without being positive, I would say that it does not represent any Oriental word (e.g. compound of lami and seri), but is a fictitious French word analogous to nonnette, vacherie, laiterie, &c.

[c. 1844.—"According to the Tartars, the Lamasery of the Five Towers is the best place you can be buried in."—Huc, Travels in Tartary, i. 78.]

LAMBALLIE, LOMBALLIE, LOMBARDIE, LUMBANAH, &c., s. Dakh. Hind. Lambārā, Mahr. Lambān, with other forms in the languages of the Peninsula. [Platts connects the name with Skt. lamba, 'long, tall'; the Madras Gloss. with Skt. lampati, 'greedy.'] A wandering tribe of dealers in grain, salt, &c., better known as Banjārs (see BRINJARY). As an Anglo-Indian word this is now obsolete. It was perhaps a corruption of Lubhāna, the name of one of the great clans or divisions of the Banjārs. [Another suggestion made is that the name is derived from their business of carrying salt (Skt. lavana); see Crooke, Tribes of N.W.P. i. 158.]

1756.—"The army was constantly supplied... by bands of people called Lamballis, peculiar to the Deccan, who are constantly moving up and down the country, with their flocks, and contract to furnish the armies in the field."—Orme, ii. 102.

1785.—"What you say of the scarcity of grain in your army, notwithstanding your having a cutwal (see COTWAL), and so many Lumbānhs with you, has astonished us."—Letters of Tippoo, 49.

LANCHARA, s. A kind of small vessel often mentioned in the Portuguese histories of the 16th and 17th centuries. The derivation is probably Malay lancharā, 'quick, nimble.' [Mr. Skeat writes: 'The real Malay form is Lanchar-an, which is regularly formed from Malay lanchar, 'swift,' and lanchara I believe to be a Port. form of lanchar-an, as lanchara could not possibly, in Malay, be formed from lanchar, as has hitherto been implied or suggested.']

c. 1535.—"In questo paes de Cambaia (read Camboja) vi sono molti fiumi, nelli LANDWIND, s. Used in the south of India. A wind which blows seaward during the night and early morning. [The dangerous effects of it are described in Madras Gloss. s.v.] In Port. Terrenho.

1561.—"Correndo a costa com terrenhos."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 115.

1612.—"Send John Dench ... that in the morning he may go out with the land torne and return with the seantorne."—Duners, Letters, i. 206.]

1614.—"And as it is between monsoon and monsoon (monaum) the wind is quite uncertain only at the beginning of summer. The N.W prevails more than any other wind ... and at the end of it begin the land winds (terrenhos) from midnight to about noon, and these are E. winds."—Bocarro, M.S.

1673.—"... we made for the Land, to gain the Land Breezes. They begin about Midnight, and hold till Noon, and are by the Portugals named Terrhenos."—Fryer, 23.

1838.—"We have had some very bad weather for the last week; furious landwind, very fatiguing and weakening. ... Everything was so dried up, that when I attempted to walk a few yards towards the beach, the grass crunched under my feet like snow."—Letters from Madras, 198-200.

LANGASAQUE, n.p. The most usual old form for the Japanese city which we now call Nagasaki (see Sainsbury, passim).

1611.—"After two or three days space a Jesuite came vnto vs from a place called Langesacke, to which place the Carake of Mucco is yeerely wont to come."—W. Adams, in Purchas, i. 126.

1618.—The Journal of Capt. John Saris has both Nagassaque and Langasaque.—Ibid. 306.

1618.—"It has now com to passe, which before I feared, that a company of rich usurers have gotten this sentence against us, and com doune together every yeare to Langasaque and this place, and have allwaies byn accustomed to buy by the panuco (as they call it), or whole sale, all the goodes which came in the carick from Amacean, the Portingales having no prevelages as we have."—The same to the E.I. Co., ii. 207-8.

Two years later Cocks changes his spelling and adopts Nangassaque (Ibid. 300 and to the end).

LAN JOHN, LANGIANNE, &c., n.p. Such names are applied in the early part of the 17th century to the Shan or Laos State of Luang Prabang on the Mekong. Lan-chan is one of its names signifying in Siamese, it is said, 'a million of elephants.' It is known to the Burmese by the same name (Len-Shen). It was near this place that the estimable French traveller Henri Mouhot died, in 1861.

1587.—"I went from Pegu to Jangomay (see Jangomay), which is in the country of the Jangogiana; it is fine and twenty five dayes journey North-east from Pegu."—Fitck, in Halil. ii.

1598.—"Thus we arrived at Lanchan, the capital of the Kingdom (Lao) where the King resides. It is a Kingdom of great extent, but thinly inhabited, because it has been frequently devastated by Pegn."—De Morga, 98.

1617.—"The merchants of the country of Lan John, a place joining to the country of Jangoma (Jangomay) arrived at the city of Judea ... and brought great store of merchandise."—Sainsbury, ii. 90.

1663.—"Entre tant et de si puissans Royaumes du dernier Orient, desquels on n'a presque jamais entendu parler, que que en Europe, il y en a un qui se nomme Lao, et plus proprement le Royaume des Langiens ... le Royaume n'a pris son nom que du grand nombre d'Elephants qui s'y rencontrent: de vray ce mot de Langiens signifie proprement, milliers d'Elephants."—Martin, H. Nouvelle et Curiouse des Royaumes de Tungvain et de Lao (Fr. Tr., Paris, 1666), 329, 397.
LAOS.

1668.—Lanchang appears in the Map of Siam in De la Loubère's work, but we do not find it in the book itself.

c. 1692.—"Laos est situé sous le même Climat que Tonquin; c'est un royaume grand et puissant, séparé des États voisins par des forêts et par des déserts. . . . Les principales villes sont Landjam et Tsiamaja."—Kaempfer, H. du Japon, i. 22-3.

LANTEA, s. A swift kind of boat frequently mentioned by F. M. Pinto and some early writers on China; but we are unable to identify the word.

c. 1540.—". . . that . . . they set sail from Lampoo for Malaca, and that being advanced as far as the Isle of Sumbor they had been set upon by a Pyrat, a Guzarat by Nation, called Coid Acm, who had three Junks, and four Lanteas. . . ."—Pinto, E.T. p. 69.

c. 1560.—"There be other lesser shipping than lumpes, somewhat long, called Bancones, they place three Oares on a side, and rowe very well, and load a great deal of goods; there be other lesse called Lanteas, which doe rowe very swift, and beare a good burthen also: and these two sorts of Ships, viz., Bancones and Lanteas, because they are swift, the theeee do commonly vse."—Caspur da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 174.

LAOS, n.p. A name applied by the Portuguese to the civilised people who occupied the inland frontier of Burma and Siam, between those countries on the one hand and China and Tongking on the other; a people called by the Burmese Shans, a name which we have in recent years adopted. They are of the same race of Thai to which the Siamese belong, and which extends with singular identity of manners and language, though broken into many separate communities, from Assam to the Malay Peninsula. The name has since been frequently used as a singular, and applied as a territorial name to the region occupied by this people immediately to the North of Siam. There have been a great number of separate principalities in this region, of which now one and now another predominated and conquered its neighbours. Before the rise of Siam the most important was that of which Sakotai was the capital, afterwards represented by Xieng-mai, the Zimmé of the Burmese and the Jango-may of some old English documents. In later times the chief States were Muang Luang Praban (see LAN JOHN) and Vien-shan, both upon the Mekong.

It would appear from Lieut. Macleod's narrative, and from Garnier, that the name of Laos is that by which the branch of these people on the Lower Mekong, i.e. of those two States, used to designate themselves. Muang Praban is still quasi independent; Vien-Shan was annexed with great cruelties by Siam, c. 1828.

1553.—"Of silver of 11 dinheiros alloy he (Albornoz) made only a kind of money called Malaynez, which silver came thither from Pegu, whilst from Siam came a very pure silver of 12 dinheiros assay, procured from certain people called Laos, lying to the north of these two kingdoms."—Barros, II. vi. 6.

1553.—". . . certain very rugged mountain ranges, like the Alps, inhabited by the people called Gueos who fight on horseback, and with whom the King of Siam is continually at war. They are near him only on the north, leaving between the two the people called Laos who encompass this Kingdom of Siam, both on the North, and on the East along the river Mecon . . . and on the south adjoin these Laos the two Kingdoms of Camboja and Choanmpa (see CHAMPA), which are on the sea-board. These Laos . . . though they are lords of so great territories, are all subject to this King of Siam, though often in rebellion against him."—Ibid. III. ii. 5.

"Three Kingdoms at the upper part of these are those of the Laos, who (as we have said) obey Siam through fear: the first of these is called Jangoma (see JANGO-MAY), the chief city of which is called Chiamay. . . . the second Chanovray Chenovay: the third Lanchan (see LAN JOHN) which is below the others, and adjoins the Kingdom of Cacho, or Cauchichina. . . ."—Ibid.

c. 1560.—"These Laos came to Camboia, dwayne a River many daies Journie, which they say to have his beginning in China as many others which runne into the Sea of India; it hath eight, fiftee, and twentie fathome water, as myselfe saw by experience in a great part of it; it passeth through manye unknowne and desert Countries of great Woods and Forestes where there are innumerable Elephants, and many Buffes . . . and certayne beasts which in that Countrie they call Badas (see ABADA)."—Caspur da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

c. 1598.—". . . I offered to go to the Laos by land, at my expense, in search of the King of Cambodia, as I knew that that was the road to go by. . . ."—Blas de Herman Gonzalez, in De Morga (E.T. by Hon. H. Stanley, Hak. Soc.), p. 97.

1641.—"Concerning the Land of the Louwen, and a Journey made thereunto by our Folk in Anno 1641" (kn.).—Valentijn, III. Pt. ii. pp. 50 seqq.

1663.—"Relation Novele et Curieuse du Royarne de Lao.—Traduite de l'italien du P. de Marini, Romain. Paris, 1668."
LAR, n.p. This name has had several applications.

(a). To the region which we now call Guzerat, in its most general application. In this sense the name is now quite obsolete; but it is that used by most of the early Arab geographers. It is the Λαρχή of Ptolemy; and appears to represent an old Skt. name Ῥατα, adj. Ῥατικα, or Ῥατίκα. "The name Λατά appears to be derived from some local tribe, perhaps the Lattas, who, as r and l are commonly used for each other, may possibly be the well-known Rashtrakūtas since their great King Amoghavarsha (A.D. 851-879) calls the name of the dynasty Ratta."—Bombay Gazetteer, 1. pt. i. 7.

c. A.D. 150.—"Της δε Ηνδικελιας τα απ’ αναστων τα μεν απ’ θαλασσας κατεχει η Αρκικη χωρα..."—Ptolemy, VII. ii. 62.

c. 940.—"On the coast, e.g. at Saimür, at Sibara, and at Tana, they speak Lär; these provinces give their name to the Sea of Lär (Laraw) on the coast of which they are situated."—Mas‘údī, i. 381.

c. 1020.—"... to Kach the country producing gum (mokši, i.e. Delellium, q.v.), and bardré (l?)... to Sonnât, fourteen (parasangs) ; to Kamhá, thirty... to Tana five. There you enter the country of Laran, where is Jamūr." (i.q. Saimür, see CHOUL.)—Al-Birúní, in Elliot, i. 66.

c. 1190.—"Udayas the Parmar mounted and came. The Dors followed him from Bombay (see his Historians, i. 378). We have no means of deciding this question (see LARRY BUNDEE).

c. 1290.—"Dīval... was reduced to ruins by a Muhamedan invasion, and another site chosen to the eastward. The new town still went by the same name... and was succeeded by Lār Bandar or the port of Lār, which is the name of the country forming the modern delta, particularly the western part."—M‘Murdock, in J. R. As. Soc. i. 29.

(b). To the Delta region of the Indus, and especially to its western part. Sir H. Elliot supposes the name in this use, which survived until recently, to be identical with the preceding, and that the name had originally extended continuously over the coast, from the western part of the Delta to beyond Bombay (see his Historians, i. 378).

c. 1220.—Lar is erroneously described by Yakūt as a great island between Sirāf and Kish. But there is no such island. It is an extensive province of the continent. See Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse, p. 501.

c. 1330.—"We marched for three days through a desert... and then arrived at Lar, a big town having springs, considerable streams, and gardens, and fine bazaars. We lodged in the hermitage of the pious Shaikh Abû Dulaf Muhammad. ..."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 240.

c. 1457.—"Retourneing longest the coast, fornaeast against Ormuz there is a town called Lar, a great and good town of merchandise, about 11 miles houses."—Joséfa Barbaco, old E.T. (Hak. Soc.) 50.

[c. 1580.—"Làr borders on the mountains of Great Tibet. To its north is a lofty mountain which dominates all the surrounding country, and the ascent of which is arduous. ..."—Ain, ed. Jarratt, ii. 363.]

1553.—"These benefactions the Kings of Ormuz... pay to this day to a mosque which that Caciz (see CASIS) had made in a district called Hongez of Sheikh Doniar, adjoining the city of Lara, distant from Ormuz over 40 leagues."—Barros, II. ii. 2.

1602.—"This man was a Moor, a native of the Kingdom of Lara, adjoining that of Ormuz; his proper name was Cufo, but as he was a native of the Kingdom of Lara, he took a surname from the country, and called himself Cufo Larym."—Costa, IV. vii. 6.

1622.—"Làr, as I said before, is capital of a great province or kingdom, which till our day had a prince of its own, who rightfully or wrongfully reigned there about 26 years since, for reasons rather generous than covetous, as it would seem, it was attacked by Abbas K. of Persia, and the country forcibly taken. ... Now Lar is the seat of a Sultan dependent on the Khan of Shiraz. ..."—P. della Valle, ii. 322.

1727.—"And 4 Days Journey within Land, is the City of Lār, which according to its fabulous tradition is the Burying...

It is possible that the island called Shaikh Shirâb, which is off the coast of Lār, and not far from Sirāf, may be meant. Barbosa also mentions Lār among the islands in the Gulf subject to the k. of Ormuz (p. 37). place of Lot..."—A. Hamilton, i. 92; [ed. 1744].

LARAI, s. This Hind. word, meaning 'fighting,' is by a curious idiom applied to the biting and annoyance of fleas and the like. [It is not mentioned in the dictionaries of either Fallon or Plattis.] There is a similar idiom (jang kardan) in Persian.

LAREK, n.p. Larak; an island in the Persian Gulf, not far from the island of Jerum or Ormus.

1623.—"At noon, being near Lareck, and no wind stirring, we cast Anchor."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 3.

1685.—"We came up with the Islands of Ormus and Arack..." (called Lareck afterwards).—Hedges, Diary, May 23; [Hak. Soc. i. 202].

LARIN, s. Pers. lârî. A peculiar kind of money formerly in use on the Persian Gulf, W. Coast of India, and in the Maldives Islands, in which last it survived to the last century. The name is there retained still, though coins of the ordinary form are used. It is sufficiently described in the quotations, and representations are given by De Bry and Tavener. The name appears to have been derived from the territory of Lar on the Persian Gulf. (See under that word, [and Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 232 seq.].)

c. 1563.—"I have seen the men of the Country who were Gentiles take their children, their sons and their daughters, and have desired the Portugals to buy them, and I have seen them sold for eight or ten larines apiece, which may be of our money x s. or xiii. s. iii d."—Master Caesar Frederick, in Hakl. ii. 343.

1583.—Gasparo Balbi has an account of the Larino, the greater part of which seems to be borrowed literatim by Fitch in the succeeding quotation. But Balbi adds: "The first who began to strike them was the King of Lar, who formerly was a powerful King in Persia, but is now a small one."—f. 35.

1587.—"The said Larine is a strange piece of money, not being round, as all other current money in Christianité, but is a small rod of silver, of the greatness of the pen of a goose feather...which is wrested so that two endes meet at the just half part, and in the head thereof is a stamp Turkesco, and these be the best current money in all the Indians, and 6 of these Larines make a duckat."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 407.

1598.—"An Oxre or a Cowe is there to be bought for one Larin, which is as much as half a Gliderne."—Linschoten, 23; [Hak. Soc. i. 94; in i. 48 Larynen; see also i. 232].

c. 1610.—"La monnoye du Royaume n'est que d'argent et d'une sorte. Ce sont des pieces d'argent qu'ils appellent larins, de valeur de huit sols ou enuiron de nostre monnoye...longues comme le doigt mais redoublées..."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 163; [Hak. Soc. i. 232].

1613.—"We agreed with one of the Governor's kinred for twenty laries (twenty shillings) to conduct us..."—N. Wielking, in Purchas, i. 484.

1622.—"The lari is a piece of money that I will exhibit in Italy, most eccentric in form, for it is nothing but a little rod of silver of a fixed weight, and bent double unequally. On the bend it is marked with some small stamp or other. It is called Lari because it was the peculiar money of the Princes of Lar, invented by them when they were separated from the Kingdom of Persia...In value every 5 lari are equal to a piastre or pataca of reals of Spain, or 'piece of eight' as we choose to call it."—P. della Valle, ii. 434.

LARKIN, s. (obsolescent). A kind of drink—apparently a sort of punch—which was popular in the Company's old factories. We know the word only on the authority of Pietro della Valle; but he is the most accurate of travellers. We are in the dark as to the origin of the name. On the one hand its form suggests an eponymus among the old servants of the Company, such as Robert Larkin, whom we find to have been engaged for the service in 1610, and to have died chief of the Factory of Patani, on the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, in 1616. But again we find in a Vocabulary of "Certaine Words of the Naturall Language of Iaua," in Drake's Voyage (Hak. iv. 246): "Larnike=Drinke." Of this word we can trace nothing nearer than (Javan.) larik, 'to pledge, or invite to drink at an entertainment,' and (Malay) larik-laravan, 'mutual pledging to drink.' It will be observed that della Valle assigns the drink especially to Java.

1623.—"Meanwhile the year 1622 was drawing near its close, and its last days were often celebrated of an evening in the House of the English, with good fellowship. And on one of these occasions I learned from them how to make a beverage called..."
LASCAR, which they told me was in great vogue in Java, and in all those other islands of the Far East. This said beverage seemed to me in truth an admirable thing,—not for use at every meal (it is too strong for that),—but as a tonic in case of debility, and to make tasty posssets, much better than those we make with Muscatel wines or Cretan malmseys. So I asked for the recipe; and am taking it to Italy with me. . . . It seemed odd to me that those hot southern regions, as well as in the environs of Hormuz here, where also the heat is great, they should use both spice in their food and spirits in their drink, as well as sundry other hot beverages like this larkin."—P. della Valle, ii. 475.

LARRY-BUNDER, n.p. The name of an old seaport in the Delta of the Indus, which succeeded Daibul (see DIUL-SIND) as the chief haven of Sind. We are doubtful of the proper orthography. It was in later Mahomemedan times called Lâhôrî-bandar, probably from presumed connection with Lahore as the port of the Punjab (Elliott, i. 378). At first sight M'Murdo's suggestion that the original name may have been Lârî-bandar, from Lâr, the local name of the southern part of Sind, seems probable. M'Murdo, indeed, writing about 1820, says that the name Lârî-Bandar was not at all familiar to natives; but if accustomed to the form Lâhôrî-bandar they might not recognize it in the other. The shape taken however by what is apparently the same name in our first quotation is adverse to M'Murdo's suggestion.

1030. — "This stream (the Indus) after passing (Alor) . . . divides into two streams of itself into the sea in the neighbourhood of the city of Lâhârî, and the other branches off to the East, to the borders of Kach, and is known by the name of Sind Sägar, i.e. Sea of Sind."—Al-Birâni, in Elliot, i. 49.

c. 1333. — "I travelled five days in his company with Ali-ul-Mulk, and we arrived at the seat of his Government, i.e. the town of Lâhâri, a fine city situated on the shore of the great Sea, and near which the River Sind enters the sea. Thus two great waters join near it; it possesses a grand haven, frequented by the people of Yemen, of Fars (etc.). The Amir Ali-ul-Mulk . . . told me that the revenue of this place amounts to 60 lakhs a year."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 112.

1565. — "Blood had not yet been spilled, when suddenly, news came from Thatta, that the Firingis had passed Lâhôrî-bandar, and attacked the city."—Turîkhi-Tâhirî, in Elliot, i. 277.

[1607. — "Then you are to sail for Lawrie in the Bay of the River Syndus."—Birdwood, First Letter-book, 251.

[1611. — "I took . . . Larree, the port town of the River Sind."—Duncans, Letters, i. 102.]

1655. — "Il se fait aussi beaucoup de traite au Loure-bender, qui est à trois jours de Tatta sur la mer, où la rade est plus excellente pour Vaisseaux, qu'en quelque autre lieu que ce soit des Indes."—Thevenot, v. 159.

1679. — ".. If Suratt, Baroech, and Bundurlaree in Scinda may be included in the same Phyrmaund to be customs free . . . then that they get these places and words inserted."—P. St. Geo. Cons., Feb. 20, in Notes and Exs., No. 1. Madras, 1871.

1727. — "It was my Fortune . . . to come to Larribunder, with a Cargo from Malleher, worth above $10,000."—I. Hamilton, i. 116; [ed. 1744, i. 117, Larribunder].

1739. — "But the Castle and town of Lohre Bender, with all the country to the eastward of the river Attok, and of the waters of the Scinda, and Nala Sunkira, shall, as before, belong to the Empire of Hindostan." — H. of Nadir, in Hinway, ii. 387.

1758. — "Le bras gauche du Sind se rend à Laheri, où il s'épanche en un lac; et ce port, qui est celui de Tattanagar, communément est nommé Laurébender."—D'Anville, p. 40.

1780. — "The first place of any note, after passing the bar, is Laribunda, about 5 or 6 leagues from the sea."—Dun's Oriental Navigator, 5th ed. p. 96.

1813. — "Laribunder. This is commonly called Scindy River, being the principal branch of the Indus, having 15 feet water on the bar, and 6 or 7 fathoms inside; it is situated in latitude about 24° 30' north. . . . The town of Laribunder is about 5 leagues from the sea, and vessels of 200 tons used to proceed up to it."—Milburn, i. 146.

1831. — "We took the route by Durajee and Meerpoor . . . The town of Lahory was in sight from the former of these places, and is situated on the same, or left bank of the Pittee."—J. Bumre, 2nd. ed. i. 22.

LASCAR, s. The word is originally from Pers. lashkar, 'an army,' 'a camp.' This is usually derived from Ar. al-askar, but it would rather seem that Ar. 'askar, 'an army' is taken from this Pers. word; whence laskharī, 'one belonging to an army, a soldier.' The word lascar or lāsčār (both these pronunciations are in vogue) appears to have been corrupted, through the Portuguese use of laskhari in the forms lasquarin, lascari, &c., either by the Portuguese themselves, or by the Dutch and English who took up the word from them, and from these laskār has passed back again into native use in this corrupt shape. The early Portuguese writers have the forms we have just named in the sense of 'soldier'; but _lascar_ is never so used now. It is in general the equivalent of _khalās_, in the various senses of that word (see _CLASSY_), viz. (1) an inferior class of artilleryman ("gun-lascar"); (2) a tent-pitcher, doing other work which the class are accustomed to do; (3) a sailor. The last is the most common Anglo-Indian use, and has passed into the English language. The use of _lascar_ in the modern sense by Pyrard de Laval shows that this use was already general on the west coast at the beginning of the 17th century, [also see quotation from Pringle below]: whilst the curious distinction which Pyrard makes between _Lascar_ and _Lascari_, and Dr. Fryer makes between _Luscar_ and _Lascar_ (accenting probably _Lāsčār_ and _Lāsčār_ shows that _laskhari_ for a soldier was still in use. In Ceylon the use of the word _lascareen_ for a local or civil soldier long survived; perhaps is not yet extinct. The word _laskhari_ does not seem to occur in the _Aīn_.

—Alguns documentos, Tombo, p. 479.

1541.—"It is a proverbial saying all over _India_ (i.e. Portuguese India, see s.v.) that the good _Lasquarin_, or 'soldier' as we should call him, must be an Abyssinian."—_Castro, Roteiro_, 73.

1546.—"Besides these there were others (who fell at _Diu_) whose names are unknown, being men of the lower rank, among whom I knew a _lascaryn_ (a man getting only 500 reis of pay!) who was the first man to lay his hand on the Moorish wall, and shouted aloud that they might see him, as many have told me. And he was immediately thrown down wounded in five places with stones and bullets, but still lived; and a noble gentleman sent and had him rescued and carried away by his slaves. And he survived, but being a common man he did not even get his pay!"—_Correa, iv._ 567.

1552.—... eles os reparte polos _lascars_ de suas capitaniaς, q assim chamão soldados.—_Costaehda_, ii. 67. [Mr. White-way notes that in the origin. _repartem_ for _reparte_, and the reference should be ii. 16.]

1554.—"Moreover the Senhor Governor conceded to the said ambassador that if in the territories of Idalsha (see _IDALCAN_), or in those of our Lord the King there should be any differences or quarrels between any Portuguese _lascars_ or _peons_ (piutes) of ours, and _lascars_ of the territories of Idalsha and peons of his, that the said Idalsha shall order the delivery up of the Portuguese and peons that they may be punished if culpable. And in like manner..."—_S. Botelho, Tombo, 44.

1572.—"Erand in co praisidio _Lasca- rini_ cireiter setagentins artes scoliopetariae pertinentissi."—_E. Acosta, f. 206v._

1598.—"The soldier of _Ballagate_, which is called _Lascarin_. . ."—_Luischoten, 74_; [in _Hak. Soc._ i. 294; _Lascarin_].

1610.—"Mesmes tous les mariniers et les pilotes sont Indiens, tant Gentils que Mahometans. Tous ces gens de mer les appellent _lascars_, et les soldats _lascarins._"—_Pyrard de Laval_, i. 317; [in _Hak. Soc._ i. 498; also see ii. 3, 17.]

[1615.—"... two horses with six _Lascars_ and two cafires (see _CAFFER)._"—_Foster, Letters_, iv. 112.]

1644.—"... the _aldea_ of the jurisdiction of Damam, in which district there are 4 fortified posts defended by _Lascars_ (Lascarina) who are mostly native Christian soldiers, though they may be heathen as some of them are."—_Bocarro_, MS.

1673.—"The Seamen and Soldiers differ only in a _Vowel_, the one being pronounced with an _a_, the other with an _a_, as _Luscar_, a soldier, _Lascar_, a seaman."—_Fryer_, 107.

[1683-84.—"The Warehousekeeper having Seaverall dayes advised the Council of Ship Walters tardynesse in receiving & stowing away the Goods, ... alledging that they have not hands Sufficient to dispatch them, though we have spared them ten _Laskars_ for that purpose..."—_Pringle_, Diary _Pt. St. Gen._, 1st ser. iii._ 7 seq.; also see p. 43.]

1685.—"They sent also from _Sofragan_ D. Antonio da _Motta_, Galvao, with 6 companies, which made 190 men; the Dissava (see _Dissave_) of the adjacent provinces joined him with 4000 _Lascars_._—_Ribeiro, H. of the I. of Ceylan_ (from French Tr., p. 241).
1690.—"For when the English Sailors at that time perceiv'd the softness of the Indian Lascars; how tame they were... they embark'd again upon a new Design... to... rob these harmless Traffickers in the Red Sea."—Ovington, 461.

1726.—"Lascaryns, or Loopers, are native soldiers, who have some regular maintenance, and in return must always be ready."—Valentijn, Oeylon, Names of Offices, &c., 10.

1755.—"Some Lascars and Sepoys were now sent forward to clear the road."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 394.

1757.—"The Field Pieces attached to the Cavalry draw up on the Right and Left Flank of the Regiment; the Artillery Lascars forming in a line with the Front Rank the full Extent of the Drag Ropes, which they hold in their hands."— design, for the Hon. Company's Troops on the Coast of Coromandel, by M. Gen. Sir Archibald Campbell, K. B. Govr. & C. in C. Madras, p. 9.

1803.—"In those parts (of the low country of Ceylon) where it is not thought requisite to quarter a body of troops, there is a police corps of the natives appointed to enforce the commands of Government in each district; they are composed of Companies, or sergeants, Artificers, or corporals, and Lascarines, or common soldiers, and perform the same office as our Sheriff's men or constables."—Percevill's Ceylon, 222.

In the following passages the original word laskar is used in its proper sense for 'a camp.'

[1615.—"We came to the Lasker the 7th of February in the evening."—Ibid. iii. 85.]

1616.—"I tooke horse to anuyde pressse, and other inconvenience, and crossed out of the Leskarr, before him."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 559; see also 560; [Hak. Soc. ii. 324].

[1682.—"... presents to the Seir Lascarr (sar-i-laskar, 'head of the army') this day received."—Pringle, Diary Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 84.]

LĀT, LĀT SĀHĪB, s. This, a popular corruption of Lord Sahib, or Lārd Sāhīb, as it is written in Hind, is the usual form from native lips, at least in the Bengal Presidency, of the title by which the Governor-General has long been known in the vernacular's. The term also extends nowadays to Lieutenant-Governors, who in contact with the higher authority become Chhotā ('Little') Lāt, whilst the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief are sometimes discriminated as the Mulki Lāt Sāhīb [or Barē Lāt], and the Jangā Lāt Sāhīb ('territorial' and 'military'), the Bishop as the Lāt Pādēr Sāhīb, and the Chief Justice as the Lāt Justy Sāhīb. The title is also sometimes, but very incorrectly, applied to minor dignitaries of the supreme Government, whilst the common form of blessing addressed to a civil officer is 'Huzār Lāt Gūnvar, Lāt Sīkritar ho-jātēn.'

1824.—"He seemed, however, much puzzled to make out my rank, never having heard (he said) of any 'Lord Sahib,' except the Governor-General, while he was still more perplexed by the exposition of 'Lord Bishop Sahib,' which for some reason or other my servants always prefer to that of Lord Padre."—Heber, i. 69.

1837.—"The Arab, thinking I had purposely stolen his kitten, ran after the buggy at full speed, shouting as he passed Lord Auckland's tents, 'Dohā! dohā! Sahib! dohā! Lāt Sāhib!' (see DODAL). 'Mercy, mercy, sir! mercy, Governor-General!' The faster the horse rushed on, the faster followed the shouting Arab."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 142.

1863.—"The old barber at Rookree, after telling me that he had known Strachey when he first began, added, 'Ah Lāt-Sekretur hai! Ah! hum bhi boodda hogya!' (Now he is Lord Secretary! Ah! I too have become old!')—Letter from the late M. Gen. W. W. H. Greathead.

1877.—"... in a rare but most valuable book (Galloway's Observations on India, 1823, pp. 254-8), in which the author reports, with much quiet humour, an aged native's account of the awful consequences of contempt of an order of the (as he called the Supreme Court) 'Shobhreen Koort,' the order of Impye being 'Lord Justey Sahib-ko-hookum,' the instruments of whose will were 'alvidabas' or affidavits."—Letter from Sir J. F. Stephen, in Times, May 31.

LĀT, LĀTH, s. Hind. lat, used as a corruption of the English lot, in reference to an auction (Carnegie).

LĀT, LĀTH. s. This word, meaning a staff or pole, is used for an obelisk or columnar monument; and is specifically used for the ancient Buddhist columns of Eastern India.

[1861-62.—"The pillar (at Besarhi) is known by the people as Bhīm-Sen-ka-lāt and Bhīm-Sen-ka-landh."—Cunningham, Arch. Rep. i. 61.]
LATERITE. 510 LAW-OFFICER.

LATERITE, s. A term, first used by Dr. Francis Buchanan, to indicate a reddish brick-like argillaceous formation much impregnated with iron peroxide, and hardening on exposure to the atmosphere, which is found in places all over South India from one coast to the other, and the origin of which geologists find very obscure. It is found in two distinct types: viz. (1) High-level Laterite, capping especially the trap-rocks of the Deccan, with a bed from 30 or 40 to 200 feet in thickness, which perhaps at one time extended over the greater part of Peninsular India. This is found as far north as the Rajmahal and Monghyr hills. (2) Low-level Laterite, forming comparatively thin and sloping beds on the plains of the coast. The origin of both is regarded as being, in the most probable view, modified volcanic matter; the low-level laterite having undergone a further rearrangement and deposition; but the matter is too complex for brief statement (see Neehaold, in J.R.A.S., vol. viii.; and the Manual of the Geol. of India, pp. xlvi. seqq., 348 seqq.). Mr. King and others have found flint weapons in the low-level formation. Laterite is the usual material for road-metal in S. India, as kunkur (q.v.) is in the north. In Ceylon it is called cabook (q.v.).

1800.—"It is diffused in immense masses, without any appearance of stratification, and is placed over the granite that forms the basis of Malayulu... It very soon becomes as hard as brick, and resists the air and water much better than any brick I have seen in India. ... As it is usually cut into the form of bricks for building, in several of the native dialects it is called the brick-stone (Itivacallies) [Malayul. vettukal]. ... The most proper English name would be Laterite, from Lateris, the appellation that may be given it in science."—Buchanan, Mysore, &c., ii. 440-441.

1860.—"Natives resident in these localities (Galle and Colombo) are easily recognizable elsewhere by the general hue of their dress. This is occasioned by the prevalence along the western coast of laterite, or, as the Singhalese call it, cabook, a product of disintegrated gneiss, which being subjected to detritus communicates its hue to the soil."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 17.

LATTIEE, s. A stick; a bludgeon, often made of the male bamboo (Dendrocalamus strictus), and sometimes bound at short intervals with iron rings, forming a formidable weapon. The word is Hind. lathī and lathī, Mahr. lathīha. This is from Prakrit lathī, for Skt. yashṭi, 'a stick,' according to the Prakrit grammar of Vararuchi (ed. Cowell, ii. 32); see also Lassen, Institutiones, Ling. Prakrit, 195. Jīski lāthī, us ki bhaiṣe, is a Hind. proverb (eujus boculum ejus bubalus), equivalent to the "good old rule, the simple plan."

1839. — "The natives use a very dangerous weapon, which they have been forbidden by Government to carry. I took one as a curiosity, which had been seized on a man in a fight in a village. It is a very heavy lāthī, a solid male bamboo, 5 feet 5 inches long, headed with iron in a most formidable manner. There are 6 jagged semicircular irons at the top, each 2 inches in length, 1 in height, and it is shod with iron bands 16 inches deep from the top."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 133.

1878. — "After driving some 6 miles, we came upon about 100 men seated in rows on the roadside, all with latties."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 114.

LATTEAL, s. Hind. lāthīyal, or, more cumbrously, lāthīvattā, 'a clubman,' a hired ruffian. Such gentry were not many years ago entertained in scores by planters in some parts of Bengal, to maintain by force their claims to lands for sowing indigo on.

1878. — "Doubtless there were hired latties... on both sides."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

LAW-OFFICER. This was the official designation of a Mahommnedan officer learned in the (Mahommnedan) law, who was for many years of our Indian administration an essential functionary of the judges' Courts in the districts, as well as of the Sudder or Courts of Review at the Presidency. It is to be remembered that the law administered in Courts under the Company's government, from the assumption of the Dewanny of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, was the Mahommnedan law; at first by the hands of native Cazees and Mutfies, with some superintendence from the higher European servants of the Company; a superintendence which, while undergoing sundry vicissitudes of system during the next 30 years, developed gradually into a European judiciary, which again was set on an extended and quasi-permanent footing by Lord Cornwallis's Government, in Regulation IX. of 1793.
The Mahommedan law continued, however, to be the professed basis of criminal jurisprudence, though modified more and more, as years went on, by new Regulations, and by the recorded constructions and circular orders of the superior Courts, until the accomplishment of the great changes which followed the Mutiny, and the assumption of the direct government of India by the Crown (1858). The landmarks of change were (a) the enactment of the Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), and (b) that of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Act. XXV. of 1861), followed by (c) the establishment of the High Court (July 1, 1862), in which became merged both the Supreme Court with its peculiar jurisdiction, and the (quondam-Company's) Sudder Courts of Review and Appeal, civil and criminal (Dewananny Adawlvt, and Nizamat Adawlvt). The authoritative exposition of the Mahommedan Law, in aid and guidance of the English judges, was the function of the Mahommedan Law-officer. He sat with the judge on the bench at Sessions, i.e. in the hearing of criminal cases committed by the magistrate for trial; and at the end of the trial he gave in his written record of the proceedings with his Futwa (q.v.) (see Regn. IX. 1793, sect. 47), which was his judgment as to the guilt of the accused, as to the definition of the crime, and as to its appropriate punishment according to Mahommedan Law. The judge was bound attentively to consider the futwa, and if it seemed to him to be consonant with natural justice, and also in conformity with the Mahommedan Law, he passed sentence (save in certain excepted cases) in its terms, and issued his warrant to the magistrate for execution of the sentence, unless it were one of death, in which case the proceedings had to be referred to the Sudder Nizamut for confirmation. In cases also where there was disagreement between the civilian judge and the Law-officer, either as to finding or sentence, the matter was referred to the Sudder Court for ultimate decision.

In 1832, certain modifications were introduced by law (Regn. VI. of that year), which declared that the futwa might be dispensed with either by referring the case for report to a Panchayet (q.v.), which sat apart from the Court; or by constituting assessors in the trial (generally three in number). The frequent adoption of the latter alternative rendered the appearance of the Law-officer and his futwa much less universal as time went on. The post of Law-officer was indeed not actually abolished till 1864. But it would appear from enquiry that I have made, among friends of old standing in the Civil Service, that for some years before the issue of the Penal Code and the other reforms already mentioned, the Moolvvee (maulavi) or Mahommedan Law-officer had, in some at least of the Bengal districts, practically ceased to sit with the judge, even in cases where no assessors were summoned.* I cannot trace any legislative authority for this, nor any Circular of the Sudder Nizamut; and it is not easy, at this time of day, to obtain much personal testimony. But Sir George Yule (who was Judge of Rungpore and Bogra about 1855-56) writes thus:

"The Moolvvee-ship... must have been abolished before I became a judge (I think), which was 2 or 3 years before the Mutiny; for I have no recollection of ever sitting with a Moolvvee, and I had a great number of heavy criminal cases to try in Rungpore and Bogra. Assessors were substituted for the Moolvvee in some cases, but I have no recollection of employing these either."

Mr. Seton-Karr, again, who was Civil and Sessions Judge of Jessore (1857-1860), writes:

"I am quite certain of my own practice... and I made deliberate choice of native assessors, whenever the law required me to have such functionaries. I determined never to sit with a Maulavi, as, even before the Penal Code was passed, and came into operation, I wished to get rid of futwas and differences of opinion."

The office of Law-officer was formally abolished by Act XI. of 1864.

In respect of civil litigation, it had been especially laid down (Regn. of April 11, 1780, quoted below) that in suits regarding successions, inheritance, marriage, caste, and all religious usages

* Reg. I. of 1810 had empowered the Executive Government, by an official communication from its Secretary in the Judicial Department, to dispense with the attendance and futwa of the Law officers of the courts of circuit, when it seemed advisable. But in such case the judge of the court passed no sentence, but referred the proceedings with an opinion to the Nizamat Adawlvt.
and institutions, the Mahommedan laws with respect to Mahommedans, and the Hindu laws with respect to Hindus, were to be considered as the general rules by which the judges were to form their decisions. In the respective cases, it was laid down, the Mahommedan and Hindu law-officers of the court were to attend and expound the law.

In this note I have dealt only with the Mahommedan law-officer, whose presence and co-operation was so long (it has been seen) essential in a criminal trial. In civil cases he did not sit with the judge (at least in memory of man now living), but the judge could and did, in case of need, refer to him on any point of Mahommedan Law. The Hindu law-officer (Pundit) is found in the legislation of 1793, and is distinctly traceable in the Regulations down to at least 1821. In fact he is named in the Act XI. of 1864 (see quotation under Cazee) abolishing law-officers. But in many of the districts it would seem that he had very long before 1860 practically ceased to exist, under what circumstances exactly I have failed to discover. He had nothing to do with criminal justice, and the occasions for reference to him were presumably not frequent enough to justify his maintenance in every district. A Pundit continued to be attached to the Sudder Dewanny, and to him questions were referred by the District Courts when requisite. Neither Pundit nor Molleeve is attached to the High Court, but native judges sit on its Bench. It need only be added that under Regulation III. of 1821, a magistrate was authorized to refer for trial to the Law-officer of his district a variety of complaints and charges of a trivial character. The designation of the Law-officer was Maulavi. (See Adawlut, Cazee, Futwa, Molleeve, Mufty.)

1780.—"That in all suits regarding inheritance, marriage, and caste, and other religious usages or institutions, the laws of the Koran with respect to Mahommedans, and those of the Shaster with respect to Gentooos, shall be invariably adhered to. On all such occasions the Molavies or Brahamins shall respectively attend to expound the law; and they shall sign the report and assist in passing the decree."—Regulation passed by the G.-G. and Council, April 11, 1780.

1793.—"II. The Law Officers of the Sudder Dewanny Adawlut, the Nizamut Adawlut, the provincial Courts of Appeal, the courts of circuit, and the zillah and city courts . . . shall not be removed but for incapacity or misconduct . . ."—Reg. XII. of 1793.

In §§ iv., v., vi. Cauzy and Mufty are substituted, for Law-Officer, but referring to the same persons.

1799.—"IV. If the futwa of the law officers of the Nizamut Adawlut declare any person convicted of wilful murder not liable to suffer death under the Mahommedan law on the ground of . . . the Court of Nizamut Adawlut shall notwithstanding sentence the prisoner to suffer death. . . ."—Reg. VIII. of 1799.

LAXIMANA, LAQUESIMENA, &c., s. Malay Laksemana, from Skt. lakshmana, ‘having fortunate tokens’ (which was the name of a mythical hero, brother of Rama). This was the title of one of the highest dignitaries in the Malay State, commander of the forces.

1511.—"There used to be in Malaca five principal dignitaries . . . the third is Laxamane; this is Admiral of the Sea. . . ."—Alaupenze, by Birch, iii. 87.

c. 1539.—"The King accordingly set forth a Fleet of two hundred Sails. . . . And of this Navy he made General the great Laque Xemena, his Admiral, of whom Valor the History of the Indians hath spoken in divers places."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 38.

1558.—"Lacsaman was harassed by the King to engage Dom Garcia; but his reply was: Sire, against the Portuguese and their high-sided vessels it is impossible to engage with low-cut lancharas like ours. Leave me (to act) for I know this people well, seeing how much blood they have cost me; good fortune is now with thee, and I am about to avenge you on them. And so he did."—Barros, III. viii. 7.

[1615.—"On the morrow I went to take my leave of Laxaman, to whom all strangers’ business are assigned."—Foster, Letters, iv. 6.]

LEAGUER, s. The following use of this word is now quite obsolete, we believe, in English; but it illustrates the now familiar German use of Lager-Bier, i.e. ‘beer for laying down, for keeping’ (primarily in cask). The word in this sense is neither in Minshew (1627), nor in Bayley (1759).

1747.—"That the Storekeeper do provide Leaguers of good Columbo or Batavia arrack."—Pt. St. David Conan., May 5 (MS. Record in India Office).

1782.—"Will be sold by Public Auction by Mr. Bondfield, at his Auction Room, formerly the Court of Cutcherry . . . Square and Globe Lanterns, a quantity of Country Rum in Leaguers, a Slave Girl, and a variety of other articles."—India Gazette, Nov. 23.
LECQUE, s. We do not know what the word used by the Abbé Raynal in the following extract is meant for. It is perhaps a mistake for last, a Dutch weight.

1770.—"They (Dutch at the Cape) receive a still smaller profit from 60 lequèses of red wine, and 80 or 90 of white, which they carry to Europe every year. The lequèse weighs about 1,200 pounds."—Raynal, E.T. 1777, i. 231.

LEE, s. Chin. li. The ordinary Chinese itinerary measure. Books of the Jesuit Missionaries generally interpret the modern li as \( \frac{1}{8} \) of a league, which gives about 3 li to the mile; more exactly, according to Mr. Giles, 27\(\frac{1}{2} \) li = 10 miles; but it evidently varies a good deal in different parts of China, and has also varied in the course of ages. Thus in the 8th century, data quoted by M. Vivien de St. Martin, from Père Gaubil, show that the li was little more than \( \frac{1}{2} \) of an English mile. And from several concurrent statements we may also conclude that the li is generalised so that a certain number of li, generally 100, stand for a day's march. [Arch-deacon Gray (China, ii. 101) gives 10 li as the equivalent of \( \frac{3}{2} \) English miles; Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 305) asserts that Hwen Thang converts the Indian yojana into Chinese li at the rate of 40 li per yojana, or of 10 li per kos.]

1585.—"By the said booke it is found that the Chinos haue amongst them but only three kind of measures; the which in their language are called lii, pu, and icham, which is as much as to say, or in effect, as a forlong, league, or orijne: the measure, which is called liii, hath so much space as a man's voice on a plain grounde may be hearde in a quiet day, halowing or whooping with all the force and strength he may; and ten of these his maketh a pu, which is a great Spanish league; and ten pus maketh a daye's journey, which is called icham, which maketh 12 (sic) long leagues."—Mendoza, i. 21.

1681.—"In this part of the country a day's march, whatever its actual distance, is called 100 li; and the li may therefore be taken as a measure of time rather than of distance."—Col. Sarel, in J.R. Geog. Soc. xxixil. 11.

1585.—"D'après les clauses du contrat le voyage d'une longueur totale de 1,800 liis, ou 180 lieues, devait s'effectuer en 18 jours."—L. Revauet, A Travers la Chine, 397.

LECHEE, LYCHEE, s. Chin. li-chi, and in S. China (its native region) lai-chi; the beautiful and delicate fruit of the Nepheium litchi, Cambessèdes (N. O. Sapindaceae), a tree which has been for nearly a century introduced into Bengal with success. The dried fruit, usually ticketed as lychee, is now common in London shops.

c. 1540.—"... outra verdura muito mais fresca, e de melhor cheiro, que esta, a que os naturaes da terra chamão lechias. ..."—Pinta, ch. lviii.

1683.—"R. Of the things of China you have not said a word; though there they have many fruits highly praised, such as are lalichias (lalixius) and other excellent fruits. "O. I did not speak of the things of China, because China is a region of which there is so much to tell that it never comes to an end. ..."—Garcia, f. 157.

1585. —"Also they have a kind of plumpuses that they doo call lechias, that are of an exceeding gallant tast, and never hurrth anybody, although they should eate a great number of them."—Parke's Mendoza, i. 14.

1598.—"There is a kind of fruit called Lechyas, which are like Plums, but of another taste, and are very good, and much esteemed, whereof I have eaten."—Linschoten, 38; [Hak. Soc. i. 131].

1681.—"Adfertur ad nos præterea fructus quidam Lances (read Laices) vocatus, qui racematim, ut uve, crescit."—Jac. Bontii, Dial. vi. p. 11.

1684.—"Laææa, or Chinese Chestnuts."—Valentijn, iv. (China) 12.

1750-52.—"Leicki is a species of trees which they seem to reckon equal to the sweet orange trees. ... It seems hardly credible that the country about Canton (in which place only the fruit grows) annually makes 100,000 tel of dried leickis."—Olof Toreen, 302-3.

1824.—"Of the fruits which this season offers, the finest are leeches (sic) and mangoes; the first is really very fine, being a sort of plum, with the flavour of a Frontignac grape."—Heber, i. 60.

c. 1585.— "Et tandis que ton pied, sorti de la ba-bouche, Pendait rose, au bord du manchy (see MUNCHEEL) À l'ombre des bois noirs touffus, et du Letchi, Aux fruits moins pourpres que ta bouche."—Lecounte de Lisle.

1878.—"... and the lichi hiding under a shell of ruddy brown its globes of translucent and delicately fragrant flesh."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 48.

1879.—"... Here are a hundred and sixty lichi fruits for you. ..."—M. Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales (Calc. ed.) 51.

LEMON, s. Citrus medica, var. Lemonum, Hooker. This is of course not an Anglo-Indian word. But it has come into European languages through the Ar. limān, and is, according to Henn, of Indian origin. In Hind. we have both limā and nimō, which last, at least, seems to be an indigenous form. The Skt. dictionaries give nimāika. In England we get the word through the Romance languages, Fr. limon, It. limone, Sp. limon, &c., perhaps both from the Crusades and from the Moors of Spain. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The Malay form is limau, 'a lime, lemon, or orange.' The Port. limão may possibly come from this Malay form.
I feel sure that limau, which in some dialects is limar, is an indigenous word which was transferred to Europe."]
(See LIME.)
c. 1200.—"Sunt praeterae aliae arbores fructus acidos, pontici videlicet saporis, ex se procreantes, quos appellant limones."—Jacob de Vitriaco, Hist. Therosolym. cap. lxxxv. in Bengara.
c. 1328.—"I will only say this much, that the India, as regards fruit and other things, is entirely different from Christendom; except, indeed, that there be lemons in some places, as sweet as sugar, whilst there be other lemons sour like ours."—Friar Jordanus, 15.
c. 1333.—"The fruit of the mango-tree (al-anbā) is the size of a great pear. When yet green they take the fallen fruit and powder it with salt and preserve it, as is done with the sweet citron and the lemon (al-leimān) in our country."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 126.
LEMON-GRASS, s. Andropogon citratus, D.C., a grass cultivated in Ceylon and Singapore, yielding an oil much used in perfumery, under the name of Lemon-Grass Oil, Oil of Verbena, or Indian Melissa Oil. Royle (Hind. Medicine, 82) has applied the name to another very fragrant grass, Andropogon schoenanthus, L., according to him the αχώιος of Dioscorides. This last, which grows wild in various parts of India, yields Rūsa Oil, alias O. of Ginger-grass or of Gerantum, which is exported from Bombay to Arabia and Turkey, where it is extensively used in the adulteration of "Otto of Roses."

LEOPARD, s. We insert this in order to remark that there has been a great deal of controversy among Indian sportsmen, and also among naturalists, as to whether there are or are not two species of this Cat, distinguished by those who maintain the affirmative, as panther (F. pardinus) and leopard (Felsis pardus), the latter being the smaller, though by some these names are reversed. Even those who support this distinction of species appear to admit that the markings, habits, and general appearance (except size) of the two animals are almost identical. Jerdon describes the two varieties, but (with Blyth) classes both as one species (Felis pardus). [Mr. Blanford takes the same view: "I cannot help suspecting that the difference is very often due to age. . . . I have for years endeavoured to distinguish the two forms, but without success." (Mammalia of India, 68 seq.)]

1540.—"And they, demanding of him whence he came, and what he would have, he answered them that he was of the Kingdom of Siam [of the settlement of the Tanaeprinm foreigners, and that he came from Veniaga] and as a merchant was going to trafigue in the Isle of Lequios."—Pinto (orig. cap. x. xii), in Cogan, 49.

1553.—"Fernao Peres . . . whilst he remained at that island of Beniga, saw there certain junks of the people called Lequios, of whom he had already got a good deal of information from Malaca, as that they inhabited certain islands adjoining that coast of China; and he observed that the most part of the merchandise that they brought was a great quantity of gold . . . and they appeared to him a better disposed people than the Chinese. . . ."—Barros, III. ii. 8. See also II. vi. 6.

1556.—(In this year) "a Portuguese arrived at Malaca, named Pero Gomez d'Almeida, servant to the Grand Master of Santiago, with a rich Present, and letters from the Vindiaquin, Prince of the Island of Tanixanna, directed to King John the third . . . to have five hundred Portuguese granted to him, to the end that with them, and his own Forces, he might conquer the Island of Lequio, for which he would remain tributary to him at 5000 Kittals of Copper and 1000 of Lattin, yearly. . . ."—Pinto, in Cogan, p. 188.

1615. — "The King of Mashona (qu. Shashona?) . . . who is King of the westernmost islands of Japan . . . has conquered the Leques Islands, which not long since were under the Government of China."—Sahinias, i. 447.

"The King of Shashma . . . a man of great power, and hath conquered the islands called the Leques, which not long since were under the government of China. . . . Grande yeeldeth a store of amber grasse of the best sort, and will vent 1,000 or 15,000 (sic) ps. of coarse cloth, as duties and such like, per annum."—Letter of Raphe Coppindall, in Cocks, ii. 272.

LIAMPO, n.p. This is the name which the older writers, especially Portuguese, give to the Chinese port which we now call Ning-Po. It is a form of corruption which appears in other cases of names used by the Portuguese, or of those who learned from them. Thus Nanking is similarly called Lanchin in the publications of the same age, and Yunnan appears in Mendoza as Olam.

1540.—"Sailing in this manner we arrived six days after at the Ports of Liampo, which are two Islands one just against another, distant three Leagues from the place, where at that time the Portugals used their commerce; There they had built above a thousand houses, that were governed by Sheriffs, Auditors, Consuls, Judges, and 6 or 7 other kinds of Officers (com governor general de Venezardos, & Ouvidor, & Alcaldes, & outras seis os sete Varas de Justiça & Ofícios de República), where the Notaries underneath the publique Acts which they made, wrote thus, J, such a one, publique Notarie of this Town of Liampo for the King our Sovereign Lord. And this they did with as much confidence and assurance as if this Place had been seittuated between Southen and Lisbon; so that there were houses there which cost three or four thousand Duckats the building, but both they and all the rest were afterwards demolished for our sins by the Chinese. . . ."

—Pinto (orig. cap. lxvi.), in Cogan, p. 82.

What Cogan renders "Ports of Liampo" is ports, i.e. Gates. And the expression is remarkable as preserving a very old tradition of Eastern navigation: the oldest document regarding Arab trade to China (the Relation, tr. by Reinaud) says that the ships after crossing the Sut of Sanji pass the Gates of China. These Gates are in fact mountains washed by the sea; between these mountains is an opening, through which the ships pass" (p. 19). This phrase was perhaps a translation of a term used by the Chinese themselves—see under BOCCA TIGRIS.

1553.—"The eighth (division of the coasts of the Indies) terminates in a notable cape, the most easterly point of the whole continent so far as we know at present, and which stands about midway in the whole coast of that great country China. This our people call Cabo de Liampo, after an illustrious city which lies in the bend of the cape. It is called by the natives Nimpo, which our countrymen have corrupted into Liampo."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1696.—"Those Junks commonly touch at Lympo, from whence they bring Petes, Geeloups, and other Sikas."—Doveyeor, in Dalrymple, i. 87.

1701.—"The Mandarine of Justice arrived late last night from Limpo."—Fragmentary M.S. Records of China Factory (at Chusan ?), in India Office, Oct. 24.

1727.—"The Province of Chequiam, whose chief city is Limpoa, by some called Nimpoo, and by others Nimpoo."—A. Hamilton, ii. 283; [ed. 1744, ii. 282].

1770.—"To these articles of importation may be added those brought every year, by a dozen Chinese Junks, from Emoy, Limpo, and Canton."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 249.

LIKIN, LEKIN, s. We borrow from Mr. Giles: "An arbitrary tax, originally of one cash per tael on all kinds of produce, imposed with a view of making up the deficiency in the land-tax of China caused by the Taiping and Nienfei troubles. It was to be set aside for military purposes only — hence its common name of ‘war tax’. The Chefoo Agreement makes the area of the Foreign concessions at the various Treaty Ports exempt from the tax of Lekin” (Gloss. of Reference, s.v.). The same authority explains the term as “li (i.e. a cash or "tael")-money,” because of the original rate of levy. The likin is professedly not an imperial customs-duty, but a provincial tax levied by the governors of the provinces, and at their discretion as to amount; hence varying in local rate, and from time to time changeable. This has been a chief difficulty in carrying out the Chefoo Agreement, which as yet has never been authoritatively interpreted or finally ratified by England. [It was ratified in 1886. For the conditions of the Agreement see Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 629 seqq.] We quote the article of the Agreement which deals with opium, which has involved the chief difficulties, as leaving not only the amount to be paid, but the line at which this is to be paid, undefined.

1876.—“Sect. III. . . (iii). On Opium Sir Thomas Wade will move his Government to sanction an arrangement different from that affecting other imports. British merchants, when opium is brought into port, will be obliged to have it taken cognizance of by the Customs, and deposited in Bond . . . until such time as there is a sale for it. The importer will then pay the tariff duty upon it, and the purchasers the likin: in order to the prevention of the evasion of the duty. The amount of likin to be collected will be decided by the different Provincial Governments, according to the circumstances of each.”—Agreement of Chefoo.

1878.—“La Chine est parsemée d’une infinité de petits bureaux d’octroi échelonnés le long des voies commerciales; les Chinois les nomment Li-kin. C’est la source la plus sure, et la plus productive des revenus.” —Rouset, A Travers la Chine, 221.

LILAC. s. This plant-name is eventually to be identified with anil (q.v.), and with the Skt. nila, ‘of a dark colour (especially dark blue or black)’; a fact which might be urged in favour of the view that the ancients in Asia, as has been alleged of them in Europe, belonged to the body of the colour-blind (like the writer of this article). The Indian word takes, in the sense of indigo, in Persian the form "ilang"; in Ar. this, modified into "ilak" and "ilak", is applied to the lilac (Syringa spp.). Marcel Devic says the Ar. adj. "ilak" has the modified sense "bleuatre." See a remark under BUCKYNE. We may note that in Scotland the ‘striving after meaning’ gives this familiar and beautiful tree the name among the uneducated of "lily-oak."

LIME, s. The fruit of the small Citrus medica, var. acida, Hooker, is that generally called lime in India, approaching as it does very nearly to the fruit of the West India Lime. It is often not much bigger than a pigeon’s egg, and one well-known miniature lime of this kind is called by the natives from its thin skin kirghazi nimbû, or ‘paper lime.’ This seems to bear much the same relation to the lemon that the miniature thin-skinned orange, which in London shops is called Tangerine, bears to the “China orange.” But lime is also used with the characterising adjective for the Citrus medica, var. Limetta, Hooker, or Sweet Lime, an insipid fruit.

The word no doubt comes from the Sp. and Port. lima, which is from the Ar. lima; Fr. lime, Pers. limā, limān (see LEMON). But probably it came into English from the Portuguese in India. It is not in Minshew (2nd ed. 1727).

1404.—“And in this land of Guilan snow never falls, so hot is it; and it produces abundance of citrons and limes and oranges (citrus & limas & varangius).”—Clavius, §11xxvi.

c. 1526.—“Another is the lime (lima), which is very plentiful. Its size is about that of a hen’s egg; which it resembles in shape. If one who is poisoned boil and eat its fibres, the injury done by the poison is averted.”—Babar, 328.

1563.—“It is a fact that there are some Portuguese so pig-headed that they would rather die than acknowledge that we have here any fruit equal to that of Portugal; but there are many fruits here that bear the bell, as for instance all the fructas de espino. For the lemons of those parts are so big that they look like citrons, besides being very tender and full of flavour, especially those of Bagaim; whilst the citrons themselves are much better and more tender (than those of Portugal); and the limes (limas) vastly better. . . .”—García, f. 133.

c. 1630.—“The Ile inricht us with many good things; Buffoys, Goats, Turtle, Hens, LINGAIT, LINGAYET. 517

LINGUIT, LINGAYET. LINGU- GUIT. LINGAVANT, LINGADHARI. s. Mahr. Lingd-it, Can. Lingayata, a member of a Sivaite sect in W. and S. India, whose members wear the linga (see LINGAM) in a small gold or silver box suspended round the neck. The sect was founded in the 12th century by Bausava. They are also called Jangama, or Vira Saiva, and have various subdivisions. [See Nelson, Madura, pt. iii. 48 seq.; Monier Williams, Brahmanism, 88.]

1672.—“At Hubly in this Kingdom are a caste called Linguits, who are buried up-right.” —Fryer, 153. This is still their practice.

Lingua is given as the name or title of the King of Columbun (see QUILON) in the 14th century, by Friar Jordanus (p. 41), which might have been taken to denote that he belonged to this sect; but this seems never to have had followers in Malabar.

LINGAM. s. This is taken from the S. Indian form of the word, which in N. India is Skt. and Hind. linga, a token, badge, &c., then the symbol of Śiva which is so extensively an object of worship among the Hindus, in the form of a cylinder of stone. The great idol of Somnath, destroyed by Māhmūd of Ghazni, and the object of so much romantic narrative, was a colossal symbol of this kind. In the quotation of 1838 below, the word is used simply for a badge of caste, which is certainly the original Skt. meaning, but is probably a mistake as attributed in that sense to modern vernacular use. The man may have been a lingait (q.v.), so that his badge was actually a figure of the lingam. But this clever author often gets out of her depth.

1811. —“The stone idols called Ling Mahādeo, which had been a long time established at that place . . . these, up to this time, the kick of the horse of Islam had not attempted to break. . . . Deo Narain fell down, and the other gods who had seats there raised their feet, and jumped so high, that at one leap they reached the foot of Lanka, and in that affright the linga themselves would have fled, had they had any legs to stand on.” —Amīr Khwārī, in Elliot, iv. 91.

1616.—“. . . above this there is elevated the figure of an idol, which in decency I abstain from naming, but which is called by the heathen Linga, and which they worship with many superstitions; and indeed they regard it to such a degree that the heathen of Canara carry well-wrought images of the kind round their necks. This abominable custom was abolished by a certain Canara King, a man of reason and righteousness.” —Conto, Dec. VII. iii. 11.

1726.—“There are also some of them who wear a certain stone idol called Lingam . . . round the neck, or else in the hair of the head. . . .” —Valentijn, Choro. 74.

1781.—“These Pagodas have each a small chamber in the center of twelve feet square, with a lamp hanging over the Lingham.” —Hodges, 94.

1799.—“I had often remarked near the banks of the rivulet a number of little altars, with a linga of Mahādeva upon them. It seems they are placed over the ashes of Hindus who have been burnt near the spot.” —Golborne, in Life, p. 162.

1809.—“Without was an immense lingam of black stone.” —Ed. Valentina, i. 371.

1814.—“. . . two respectable Brahmins, a man and his wife, of the secular order; who, having no children, had made several religious pilgrimages, performed the accustomed ceremonies to the linga, and consulted the divines.” —Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 364; [2nd ed. ii. 4; in ii. 164, lingam].

1838.—“In addition to the preaching, Mr. G. got hold of a man’s Lingum, or badge of caste, and took it away.” —Letters from Madras, 156.

1843.—“The homage was paid to Lingamism. The insult was offered to Mahometanism. Lingamism is not merely idolatry, but idolatry in its most pernicious form.” —Maccusley, Speech on Gates of Somnauth.

LINGUIST. s. An old word for an interpreter, formerly much used in the East. It long survived in China, and is there perhaps not yet obsolete. Probably adopted from the Port. lingua, used for an interpreter.

1541.—“To a lingua of the factory (at Goa) 2 pardaos monthly. . . .” —S. Botelho, Tombo, 63.

1612.—“To the lingua of this kingdom (Ormuz) a Portuguese . . . To the lingua of the custom-house, a bramen.” —Ibid. 104.

1867. —“Did Captain Saris Linguist attend?” —Dancers, Letters, i. 68.
1700.—"I carried the Linguist into a Merchant's House that was my Acquaintance to consult with that Merchant about removing that Remore, that stopp'd the March of War from entering into the Harbour."—A. Hamilton, iii. 254; [ed. 1744].

1711.—"Linguists require not too much haste, having always five or six to make choice of, never a Barrel the better Herring."—Lockyer, 102.

1760.—"I am sorry to think your Honour should have reason to think, that I have been anyway concerned in that unhappy affair that happened at the Negrois, in the month of October 1759; but give me leave to assure your Honour that I was no further concerned, than as a Linguist for the King's Officer who commanded the Party."—Letter to the Gov. of Fort St. George, from Antonio the Linguist, in Dalrymple, i. 398.

1760-1810.—"If the ten should presume to enter villages, public places, or bazaars, punishment will be inflicted on the linguist who accompanies them."—Regulations at Canton, from The Fanckawi at Canton, p. 20.

1852.—"As up to treaty days, neither Consul nor Vice-Consul of a foreign nation was acknowledged, whenever either of these officers made a communication to the Hoppo, it had to be done through the Hong merchants, to whom the dispatch was taken by a Linguist."—The Fanckawi at Canton, p. 50.

LIP-LAP, s. A vulgar and disparaging nickname given in the Dutch Indies to Eurasians, and corresponding to Anglo-Indian chee-chee (q.v.). The proper meaning of lip-lap seems to be the uncoagulated pulp of the coco-nut (see Rumphius, bk. i. ch. 1). [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is not in the dicts., but Klinkert gives Jay. lap-lap, 'a dish-clout.']

1768-71.—"Children born in the Indies are nicknamed liplaps by the Europeans, although both parents may have come from Europe."—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 315.

LISHTEE, LISTEE, s. Hind. lishī, English word, 'a list.'

LONG-CLOTH, s. The usual name in India for (white) cotton shirtings, or Lancashire calico; but first applied to the Indian cloth of like kind exported to England, probably because it was made of length unusual in India; cloth for native use being ordinarily made in pieces sufficient only to clothe one person. Or it is just possible that it may have been a corruption or mis-apprehension of laungi (see LOONGHEE). [This latter view is accepted without question by Sir G. Birdwood (Rep. on Old Rec., 224), who dates its introduction to Europe about 1675.]

1670.—"We have continued to supply you . . . in regard the Dutch do so fully fall in with the Calicoe trade that they had the last year 50,000 pieces of long cloth."—Letter from Court of E.I.C. to Madras, Nov. 9th. In Notes and Exts., No. i. p. 2.

[1682.—". . . for long cloth brown English 72: Coveds long & 1/4 broad No. i. . . . Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. i. 40.]

1727.—"Saderass, or Saderass Patam, a small Factory belonging to the Dutch, to buy up long cloth."—A. Hamilton, i. 358; [ed. 1744].

1785.—"The trade of Fort St. David's consists in long cloths of different colours."—Corracciotto's Life of Cico, i. 5.

1865.—"Long cloth, as it is termed, is the material principally worn in the Tropics."—Waring, Tropical Resident, p. 111.

1880.—"A Chinaman is probably the last man in the world to be taken in twice with a fraudulent piece of long cloth."—Pall Mall Budget, Jan. 9, p. 9.

LONG-DRAWERS, s. This is an old-fashioned equivalent for pyjamas (q.v.). Of late it is confined to the Madras Presidency, and to outfitters' lists. [Mosquito drawers were probably like these.]

[1623.—"They wear a pair of long drawers of the same Cloth, which cover not only their Thighs, but legs also to the Feet."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 43.]

1711.—"The better sort wear long drawers, and a piece of Silk, or wrought Calico, thrown loose over the Shoulders."—Lockyer, 57.

1774.—". . . gave each private man a frock and long drawers of shintz."—Forrest, V. to N. Guinea, 169.

1789.—"Leroy, one of the French hussars, who had saved me from being cut down by Hyde's horse, gave me some soup, a shirt, and long drawers, which I had great want of."—Hon. John Lindsay in Lives of the Liddeaux, iv. 266.

1789.—"It is true that they (the Syces) wear only a short blue jacket, and blue long draws."—Note by Translator of Sei-Manthogherin, i. 87.

1810.—"For wear on board ship, pantaloons . . . together with as many pair of wove cotton long drawers, to wear under them."—Williamson, V. M. i. 9.

LONG-SHORE WIND. 519

LONG-SHORE WIND, s. A term used in Madras to designate the damp, unpleasant wind that blows in some seasons, especially July to September, from the south.

1837.—“This longshore wind is very disagreeable—a sort of sham sea-breeze blowing from the south; whereas the real sea-breeze blows from the east; it is a regular cheat upon the new-comers, feeling damp and fresh as if it were going to cool one.”—Letters from Madras, 73.

LOONTAR, s. The palm leaves used in the Archipelago (as in S. India) for writing on are called lontar-leaves. Filet (No. 5179, p. 209) gives lontar as the Malay name of two palms, viz. Borassus flabelliformis (see PALMYRA, BRAB), and Livistana tundifolia. [See CADJAN.] [Mr. Skeat notes that Klinkert gives—“Lontar, metathesis of roon-tal, leaf of the tal tree, a fan-palm whose leaves were once used for writing on, borassus flabelliformis.” Roon is thus probably equivalent to the Malay dawn, or in some dialects don, leaf. The tree itself is called pokun (pokun) tar in the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula, tar and tal being only variants of the same word. Scott, Malayan Words in English, p. 121, gives: “Lontar, a palm, dial. form of dawn tal (tal, Hind.).” (See TODDY.)

LOOCHER, s. This is often used in Anglo-Ind. colloquial for a blackguard libertine, a lewd loafer. It is properly Hind. luchcha, having that sense. Orme seems to have confounded the word, more or less, with laqicha (see under LOOTY). [A rogue in Pandurang Hari (ed. 1873, ii. 168) is Loocherjee. The place at Matheran originally called “Loocha Point” has become “Loocha Point.”]

LOONGHEE, s. Hind. lungqi, perhaps originally Pers. lung and lungghi; but Platts connects it with linga. A scarf or web of cloth to wrap round the body, whether applied as what the French call pagne, i.e. a cloth simply wrapped once or twice round the hips and tucked in at the upper edge, which is the proper Mussulman mode of wearing it; or as a cloth tucked between the legs like a dhoty (q.v.), which is the Hindu mode, and often followed also by Mahommedans in India. The Qanoon-e-Islam further distinguishes between the lunggi and dhoti that the former is a coloured cloth worn as described, and the latter a cloth with only a coloured border, worn by Hindus alone. This explanation must belong to S. India. [“The lungi is really meant to be worn round the waist, and is very generally of a checked pattern, but it is often used as a pagari (see PUGGARY), more especially that known as the Kohat lungi” (Cookson, Mon. on Punjáb Silk, 4). For illustrations of various modes of wearing the garment, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures and Costumes, pl. iii. iv.]

1726.—“Silk Longis with red borders, 160 pieces in a pack, 14 cubids long and 2 broad.”—Valentijn, v. 175.

1727.—“... For some coarse chequered Cloth, called Cambaya (see COMBOY), Lungies, made of Cotton-Yarn, the Natives would bring Elephant's Teeth.”—A. Hamilton, i. 9; [ed. 1744].

“... (In Pegu) Under the Frock they have a Scarf or Lungée doubled fourfold, made fast about the Middle...”—Ibid. ii. 49.

c. 1760.—“Instead of petittoys they wear what they call a long piece of silk or cotton stuff.”—Grose, i. 143.

C. 1809-10.—“Many use the Lunggi, a piece of blue cotton cloth, from 5 to 7 cubits long and 2 wide. It is wrapped simply two or three times round the waist, and hangs down to the knee.”—P. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 102.

LOOT, s. & v. Plunder; Hind. lat, and that from Skt. lotra, for loptra, root lop, rob, plunder; [rather lapt, to rob]. The word appears in Stockdale's Vocabulary, of 1788, as “Loot—plunder, pillage.” It has thus long been a familiar item in the Anglo-Indian colloquial. But between the Chinese War of 1841, the Crimean War (1854-5), and the Indian Mutiny (1857-8), it gradually found acceptance in England also, and is now a recognised constituent of the English Slang Dictionary. Admiral Smyth has it in his Nautical Glossary (1867) thus: “Loot, plunder, or pillage, a term adopted from China.”

1545.—St. Francis Xavier in a letter to a friend in Portugal admonishing him from encouraging any friend of his to go to India seems to have the thing Loot in his mind, though of course he does not use the word: “Nominem patiari amicorum tuorum in Indian cum Praefectura mitti, ad regias pecunias, et negotia tractanda. Nam de illia vere illud scriptum capere licet: ‘Deeleantur de libro viventium et cum justis non scribantur. . . . Invidiam tantum non cuiusus unus publicus detrahit, dum vix dubitatur fieri non maud quod impune fit. Ubique, semper, rapitur, conqueritur, auferitur. Semel captum nuncquam redditur. Qvis enumeret aries et nomina, praedaram? Equidem mirari satis nequeo, quot, praeter usitatos modos, insolitis flexionibus inauspicatam illud rapiendi verbum quaedam avaritiae barbaria conjugat!’”—Epistolae, Prague, 1667, Lib. V. Ep. vii.

1842.—“I believe I have already told you that I did not take any loot—the Indian word for plunder—so that I have nothing of that kind, to which so many in this expedition helped themselves so bountifully.”—Colin Campbell to his Sister, in L. of Ed. Clyde, i. 120.

“‘In the Sangor district the plunderers are beaten whenever they are caught, but there is a good deal of burning and ‘looting,’ as they call it.”—Indian Administration of Ed. Ellenborough, To the D. of Wellington, May 17, p. 194.

1847.—“Went to see Marshal Soult’s pictures which he looted in Spain. There are many Murillos, all beautiful.”—Ed. Matneshbury, Mem. of an Ex-Minister, i. 192.

1858.—“There is a word called ‘loot,’ which gives, unfortunately, a venial character to what would in common English be styled robbery.”—Ed. Elgin, Letters and Journals, 215.

1860.—“Loot, swag or plunder.”—Slang Dict. s.v.

1864.—“When I mentioned the ‘looting’ of villages in 1845, the word was printed in italics as little known. Unhappily it requires no distinction now, custom having rendered it rather common of late.”—Admiral W. H. Smyth, Synopsts, p. 52.

1875.—“It was the Colonel Sahib who carried off the loot.”—The Dilemma, ch. xxxvii.

1876.—“Public servants (in Turkey) have vied with one another in a system of universal loot.”—Blackwood’s Mag. No. cxix, p. 115.

1878.—“The city (Hongkong) is now parcelled night and day by strong parties of marines and Sikhs, for both the disposition to loot and the facilities for looting are very great.”—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 34.

1883.—“Loot” is a word of Eastern origin, and for a couple of centuries past . . . the looting of Delhi has been the dream of the most patriotic among the Sikh race.”—Bos. Smith’s Life of Ed. Lawrence, ii. 245.

"At Ta li fu . . . a year or two ago, a fire, supposed to be an act of incendiary, broke out among the Tibetan encampments which were then looted by the Chinese.”—Official Memo. on Chinese Trade with Tibet, 1888.

LOOTY, LOOTIEWALLA, s.

1757.—“A body of their Louchees (see LOOUCHER) or plunderers, who are armed with clubs, passed into the Company’s territory.”—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 229.

1782.—“Even the rascally Looty wallahs, or Mynorean hussars, who had just before been meditating a general desertion to us, now pressed upon our flanks and rear.”—Munro’s Narrative, 295.

1792.—“The Colonel found him as much dismayed as if he had been surrounded by the whole Austrian army, and busy in placing an ambuscade to catch about six looters.”—Letter of T. Munro, in Life.

1793.—“This body (horse plunderers round Madras) had been branded generally by the name of Looties, but they had some little title to a better appellation, for they were . . . not guilty of those sanguinary and inhuman deeds . . .”—Madras Courier, Jan. 26.

1793.—“A party was immediately sent, who released 27 half-starved wretches in heavy iron; among them was Mr. Randal Cudman, a midshipman taken 10 years before by Suffrein. The remainder were private soldiers; some of whom had been taken by the Looties; others were deserters . . .”—Dirro’s Narrative, p. 157.

b. A different word is the Ar.—Pers. lâtiy, bearing a worse meaning, ‘one of the people of Lot,’ and more generally ‘a blackguard.’

[1824.—“They were singing, dancing, and making the luti all the livelong day.”—Haaji Baba, ed. 1851, p. 444.

1858.—“The Lootis, who wandered from town to town with monkeys and other animals, taught them to cast earth upon their heads (a sign of the deepest grief among Asiatics) when they were asked whether they would be governors of Balk or Akkhcheh.”—Perrier, H. of the Affghans, 101.

1888.—“Monkeys and baboons are kept and trained by the Lattis, or professional LORY.

LORY, s. A name given to various brilliantly-coloured varieties of parrot, which are found in the Moluccas and other islands of the Archipelago. The word is a corruption of the Malay nāri, 'a parrot'; but the corruption seems not to be very old, as Fryer retains the correct form. Perhaps it came through the French (see Léullier below). [Mr. Skeat writes: 'Lāri is hardly a corruption of nāri; it is rather a parallel form. The two forms appear in different dialects. Nāri may have been first introduced, and lāri may be some dialectic form of it.'] The first quotation shows that lories were imported into S. India as early as the 14th century. They are still imported thither, where they are called in the vernacular by a name signifying 'Five-coloured parrots.' [Can. panchavarna-gini.]

BUFBOONS."—Will's Modern Persia, ed. 1891, p. 306.]

The people of Shiraz are noted for a fondness for jingling phrases, common enough among many Asians, including the people of India, where one constantly hears one's servants speak of chauki-auki (for chairs and tables), naukar-chakar (where both are however real words), 'servants,' lokrī-akrī, 'sticks and staves,' and so forth. Regarding this Mr. Wills tells a story (Modern Persia, p. 239). The late Minister, Kawām-ud-Daulat, a Shi'ā, was asked by the Shāh:

"Why is it, Kawām, that you Shi'rāzis always talk of Koobah-mahbob and so on? You always add a nonsense-word; is it for euphony?"

"Oh, Asylum of the Universe, may I be your sacrifice! No respectable person in Shi'rāz does so, only the īt-tī pītī says it!"

LOQUOT, LOQUAT, s. A sub-acid fruit, a native of China and Japan, which has been naturalised in India and in Southern Europe. In Italy it is called nespola giapponese (Japan medlar). It is Eríobotrya japonica, Lindl. The name is that used in S. China, lu-kīh, pron. at Canton lu-kwot, and meaning 'rush-orange.' Elsewhere in China it is called pi-pa.

[1821.—"The Lacott, a Chinese fruit, not unlike a plum, was produced also in great plenty (at Bangalore); it is sweet when ripe, and both used for tarts, and eaten as dessert."—Boole, Missions in Madras and Mysoor, 2nd ed. 159.]

1878.—"... the yellow loquat, peach-skinned and pleasant, but prodigal of stones."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 49, c. 1830.—A loquat tree in full fruit is probably a sight never seen in England before, but 'the phenomenon' is now on view at Richmond. (This was in the garden of Lady Parker at Stawell House.) We are told that it has a fine crop of fruit, comprising about a dozen bunches, each bunch being of eight or ten beautiful berries. ..."

—Newspaper cutting (source lost).

LORCHA, s. A small kind of vessel used in the China coasting trade. Giles explains it as having a hull of European build, but the masts and sails Chinese fashion, generally with a European skipper and a Chinese crew. The word is said to have been introduced by the Portuguese from S. America (Giles, 81). But Pinto's passage shows how early the word was used in the China seas, a fact which throws doubt on that view. [Other suggestions are that it is Chinese low-chien, a sort of fighting ship, or Port. lancha, our launch (2 N. & Q. iii. 217, 236).]

1540.—"Now because the Lorch (lorcho), wherein Antonio de Faria came from Podaiva leaked very much, he commanded all his soldiers to pass into another better vessel ... and arriving at a River that about evening we found towards the East, he cast anchor a league out at Sea, by reason his Junk ... drew much water, so that fearing the Sands ... he sent Christovam Borratho with 14 Soldiers in the Lorch up the River."

1613.—"And they use smaller vessels called lorchas and bjoljo (!), and these never use more than 2 oars on each side, which serve both for rudders and for oars in the river traffic."—Godinho de Esvita, f. 28r.

1856.—... Mr. Parkes reported to his superior, Sir John Bowring, at Hong Kong, the facts in connexion with an outrage which had been committed on a British-owned lorcha at Canton. The lorcha 'Arrow,' employed in the river trade between Canton and the mouth of the river, commanded by an English captain and flying an English flag, had been boarded by a party of Mandarins and their escort while at anchor near Dutch Folly."—Boulger, H. of China, 1854, iii. 396.
c. 1330.—"Parrots also, or popinjays, after their kind, of every possible colour, except black, for black ones are never found; but white all over, and green, and red, and also of mixed colours. The birds of this India seem really like the creatures of Paradise."—Friar Jordanus, 29.

c. 1490.—"In Bandan three kinds of parrot are found, some with red feathers and a yellow beak, and some parti-coloured which are called Nori, that is brilliant."—Conti, in India in the X'th Cent., 17. The last words, in Poggio's original Latin, are: "quos Noros appellant hoc est Indios," showing that Conti connected the word with the Pers. "nâr." 1518.—"In these islands there are many coloured parrots, of very splendid colours; they are tame, and the Moors call them nure, and they are much valued."—Barbosa, 202.

1555.—"There are hogs also with hornes (see BABI-ROUSSA), and parrots which prattle much, which they call Noris."—Galvano, E.T. in Hatkl. iv. 424.

[1598.]—"There cometh into India out of the Island of Molucca beyond Malacca a kind of birds called Noyras; they are like Parrattes."—Linscloten, Hak. Soc. i. 307.]

1673.—"... Cockatoos and Newries from Bantam."—Fryer, 116.

1682.—"The Lyons are about as big as the parrots that one sees in the Netherlands. ... There are no birds that the Indians value more: and they will sometimes pay 30 rix dollars for one. ..."—Nieuhof, Zee en Lant-Reize, ii. 257.

1698.—"Brought ashore from the Resolution ... a Newry and four yards of broad cloth for a present to the Havildar."—In Wheeler, i. 355.

1705.—"On troye de quatre sortez de perroquets, scavoir, perroquets, lauris, per- ruches, & catorcis."—Eyriuller, 72.

1809.—"Twas Camdeo riding on his lory. Twas the immortal Youth of Love."—Kekama, x. 19.

1817.—" Gay sparkling loories, such as gleam between The crimson blossoms of the coral-tree In the warm isles of India's summer sea."—Mokana.

LOTA, s. Hind. lotâ. The small spheroidal brass pot which Hindus use for drinking, and sometimes for cooking. This is the exclusive Anglo-Indian application; but natives also extend it to the spherical pipkins of earthenware (see CHATTY or GHURRA.)

1810.—"... a lootah, or brass water vessel."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 284.

LOTE, s. Mod. Hind. lot, being a corruption of Eng. 'note.' A bank-note; sometimes called banklot.

LOTOO, s. Burm. Hlweat-d'hau, 'Royal Court or Hall'; the Chief Council of State in Burma, composed nominally of four Wungpis (see WOON) or Chief Ministers. Its name designates more properly the place of meeting; compare Star-Chamber.

1792.—"... in capital cases he transmits the evidence in writing, with his opinion, to the Lotoo, or grand chamber of consultation, where the council of state assembles. ..."—Smyes, 307.

1819.—"The first and most respectable of the tribunals is the Lutto, comprised of four presidents called Veghî, who are chosen by the sovereign from the oldest and most experienced Mandarins, of four assistants, and a great chancyer."—Sangermano, 164.

1827.—"Every royal edict requires by law, or rather by usage, the sanction of this council: indeed, the King's name never appears in any edict or proclamation, the acts of the Lut-d'hau being in fact considered his acts."—Crawford's Journal, 401.

LOTEA, LOYTIA, &c. s. A Chinese title of respect, used by the older writers on China for a Chinese official, much as we still use mandarin. It is now so obsolete that Giles, we see, omits it. "It would almost seem certain that this is the word given as follows in C. C. Baldwin's Manual of the Fochow Dialect: 'Lo-tia.' ... (in Mandarin Loo-tye) a general appellative used for an officer. It means 'Venerable Father' (p. 215). In the Court dialect Ta-lao-yê, 'Great Venerable Father' is the appellative used for any officer, up to the 4th rank. The ye of this expression is quite different from the tyê or tia of the former" (Note by M. Terrien de la Courprie). Mr. Baber, after giving the same explanation from Carstairs Douglass's Amoy Dict., adds: "It would seem ludicrous to a Pekingese. Certain local functionaries (Prefects, Magistrates, &c.) are, however, universally known in China as Fu-ma-kwan, 'Parental Officers' (lit. 'Father-and-Mother Officers') and it is very likely that the expression 'Old Papa' is intended to convey the same idea of paternal government."

c. 1560,—"Everyone that in China hath any office, command, or dignity by the King, is called Louthia, which is to say with us Señor."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 169.

"I shall have occasion to speak of a certain Order of gentlemen that are called Loutea; I will first therefor expound what this word signifieth. Loutea is as much as to say in our language as Syr. . . ."—Galeotto Peregra, by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii.; [ed. 1810, ii. 548].

1585.—"And although all the King's officers and justices of what sort of administration they are, be generally called by the name of Loytia; yet euery one hath a special and a particular name besides, according vnto his office."—Mendoza, tr. by R. Parke, ii. 101.

1598.—"Not any Man in China is esteemed or accounted of, for his birth, family, or riches, but onely for his learning and knowledge, such as they that serve at every town, and have the government of the same. They are called Loitias and Mandorijns."—Linschoten, 39; [Hak. Soc. i. 133].

1618.—"The China Capt. had letters this day per way of Xaxma (see SATSUMA) . . . that the letters I sent are received by the noblemen in China in good parte, and a mandarin, or loytta, appointed to com for Japan. . . ."—Cocks, Diary, ii. 44.

1681.—"They call . . . the lords and gentlemen Lottias. . . ."—Martinez de la Puente, Compendio, 26.

LOVE-BIRD, s. The bird to which this name is applied in Bengal is the pretty little lori-keet, Lorinculus vernalis, Sparrman, called in Hind. lutkan or 'pendant,' because of its quaint habit of sleeping suspended by the claws, head downwards.

LUBBYE, LUBBE, s. [Tel. Lubbi, Tam. Nappas]; according to C. P. Brown and the Madras Gloss. a Dravidian corruption of 'Arabi.' A name given in S. India to a race, Mussulmans in creed, but speaking Tamil, supposed to be, like the Moplahs of the west coast, the descendants of Arab emigrants by inter-marriage with native women. "There are few classes of natives in S. India, who in energy, industry, and perseverance, can compete with the Lubbay;" they often, as pedlars, go about selling beads, precious stones, &c.

1810.—"Some of these (early emigrants from Kufa) landed on that part of the Western coast of India called the Concun; the others to the eastward of C. Comorin; the descendants of the former are the Nervayets; of the latter the Lubbe; a name probably given to them by the natives, from that Arabic particle (a modification of Lubbek) corresponding with the English here I am, indicating attention on being spoken to. The Lubbe pretend to some common origin with the Nervayets, and attribute their black complexion to inter-marriage with the natives, but the Nervayets affirm that the Lubbe are the descendants of their domestic slaves, and there is certainly in the physiognomy of this very numerous class, and in their stature and form, a strong resemblance to the natives of Abyssinia."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, i. 243.

1836.—"Mr. Boyd . . . describes the Moors under the name of Choolias (see CHOOLIA); and Sir Alexander Johnston designates them by the appellation of Lubbes. These epithets are however not admissible; for the former is only confined to a particular sect among them, who are rather of an inferior grade; and the latter, to the priests who officiate in their temples; and also as an honorary affix to the proper names of some of their chief men."—Simon Casie Chitty on the Moors of Ceylon, in J.R. As. Soc. iii. 338.

1888.—"The Lubbeis are a curious caste, said by some to be the descendants of Hindus forcibly converted to the Mahometan faith some centuries ago. It seems most probable, however, that they are of mixed blood. They are, comparatively, a fine strong active race, and generally contrive to keep themselves in easy circumstances. Many of them live by traffic. Many are smiths, and do excellent work as such. Others are fishermen, boatmen and the like. . . ."—Nelson, Madura Manual, Pt. ii. 86.

1889.—In a paper by Dr. Shortt it is stated that the Lubbays are found in large numbers on the East Coast of the Peninsula, between Pulicat and Negapatam. Their headquarters are at Nagore, the burial place of their patron saint Nagori Mir Sibib. They excel as merchants, owing to their energy and industry."—In Trans. Edin. Soc. of London, N.S. vii. 189-190.
Hind. and Mahr., in an adjective form, the word is used for 'stiff, gaunt, emaciated,' and this may be the sense in which it is applied to the hyena. [More probably the name refers to the bar-like stripes on the animal.] Another name is harvagh, or (apparently) 'bone-tiger,' from its habit of gnawing bones.

c. 1809.—"It was said not to be uncommon in the southern parts of the district (Bhagalpur) . . . but though I have offered ample rewards, I have not been able to procure a specimen, dead or alive; and the leopard is called at Munger Lakravagh."

"The hyena or Lakravagh in this district has acquired an uncommon degree of ferocity."—F. Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 142-3.

[1849.—"The man seized his gun and shot the hyena, but the 'lakkabakka' got off."—Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, ii. 152.]

LUCKNOW, n.p. Properly Lakhnau; the well-known capital of the Nawabs and Kings of Oudh, and the residence of the Chief Commissioner of that British Province, till the office was united to that of the Lient.-Governor of the N.W. Provinces in 1877. [The name appears to be a corruption of the ancient Lakshmanavati, founded by Lakshmana, brother of Ramachandra of Ayodhya.]

1528.—"On Saturday the 29th of the latter Jemadi, I reached Lucknow; and having surveyed it, passed the river Gomti and encamped."—Baber, p. 381.

[c. 1590.—"Lucknow is a large city on the banks of the Gomti, delightful in its surroundings."—Arin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 178.]

1663.—"In Agra the Hollanders have also an House. . . . Formerly they had a good trade there in selling Scarlet . . . as also in buying those cloths of Jelapour and Laknai, at 7 or 8 days journey from Agra, where they also keep an house. . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 94; [ed. Constable, 292, who identifies Jelapower with Jalalpur-Nahir in the Fyzabad district.]

LUDDOO, s. H. laddū. A common native sweetmeat, consisting of balls of sugar and ghee, mixt with wheat and gram flour, and with cocoanut kernel rasped.

[1826.—"My friends . . . called me bōr le luddoo, or the great man's sport."—Panduranag Hari, ed. 1873, i. 197.]

[1828.—"When at large we cannot even get rabri (porridge), but in prison we eat laddo (a sweetmeat)."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 185.]

LUCKNOW, 524

LUGOW, TO, v. This is one of those imperatives transformed, in Anglo-Indian jargon, into infinitives, which are referred to under BUNOW, PUCKEROW. H. inf. lagā-nā, imperative lagā-o. The meanings of lagānā, as given by Shakespear, are: "to apply, close, attach, join, fix, aflix, ascribe, impose, lay, add, place, put, plant, set, shut, spread, fasten, connect, plaster, put to work, employ, engage, use, impute, report anything in the way of scandal or malice"—in which long list he has omitted one of the most common uses of the verb, in its Anglo-Indian form lagow, which is "to lay a boat alongside the shore or wharf, to moor." The fact is that lagānā is the active form of the neuter verb lag-nā, 'to touch, lie, to be in contact with,' and used in all the neuter senses of which lagānā expresses the transitive senses. Besides neuter lagānā, active lagānā, we have a secondary casual verb, lagpānā, 'to cause to apply,' &c. Lagnā, lagānā are presumably the same words as our lie, and lay, A.-S. liegan, and leogan, mod. Germ. liegen and legen. And the meaning 'lay' underlies all the senses which Shakespear gives of lagā-nā. [See Skeat, Concise Etym. Dict. s.v. lie.]

LUMBERDAR, s. Hind. lambādar, a word formed from the English word 'number' with the Pers. termination -dār, and meaning properly 'the man who is registered by a number.' "The registered representative of a coparcenary community, who is responsible for Government revenue." (Carney.) "The cultivator who, either on his own account or as the representative of other members of the village, pays the Government dues and is registered in the Collector's Roll according to his number; as the representative of the rest he may hold the office by descent or by election." (Wilson.)

by Hindus, and identified with the monkey-god Hanuman. The genus is Presbytes, Illiger, of which several species are now discriminated, but the differences are small. [See Blanford, Mammalia, 27, who classes the Langur as Semnopithecus entellus.] The animal is well described by Aelian in the following quotation, which will recall to many what they have witnessed in the suburbs of Benares and other great Hindu cities. The Langur of the Prasii is P. Entellus.

c. 250.—"Among the Prasii of India they say that there exists a kind of ape with human intelligence. These animals seem to be about the size of Hyrcanian dogs. Their front hair looks all grown together, and any one ignorant of the truth would say that it was dressed artificially. The beard is like that of a satyr, and the tail strong like that of a lion. All the rest of the body is white, but the head and the tail are red. These creatures are tame and gentle in character, but by race and manner of life they are wild. They go about in crowds in the suburbs of Latage (now Latagé is a city of the Indians) and eat the boiled rice that is put out for them by the King's order. Every day their dinner is elegantly set out. Having eaten their fill it is said that they return to their parents in the woods in an orderly manner, and never hurry anybody that they meet by the way."—Aelian, De Nat. Animal. xvi. 10.

1825.—"An alarm was given by one of the sentries in consequence of a baboon drawing near his post. The character of the intruder was, however, soon detected by one of the Siu wars, who on the Sepoy's repeating his exclamation of the broken English 'Who goes there?' said with a laugh, 'Why do you challenge the lungoor? he cannot answer you.'"—Heber, ii. 85.

1859.—"I found myself in immediate proximity to a sort of parliament or general assembly of the largest and most human-like monkeys I had ever seen. There were at least 200 of them, great lungoors, some quite four feet high, the jetty black of their faces enhanced by a fringe of snowy whiskers.*—*W. Levin, A Fly on the Wheel, 49.*

1884.—"Less interesting personally than the gibbon, but an animal of very developed social instincts, is Semnopithecus entellus, otherwise the Bengal langur. (He) fights for his wives according to a custom not unheard of in other cases; but what is peculiar to him is that the vanquished males 'receive charge of all the young ones of their own sex, with whom they retire to some neighbouring jungle.' Schoolmasters and private tutors will read this with interest, as showing the origin and early disabilities of their profession."—Saturday Rev., May 31, on Sternadale's Nat. Hist. of Mammalia of India, &c.

Lungooty, s. Hind. langotii. The original application of this word seems to be the scantiest modicum of covering worn for decency by some of the lower classes when at work, and tied before and behind by a string round the waist; but it is sometimes applied to the more ample dhoti (see Dhoty). According to R. Drummond, in Guzerat the "Langoth or Lungota" (as he writes) is "a pretty broad piece of cotton cloth, tied round the breech by men and boys bathing. . . . The diminutive is Langotee, a long slip of cloth, stitched to a loin band of the same stuff, and forming exactly the T bandage of English Surgeons." This distinction is probably originally correct, and the use of langūta by Abdurrazzik would agree with it. The use of the word has spread to some of the Indo-Chinese countries. In the quotation from Moquet it is applied in speaking of an American Indian near the R. Am curved. But the writer had been in India.

c. 1422.—"The blacks of this country have the body nearly naked; they wear only bandages round the middle called lankoutah, which descend from the navel to above the knee."—*Abdurrazzik, in India in XV. Cent. 17.

1526.—"Their peasants and the lower classes all go about naked. They tie on a thing which they call a langotii, which is a piece of clot that hangs down two spans from the navel, as a cover to their nakedness. Below this pendant modesty-clout is another slip of cloth, one end of which they fasten before to a string that ties on the langotii, and then passing the slip of cloth between the two legs, bring it up and fix it to the string of the langotii behind."—Babar, 333.

c. 1609.—"Leur capitaine auoit fort bonne façon, encore qu'il fust tout nud et luy seul auoit vn langoutin, qui est vne petite pièce de coton pointe."—Moquet, 77.

"They wear nothing but the langotii, which is a string round the loins, and a piece of cloth about a hand's breadth fastened to it in front."—(Ref. lost), p. 26.
LUNKA, n.p. Skt. Laṅka. The oldest name of Ceylon in the literature both of Buddhism and Brahmanism. Also ‘an island’ in general.

—, s. A kind of strong cheroot much prized in the Madras Presidency, and so called from being made of tobacco grown in the ‘islands’ (the local term for which is laṅka) of the Godavery Delta.

M

MĀ-BĀP, s. ‘Āp mā-bāp hai khudā-vand! ’ ‘You, my Lord, are my mother and father!’ This is an address from a native, seeking assistance, or begging release from a penalty, or reluctant to obey an order, which the young sāhīb hears at first with astonishment, but soon as a matter of course.

MABAR, n.p. The name given in the Middle Ages by the Arabs to that coast of India which we call Coromandel. The word is Ar. ma’bar, ‘the ferry or crossing-place.’ It is not clear how the name came to be applied, whether because the Arab vessels habitually touched at its ports, or because it was the place of crossing to Ceylon, or lastly whether it was not an attempt to give meaning to some native name. [The Madras Gloss, says it was so called because it was the place of crossing from Madura to Ceylon; also see Logan, Malabar, i. 280.] We know no occurrence of the term earlier than that which we give from Abdallatif.

c. 1293. — ‘I saw in the hands of an Indian trader very beautiful mats, finely woven and painted on both sides with most pleasing colours. . . . The merchant told me . . . that these mats were woven of the Indian plantain . . . and that they sold in Mabar for two dinars apiece.’—Abd-Allatif, Relation de l’Egypte, p. 31.

c. 1279-80. In M. Pauthier’s notes on Marco Polo very curious notices are extracted from Chinese official annals regarding the communications, in the time of Kublai Kaan, between that Emperor and Indian States, including Ma-pa-rh.—(See pp. 600-605).

c. 1292. — ‘When you leave the Island of Seilan and sail westward about 60 miles, you come to the great province of Maabar, which is styled India the Greater: it is the best of all the Indies, and is on the mainland.’—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 16.

c. 1300. — ‘The merchants export from Maabar silken stuffs, aromatic roots; large pearl shell are brought from the sea. The productions of this country are carried to Irāk, Khurasān, Syria, Russia and Europe.’—Rashīd-al-Dīn, in Elliot, i. 69.

c. 1303. — ‘In the beginning of this year (703 H.), the Maliki-‘Azam, Takīf-d-din . . . departed from the country of Hind to the passage (ma’bar) of corruption. The King of Maabar was anxious to obtain his property and wealth, but Malik Mu’azzam Sirājū-d-din, son of the deceased, having secured his goodwill, by the payment of 200,000 dinars, not only obtained the wealth, but rank also of his father.’—Wassāf, in Elliot, iii. 45.

c. 1310. — ‘The country of Maabar, which is so distant from Dehli that a man travelling with all expedition could only reach it after a journey of 12 months, there the arrow of any holy warrior had not yet reached.’—Amīr Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 85.

c. 1330. — ‘The third part (of India) is Ma’bar, which begins some three or four days journey to the eastward of Kaulam; this territory lies to the east of Malabar. . . . It is stated that the territory Ma’bar begins at the Cape Kumhari, a name which applies both to a mountain and a city. . . . By way of the Calicut is the residence of the Princes of Ma’bar, for whom horses are imported from foreign countries.’—Alufedea, in Gildemeister, p. 185. We regret to see that M. Guyard, in his welcome completion of Reinard’s translation of Alufedea, absolutely, in some places, substitutes “Coromandel” for “Ma’bar.” It is French fashion, but a bad one.

a. The name applied by the Portuguese to the small peninsula and the city built on it, near the mouth of Canton River, which they have occupied since 1557. The place is called by the Chinese Nyao-màn (Ngyao, ‘bay or inlet,’ Màn, ‘gate’). The Portuguese name is alleged to be taken from A-ma-ngao, ‘the Bay of Ama,’ i.e. of the Mother, the so-called

'Queen of Heaven,' a patroness of seamen. And indeed Amacao is an old form often met with.

c. 1567. — "Hanno i Portoghesi fatta vna picciola cittad in vna Isola vicina a' i liti della China chiamato Machao ... ma i dati sono del Rei della China, e vanno a pagari a Canton, bellissima cittad, e di grande importanza, distante da Machao due giorni e mezzo." — Cesare de' Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 391.

c. 1570. — "On the fifth day of our voyage it pleased God that we arrived at ... Lampacau, where at that time the Portugals exercised their commerce with the Chineses, which continued till the year 1557, when the Mandarins of Canton, at the request of the Merchants of that Country, gave us the port of Macao, where the trade now is; of which place (that was but a desert Iland before) our countrymen made a very goodly plantation, wherein there were houses worth three or four thousand Duckats, together with a Cathedral Church ..." — Pinto, in Capta, p. 315.

1554. — "There was in Machao a religious man of the order of the barefooto friars of St. Francis, who understanding the great and good desire of this king, did sende him by certaine Portuguese merchants ... a cloth whereon was painted the day of judgement and hell, and that by an excellent workman." — Mendoza, ii. 394.

1557. — "They came to Amacao, in July, 1555. At the same time it seasonably hapned that Linsilan was commanded from the court to procure of the Strangers at Amacao, certaine goodly feathers for the King." — From the Jesuit Accounts, in Purchas, iii. 330.

1599. ... "Amacao." See under MONSOON.

1602. — "Being come, as heretofore I wrote your Worship, to Macao a city of the Portugals, adjoining to the firme Land of China, where there is a College of our Company." — Letter from Diego de Pantoja, in Purchas, iii. 350.

1611. — "There came a Jesuit from a place called Langasack (see LANGASAQUE), which place the Carrack of Amakau yearly was wont to come." — Danvers, Letters, i. 146.

1615. — "He adviseth me that 4 junckes are arrived at Langasaque from Chanchew, which with this ship from Amacau, will cause all matters to be sould chepe." — Cocke's Diary, i. 35.

1625. — "That course continued divers yeeres till the Chinois growing lesse fearefull, granted them in the greater Iland a little Peninsula to dwell in. In that place was an Idoll, which still remained to be scene, called Amia, whence the Peninsula was called Amacao, that is Amas Bay." — Purchas, iii. 319.

b. MACAO, MACCAO, was also the name of a place on the Pegu River which was the port of the city so called in the day of its greatness. A village of the name still exists at the spot.

1554. — "The baar (see BAHAR) of Macao contains 120 biacs, each biac 100 ticals (q.v.) . . ." — A. Nunes, p. 39.

1568. — "Si fa commodamente il viaggio sino a Macao distante da Pegu dodici miglia, e qui si sbarca." — Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 395.

1587. — "From Cirion we went to Macao, &c." — R. Fitch, in Hukl, ii. 391. (See DELING).

1599. — "The King of Arreauan is now ending his business at the Town of Macao, carrying thence the Silver which the King of Tangie had left, exceeding three millions." — N. Pimenta, in Purchas, iii. 1748.

MACAREO, s. A term applied by old voyagers to the phenomenon of the bore, or great tidal wave as seen especially in the Gulf of Cambay, and in the Sitang Estuary in Pegu. The word is used by them as if it were an Oriental word. At one time we were disposed to think it might be the Skt. word makara, which is applied to a mythological sea-monster, and to the Zodiacal sign Capricorn. This might easily have had a mythological association with the furious phenomenon in question, and several of the names given to it in various parts of the world seem due to associations of a similar kind. Thus the old English word Oegir or Eagre for the bore on the Severn, which occurs in Drayton, "seems to be a reminiscence of the old Scandinavian deity Oegir, the god of the stormy sea," [This theory is rejected by N.E.D. s.v. Eagre.] One of the Hindi names for the phenomenon is Mendhā, 'The Ram'; whilst in modern Guzerat, according to R. Drummond, the natives call it ghord, "likening it to the war horse, or a squadron of them." But nothing could illustrate the naturalness of such a figure as makara, applied to the bore, better than the following paragraph in the review-article just quoted (p. 401), which was evidently penned without any allusion to or suggestion of such an origin of the name, and which indeed makes no reference to the Indian name, but only to the French names of which we shall presently speak:

"Compared with what it used to be, if old descriptions may be trusted, the Mascaret is now stripped of its terrors. It resembles the great nature-force which used to ravage the valley of the Seine, like one of the mythical dragons which, as legends tell, laid whole districts waste, about as much as a lion confined in a cage resembles the free monarch of the African wilderness."

Take also the following:

1885.—"Here at his mouth Father Meghna is 20 miles broad, with islands on his breast as large as English counties, and a great tidal bore which made a daily and ever-varying excitement... In deep water, it passed merely as a large rolling bilow; but in the shallows it rushed along, roaring like a crested and devouring monster, before which no small craft could live."—J. Col. T. Lecin, A Fly on the Wheel, 161-162.

But unfortunately we can find no evidence of the designation of the phenomenon in India by the name of makara or the like; whilst both mascaret (as indicated in the quotation just made) and macrée are found in French as terms for the bore. Both terms appear to belong properly to the Garonne, though mascaret has of late begun on the Seine to supplant the old term barre, which is evidently the same as our bore. [The N.E.D. suggests O. N. bâra, 'wave.'] Littré can suggest no etymology for mascaret; he mentions a whimsical one which connects the word with a place on the Garrone called St. Macaire, but only to reject it. There would be no impossibility in the transfer of an Indian word of this kind to France, any more than in the other alternative of the transfer of a French term to India in such a way that in the 16th century visitors to that country should have regarded it as an indigenous word, if we had but evidence of its Indian existence. The date of Littré's earliest quotation, which we borrow below, is also unfavourable to the probability of transplantation from India. There remains the possibility that the word is Basque. The Saturday Reviewer already quoted says that he could find nothing approaching to Mascaret in a Basque French Dict., but this hardly seems final.

The vast rapidity of the flood-tide in the Gulf of Cambay is mentioned by Mašūdī, who witnessed it in the year H. 303 (A.D. 915) i. 255; also less precisely by Ibn Batuta (iv. 60). There is a paper on it in the Bo. Govt. Selections, N.S. No. xxv., from which it appears that the bore wave reaches a velocity of 10½ knots. [See also Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd. ed. i. 313.]

1553.—"In which time there came hither (to Diu) a concourse of many vessels from the Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, and all the coast of Arabia and India, so that the places within the Gulf of Cambay, which had become rich and noble by trade, were by this port undone. And this because it stood outside of the Macareos of the Gulf of Cambaya, which were the cause of the loss of many ships."—Barros, II. ii. cap 9.

1563.—"These Sholds (G. of Cambay) are an hundred and four-score miles about in a straight or gufle, which they call Macareo (Maccareo in orig.) which is as much as to say a race of a Tide."—Most C. Frederick, Hakk. ii. 342; [and comp. ii. 362].

1583.—"And having sailed until the 23d of the said month, we found ourselves in the neighbourhood of the Macareo (or Martaban) which is the most marvellous thing that ever was heard of in the way of tides, and high waters... The water in the channel rises to the height of a high tree, and then the boat is set to face it, waiting for the fury of the tide, which comes on with such violence that the noise is that of a great earthquake, insomuch that the boat is tossed from stem to stern, and carried by that impulse swiftly up the channel."—Gasparo Balbi, ff. 91v, 92.

1614.—"... thence to the Gulf of Cambaya with the impetuousity of the currents which are called Macareo, of whose furious strange things are told, insomuch that a stone thrown with force from the hand even in the first speed of its projection does not move more swiftly than those waters run."—Boeacro, MS.

1727.—"A Body of Waters comes rolling in on the Sand, whose Front is above two fathoms high, and whatever Body lies in its Way it over-turns, and no Ship can evade its Force, but in a Moment is overturned, this violent Boer the Natives called a Macarea."—A. Hamilton, ii. 33; [ed. 1744, ii. 32].

1811.—Solyuns uses the word Macrée as French for 'Bore,' and in English describes his print as "... the representation of a phenomenon of Nature, the Mace or tide, at the mouth of the river Ougly."—Les Hindous, iii.

MACASSAR, n.p. In Malay Mangkasar, properly the name of a people of Celebes (q.v.), but now the name of a Dutch seaport and seat of Government on the W. coast of the S.W. peninsula of that spider-like island. The last quotation refers to a time when we occupied the place, an episode of Anglo-Indian history almost forgotten.

[1664-5.—"... and anon to Gresham College, where, among other good discourse, there was tried the great poyson of Macassa upon a dogge, but it had no effect all the time we sat there."—Popps, Diary, March 16; ed. Wheatley, iv. 372.]

1816.—"Letters from Macassar of the 20th and 27th of June (1816), communicate the melancholy intelligence of the death of Lieut. T. C. Jackson, of the 1st Regt. of Native Bengal Infantry, and Assistant Resident of Macassar, during an attack on a fortified village, dependent on the dethroned Raja of Bone."—As. Journal, i. 297.

a. The crimson net-like mantle, which envelops the hard outer shell of the nutmeg, when separated and dried constitutes the mace of commerce. Hanbury and Flückiger are satisfied that the attempt to identify the Macir, Macer, &c., of Pliny and other ancients with mace is a mistake, as indeed the sagacious Garcia also pointed out, and Chr. Acosta still more precisely. The name does not seem to be mentioned by Maśyādī; it is not in the list of aromaticies, 25 in number, which he details (i. 367). It is mentioned by Edrisi, who wrote c. 1150, and whose information generally was of much older date, though we do not know what word he uses. The fact that nutmeg and mace are the product of one plant seems to have led to the fiction that clove and cinnamon also came from that same plant. It is, however, true that a kind of aromatic bark was known in the Arab pharmacopoeia of the Middle Ages under the name of kirfet-al-karanfīl or 'bark of clove,' which may have been either a cause of the mistake or a part of it. The mistake in question, in one form or another, prevailed for centuries. One of the authors of this book was asked many years ago by a respectable Mahommedan of Delhi if it were not the case that cinnamon, clove, and nutmeg were the produce of one tree. The prevalence of the mistake in Europe is shown by the fact that it is contradicted in a work of the 16th century (Bodaei, Comment. in Theophrastum, 992); and by the quotation from Funnel.

The name mace may have come from the Ar. bābāša, possibly in some confusion with the ancient macis. [See Skeat, Concise Dict. which gives F. macis, which was confused with M. F. macer, probably Lat. macer, macis, doubtless of Eastern origin.]

c. 1150.—"On its shores (i.e. of the sea of Sanf or Champa), are the dominions of a King called Miharja, who possesses a great number of populous and fertile islands, covered with fields and pastures, and producing ivory, camphor, nutmeg, mace, clove, aloeswood, cardamom, cubeb, &c."—Edrisi, i. 89; see also 51.

c. 1347.—"The fruit of the clove is the nutmeg, which we know as the scented nut. The flower which grows upon it is the mace (babasa). And this is what I have seen with my own eyes."—Jbn Batuta, iv. 243.

c. 1370.—"A gret Yele and great Contree, that men elepen Java... There growen alle manere of Spicerie more plentifuly liche than in any other contree, as of Gyncgever, Clowegylofres, Canelle, Zedewalle, Notemuges, and Maces..."—Edrisi, i. 99.

MACE, s.

b. Jav, and Malay mäs. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Mäs is really short for amäs or emäs, one of those curious forms with prefixed a, as in the case of abada, which are probably native, but may have been influenced by Portuguese.”] A weight used in Sumatra, being, according to Crawford, 1-16th of a Malay tael (q.v.), or about 40 grains (but see below). Mace is also the name of a small gold coin of Aĉhin, weighing 9 grs. and worth about 1s. 1d. And mace was adopted in the language of European traders in China to denote the tenth part of the Chinese bang or tael of silver; the 100th part of the same value being denominated in like manner candareen (q.v.). The word is originally Skt. mäsha, 'a bean,' and then 'a particular weight of gold' (comp. CARAT, RUTTEE).

1599.—"... by intervention of this thirdsman whom the Moor employed as broker they agreed on my price with the merchant at seven mazes of gold, which in our money makes a 1400 reys, at the rate of a half cruzado the maz."—Pinto, cap. xxv. Cogan has, "the fishermen sold me to the merchant for seven mazes of gold, which amounts in our money to seventeen shillings and sixpence."—p. 31.

1554.—"The weight with which they weigh (at Malacca) gold, musk, seed-pearl, coral, calamace... consists of cate which contain 20 tael, each tael 16 mazes, each max 20 cumderyns. Also one pawn 4 mazes, one max 4 cupoes (see KOBANG), one cupo 5 cumderyns (see CANDAREEN)."—A. Nunces, 39.

1598.—"Likewise a Tael of Malacca is 16 Mases."—Linschoten, 44; [Hak. Soc. i. 149].

1599.—"Bever sive Bazar (i.e. Bezaor, q.v.) per Massas venditur."—De Bry, ii. 64.

1625.—"I have also sent by Master Tomkins of their coin (Aĉhin)... that is of gold named a Mas, and is ninepence halfpence nearest."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 117.

1813.—"Milburn gives the following table of weights used at Aĉhin, but it is quite inconsistent with the statements of Crawford and Linschoten above.

| 5 mace    | = 1 mayam |
| 16 mayam  | = 1 tale |
| 5 taels   | = 1 bancal |
| 20 bancals | = 1 catty |
| 200 catties | = 1 bahrn." |

Milburn, ii. 329. [Mr. Skeat notes that here "copang" is Malay kupang; tale, tali; bancal, bongkat.]

MACHEEN, MAHACHEEN, n.p.

This name, Mahâ-china, "Great China," is one by which China was known in India in the early centuries of our era, and the term is still to be heard in India in the same sense in which Al-Birūnī uses it, saying that all beyond the great mountains (Himâlaya) is Mahâ-chin. But "in later times the majority, not knowing the meaning of the expression, seem to have used it pleonastically coupled with Chín, to denote the same thing, Chín and Mâchín, a phrase having some analogy to the way Sind and Hind was used to express all India, but a stronger one to Goy and Magoy, as applied to the northern nations of Asia." And eventually Chín was discovered to be the eldest son of Japhet, and Mâchín his grandson; which is much the same as saying that Britain was the eldest son of Brut the Trojan, and Great Britain his grandson! (Cathay and the Way Thither, p. cxix.).

In the days of the Mongol supremacy in China, when Chinese affairs were for a time more distinctly conceived in Western Asia, and the name of Manzi as denoting Southern China, unconquered by the Mongols till 1275, was current in the West, it would appear that this name was confounded with Mâchín, and the latter thus acquired a specific but erroneous application. One author of the 16th century also (quoted by Klaproth, J. As. Soc. ser. 2, tom. i. 115) distinguishes Chín and Mâchín as N. and S. China, but this distinction seems never to have been entertained by the Hindus. Ibn Batata sometimes distinguishes Sin (i.e. Chín) as South China from Khītā (see CATHAY) as North China. In times when intimacy with China had again ceased, the double name seems to have recovered its old vagueness as a rotund way of saying China, and had no more plurality of sense than in modern parlance Sodor and Man. But then comes an occasional new application of Mächin to Indo-China, as in Conti (followed by Fra Mauro). An exceptional application, arising from the Arab habit of applying the name of a country to the capital or the chief port frequented by them, arose in the Middle Ages, through which Canton became known in the West as the city of Mächin, or in Persian translation Chinkalân, i.e. Great Chin.

Mâcháchina as applied to China:

636.—"In what country exists the kingdom of the Great Thang? I asked the king (Siladitya of Kanauj), 'how far is it from this?' "It is situated,' replied he (Hwen Ts'ang), 'to the N.E. of this kingdom, and is distant several ten-thousands of it. It is the country which the Indian people call Mâhá-chin."—Pol. Boud. ii. 254-255.

c. 641.—"Mohochintan." See quotation under CHINA.

c. 1030.—"Some other mountains are called Harmakût, in which the Ganges has its source. These are impassable from the side of the cold regions, and beyond them lies Mächin."—Al-Birûnî, in Elliot, i. 46.

1501.—In the Letter of Amerigo Vespucci on the Portuguese discoveries, written from C. Verde, 4th June, we find mention among other new regions of Marchin. Published in Baldelli Boni's II. Milione, p. ciii.

c. 1590.—"Adjoining to Asham is Tibet, bordering upon Khatai, which is properly Mahacheen, vulgarly called Macheen. The capital of Khatai is Khan Baleegh, 4 days' journey from the sea."—Ayeen, by Gladwin, ed. 1800, ii. 4; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 118].

c. 1665.—"... you told me ... that Persia, Usbec, Kachguer, Tartary, and Cattyag, Pegu, Siam, China and Matchine (in origin: Tokine et Matchine) trembled at the name of the Kings of the Indies."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 155 seq.

Applied to Southern China.

c. 1300.—"Khatil is bounded on one side by the country of Mâchîn, which the Chinese call Manzi. ... In the Indian language S. China is called Mahâ-chin, i.e. 'Great china,' and hence we derive the word Manzi."—Roshkî-ud-dîn, in H. des Mongols (Quatremerê), xci.-xciii.

c. 1348.—"It was the Kaam's orders that we should proceed through Manzi, which was formerly known as India Maxima" (by which he indicates Mahâ-Chinâ, see below, in last quotation).—John Marignolli, in Cathay, p. 354.

Applied to Indo-China:

c. 1430.—"Es provincia (Ava)—Máchnum incolae dicant ... referata est elephantis."—Conti, in Poggias, De Var. Fortunae.

Chin and Machin:

c. 1320.—"The curiosities of Chin and Machin, and the beautiful products of Hind and Sind."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 32.

c. 1440.—"Poi si retrova in quella istessa provincia di Zagatai Sarmancent città granissima e ben popolata, per la qual vanno e vengono tutti quelli di Cini e Macini e del Catia, o mercanti o viandanti che siano."—Barbaro, in Ramusio, ii. f. 106c.

c. 1442.—"The merchants of the 7 climates from Egypt ... from the whole of the realms of Chin and Machin, and from the city of Khânbûlik, steer their course to this port."—Abdûr-râzâk, in Notices et Extraits, xiv. 429.

[1503.—"Sin and Masin." See under JAVA.]

Mahâchin or Chin Kalân, for Canton.

c. 1030.—In Sprenger's extracts from Al-Birûnî we have "Sharhkâd, in Chinesen Sânfâ, This is Great China (Mâchâln)."—Post und Reise-rouiten des Orient, 90.

c. 1300.—"This canal extends for a distance of 40 days' navigation from Khân-bûlik to Khingsai and Zaitân, the ports frequented by the ships that come from India, and from the city of Mâchîn."—Roshkî-ud-dîn, in Cathay, &c., 259-260.

c. 1332.—"... after I had sailed eastward over the Ocean Sea for many days I came to that noble province Manzi. ... The first city to which I came in this country was called Cens-Kalân, and 'tis a city as big as three Venices."—Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 109-105.

c. 1347.—"In the evening we stopped at another village, and so on till we arrived at Sin-Kalân, which is the city of Sin-ul-Sin ... one of the greatest of cities, and one of those that has the finest of bazaars. One of the largest of these is the porcelain bazaar, and from it china-ware is exported to the other cities of China, to India, and to Yemen."— Ibn Butala, iv. 272.

c. 1349.—"The first of these is called Manzi, the greatest and noblest province in the world, having no paragon in beauty, pleasantness, and extent. In it is that noble city of Campsay, besides Zayton, CynKalân, and many other cities."—John Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 373.

MÄCHIS, s. This is recent Hind. for 'lucifer matches.' An older and purer phrase for sulphur-matches is divâ-, diya-sulâ.

cloth, and which often occurs in prices current, is taken from the name of a place on the Southern Delta-branch of the Godavery, properly Madhavapalam, ['Tel. Madhavayya-palemu,' fortifed village of Madhava']. This was till 1833 [according to the Madras Gloss, 1827] the seat of one of the Company's Commercial Agencies, which was the chief of three in that Delta; the other two being Bunder Malunka and Injeram. Madappalam is now a staple export from England to India; it is a finer kind of white piece-goods, intermediate between calico and muslin.

MADRAXAO, s. This appears in old Portuguese works as the name of a gold coin of Guzerat; perhaps representing Musafar-shahi. There were several kings of Guzerat of this name. The one in question was probably Musafar-Shah II. (1511-1525), of whose coinage Thomas mentions a gold piece of 185 grs. (Pathan Kings, 353).

1554.—"There also come to this city Madrafaxaos, which are a money of Cambay, which vary greatly in price; some are of 24 tangas of 60 reis the tanga, others of 22, 22, 21, and other prices according to time and value."—A. Venez, 32.

MADRAS, n.p. This alternative name of the place, officially called by its founders Fort St. George, first appears about the middle of the 17th century. Its origin has been much debated, but with little result. One derivation, backed by a fictitious legend, derives the name from an imaginary Christian fisherman called Madarasen; but this may be pronounced philologically impossible, as well as otherwise unworthy of serious regard.* Lassen makes the name to be a corruption of Manda-raja, 'Realm of the Stupid!' No one will suspect the illustrious author of the Indische Alterthumskunde to be guilty of a joke; but it does look as if some malign Bengalee had suggested to him this gibe against the "Benighted!" It is indeed curious and true that, in Bengal, sepoys and the like always speak of the Southern Presidency as Mandraj. In fact, however, all the earlier mentions of the name are in the form of Madraspatanam, 'the city of the Madras,' whatever the Madras may have been. The earliest maps show Madraspatanam as the Mahommedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah. The word is therefore probably of Mahommedan origin; and having got so far we need not hesitate to identify it with Madrasa, 'a college.' The Portuguese wrote this Madurasa (see Faria y Sousa, Africa Portuguesa, 1681, p. 6); and the European name probably came from them, close neighbours as they were to Fort St. George, at Mylapore or San Thomé. That there was such a Madrissa in existence is established by the quotation from Hamilton, who was there about the end of the 17th century.† Fryer's Map (1698, but illustrating 1672-73) represents the Governor's House as a building of Mahommedan architecture, with a dome. This may have been the Madrassa itself. Lockyer also (1711) speaks of a "College," of which the building was "very ancient;" formerly a hospital, and then used apparently as a residence for young writers. But it is not clear whether the name "College" was not given on this last account. (The Madras Admin. Mon. says: "The origin of this name has been much discussed. Madrissa, a Mahommedan school, has been suggested, which considering the date at which the name is first found seems fanciful. Mando is in Sanscrit 'slow.' Manderz was a king of the lunar race.

* It is given in No. II. of Selections from the Records of S. Arote District, p. 107.
† In a letter from poor Arthur Burnell, on which this paragraph is founded, he adds: "It is sad that the most Philistine town (in the German sense) in all the East should have such a name."
The place was probably called after this king" (ii. 91). The Madras Gloss. again writes: "Hind. Madras, Can. Madarosu, from Tel. Mandaradzu, name of a local Telegu Royer," or ruler. The whole question has been discussed by Mr. Pringle (Diary Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 106 seqq.). He points out that while the earliest quotation given below is dated 1653, the name, in the form Madraspatanam, is used by the President and Council of Surat in a letter dated 29th December, 1640 (J. O. Records, O. C. No. 1764); "and the context makes it pretty certain that Francis Day or some other of the factors at the new Settlement must have previously made use of it in reference to the place, or 'rather,' as the Surat letter says, 'plot of ground' offered to him. It is no doubt just possible that in the course of the negotiations Day heard or caught up the name from the Portuguese, who were at the time in friendly relations with the English; but the probabilities are certainly in the opposite direction. The niya-k from, whom the plot was obtained must almost certainly have supplied the name, or what Francis Day conceived to be the name. Again, as regards Hamilton's mention of a 'college,' Sir H. Yule's remark certainly goes too far. Hamilton writes, 'There is a very Good Hospital in the Town, and the Company's Horse-stables are near, but the old College where a good many Gentlemen Factors are obliged to lodge, is ill-kept in repair.' This remark taken together with that made by Lockyer ... affords proof, indeed, that there was a building known to the English as the 'College.' But it does not follow that this, or any, building was distinctively known to Musalmans as the 'madrasa.' The 'old College' of Hamilton may have been the successor of a Muselman 'madrasa' of some size and consequence, and if this was so the argument for the derivation would be strengthened. It is however equally possible that some old buildings within the plot of territory acquired by Day, which had never been a 'madrasa,' was turned to use as a College or place where the young writers should live and receive instruction; and in this case the argument, so far as it rests on a mention of 'a College' by Hamilton and Lockyer, is entirely destroyed. Next as regards the probability that the first part of 'Madraspatanam' is 'of Mahommedan origin.' Sir H. Yule does not mention that date of the maps in which Madraspatanam is shown 'as the Mahommedan settlement corresponding to the present Triplicane and Royapettah'; but in Fryer's map, which represents the fort as he saw it in 1672, the name 'Madirass'—to which is added 'the Indian Town with flat houses'—is entered as the designation of the collection of houses on the north side of the English town, and the next makes it evident that in the year in question the name of Madras was applied chiefly to the crowded collection of houses styled in turn the 'Heathen,' the 'Malabar,' and the 'Black' town. This consideration does not necessarily disprove the supposed Musulman origin of 'Madras,' but it undoubtedly weakens the chain of Sir H. Yule's argument." Mr. Pringle ends by saying: "On the whole it is not unfair to say that the chief argument in favour of the derivation adopted by Sir H. Yule is of a negative kind. There are fatal objections to whatever other derivations have been suggested, but if the mongrel character of the compound 'Madraspatanam' is disregarded, there is no fatal objection to the derivation from 'madrasa.' ... If however that derivation is to stand, it must not rest upon such accidental coincidences as the use of the word 'College' by writers whose knowledge of Madras was derived from visits made from 30 to 50 years after the foundation of the colony."]

Ahmednagar. There is another Madre-maluco (or 'Imād-ul-Mulk) much spoken of in Portuguese histories, who was an important personage in Guzerat, and put to death with his own hand the king Sikandar Shāh (1526) (Barros, IV. v. 3; Correa, ii.
272, 344, &c.; Couto, Decs. v. and vi.

[1543.—See under COTAMALUCO.]

1553.—"The Madre Maluco was married to a sister of the Hidalchán (see IDALCAN), and the latter treated this brother-in-law of his, and Meleque Verido as if they were his vassals, especially the latter."—Barros, IV.
vii. 1.

1563.—"The Imademaluco or Madre-maluco, as we corruptly style him, was a Circassian (Cheryges) by nation, and had originally been a Christian, and died in 1546.
. . . . Imad is as much as to say 'prop', and thus the other (of these princes) was called Imademaluco, or 'Prop of the Kingdom.' . . . "—Garcia, f. 36v.

Neither the chronology of De Orta here, nor the statement of Imād-ul-Mulk's Circasssian origin, agree with those of Firishta.
The latter says that Fath-Ullah Imād Shāh was descended from the heathen of Bijanagar (iii. 455).

MADURA, n.p., properly Madurei, Tâm. Mathurvi. This is still the name of a district in S. India, and of a city which appears in the Tables of Ptolemy as "Μάδουρα βασιλέως Παρθένος." The name is generally supposed to be the same as that of Mathurā, the holy and much more ancient city of Northern India, from which the name was adopted (see MUTTRA), but modified after Tamil pronunciation.* [On the other hand, a writer in J.R. As. Soc.
(xiv. 578, n. 3) derives Madura from the Dravidian Madur in the sense of 'Old Town,' and suggests that the northern Mathura may be an offshoot from it.] Madura was, from a date, at least as early as the Christian era,
the seat of the Pandyas sovereigns.
These, according to Tamil tradition, as stated by Bp. Caldwell, had previously held their residence at Kolket on the Tamraparni, the Kāḷaṇa of Ptolemy. (See Caldwell, pp. 16, 95, 101). The name of Madura, probably as adopted from the holier northern Muttra, seems to have been a favourite among the Eastern settlements under Hindu influence. Thus we have northern influence than we are justified in MADURA FOOT, s. A fungoidal disease of the foot, apparently incurable except by amputation, which occurs in the Madura district, and especially in places where the 'Black soil' prevails. Medical authorities have not yet decided on the causes or precise nature of the disease. See Nelson, Madura, Pt. i. pp. 91-94; [Gribble, Cuddapah, 193].

MAGADOXO, n.p. This is the Portuguese representation, which has passed into general European use, of Makdashau, the name of a town and State on the Somalī coast in E. Africa, now subject to Zanzibar. It has been shown by one of the present writers that Marco Polo, in his chapter on Madagascar, has made some confusion between Magadoxo and that island, mixing up particulars relating to both. It is possible that the name of Madagascar was really given from Makdashau, as Sir R. Burton supposes; but he does not give any authority for his statement that the name of Madagascar "came from Makdishă (Magadoxo) . . . whose Sheikh invaded it." (Comment. on Camões, ii. 520). [Owen (Narrative, i. 357) writes the name Muldeesha, and Boteler (Narrative, ii. 215) says it is pronounced by the Arabs Makodīsha. The name is said to be Magaad-el-Shata, "Harbour of the Sheep," and the first syllable has been identified with that of Magdala and is said to mean "door" in some of the Galla dialects (Notes & Queries, 9 ser. ii. 193, 310. 1408.—"And we found ourselves before a great city with houses of several stories and in the midst of the city certain great palaces; and about it a wall with four towers; and this city stood close upon the sea, and the Moors call it Magadoxo. 1514.—". . . the most of them are Moors such as inhabit the city of Zofalla . . . and these people continue to be found in Mazambic, Melinda, Mogodecio, Marachilue (read Brava Chilve, i.e. Braça and Quiñao), and Mombazza; which are all walled cities on the main land, with houses and streets like our own; except Mazambic."—Letter of Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital.

1516.—"Further on towards the Red Sea there is another very large and beautiful town called Magadoxo, belonging to the Moors, and it has a King over it, and is a place of great trade and merchandise."—Barbosa, 16.

1592.—". . . and after they had passed Cape Guardafu, Dom Estevão was going along in such depression that he was like to die of grief, on arriving at Magadoxo, they stopped to water. And the King of the country, hearing that there had come a son of the Count Admiral, of whom all had ample knowledge as being the first to discover and navigate on that coast, came to the shore to see him, and made great offers of all that he could require."—Couto, IV. viii. 2.

1727.—"Magadoxa, or as the Portuguese call it, Magadocia, is a pretty large City, about 2 or 3 Miles from the Sea, from whence it has a very fine Aspect, being adorned with many high Steeples and Mosques."—A. Hamilton, i. 12-13, [ed. 1744].
MAHÁJUN, s. Hind. from Skt. maha-juṇa, 'great person.' A banker and merchant. In Southern and Western India the vernacular word has various other applications which are given in Wilson.

c. 1861.—"Down there lives a Mahajun—my father gave him a bill, I have paid the knave thrice over, and here I'm paying him still.
He shows me a long stamp paper, and must have my land—must he!
If I were twenty years younger, he should get six feet by three."
Sir A. C. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

1885.—"The Mahajun hospitably entertains his victim, and speeds his homeward departure, giving no word or sign of his business till the time for appeal has gone by, and the decree is made absolute. Then the storm bursts on the head of the luckless hill-man, who finds himself loaded with an overwhelming debt, which he has never incurred, and can never hope to discharge; and so he practically becomes the Mahajan's slave for the rest of his natural life."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, 339.

MAHÁNHANAH, s. (See MEEANA.)

MAHÉ, n.p. Properly Māyāli. [According to the Madras Gloss, the Mal name is Mayyazhi, maṭi, 'black, 'azhi, 'river mouth'; but the title is from the French Mahé, being one of the names of Labourdonnais.] A small settlement on the Malabar coast, 4 m. S.E. of Tellicherry, where the French established a factory for the sake of the pepper trade in 1722, and which they still retain. It is not now of any importance.

MAHI, n.p. The name of a considerable river flowing into the upper part of the Gulf of Cambay. ["The height of its banks, and the fierceness of its floods; the deep gullies through which the traveller has to pass on his way to the river, and perhaps, above all, the bad name of the tribes on its banks, explain the proverb: 'When the Mahi is crossed, there is comfort.'"] (Imp. Gazetteer, s.v.)

c. A.D. 80-90.—"Next comes another gulf ... extending also to the north, at the mouth of which is an island called Byzæn (Perim), and at the innermost extremity a great river called Mais."—Periplus, ch. 42.

MAHOUT, s. The driver and tender of an elephant. Hind. maháwat, from Skt. mahá-matrā, 'great in measure,' a high officer, &c., so applied. The Skt. term occurs in this sense in the Mahábharata (e.g. iv. 1761, &c.). The Mahout is mentioned in the 1st Book of Maccabees as 'the Indian.' It is remarkable that we find what is apparently mahá-matrā, in the sense of a high officer in Hesychius:

"Μαχαύτρα, οἱ στρατηγοί παρ' Ινδόις.

—Hesych. s.v.

c. 1590.—"Must elephants (see MUST). There are five and a half servants to each, viz., first, a Mahawat, who sits on the neck of the animal and directs its movements. . . . He gets 200 dôma per month. . . . Secondly a Bhôi, who sits behind, upon the rump of the elephant, and assists in battle, and in quickening the speed of the animal; but he often performs the duties of the Mahawat. . . . Thirdly the Meths (see MATE). . . . A Meth fetches fodder, and assists in caparisoning the elephant. . . ."—An, ed. Blokhuin, i. 123.

1648.—". . . and Mahouts for the elephants. . . ."—Van Twist, 56.

1826.—"I will now pass over the term of my infancy, which was employed in learning to read and write—my preceptor being a mahouhut, or elephant-driver—and will take up my adventures."—Pandurang Hari, 21; [fed. 1873, i. 28].

1848.—"Then he described a tiger hunt, and the manner in which the Mahout of his elephant had been pulled off his seat by one of the infuriate animals."—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. iv.

MAHRRATTA, n.p. Hind. Marhatá, Marhatà, Marhatá (Marhati, Marhatî, Marhatî), and Marâhatá. The name of a famous Hindu race, from the old Skt. name of their country, Mahâ-rajâstra, 'Magna Regio.' [On the other hand H. A. Accworth (Ballads of the Marathas, Intro. vi.) derives the word from a tribal name Again some authorities (Wilson, Indian Caste, ii. 48; Baden-Powell, J. R. As. Soc., 1897, p. 249, note) prefer to derive the word from the Mâhr or Mahâr, a once numerous and dominant race. c. 1842.—"... Ah, for some retreat

Deep in yonder shining Orient, where my life began to beat;

Where in wild Mahâratta battle fell my father evil starr'd."—Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

The following is in the true Hobson-Jobson manner:

[1859.—"This term Marhatta or Marhutta, is derived from the mode of warfare adopted by these Men. Mor means to strike, and hutna, to get out of the way, i.e. those who struck a blow suddenly and at once retreated out of harm's way."—J. Dundas Robertson, District Duties during the Revolt in 1857, p. 104, note.]

MAHRATTA DITCH, n.p. An excavation made in 1742, as described in the extract from Orme, on the landward sides of Calcutta, to protect the settlement from the Maharatta bands. Hence the term, or for shortness 'The Ditch,' simply, as a disparaging name for Calcutta (see DITCHER). The line of the Ditch corresponded nearly with the outside of the existing Circular Road, except at the S.E. and S., where the work was never executed. [There is an excavation known by the same name at Madras excavated in 1780. (Murray, Handbook, 1859, p. 43.)]

1742.—"In the year 1742 the Indian inhabitants of the Colony requested and obtained permission to dig a ditch at their own expense, round the Company's bounds, from the northern parts of Soottanatty to the southern part of Govindpore. In six months three miles were finished: when the inhabitants ... discontinued the work, which from the occasion was called the Morattoe ditch."—Orme, ed. 1863, ii. 45.

1757.—"That the Bounds of Calcutta are to extend the whole Circle of Ditch dug upon the Invasion of the Marattes; also 600 yards without it, for an Esplanade."—Articles of Agreement sent by Colonel Cline (previous to the Treaty with the Nabob of May 14). [1840.—"Less than a hundred years ago, it was thought necessary to fortify Calcutta against the horsemen of Berar, and the name of the Mahrratta Ditch still preserves the memory of the danger."—Mackay, Essay on Oriental.]

MAHSEER, MASEER, MASAL, &c. Hind. mahāsir, mahāser, mahāsāulā, s. The name is applied to perhaps more than one of the larger species of Barbus (N.O. Cyprinidae), but especially to B. Mosul of Buchanan, B. Tor, Day, B. elegalis, McLelland, found in the larger Himalayan rivers, and also in the greater perennial rivers of Madras and Bombay. It grows at its largest, to about the size of the biggest salmon, and more. It affords also the highest sport to Indian anglers; and from these circumstances has sometimes been called, misleadingly, the 'Indian salmon.' The origin of the name Mahseer, and its proper spelling, are very doubtful. It may be Skt. mahā-sāla, 'big-head,' or mahā-sālka, 'large-scaled.' The latter is most probable, for the scales are so large that Buchanan mentions that playing cards were made from them at Dacca. Mr. H. S. Thomas suggests mahā-āsya, 'great mouth.' [The word does not appear in the ordinary dicts.; on the whole, perhaps the derivation from mahā-śiras is most probable.]

c. 1809.—"The Masal of the Kosi is a very large fish, which many people think still better than the Rohu, and compare it to the salmon."—Buchanan, Eastern India, iii. 194.

1822.—"Mahasaula and Tor, variously altered and corrupted, and with various additions may be considered as genuine appellations, amongst the natives for these fishes, all of which frequent large rivers."—F. Buchanan Hamilton, Fishes of the Ganges, 304.

1873.—"In my own opinion and that of others whom I have met, the Mahseer shows more sport for its size than a salmon."—H. S. Thomas, The Rod in India, p. 9.

MAINATO, s. Tam. Mal. Mainätta, a washerman or dhoby (q.v.).

1516.—"There is another sect of Gentiles which they call Mainatos, whose business it is to wash the clothes of the Kings, Bramins, and Naires; and by this they get their living; and neither they nor their sons can take up any other business."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed., 334.

c. 1542.—"In this inclosure do likewise remain all the Landresses, by them called Maynates, which wash the linnen of the City (Pequin), who, as we were told, are above an hundred thousand."—Pinto, in Cogun, p. 193. The original cap. ev.) has todas os mainatos, whose sex Cogan has changed.

1554.—"And the farm (renda) of mainatos, which farm prohibits any one from washing clothes, which is the work of a mainato, except by arrangement with the farmer (Rendeiro). . . ."—Tombo, &c., 53.

[1598.—"There are some among them that do nothing else but wash cloathes: . . . they are called Maynattos."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 260.

[c. 1610.—"These folk (the washermen) are called Menates."—Peyard de Lacl, Hak. Soc. ii. 71.]

1644.—(Expenses of Daman) "For two mainatos, three water boyos (bois de agua), one sombreyro boy, and 4 torch bearers for the said Captain, at I xera mi, a month, comes in the year to 36,000 rês or r. 00120.0.00."—Bocarro, MS. f. 181.

MAISTRY, MISTRY, sometimes even MYSTERY, s. Hind. mistri. This word, a corruption of the Portuguese mestre, has spread into the vernaculars all over India, and is in constant Anglo-Indian use. Properly 'a foreman,' 'a master-workman'; but used also, at least in Upper India, for any artizan, as rāj-mistāri (properly Pers. rāz), 'a mason or bricklayer,' lokhār-mistāri, 'a blacksmith,' &c. The proper use of the word, as noted above, corresponds precisely to the definition of the Portuguese word, as applied to artizans in Bluteau: "Artificie que sabe bem o seu officio. Peritus artifex . . . Opifex, alienorum operum inspecctor." In W. and S. India maistry, as used in the household, generally means the cook, or the tailor. (See CALEFA.)

Master (Macrepa) is also the Russian term for a skilled workman, and has given rise to several derived adjectives. There is too a similar word in modern Greek, μαγιστρος.

1404.—"And in these (chambers) there were works of gold and azure and of many other colours, made in the most marvellous way; insomuch that even in Paris whence come the subtle maistros, it would be reckoned beautiful to see."—Clavijo, § ev. (Comp. Markham, p. 125).

1524.—"And the Viceroy (D. Vasco da Gama) sent to seize in the river of the Culumutys four newly-built catturs, and fetched them to Cochín. These were built very light for fast rowing, and were greatly admired. But he ordered them to be burned, saying that he intended to show the Moors that we knew how to build better caturas than they did; and he sent for Master Vyne the Genoese, whom he had brought to build galleys, and asked him if he could build boats that would row faster than the Malabar paraos (see PROW). He answered: "Sir, I'll build you brigantines fast enough to catch a mosquito. . . ."—Correa, ii. 830. [1514.—"He ordered to be collected in the smithies of the dockyard as many smiths as could be had, for he had many mistresses."—Ibid. iv. 663.] 1554.—"To the mestre of the smith's shop (terraita) 30,000 reis of salary and 600 reis for maintenance" (see Batta).—S. My mind goes back to my ancient Goanese cook. He was only a maistry, or more vulgarly a bobberjee (see Bobáchee), yet his sonorous name recalled the conquest of Mexico, or the doubling of the Cape."—Tribes on My Frontier, 85. [1900.—"Mystery very sick, Mem Sahib, very sick all the night."—Temple Bar, April.] MAJOON, s. Hind, from Ar. ma'jân, lit. 'kneaded,' and thence what old medical books call 'an electuary' (i.e. a compound of medicines kneaded with syrup into a soft mass), but especially applied to an intoxicating confection of hemp leaves, &c., sold in the bazar. [Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 159.] In the Deccan the form is ma'jâm. Mooden Sheriiff, in his Suppt. to the Pharmac. of India, writes mughjâm. "The chief ingredients in making it are ganja (or hemp) leaves, milk, ghee, poppy-seeds, flowers of the thorn-apple (see Datura), the powder of nux vomica, and sugar" (Qanoon-e-Islam, Gloss. lxxxi). 1519.—"Next morning I halted . . . and indulging myself with a maajûn, made them throw into the water the liquor used for intoxicating fishes, and caught a few fish."—Baber, i. 27. 1569.—"And this they make up into an electuary, with sugar, and with the things above-mentioned, and this they call majû."—Garcia, t. 27v. 1731.—"Our ill-favoured guard brought in a dose of majum each, and obliged us to eat it . . . a little after sunset the surgeon came, and with him 30 or 40 Caffres, who seized us, and held us fast till the operation (circumcision) was performed."—Soldier's letter quoted in Hon. John Lindsay's Journal of Captivity in Myore, Lives of Lindsay, iii. 225. 1874.—"... it (Bhang) is made up with flour and various additions into a sweetmeat or majum of a green colour."—Hanbury and Fröciger, 498.

MALABAR, n.p. a. The name of the sea-board country which the Arabs called the 'Pepper-Coast,' the ancient Kerala of the Hindus, the Διούρωπα, or rather Διούρωπη, of the Greeks (see Tamil), is not in form indigenous, but was applied, apparently, first by the Arab or Arabo-Persian mariners of the Gulf. The substantive part of the name, Malai, or the like, is doubtless indigenous; it is the Dravadian term for 'mountain' in the Sanskritized form Malayâlam, which is applied specifically to the southern portion of the Western Ghats, and from which is taken the indigenous term Malayâlam, distinguishing that branch of the Dravidian language in the tract which we call Malabar. This name—Male or Malai, Małia, &c.,—we find in the earlier post-classic notices of India; whilst in the great Temple-Inscription of Tanjore (11th century) we find the region in question called Malai-nâdu. (nâdu, 'country'). The affix bâr appears attached to it first (so far as we are aware) in the Geography of Edrisi (c. 1150). This (Persian) termination, bâr, whatever be its origin, and whether or no it be connected either with the Ar. barr, 'a continent,' on the one hand, or with the Skt. vāra, 'a region,' a slope;' on the other, was most assuredly applied by the navigators of the Gulf to other regions which they visited besides Western India. Thus we have Zangi-bâr (mod. Zanzibar), 'the country of the Blacks'; Kalâbār, denoting apparently the coast of the Malay Peninsula; and even according to the dictionaries, Hindû-bâr for India. In the Arabic work which affords the second of these examples (Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 17) it is expressly explained: 'The word bâr serves to indicate that which is both a coast and a kingdom.' It will be seen from the quotations below that in the Middle Ages, even after the establishment of the use of this termination, the exact form of the name as given by foreign travellers and writers, varies considerably. But, from the time of the Portuguese discovery of the Cape route, Malabar, or Malabar, as we have it now, is the persistent form. [Mr. Logan (Manual, i. 1) remarks that the name is not in use in the district itself except among foreigners and English-speaking natives; the ordinary name is Malayalam or Malayam, ‘the Hill Country.’]

c. 645.—“The imports to Taprobane are silk, aloeswood, cloves, sandalwood. . . . These again are passed on from Sledediba to the marts on this side, such as Mākē, where the pepper is grown. . . . And the most notable places of trade are these, Sindu. . . . and then the five marts of Mākē, from which the pepper is exported, viz., Parti, Mangarthu, Salopatana, Nalopatana, and Pudopatana.”—Cosmus, BK. xi.

c. 646.—“To the south this kingdom is near the sea. There rise the mountains called Mo-la-ye (Malaya), with their precipitous sides, and their lofty summits, their dark valleys and their deep ravines. On these mountains grows the white sandalwood.”—Hwee T'song, in Julien, iii. 122.

581.—“From this place (Maskat) ships sail for Kaulam-Malai; the distance from Maskat to Kaulam-Malai is a month’s sail with a moderate wind.”—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinaud, i. 15. The same work at p. 15 uses the expression “Country of Pepper” (Bahad-ul-faluf).

580.—“From Sindin to Mali is five days’ journey; in the latter pepper is to be found, also the bamboo.”—Ibn Khardadbeh, in Elliot, i. 15.

c. 1090.—“You enter then on the country of Lärn, in which is Jaimur (see under CHOU), then Maliah, then Kanci, then Dravira (see DRAVIDIAN).”—Al-Birānī, in Reinaud, Fragmens, 121.

c. 1150.—“Fandarina (see PANDARANI) is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Minibār, where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor.”—Idrisi, in Elliot, i. 90.

c. 1200.—“Hari-sports here in the delightful spring. . . . when the breeze from Malaya is fragrant from passing over the charming luangwa” (cloves).—Gīta Govinda.

1270.—“Malibar is a large country of India, with many cities, in which pepper is produced.”—Kazwinī, in Gildemeister, 214.

c. 1298.—“You can sail (upon that sea) between these islands and Ormes, and (from Ormes) to those parts which are called (Minibar), is a distance of 2,000 miles, in a direction between south and south-east; then 300 miles between east and south-east from Minibar to Maabar” (see MABAR).—Letter of Fr. John of Montecorvino, in Cathay, i. 215.

c. 1298.—“Minibar is a great kingdom lying towards the west. . . . There is in this kingdom a great quantity of pepper.”—Marco Polo, BK. iii. ch. 25.

c. 1300.—“Beyond Guzerat are Kankan (see CONCAN) and Tana; beyond them the country of Malibār, which from the boundary of Kanka to Edam (probably from Ghīrāh to Quilon) is 300 parasangs in length.”—Rashidadīdūn, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1320.—“A certain traveller states that India is divided into three parts, of which the first, which is also the most westerly, is that on the confines of Kerman and Sind, and is called Güzrat; the second Manibār, or the Land of Pepper, east of Güzrat.”—Abulfera, in Gildemeister, 184.

c. 1322.—“And now that ye may know how pepper is got, let me tell you that it greweth in a certain empire, whereunto I came to land, the name whereof is Minibār.”—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 74.

c. 1343.—“After 3 days we arrived in the country of the Mulaibār, which is the country of Pepper. It stretches in length a distance of two months’ march along the sea-shore.”—Ibn Batuta, iv. 71.

1348-49.—“We embarked on board certain hooks from Lower India, which is called Minubar.”—John de Margonelli, in Cathay, 336.

c. 1420-30.—“. . . Departing thence he . . . arrived at a noble city called Colen. . . . This province is called Melibaria, and they collect in it the ginger called by the natives colombi, pepper, brazil-wood, and the cinnamon, called canella grossa.”—Conti, corrected from Jones’s tr. in India in XVIth Cent. 17-18.

c. 1442.—“The coast which includes Calicut with some neighbouring ports, and which extends as far as (Kael), a place situated opposite to the Island of Serendib . . . bears the general name of Melibār.”—Abarrazzak, ibid. 19.

[1623.—“... Malabar Pirates...”—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 121.]

1877.—The form Malibar is used in a letter from Athanasius Peter III., “Patriarch of the Syrians of Antioch” to the Marquis of Salisbury, dated Cairo, July 18.

MALABAR, n.p.

This word, through circumstances which have been fully elucidated by Bishop Caldwell in his Comparative Grammar (2nd ed. 10-12), from which we give an extract below,* was applied by the Portuguese not only to the language and people of the country thus called, but also to the Tamil language and the people speaking Tamil. In the quotations following, those under A apply, or may apply, to the proper people or language of Malabar (see MALAYALAM); those under B are instances of the misapplication to Tamil, a misapplication which was general (see e.g. in Orme, passim) down to the beginning of the last century, and which still holds among the more ignorant Europeans and Eurasians in S. India and Ceylon.

1572.—“Leva alguns Malabaros, que tomou Por força, dos que o Samorim mandara.” Canões, ix. 14.

* “The Portuguese...” sailing from Malabar on voyages of exploration... made their acquaintance with various places on the eastern or Coromandel Coast... and finding the language spoken by the fishing and sea-faring classes on the eastern coast similar to that spoken on the western, they came to the conclusion that it was identical with it, and called it in consequence by the same name—viz. Malabar. A circumstance which naturally confirmed the Portuguese in their notion of the identity of the people and language of the Coromandel Coast with those of Malabar was that when they arrived at Cael, in Timevelly, on the Coromandel Coast... they found the King of Gullan (one of the most important places on the Malabar Coast) residing there.”—Sp. MALABAR-CREEPER. 542 MALABAR RITES.

In the following passage the word Malabars is misapplied still further, though by a writer usually most accurate and intelligent:

1810.—"The language spoken at Madras is the Tulainga, here called Malabars."—Marie Graham, 123.

1869.—"The term 'Malabar' is used throughout the following pages in the comprehensive sense in which it is applied in the Singhalesse Chronicles to the continental invaders of Ceylon; but it must be observed that the adventurers in these expeditions, who are styled in the Malavasavo 'damilos,' or Tamils, came not only from... 'Malabar,' but also from all parts of the Peninsula as far north as Cuttack and Orissa."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 353.

MALABAR-CREEPER, s. Argyreia malabarica, Choisy.

MALABAR EARS, s. The seed vessels of a tree which Ives calls Codaga palli.

1773.—"From their shape they are called Malabar Ears, on account of the resemblance they bear to the ears of the women of the Malabar coast, which from the large slit made in them and the great weight of ornamental rings put into them, are rendered very large, and so long that sometimes they touch the very shoulders."—Ives, 465.

MALABAR HILL, n.p. This favourite site of villas on Bombay Island is stated by Mr. Whitworth to have acquired its name from the fact that the Malabar pirates, who haunted this coast, used to lie behind it.

[1674.—"On the other side of the great Inlet, to the Sea, is a great Point abutting against Old Woman's Island, and is called Malabar Hill... the remains of a stupendous Pagod, near a Tank of Fresh Water, which the Malabars visited it mostly for."—Fryer, 68 seg.]

MALABAR OIL, s. "The ambiguous term 'Malabar Oil' is applied to a mixture of the oil obtained from the livers of several kinds of fishes frequenting the Malabar Coast of India and the neighbourhood of Karachi."—Watt, Econ. Dict. v. 113.

MALABAR RITES. This was a name given to certain heathen and superstitious practices which the Jesuits of the Madura, Carnatic, and Mysore Missions permitted to their converts, in spite of repeated prohibitions by the Popes. And though these practices were finally condemned by the Legate Cardinal de Tournon in 1704, they still subsist, more or less, among native Catholic Christians, and especially those belonging to the (so-called) Goa Churches. These practices are generally alleged to have arisen under Father de' Nobili ("Robertus de Nobilibus"), who came to Madura about 1606. There can be no doubt that the aim of this famous Jesuit was to present Christianity to the people under the form, as it were, of a Hindu translation!

The nature of the practices of which we speak may be gathered from the following particulars of their prohibition. In 1623 Pope Gregory XV., by a constitution dated 31st January, condemned the following:—1. The investiture of Brahmans and certain other castes with the sacred thread, through the agency of Hindu priests, and with Hindu ceremonies. For these Christian ceremonies were to be substituted; and the thread was to be regarded as only a civil badge.

2. The ornamental use of sandalwood paste was permitted, but not its superstitious use, e.g., in mixture with cowdung ashes, &c., for ceremonial purification.

3. Bathing as a ceremonial purification.

4. The observance of caste, and the refusal of high-caste Christians to mix with low-caste Christians in the churches was disapproved.

The quarrels between Capuchins and Jesuits later in the 17th century again brought the Malabar Rites into notice, and Cardinal de Tournon was sent on his unlucky mission to determine these matters finally. His decree (June 23, 1704) prohibited:—

1. A mutilated form of baptism, in which were omitted certain ceremonies offensive to Hindus, specifically the use of 'suliva, sal, et insufflatio.'

2. The use of Pagan names.

3. The Hinduizing of Christian terms by translation.

4. Deferring the baptism of children.

5. Infant marriages.

6. The use of the Hindu tali (see TALEE).

7. Hindu usages at marriages.

9. The exclusion of women from churches during certain periods.

10. Ceremonies on a girl's attainment of puberty.

11. The making distinctions between Pariahs and others.

12. The assistance of Christian musicians at heathen ceremonies.

13. The use...

With regard to No. 11 it may be observed that in South India the distinction of castes still subsists, and the only Christian Mission in that quarter which has really succeeded in abolishing caste is that of the Basel Society.

MALABATHRUM, s. There can be very little doubt that this classical export from India was the dried leaf of various species of Cinnamomum, which leaf was known in Skt. as tdmbula-pattra. Some who wrote soon after the Portuguese discoveries took, perhaps not unnaturally, the pān or betel-leaf for the malabathrum of the ancients; and this was maintained by Dean Vincent in his well-known work on the Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients, justifying this in part by the Ar. name of the betel, tāmbāl, which is taken from Skt. tāmbāla, betel; tāmbāla-pattra, betel-leaf. The tdmbula-pattra, however, the produce of certain wild spp. of Cinnamomum, obtained both in the hills of Eastern Bengal and in the forests of Southern India, is still valued in India as a medicine and aromatic, though in no such degree as in ancient times, and it is usually known in domestic economy as tejpāt, or corruptly tezpāt, i.e. 'pungent leaf.' The leaf was in the Arabic Materia Medica under the name of sādhāj or sādhāji Hindi, as was till recently in the English Pharmacopoeia as Foliolum indicum, which will still be found in Italian drug-shops. The matter is treated, with his usual lucidity and abundance of local knowledge, in the Colloquios of Garcia de Orta, of which we give a short extract. This was evidently unknown to Dean Vincent, as he repeats the very errors which Garcia dissipates. Garcia also notes that confusion of Malabathrum and Foliolum indicum with spikenard, which is traceable in Pliny as well as among the Arab pharmacologists. The ancients did no doubt apply the name Malabathrum to some other substance, an unguent or solid extract. Rheede, we may notice, mentions that in his time in Malabar, oils in high medical estimation were made from both leaves and root of the "wild cinnamon" of that coast, and that from the root of the same tree a camphor was extracted, having several of the properties of real camphor and more fragrance. (See a note by one of the present writers in Catholic &c., pp. exlv.-lxvi.) The name Cinnamom is properly confined to the tree of Ceylon (C. Zeylanicum). The other Cinna- moma are properly Cassia barles. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 317 seqq.]

c. a.d. 60.—"Malabathron èmovi ùptolmè-βάκωνα είναι τῆς Ἰνδικῆς νάρδου φύλλων, πλανιώμερα ὑπὸ τῆς κατὰ τὴν οὐσίαν ἐμφα-ρειας, ... ἵνα γαρ ἐστὶ γένος φύλλων εὐτοί τῇ Ἰνδικῷ τέλαντο, φύλλων δὲ ἐπινηχυ-μένου εἴδατι."—Diocorides, Mat. Med. ii. 11.

c. a.d. 70.—"We are beholden to Syria for Malabathrum. This is a tree that beareth leaves rolled up round together, and seeming to the eie withered. Out of which there is drawn and pressed an Oile for perfumers to use. ... And yet there commeth a better kind thereof from India. ... The relish thereof ought to resemble Nardus at the tongue end. The perfume or smell that ... the leave yeeldeth when it is boiled in wine, passeth all others. It is strange and monstrous which is observed in the price; for it hath risen from one denier to three hundred a pound."—Pliny, xii. 26, in Ph. Holland.

c. a.d. 90. —"... Getting rid of the fibrous parts, they take the leaves and double them up into little balls, which they stitch through with the fibres of the withes. And these they divide into three classes. ... And thus originate the three qualities of Malabathrum, which the people who have prepared them carry to India for sale."—Periplus, near the end. [Also see Yule, Intro. Gill, River of Golden Sand, ed. 1883, p. 89.]

1563.—"R. I remember well that in speaking of betel you told me that it was not folium indu, a piece of information of great value to me; for the physicians who put themselves forward as having learned much from these parts, assert that they are the same; and what is more, the modern writers ... call betel in their works tebāl, and say that the Moors give it this name. ...

"O. That the two things are different as I told you is clear, for Avicenna treats them in two different chapters, viz., in 259, which treats of folium indu, and in 707, which treats of tambul ... and the folium indu is called by the Indians Talama-pattra, which the Greeks and Latins corrupted into Malabathrum, &c.—Garcia, f. 55e, 96e"

c. 1590.—"Hoe Tombul seu Sirium, licet vulgarisissimum in India sit folium, distinctum est a Folio Indo seu Malabathro, Arabibus Cadeji Hindi, in Pharmacopoeis, et Indis, Talama-pattra et folio Indo dicto, ... A nostra autem natione intellexi Malabathrnum nihil aliud esse quam folium canellae, seu cinnamoni sylvestris."—Rumphius, v. 387.
MALACCA. 544 MALACCA.

c. 1760.—"... quand l'on considère que les Indiens appellent notre feuille Indienne tamalapatra on croit d'apercevoir que le mot Grec μαλάκαρπος en a été anciennement dérivé."—(Diderot) Encyclopédie, xx. 846.

1837.—(Malatroon) is given in Arabic works of Materia Medica as the Greek of Sāddhaj, and ṭej and tej-pat as the Hindi synonyms. "By the latter names may be obtained everywhere in the bazaars of India, the leaves of Cn. Tamala and of Cn. albiflorum."—Royle, Essay on Anty. of Hindoo Medicine, 85.

MALACCA, n.p. The city which gives its name to the Peninsula and the Straits of Malacca, and which was the seat of a considerable Malay monarchy till its capture by the Portuguese under D'Alboquerque in 1511. One naturally supposes an etymological connection between Malay and Malacca. And such a connection is put forward by De Barros and D'Alboquerque (see below, and also under MALAY). The latter also mentions an alternative suggestion for the origin of the name of the city, which evidently refers to the Ar. malakī, 'a meeting.' This last, though it appears also in the Sījarā Malājī, may be totally rejected. Crawfurd is positive that the place was called from the word malaka, the Malay name of the Phyllanthus emblica, or embic Myrobalan (q.v.), "a tree said to be abundant in that locality"; and this, it will be seen below, is given by Godinho de Eredia as the etymology. Malaka again seems to be a corruption of the Skt. amalaka, from amal, 'acid.' [Mr. Skeat writes: "There can be no doubt that Crawfurd is right, and that the place was named from the tree. The suggested connection between Malayu and Malaka appears impossible to me, and, I think, would do so to any one acquainted with the laws of the language. I have seen the Malaka tree myself and eaten its fruit. Ridley in his Botanical Lists has laka-laka and malaka which he identifies as Phyllanthus emblica. L. and P. pectinatus Hooker (Euphorbiaceae). The two species are hardly distinct, but the latter is the commoner form. The fact is that the place, as is so often the case among the Malays, must have taken its name from the Sungai Malaka, or Malaka River."]

1416.—"There was no King but only a chief, the country belonging to Siam. . . . In the year 1409, the imperial envoy Cheng Ho brought an order from the emperor and gave to the chief two silver seals, . . . he erected a stone and raised the place to a city, after which the land was called the Kingdom of Malacca (Moa-la-ka). . . Tin is found in the mountains. . . . it is cast into small blocks weighing 1 catti 8 taels. . . ten pieces are bound together with rattan and form a small bundle, whilst 40 pieces make a large bundle. In all their trading. . . . they use these pieces of tin instead of money."—Chinese Annals, in Grewedt, p. 123.

1498.—"Melequa . . . is 40 days from Qualecut with a fair wind . . . hence proceeds all the clove, and it is worth there 9 crusados for a bahar (q.v.), and likewise nutmeg other 9 crusados the bahar; and there is much porcelain and much silk, and much tin, of which they make money; but the money is of large size not weighing so that it takes 3 farazalas (see Frazala) of it to make a crusado. Here too are many large parrots all red like fire."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 110-111.

1510.—"When we had arrived at the city of Melacha, we were immediately presented to the Sultan, who is a Moor. . . . I believe that more ships arrive here than in any other place in the world."—Vazhtham, 224.

1511.—"This Paremiça gave the name of Malaca to the new colony, because in the language of Java, when a man of Palimbio flees away they call him Malaya. . . . Others say that it was called Malacca because of the number of people who came there from one part and the other in so short a space of time, for the word Malaca also signifies to meet. . . . Of these two opinions let each one accept that which he thinks to be the best, for this is the truth of the matter."—Commentaries of Alboquerque, E.T. by Birch, iii. 76-77.

1516.—"The said Kingdom of Anyane (see Siam) throws out a great point of land into the sea, which makes there a cape, where the sea returns again towards China to the north; in this promontory is a small kingdom in which there is a large city called Malaca."—Barbosa, 19l.

1538.—"A son of Paramisora called Xa- quem Darza, (i.e. Sikandar Shah) . . . to form the town of Malaca, to which he gave that name; because of the banishment of his father, because in his vernacular tongue (Javanese) this was as much as to say 'banished,' and hence the people are called Malaisos."—De Barros, II. vi. 1.

..."That which he (Alboquerque) regretted most of all that was lost on that vessel, was two lions cast in iron, a first-rate work, and most natural, which the King of China had sent to the King of Malaca, and which King Mahamed had kept, as an honourable possession, at the gate of his Palace, whence Affonso Alboquerque carried them off, as the principal item of his triumph in the capture of the city."—Ibid. II. vii. 1.

"Nem tu menos fugir poderás deste Postoque rica, e postoque assentada Lá no gremio da Aurora, onde nasceste, Opulenta Malaca nomeada! Assettas venenosas, que fizeste, Os cires, com que já te vejo armada, Malais nomarados, Jaoos valentes, Todas farás ao Luso obedientes."
Camões, x. 44.

By Burton:
"Nor shalt thou 'scape the fate to fall his prize, albeit so wealthy, and so strong thy site there on Aurora's bosom, whence thy rise, thou Home of Opulence, Malacca bright! The poysioned arrows which thine art supplies, the Krises thirsting, as I see, for fight, th' enamoured Malay-men, the Javan braves, all of the Lusian shall become the slaves."

1612.—"The Arabs call it Malakat, from collecting all merchants."—Sijara Malayu, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 322.

1613.—"Malaca significa Mirabolancos, fructa de hua arvore, plantada ao longo de hum ribeiro chamado Acerlele."—Godinho de Eredius, t. 4.

MALADOO, s. Chicken maladoo is an article in the Anglo-Indian menu. It looks like a corruption from the French cuisine, but of what? [Maladoo or Manadoo, a lady informs me, is cold meat, such as chicken or mutton, cut into slices, or pounded up and re-cooked in batter. The Port. malhado, 'beaten-up,' has been suggested as a possible origin for the word.]

MALAY, n.p. This is in the Malay language an adjective, Maláyu; thus orang Maláyu, 'a Malay'; bána [banáh] Maláyu, 'the Malay country'; bahasa [bhásá] Maláyu, 'the Malay language.'

In Javanese the word maláyu signifies 'to run away,' and the proper name has traditionally been derived from this in reference to the alleged foundation of Malacca by Javanese fugitives; but we can hardly attach importance to this. It may be worthy at least of consideration whether the name was not of foreign, i.e. of S. Indian origin, and connected with the Maláya of the Peninsula (see under MALABAR). [Mr. Skeat writes: "The tradition given me by Javanese in the Malay States was that the name was applied to Javanese refugees, who peopled the S. of Sumatra. Whatever be the original meaning of the word, it is probable that it started its life-history as a river-name in the S. of Sumatra, and thence became applied to the district through which the river ran, and so to the people who lived there; after which it spread with the Malay dialect until it included not only many allied, but also many foreign, tribes; all Malay-speaking tribes being eventually called Malays without regard to racial origin. A most important passage in this connection is to be found in Leyden's Tr. of the 'Malay Annals' (1821), p. 20, in which direct reference to such a river is made: 'There is a country in the land of Andalás named Paral-embang, which is at present denominated Palembang, the raja of which was denominated Damang Lebar Dawn (chiefstein Broad-leaf), who derived his origin from Raja Sultan (Chulan?), whose great-grandson he was. The name of its river Muartatang, into which falls another river named Sungay Malayu, near the source of which is a mountain named the mountain Sagantang Maha Miru.' Here Palembang is the name of a well-known Sumatran State, often described as the original home of the Malay race. In standard Malay 'Damang Lebar Dawn' would be 'Démang Lebar Dawn.' Raja Chulan is probably some mythical Indian king, the story being evidently derived from Indian traditions. 'Muartatang' may be a mistake for Muar Tenang, which is a place one heard of in the Peninsula, though I do not know for certain where it is. 'Sungey Malayu' simply means 'River Malayu.' 'Sagantang Maha Miru' is, I think, a mistake for Sa-guantang Maha Miru, which is the name used in the Peninsula for the sacred central mountain of the world on which the episode related in the Annals occurred" (see Skeat, Malay Magic, p. 2.)

It is a remarkable circumstance, which has been noted by Crawfurd, that a name which appears on Ptolemy's Tables as on the coast of the Golden Chersonese, and which must be located somewhere about Maulmain, is Malévó Kálov, words which in Javanese (Maláyu-Kalón) would signify 'Malays of the West.' After this the next (possible) occurrence of the name in literature is in the Geography of Edrisi, who describes Malai as a great island in the eastern seas, or rather as occupying the position of the Lemuria of Mr. Selater, for (in partial accommodation to the Ptolemaic theory of the Indian Sea) it stretched eastward nearly from the coast of Zinj, i.e. of Eastern Africa, to the vicinity of China. Thus it must be uncertain without further accounts whether it is an adumbration of the great Malay islands (as is on the whole probable) or of the Island of the Malagashes (Madagascar), if it is either. We then come to Marco Polo, and after him there is, we believe, no mention of the Malay name till the Portuguese entered the seas of the Archipelago.

[A.D. 690. —Mr. Skeat notes: "I Teung speaks of the 'Molo-yu country,' i.e. the district W. or N.W. of Palembang in Sumatra."]

c. 1150. —"The Isle of Malai is very great. . . . The people devote themselves to very profitable trade; and there are found here elephants, rhinoceroses, and various aromatics and spices, such as clove, cinnamon, nard . . . and nutmeg. In the mountains are mines of gold, of excellent quality . . . the people also have windmills." — Edrisi, by Jauberf, i. 945.

c. 1273.—A Chinese notice records under this year that tribute was sent from Siam to the Emperor. "The Siamese had long been at war with the Malay, or Malurh, but both nations laid aside their feud and submitted to China." —Notice by Sir T. Wade, in Dowring's Siam, i. 72.

c. 1292.—"You come to an Island which forms a kingdom, and is called Malaiur. The people have a king of their own, and a peculiar language. The city is a fine and noble one, and there is a great trade carried on there. All kinds of spicery are to be found there." —Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 8.

c. 1539. —". . . as soon as he had delivered to him the letter, it was translated into the Portuguese of the Malayan tongue wherein it was written." —Pinto, E.T. p. 15.

1548.—". . . having made a breach in the wall twelve fathom wide, he assaulted it with 10,000 strangers, Turks, Abyssins, Moors, Malawres, Achems, Jaos, and Malayos." —Ibid. p. 279.

1553.—"And so these Gentiles like the Moors who inhabit the sea-coasts of the Island (Sumatra), although they have each their peculiar language, almost all can speak the Malay of Malacca as being the most general language of those parts." —Barros, II. v. 1.

"Everything with them is to be a gentleman; and this has such prevalence in those parts that you will never find a native Malay, however poor he may be, who will set his hand to lift a thing of his own or anybody else's; every service must be done by slaves." —Ibid. II. vi. 1.

1610.—"I cannot imagine what the Hollanders meane, to suffer these Malaysians, Chinesians, and Moors of these countries, and to assist them in their free trade thorow all the Indies, and forbid it their owne servants, countrymen, and Brethren, upon paine of death and losse of goods." —Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 321.

[Mr. Skeat writes: "The word Malaya is now often applied by English writers to the Peninsula as a whole, and from this the term Malaysia as a term of wider application (i.e. to the Archipelago) has been coined (see quotation of 1610 above). The former is very frequently mis-written by English writers as 'Malay,' a barbarism which has even found place on the title-page of a book—'Travel and Sport in Burma, Siam and Malay, by John Bradley, London, 1876.'"]

MALAYÁLAM. This is the name applied to one of the cultivated Dravidian languages, the closest in its relation to the Tamil. It is spoken along the Malabar coast, on the Western side of the Ghauts (or Maliya mountains), from the Chandragiri River on the North, near Mangalore (entering the sea in 12° 29'), beyond which the language is, for a limited distance, Tulu, and then Canarese, to Trevandum on the South (lat. 8° 29'), where Tamil begins to supersede it. Tamil, however, also intertwines with Malayalam all along Malabar. The term Malayalam properly applies to territory, not language, and might be rendered "Mountain region" [See under MALABAR, and Logan, Man. of Malabar, i. 90.]

MALDIVES, MALDIVE ISLDS., n.p. The proper form of this name appears to be Male-diva; not, as the estimable Garcia de Orta says, Nale-diva; whilst the etymology which he gives is certainly wrong, hard as it may be to say what is the right one. The people of the islands formerly designated themselves and their country by a form of the word for 'island' which we have in the Skt. diva and the Pali dīpa. We find this reflected in the Diva of Ammianus, and in the Diva and Dība-jāt (Pers. plural) of old Arab geographers, whilst it survives in letters of the 18th century addressed to the Ceylon Government (Dutch) by the Sultan of the Isles, who calls his kingdom Divihi Raijé, and his people Divëhe mihun. Something like the modern form first appears in Ibn Batuta. He, it will be seen, in his admirable account of these islands, calls them, as it were, Mahal-dives, and says they were so called from the chief group Mahal, which was the residence of the Sultan, indicating a connection with Mahal, 'a palace.' This form of the name looks like a foreign 'striving after meaning.' But Pyrard de Laval, the author of the most complete account in existence, also says that the name of the islands was taken from Male, that on which the King resided. Bishop Caldwell has suggested that these islands were the dives, or islands, of Male, as Malebran (see MALABAR) was the coast-tract or continent, of Male. It is, however, not impossible that the true etymology was from maldh, 'a garland or necklace,' of which their configuration is highly suggestive. [The Madras Gloss. gives Malayal. mal, 'black,' and dëipa, 'island,' from the dark soil. For a full account of early notices of the Maldives, see Mr. Gray's note on Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 423 seqq.] Milburn (Or. Commer. i. 335) says: "This island was (these islands were) discovered by the Portuguese in 1507." Let us see!

c. 545.—"And round about it (Siëladiba or Teprobane, i.e. Ceylon) there are a number of small islands, in all of which you find fresh water and coco-nuts. And these are almost all set close to one another."— Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clxvii.

851.—"Between this Sea (of Horkand) and the Sea called Lâravi there is a great number of isles; their number, indeed, it is said, amounts to 1,900: ... the distance from island to island is 2, 3, or 4 parasangs.
They are all inhabited, and all produce coco-palms. ... The last of these islands is Serendib, in the Sea of Horkand; it is the chief of all; they give the islands the name of Dibajât" (i.e. Divas).—Relation,

c. 1030.—"The special name of Diva is given to islands which are formed in the sea, and which appear above water in the form of accumulations of sand; these sands continually augment, spread, and unite, till they present a firm aspect ... these islands are divided into two classes, according to the nature of their staple product.
Those of one class are called Diva-Kâ'bah (or the Cowry Divahs), because of the cowries which are gathered from coco-branches planted in the sea. The others are called Divâ-Kanbar, from the word kanbar (see COIR), which is the name of the twine made from coco-fibres, with which vessels are stitched."—Al-Birânî, in Reinaud, Frequens, reckoned among the wonders of the World;

there are some 2000 of them. Groups of a hundred, or not quite so many, of these islands are found clustered into a ring, and each cluster has an entrance like a harbour-mouth, and it is only there that ships can enter. ... Most of the trees that grow on these islands are coco-palms. ... They are divided into regions or groups ... among which are distinguished ... 3° Mañal, the group which gives a name to the whole,
and which is the residence of the Sultans."

isles of Diva-Mahal."—In Not. et Ext.
iv. 429.

1503.—"But Dom Vasco ... said that

And so arriving in the Gulf (golfo) where the storm befell them, all were separated, and that vessel which steered badly, parted company with the fleet, and found itself at one of the first islands of Maldiva, at which they stopped some days enjoying themselves.
For the island abounded in provisions, and the men indulged to excess in eating cocos, and fish, and in drinking bad stagnant water, and in disorders with women; so that many died."—Correa, i. 347.

1563.—"R. Though it be somewhat to interrupt the business in hand,—why is that chain of islands called 'Islands of Maldiva'?
'O. In this matter of the nomenclature of lands and seas and kingdoms, many of our people make great mistakes even in regard to our own lands; how then can you expect that one can give you the rationale of etymologies of names of foreign tongues?
But, nevertheless, will tell you what I have heard say. And that is that the right name is not Maldiva, but Naldives; for nade in Malabar means 'four,' and diva 'island,' so that in the Malabar tongue the name is as much as to say 'Four Isles.' And in the same way we call a certain island that is 12 leagues from Goa Angodia (see ANCHEDIVA), because there are five in the group, and so the name in Malabar means 'Five Isles,' for anáé is 'five.' But these derivations rest on common report, I don't detail them to you as demonstrable facts."—Garcia, Colloquios, t. 11.

c. 1610.—"Ce Royama en leur langage s'appelle Malé-ragée, Royama de Malé, et des autres peuples de l'Inde il s'appelle Malé-divar, et les peuples diués ... L'Isle principale, comme l'on dit, s'appelle Malé qui donne le nom à tout le reste des autres; car le mot Diués signifie vn nombre de petites isles amassées."—Pyrrand de Laval, i, 63, 68, ed. 1679. [Hak. Soc. i, 38, 177.]

1683.—"Mr. Beard sent up his Couries, which he had received from ye Mauldivas, to be put off and passed by Mr. Charnock at Cassumbazar."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 122].

MALUM, s. In a ship with English officers and native crew, the mate is called málum sáthib. The word is Ar. muallím, literally 'the Instructor,' and is properly applied to the pilot or sailing-master. The word may be compared, thus used, with our 'master' in the Navy. In regard to the first quotation we may observe that Nákkhuda (see NACODA) is, rather than Muallím, 'the captain;' though its proper meaning is the owner of the ship; the two capacities of owner and skipper being doubtless often combined. The distinction of Muallím from Nákkhuda accounts for the former title being assigned to the mate.

1497.—"And he sent 20 cruzados in gold, and 20 testoons in silver for the Malemos, who ere the pilots, for of all the coasts we should give each month whatever he (the Sheikh) should direct."—Correa, i. 38 (E.T. by Ld. Stanley of Alderley, 88). On this passage the Translator says: "The word is perhaps the Arabic for an instructor, a word in general use all over Africa." It is curious that his varied experience should have failed to recognise the habitual marine use of the term.

1541.—"Meanwhile he sent three caturas (q.v.) to the Port of the Malems (Porto dos Malemos) in order to get some pilot. In this Port of the Bandel of the Malems the ships of the Moors take pilots when they enter the Straits, and when they return they leave them here again."—Correa, iv. 168.

* This Port was immediately outside the Straits, as appears from the description of Dom João de Castro (1541). "Now turning to the 'Gates' of the Strait, which are the chief object of our description, we remark that here the land of Arabia juts out into the sea, forming a prominent Point, and very prolonged. ... This is the point or promontory which Ptolemy calls Postidém. ... In front of it, a little more than a gunshot off, is an islet called the Ildo dos Roboena; because Roboño in Arab. means a pilot; and the pilots living here go aboard the ships which come from outside, and conduct them."—Roteiro do Mar, &c., 45.

The Island retains its name, and is mentioned as Pilão Island by Capt. Haines in J. R. Geog. Soc., ix. 126. It lies about 14 m. due east of Perim.
mumificat obusin in oculis, et acut visum: quum ex eo fit collyrium et abstergitur humilitatem grossum...

The glossary of Arabic terms by Andreas de Alpago of Belluno, attached to various early editions of Avicenna, gives the following interpretation; "Memirem est radix nodosa, non multum grossa, citrini coloris, sicut curcuma; minor tamen est et subtilior, et asportatur ex Indiis, et apud physicos orientales est valde nota, et usitatur in passionibus oculi."

c. 1200. — "Some maintain that this plant (urāk al-sabāghīn) is the small kūrkuam (curcuma), and others that it is mamīrān."

The curcuma is brought to us from India, and has the same properties as kūrkuam. — Ibn Barther, ii. 186-188.

c. 1550. — "But they have a much greater appreciation of another little root which grows in the mountains of Susceur (i.e. Suchau in Shensi), where the rhubarb grows, and which they call Mamroni-Chini (i.e. Mamīrān-i-Chini). This is extremely dear, and is used in most of their ailments, but especially when the eyes are affected. They grind it on a stone with rose water, and anoint the eyes with it. The result is wonderfully beneficial." — Heijji Mahommed’s Account of Cathay, in Ramusio, ii. f. 15c.

Also the following we borrow from Dozy’s Suppl. aus Dict. Arabes:

1582. — "Mehr haben ihre Krämer kleine würzigein zu verkaufen mamiranī technī genannt, in gehresten der Augen, wie sie fürgeben ganz dienlich; dieselb sind geblich wie die Curcuma umb ein zimlich lenger, auch dünner und knopfet das solche unseren weiss wurtzten sehr dienlich, und wofür die rechte mamiran mögen gehalten werden, dessen sanderlicher Rhaes an mehr orten gedencket." — Rawolf, Agentliche Beschreibung der Reizes, 126.

c. 1665. — "These caravans brought back Musk, Chines-mood, Rubarb, and Mamiron, which last is a small root exceeding good for ill eyes." — Bernier, E.T. 130; [ed. Constable, 426].

1826. — "I now proceed to the Maamul-dar, or farmer of the district."
— Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, f. 42.

MAMOOL, s.; MAMOOLEE, adj. Custom, Customary. — H. ma’mul. The literal meaning is ‘practised,’ and then ‘established, customary.’ Ma’mul is, in short, ‘precedent,’ by which all Orientals set as much store as English lawyers, e.g. “And Laban said, It must not so be done in our country (lit. It is not so done in our place) to give the younger before the firstborn.” — Genesis xxix. 26.

MAMOOTY, MOMOTY, MOMATY, s. A digging tool of the form usual all over India, i.e. not in the shape of a spade, but in that of a hoe, with the helve at an acute angle with the blade. [See FOWRA.] The word is of S. Indian origin, Tamil maavettī, ‘earth-cutter;’ and its vernacular use is confined to the Tamil regions, but it has long been an established term in the list of ordnance stores all over India, and thus has a certain prevalence in Anglo-Indian use beyond these limits.

1782. — "He marched... with two battalions of sepoys... who were ordered to make a show of entrechancing themselves with mamuties..." — Letter of Id. Muwartney, in Forrest, Selections, iii. 855.

1852. — "... by means of a momety or hatchet, which he ran and borrowed from a husbandman... this fellow dug... a reservoir."
— Neate, Narrative of Residence in Siam, 138.

MANCHUA, s. A large cargo-boat, with a single mast and a square sail, much used on the Malabar coast. This is the Portuguese form; the original Malayalam word is manjī, [manchi, Skt. mancha, ‘a cot,’ so called apparently from its raised platform for cargo,] and nowadays a nearer approach to this, manjee, &c., is usual.

c. 1512. — "So he made ready two manchusas, and one night got into the house of the King, and stole from him the most beautiful woman that he had, and, along with her, jewels and a quantity of money."
—Correa, i. 281.

c. 1610.—"Il a une petite Galiote, qu'ils appellent Manchoëz, fort bien couverte . . . et fort bateau ou neuf hommes seulement pour la manœuvre."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 26 ; [Hak. Soc. ii. 42].

MANDARE, s. Port. mandador, 'one who commands.'

1673.—"Each of which Tribes have a Mandador or Superintendent."—Fryer, 67.

1861.—"Next morning the son of my friendly host accompanied me to the Mandalay Hill, on which there stands a gilt chapel of the image of Shwesayatta, pointing down with outstretched finger to the Palace of Mandalay, interpreted as the divine command there to build a city . . . on the other side where the hill falls in an abrupt precipice, sits a gigantic Buddha gazing in motionless meditation on the mountains opposite. There are here some caves in the hard rock, built up with bricks and whitewashed, which are inhabited by eremites. . . ."—Bastian's Travels (German), ii. 89-90.

MANDARIN, s. Port. Mandarí, Mandarin. Wedgwood explains and derives the word thus: "A Chinese officer, a name first made known to us by the Portuguese, and like the Indian caste, erroneously supposed to be a native term. From Portuguese mandar, to hold authority, command, govern, &c." So also T. Hyde in the quotation below. Except as regards the word having been first made known to us by the Portuguese, this is an old and persistent mistake. What sort of form would mandarí be as a derivative from mandar? The Portuguese might have applied to Eastern officials some such word as mandador, which a preceding article (see MANDARE) shows that they did apply in certain cases. But the parallel to the assumed origin of mandarin from mandar would be that English voyagers on visiting China, or some other country in the far East, should have invented, as a title for the officials of that country, a new and abnormal derivation from 'order,' and called them orderumbos.

The word is really a slight corruption of Hind. (from Skt.) mantri, 'a counsellor, a Minister of State,' for which it was indeed the proper old pre-Mahommedan term in India. It has been adopted, and specially affected in various Indo-Chinese countries, and particularly by the Malays, among whom it is habitually applied to the highest class of public officers (see Crawford's Malay Dict. s.v. [and Klinkert, who writes manteri, colloquially mentri]). Yet Crawford himself, strange to say, adopts the current explanation as from the Portuguese (see J. Ind. Archip. iv. 189). [Klinkert adopts the Skt. derivation.] It is, no doubt, probable that the instinctive "striving after meaning" may have shaped the corruption of mantri into a semblance of mandar. Marsden is still more oddly perverse, videns melhoria, deteriora secundus, when he says: "The officers next in rank to the Sultan are Mantree, which some apprehend to be a corruption of the word Mandarin, a title of distinction among the Chinese" (H. of Sumatra, 2nd ed. 285). Ritter adopts the etymology from mandar, apparently after A. W. Schlegel.* The true etymon is pointed out in Notes and Queries in China and Japan, iii. 12, and by one of the present writers in Ocean Highways for Sept. 1872, p. 186. Several of the quotations below will show that the earlier applications of the title have no reference to China at all, but to officers of state, not only in the Malay countries, but in Continental India. We may add that mantri (see MUN TREE) is still much in vogue among the less barbarous Hill Races on the Eastern frontier of Bengal (e.g. among the Kasius (see COSSYA) as a denomination for their petty dignitaries under the chief. Gibbon was perhaps aware of the true origin of mandarin; see below.

MANDARIN LANGUAGE. s.
The language spoken by the official and literary class in China, as opposed to local dialects. In Chinese it is called Kuan-Hua. It is substantially the language of the people of the northern and middle zones of China, extending to Yun-nan. It is not to be confounded with the literary style which is used in books. [See Ball, Things Chinese, 169 seq.]

1674.—“The Language... is called Quênhra (hwa), or the Language of Mandarines, because as they spread their command they introduced it, and it is used throughout all the Empire, as Latin in Europe. It is very barren, and as it has more Letters far than any other, so it has fewer words.”—Pare y Sôusa, E.T. ii. 468.

MANGALORE, n.p. The only place now well known by this name is (a) Mangal-ur, a port on the coast of Southern Canara and chief town of that district, in lat. 12° 51’ N. In Mir Husain Ali’s Life of Hadair it is called “Gorial Bunder,” perhaps a corroboration of Kandîl or Kandîl, which is said in the Imp. Gaz. to be the modern native name. [There is a place called Gurupura close by; see Madras Gloss. s.v. Goorpoor.] The name in this form is found in an inscription of the 11th century, whatever may have been its original form and etymology. [The present name is said to be taken from the temple of Mangalâ Devi.] But the name in approximate forms (from maîgalâ, ‘gladness’) is common in India. One other port (b) on the coast of Peninsular Guzerat was formerly well known, now commonly called Mungrole. And another place of the name (c) Mangalâvar in the valley of Swat, north of Peshâwar, is mentioned by Hwen Tsang as a city of Gandhâra. It is probably the same that appears in Skt. literature (see Willams, s.v. Mangalâ) as the capital of Udyâna.

1858.—"Mangiel se retrouve dans Manglavor (in Sanskrit Mangala-poura)...ville situite pres de la riviere moyen de la riviere de Svat, et qui a ete longtemps, au rapport des indigenes, la capitale du pays." —Vivien de St. Martin, Ibid. iii, 314-315.

MANGELIN, s. A small weight, corresponding in a general way to a carat (q.v.), used in the S. of India and in Ceylon for weighing precious stones. The word is Telegu manjâdi; in Tamil manjâdi, [from Skt. manju, "beautiful"]; the seed of the Aden-anthera pavonina (Compare Ruttee). On the origin of this weight see Sir W. Elliot's Coins of S. India. The manjâdi seed was used as a measure of weight from very early times. A parcel of 50 taken at random gave an average weight of 4·13 grs. Three parcels of 10 each, selected by eye as large, gave average 5·02 and 5·03 (op. cit. p. 47).

1516.—Diamonds...sell by a weight which is called a Mangiar, which is equal to 2 tare and 3, and 2 tare make a carat of good weight, and 4 tare weigh one fanam." —Barbosa, in Ramusio, i. f. 321v.

1554.—(In Ceylon) "A calanwa contains 20 mangelins, each mangelin 8 grains of rice; a Portuguese of gold weighs 8 calamjas and 2 mangelins." —A. Nunez, 35.

1584.—"There is another sort of weight called Mangialino, which is 5 grains of Venice weight, and therewith they weigh diamonds and other jewels." —Barret, in Hokl. ii. 409.

1665.—"Le poids principal des Diamants est le mangelin; il pese cinq grains et trois cinquemes."—Thevexot, v. 293.

1675.—"At the mine of Ractoonda they weigh by Mangelin, a Mangelin being one Carat and three quarters, that is 7 grains.

7 At the Mine of Soumelpore in Bengal they weigh by Rat's (see Ruttee), and the Rati is 3 of a Carat, or 31 grains. In the Kingdoms of Golconda and Vizagapatam, they make use of Mangelins, but a Mangelin in those parts is not above 1 carat and 3. The Portugues in Goa make use of the same Weights in Goa; but a Mangelin there is not above 5 grains."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 141; [ed. Bell, ii. 87, and see ii. 433.]

MANGO, s. The royal fruit of the Mangifera indica, when of good quality is one of the richest and best fruits in the world. The original of the word is Tamil mân-kây or mân-gây, i.e. mân fruit (the tree being mûmarum, 'mân-tree'). The Portuguese formed from this mango, which we have adopted as mango. The tree is wild in the forests of various parts of India; but the fruit of the wild tree is uneating.

The word has sometimes been supposed to be Malay; but it was in fact introduced into the Archipelago, along with the fruit itself, from S. India. Rumphius (Herb. Ambony, i. 95) traces its then recent introduction into the islands, and says that it is called (Malaiê) "mankya, vel vulgo Mango et Mapelaam." This last word is only the Tamil Mâpâlam, i.e. 'mân fruit' again. The close approximation of the Malay manjka to the Portugeuse form might suggest that the latter name was derived from Malaccia. But we see manga already used by Varthema, who, according to Garcia, never really went beyond Malabar. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The modern standard Malay word is mangga, from which the Port. form was probably taken. The other Malayan form quoted from Rumphius is in standard Malay mapelam, with mepelam, kemepelam, ampelem, and pepelam or 'plam as variants. The Javanese is pelam."]

The word has been taken to Madagascar, apparently by the Malayan colonists, whose language has left so large an impression there, in the precise shape mangka. Had the fruit been an Arab importation it is improbable that the name would have been introduced in that form.

The N. Indian names are Am and Amba, and variations of these we find in several of the older European writers. Thus Fr. Jordanus, who had been in the Konkan, and appreciated the progenitors of the Goa and Bombay Mango (c. 1328), calls the fruit Aniba. Some 30 years later John de' Marignolli calls the tree "amburan, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach" (Catthay, &c., ii. 362). Garcia de Orta shows how early the Bombay fruit was prized. He seems to have been the owner of the parent tree. The Skt. name is Awrara, and this we find in Hwen T'sang (c. 645) phoneticised as 'An-mo-lo.

The mango is probably the fruit alluded to by Theophrastus as having caused dysentery in the army of Alexander. (See the passage s.v. JACK).

c. 1328.—"Est etiam alia arbor quae fructus facit ad modum pruni, grossissimos, qui vocantur Aniba. Hi sunt fructus ita dulces et amables, quod ore tenus exprimi hoc minimè possit."—Fr. Jordannes, in Rec. de Voyages, &c., iv. 42.

c. 1334.—"The mango tree (ambra) resembles an orange-tree, but is larger and more leafy; no other tree gives so much shade, but this shade is unwholesome, and whoever sleeps under it gets fever."— Ibn Battuta, iii. 125. At ii. 185 he writes ambra. [The same charge is made against the tamarind; see Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 81.]

c. 1349.—"They have also another tree called Anburen, having a fruit of excellent fragrance and flavour, somewhat like a peach."—John de' Marignolli, in Cathay, &c., 362.

1510.—"Another fruit is also found here, which is called Amba, the stem of which is called Mango," &c.—Varthemone, 160-161.

c. 1526.—"Of the vegetable productions peculiar to Hindustan one is the mango (ambhen). . . . Such mangoes as are good are excellent. . . ." &c.—Biber, 324.

1563.—"O. Boy! go and see what two vessels those are coming in—you see them from the varanda here—and they seem but small ones.

"Servant. I will bring you word presently. . . ."

"S. Sir! it is Simon Toscano, your tenant in Bombay, and he brings this hamper of mangoes for you to make a present to the Governor, and says that when he has moored the boat he will come here to stop.

"O. He couldn't have come more à propos. I have a mango-tree (mangueira) in that island of mine which is remarkable for both its two crops, one at this time of year, the other at the end of May, and much as the other crop excels this in quality for fragrance and flavour, this is just as remarkable for coming out of season. But come, let us taste them before His Excellency. Boy! take out six mangoes."—Garcia, ff. 134r, 135. This author also mentions that the mangoes of Ormuz were the most celebrated; also certain mangoes of Guzerat, not large, but of surpassing fragrance and flavour, and having a very small stone. Those of Balaghat were both excellent and big; the Doctor had seen two that weighed 4 arrelot and a half (41 lbs.); and those of Bengal, Pegu, and Malacca were also good.

[1569.—"There is much fruit that comes from Arabia and Persia, which they call mangoes (mangas), which is very good fruit."
—Cronica dos Reys Dormus, translated from the Arabic in 1569.]

c. 1590.—"The Mango (Amba). . . . This fruit is unrivalled in colour, smell, and taste; and some of the gourmands of Tiran and Iran place it above musk melons and grapes. . . . If a half-ripe mango, together with its stalk to a length of about two fingers, be taken from the tree, and the broken end of its stalk be closed with warm wax, and kept in butter or honey, the fruit will retain its taste for two or three months."—Atin, ed. Blockmann, i. 67-68.

"There is another very liquierous fruit called Amangues growing on trees, and it is as bigge as a great quinne, with a very great stone in it."—De Montfort, 20.

1622.—P. della Valle describes the tree and fruit at Minâ (Minao) near Hormuz, under the name of Amba, as an exotic introduced from India. Afterwards at Goa he speaks of it as "manga or amba."—[See p. 181-182, & 681; [Hak. Soc. i. 40].

[1668.—"Ambas, or Mangues, are in season during two months in summer, and are plentiful and cheap; but those grown at Delhi are indifferent. The best come from Bengale, Golkonda, and Goa, and these are indeed excellent. I do not know any sweet-meat more agreeable."—Bennier, ed. Constable, 249.]

1673.—Of the Goa Mango,* Fryer says justly: "When ripe, the Apples of the Hesperides are but Fables to them; for Taste, the Nectarine, Peach, and Apricot fall short. . . ."—p. 182.

1679.—"Mango and saio (see SOY), two sorts of sauces brought from the East Indies."—Lodge's Journal, in Ed. King's Life, 1820, i. 249.

* The excellence of the Goa Mangoes is stated to be due to the care and skill of the Jeunitits (Annales Martinimos, ii. 270). In S. India all good kinds have Portuguese or Mahomedan names. The author of Tribes on My Frontier, 1888, p. 148, mentions the luscious perie and the delicate afos as two fine varieties, supposed to bear the names of a certain Peres and a certain Afonso.
MANGO-TRICK.

1727.—"The Goa mango is reckoned the largest and most delicious to the taste of any in the world, and I may add, the wholesomest and best tasted of any Fruit in the World."—A. Hamilton, i. 255, [ed. 1744, i. 258].

1889.—"... the unsophisticated rye... conceives that cultivation could only emasculate the pronounced flavour and firm fibrous texture of that prince of fruits, the wild mango, likest a ball of tow soaked in turpentine."—Tribes on My Frontier, 149.

The name has been carried with the fruit to Mauritius and the West Indies. Among many greater services to India the late Sir Proby Cautley diffused largely in Upper India the delicious fruit of the Bombay mango, previously rare there, by creating and encouraging groves of grafts on the banks of the Ganges and Jumna canals. It is especially true of this fruit (as Sultan Baber indicates) that excellence depends on the variety. The common mango is coarse and strong of turpentine. Of this only an evanescent suggestion remains to give peculiarity to the finer varieties. [A useful account of these varieties, by Mr. Maries, will be found in Watt, Econ. Dict. v. 148 seqq.]

MANGO-BIRD. s. The popular Anglo-Indian name of the beautiful golden oriole (Oriolus aureus, Jerdon). Its "loud mellow whistle" from the mango-groves and other gardens, which it affects, is associated in Upper India with the invasion of the hot weather.

1878.—"The mango-bird glances through the groves, and in the early morning announces his beautiful but unwelcome presence with his merle melody."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 59.

MANGO-FISH. s. The familiar name of an excellent fish (Polynemus Visua of Buchanan, P. paradissus of Day), in flavour somewhat resembling the smelt, but, according to Dr. Mason, nearly related to the mullets. It appears in the Calcutta market early in the hot season, and is much prized, especially when in roe. The Hindu-stani name is topsi or tapussi, 'an ascetic,' or 'penitent,' but we do not know the rationale of the name. Buchanan says that it is owing to the long fibres (or free rays), proceeding from near the head, which lead the natives to associate it with penitents who are forbidden to shave. [Dr. Grierson writes: "What the connection of the fish with a hermit was I never could ascertain, unless it was that like wandering Fakirs, they disappear directly the rains begin. Compare the uposatha of the Buddhists." But tapasya means 'produced by heat,' and is applied to the month Phagun (Feb.-March) when the fish appears; and this may be the origin of the name.]

1781.—"The Board of Trustees Assemble on Tuesday at the New Tavern, where the Committee meet to eat Mangoe Fish for the benefit of the Subscribers and on other special affairs."—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, March 3.

[1820.—"... the mango fish (so named from its appearing during the mango season). ... By the natives they are named the Topussi or Tapussi (ascetic) fish, (abbreviated by Europeans to Tippu) from their resembling a class of religious penitents, who ought never to shave."—Hamilton, Des. of Hindostan, i. 58.]

MANGO-SHOWERS. s. Used in Madras for showers which fall in March and April, when the mangos begin to ripen.

MANGO-TRICK. One of the most famous tricks of Indian jugglers, in which they plant a mango-stone, and show at brief intervals the tree shooting above ground, and successively producing leaves, flowers, and fruit. It has often been described, but the description given by the Emperor Jahangir in his Autobiography certainly surpasses all in its demand on our belief.

c. 1610.—"... Khaun-e-Jehaun, one of the nobles present, observed that if they spoke truly he should wish them to produce for his conviction a mulberry-tree. The men arose without hesitation, and having in ten separate spots set some seed in the ground, they recited among themselves... when instantly a plant was seen springing from each of the ten places, and each proved the tree required by Khaun-e-Jehaun. In the same manner they produced a mango, an apple-tree, a cypress, a pine-apple, a fig-tree, an almond, a walnut... open to the observation of all present, the trees were perceived gradually and slowly springing from the earth, to the height of one or perhaps of two cubits... Then making a sort of procession round the trees as they stood... in a moment there appeared on the respective trees a sweet mango without the rind, an almond fresh and ripe, a large fig of the most delicious kind... the fruit being pulled in my presence, and every one present was allowed to taste it. This, how-over, was not all; before the trees were removed there appeared among the foliage birds of such surpassing beauty, in colour and shape, and melody and song, as the world never saw before. . . . At the close of the operation, the foliage, as in autumn, was seen to put on its variegated tiuts, and the trees gradually disappeared into the earth. . . . —Mem. of the Emp. Jehanqui-er,

tr. by Major D. Price, pp. 96-97.

c. 1650.—"Then they thrust a piece of stick into the ground, and asked the Company what Fruit they would have. One told them he would have Mangues; then one of the Montebanks hiding himself in the middle of a Sheet, stoop to the ground five or six times one after another. I was so curious to go upstairs, and look out of a window, to see if I could spy what the Montebank did, and perceived that after he had cut himself under the armpits with a Razor, he rub'd the stick with his Blood.
After the two first times that he rais'd himself, the stick seemed up to the very eye to grow. The third time there sprung out branches with young buds. The fourth time the tree was covered with leaves; and the fifth time it bore flowers. . . . The English Minister protested that he could not give his consent that any Christian should be Spectator of such delusions. So that as soon as he saw that these Mountebanks had of a dry stick, in less than half-hour, made a Tree four or five foot high, that bare leaves and flowers as in the Spring-time: he went about to break it, protesting that he would not give the Communion to any person that should stay any longer to see those things."—Tavernier, Travels made English, by J.P., ii. 36; [ed.
Ball, i. 67, seq.].

1667.—"When two of these Jaquins (see JOGEE) that are eminent, do meet, and you stir them upon the point and power of their knowledge or Jaquism, you shall see them do such tricks out of sight of one another, that I know not if Susum Magis could have outdone them. For they divine what one thinketh, make the Branch of a Tree blossome and bear fruit in less than an hour, hatch eggs in their bosome in less than half a quarter of an hour, and bring forth such birds as you demand: . . . I mean, if what is said of them is true. . . .
For, as for me, I am with all my curiosity not a Happy Man, that are present at,
and see these great feats."—Bernier,
E.T. 103; [ed. Constable, 321].

1673.—"Others presented a Mock-Creation of a Mango-Tree, arising from the Stone in a short space (which they did in Hugger-Mugger, being very careful to avoid being discovered) with Fruit Green and Ripe; so that a Man must stretch his Fancy, to imagine it Witchcraft; though the common Sort think no less."—Fryer, 192.

1690.—"Others are said to raise a Mango-Tree, with ripe Fruit upon its Branches, in the space of one or two Hours. To confirm which Relation, it was affirmed confidently to me, that a Gentleman who had pluckt one of these Mangoes, fell sick upon it, and was never well as long as he kept it till he consulted a Brugs, for his Health, who prescrib'd his only Remedy would be the restoring of the Mango, by which he was restor'd to his Health again."—Ovington, 258-259.

1726.—"They have some also who will show you the kernel of a mango-fruit, or may be only a twig, and ask if you will see the fruit or this stick planted, and in a short time see a tree grow from it and bear fruit:
after they have got their answer the jugglers (Koordo-donner) wrap themselves in a blanket, stick the twig into the ground, and then put a basket over them (Kc. &c.).

"There are some who have prevailed on these jugglers by much money to let them see how they have accomplished this.

"These have revealed that the jugglers made a hole in their bodies under the armp-its, and rubbed the twig with the blood from it, and every time that they stuck it in the ground they would do it, and in this way they clearly saw it to grow and come to the perfection before described.

"This is asserted by a certain writer who has seen it. But this can't move me to believe it!"—Valentijn, v. (Chorom.) 53.

Our own experience does not go beyond Dr. Fryer's, and the huggermugger performance that he disparages.
But many others have testified to more remarkable skill. We once heard a traveller of note relate with much spirit such an exhibition as witnessed in the Deccan. The narrator, then a young officer, determined with a comrade, at all hazards of fair play or foul, to solve the mystery. In the middle of the trick one suddenly seized the conjuror, whilst the other uncovered and snatched at the mango-plant. But lo! it came from the earth with a root, and the mystery was darker than ever! We tell the tale as it was told.

It would seem that the trick was not unknown in European conjuring of the 16th or 17th centuries, e.g.

MANGOSTEEN, s. From Malay mangusta (Crawfurd), or manggdian (Favre), in Javanese Manggis. [Mr. Skeat writes: "The modern standard Malay form used in the W. coast of the Peninsula is manggis, as in Javanese, the forms manggusta and manggdian never being heard there." The Siamese form maangkhut given in M'Farland's Siamese Grammar is probably from the Malay mangostana. It was very interesting to me to find that some distinct trace of this word was still preserved in the name of this fruit at Patani-Kelantan on the E. coast, where it was called hawch 'seta (or 'setar'), i.e. the 'setar fruit,' as well as occasionally mesetar or mesetar, clearly a corruption of some such old form as manggistar."

This delicious fruit is known throughout the Archipelago, and in Siam, by modifications of the same name; the delicious fruit of the Garcinia Mangostana (Nat. Ord. Gutiferae). It is strictly a tropical fruit, and, in fact, near the coast does not bear fruit further north than lat. 14°. It is a native of the Malay Peninsula and the adjoining islands.

1563.—"R. They have bragged much to me of a fruit which they call mangostana; let us hear what you have to say of these.

"O. What I have heard of the mangostan is that 'tis one of the most delicious fruits that they have in these regions. . . ."

—Garcia, f. 151v.

1598.—"There are yet other fruits, as . . . Mangostaine [in Hak. Soc. Mange-stains] . . . but because they are of small account I think it not requisite to write severally of them."—Linschoten, 96; [Hak. Soc. ii. 31].

1631.—

"Cedant Hesperii longe hinc, mala aurea, fructus, Ambrosia pascit Mangostan et nectare

divis——

... Inter omnes Indicar fructus longe sapidissimus."

1645.—"Il s'y trouve de plus vne especie de fruit propre du terroir de Malague, qu'ils nomment Mangostans.—Cardin, Ret. de la Prov. de Japon, 162.

[1682.—"The Mangosthan is a Fruit growing by the Highways in Java, upon bushes, like our Sloes."—Mandelslo, tr. Davies, Bk. ii. 121 (Stanz. Diet.).]

1727.—"The Mangostane is a delicious Fruit, almost in the Shape of an Apple, The Skin is thick and red, being dried it is a good Astringent. The Kernels (if I may so call them) are like Cloves of Garlic, of a very agreeable Taste, but very cold."—J. Hamilton, ii. 80 [ed. 1744].

MANGROVE, s. The sea-loving genera Rhizophora and Avicennia derive this name, which applies to both, from some happy accident, but from which of two sources may be doubtful. For while the former genus is, according to Crawfurd, called by the Malays mangi-manggi, a term which he supposes to be the origin of the English name, we see from Oviedo that one or other was called mangle in S. America, and in this, which is certainly the origin of the French mangle, we should be disposed also to seek the derivation of the English word. Both genera are universal in the tropical tidal estuaries of both Old World and New. Prof. Sayce, by an amusing slip, or oversight probably of somebody else's slip, quotes from Humboldt that "maize, mangle, hammock, canoe, tobacco, are all derived through the medium of the Spanish from the Haytian mahez, mangle, hamaca, canoa, and tabaco." It is, of course, the French and not the English mangle that is here in question. [Mr. Skeat observes: "I believe the old English as well as French form was mangle, in which case Prof. Sayce would be perfectly right. Mangrove is probably mangle-grove. The Malay manggi-manggi is given by Klinkert, and is certainly on account of the reduplication, native. But I never heard it in the Peninsula, where mangrove is always called *bakau." *]

The mangrove abounds on nearly all the coasts of further India, and also on the sea margin of the Ganges Delta, in the backwaters of S. Malabar, and less luxuriantly on the Indus mouths.

1555.—"Of the Tree called Mangle. . . . These trees grow in places of mire, and on the shores of the sea, and of the rivers, and streams, and torrents that run into the sea. They are trees very strange to see . . . they grow together in vast numbers, and many of their branches seem to turn down and change into roots . . . and these plant themselves in the ground like stems, so that the tree looks as if it had many legs joining one to the other."—Oviedo, in Ramases, iii. f. 146v.

"So coming to the coast, embarked in a great Canoa with some 30 Indians, and 5 Christians, whom he took with him, and coasted along amid solitary places and islets, passing sometimes into the sea itself for 4 or 5 leagues,—among certain trees, lofty, dense and green, which grow in the very sea-water, and which they call mangle."

—*Ib. ib. f. 224.

1555.—". . . by advice of a Moorish pilot, who promised to take the people by night to a place where water could be got . . . and either because the Moor desired to land many times on the shore by which he was conducting them, seeking to get away from the hands of those whom he was conducting, or because he was—" really perplexed by its being night, and in the middle of a great growth of mangrove (mangues) he never succeeded in finding the wells of which he spoke."—Barros, 1. iv. 4.

c. 1830.—"'Smite my timbers, do the trees bear shellfish?' The tide in the Gulf of Mexico does not ebb and flow above two feet except in the springs, and the ends of the drooping branches of the mangrove trees that here cover the shore, are clustered, within the wash of the water, with a small well-flavoured oyster."—Tom Cringle, ed. 1865, 119.

MANILLA-MAN. s. This term is applied to natives of the Philippines, who are often employed on shipboard, and especially furnish the quarter-masters (Seacunny, q.v.) in Lascar crews on the China voyage. But Manilla-man seems also, from Wilson, to be used in S. India as a hybrid from Telug. manelát vàdu, 'an itinerant dealer in coral and gems'; perhaps in this sense, as he says, from Skt. manjá, 'a jewel,' but with some blending also of the Port. manila, 'a bracelet.' (Compare COBRA-MANILLA.)

MANJEE. s. The master, or steersman, of a boat or any native river-craft; Hind. manjá, Beng. mají and majhí, [all from Skt. madhýa, 'one who stands in the middle']. The word is also a title borne by the head men among the Paharis or Hill-people of Rájmahal (Wilson), [and as equivalent for Majhuár, the name of an important Dravidian tribe on the borders of the N.W. Provinces and Chota Nagpaur].

1883.—"'We were forced to track our boat till 4 in the Afternoon, when we saw a great black cloud arise out of ye North with much lightning and thunder, which made our Manjee or Steerman advise us to fasten our boat in some Creek.'—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 88.

1781.—"This is to give notice that the principal Gaut Mangies of Calcutta have entered into engagements at the Police Office to supply all Persons that apply there with Boats and Budgerows, and to give security for the Handica."—India Gazette, Feb. 17.

1784.—"Mr. Austin and his head bearer, who were both in the room of the budgerow, are the only persons known to be drowned. The Manjee and dandees have not appeared."—In Seton-Karr, i. 25.

1810.—"Their Manjies will not fail to take every advantage of whatever distress, or difficulty, the passenger may labour under."—Williamson, V. M. i. 148.

[1864.—"The Khond chiefs of villages and Mootas are termed Mají instead of Mulliko as in Goomsur, or Khonro as in Boad. . . ."—Campbell, Wild Tribes of Khondistan, 120.]

MANNICKJORE. s. Hind. mañikjóraj; the white-necked stork (Ciconia leucocephala, Gmelin); sometimes, according to Jerdon, called in Bengal the 'Beef-steak bird,' because palatable when cooked in that fashion. "The name of Manikjor means the companion of Manik, a Saint, and some Mussulmans in consequence abstain from eating it." (Jerdon). [Platts derives it from mánik, 'a ruby'.]

MANUCODIATA. (See BIRD OF PARADISE.)

MARAMUT, MURRUMUT. s. Hind. from Ar. maramma(t), 'repair.' In this sense the use is general in Hindustani (in which the terminal t is always pronounced, though not by the Arabs), whether as applied to a stocking, a fortress, or a ship. But in Madras Presidency the word had formerly a very specialised sense as the recognised title of that branch of the Executive which included the conservation of irrigation tanks and the like, and which was worked under the District Civil Officers, there being then no separate department of the State in charge of Civil Public Works. It is a curious illustration of the wide spread at one time of Musulman power that the same Arabic word, in the form Marama, is still applied in Sicily to a standing committee charged with repairs to the Duomo or Cathedral of Palermo. An analogous instance of the wide grasp of the Saracenic power is mentioned by one of the Muslim authors whom Amari quotes in his History of the Mahommedan rule in Sicily. It is that the Caliph Al-Mámūn, under whom conquest was advancing in India and in Sicily simultaneously, ordered that the idols taken from the infidels in India should be sent for sale to the infidels in Sicily!

mutty men, or pioneers to clear the road."—Ives, 156.

stituted under the Collector."—Bowd./l., Man.

MARGOSA, s. A name in the S. of India and Ceylon for the Nim (see NEEM) tree. The word is a corruption of Port. amargosa, 'bitter,' indicating the character of the tree. This gives rise to an old Indian proverb, traceable as far back as the Jatakas, that you cannot sweeten the nim tree though you water it with syrup and ghee (Naturam expellas furoc, &c.).

1727.—"The wealth of an evil man shall another evil man take from him, just as the crows come and eat the fruit of the margoise tree as soon as it is ripe."—Apophthegms translated in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon) 390.

1782.—"... ils lavent le malade avec de l'eau froide, ensuite ils le frottent rude-ment avec de la feuille de Margosier."—Sonnerat, i. 208.

1834.—"Adjacent to the Church stand a number of tamarind and margosa trees."—Chitty, Ceylon Gazetteer, 183.

MARKHORE, s. Pers. mahr-khor, 'snake-eater.' A fine wild goat of the Western Himalaya; Capra megaceros, Hutton.

[1851.—"Hence the people of the country call it the Markhor (eater of serpents)."—Edwards, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 474.

1885.—"Never more would he chase the ibex and makor."—Mrs. Croker, Village Tales, 112.]

MARTABAN, n.p. This is the conventional name, long used by all the trading nations, Asiatic and European, for a port on the east of the Irrawadi Delta and of the Sitang estuary, formerly of great trade, but now in comparative decay. The original name is Talaning, Mal-ta-man, the meaning of which we have been unable to ascertain.

1545.—"At the end of these two days the King... caused the Captains that were at the Guard of the Gates to leave them and retire; whereupon the miserable City of Martabano was delivered to the mercy of the Souldiers... and therein showed themselves so cruel-minded, that the thing they made least reckoning of was to kill 100 men for a crown."—Pinto, in Cogan, 203.

1553.—"And the towns which stand outside this gulf of the Isles of Pegu (of which we have spoken) and are placed along the coast of that country, are Vagara, Martaban, a city notable in the great trade that it enjoys, and further on Rey, Talaga, and Tavy."—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1568.—"Trovassimo nella città di Mart-aunan intorno a monunata Portoghese, tra mercadanti e huomini vagabondi, li quali stauano in gran differenza co' Rettori della città."—Ces. Federici, in Romanio, iii. 393.

1586.—"The city of Martaban hath its front to the south-east, south, and southwest, and stands on a river which there enters the sea... it is a city of Manuparagia, a Prince of the King of Pegu's."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 129v, 130v.

1680.—"That the English may settle factotums at Serian, Pegu, and Ava... and alsose that they may settle a factoty in like manner at Mortavan..."—Articles to be proposed to the King of Barma and Pegu in Notes and Eects, No. iii. p. 8.

1695.—"Concerning Bartholomew Rodrigues... I am informed and do believe he put into Mortavan for want of wood and water, and was there seized by the King's officers, because not bound to that Place."—Governor Higgison, in Dalrymple, Or. Repert. ii. 342-3.

MARTABAN, s. This name was given to vessels of a peculiar pottery, of very large size, and glazed, which were famous all over the East for many centuries, and were exported from Martaban. They were sometimes called Pegu jars, and under that name specimens were shown at the Great Exhibition of 1851. We have not been able to obtain recent information on the subject of this manufacture. The word appears to be now obsolete in India, except as a colloquial term in Telegu. [The word is certainly not obsolete in Upper India: "The martabun" (Plate ii. fig. 10) is a small deep jar with an elongated body, which is used by Hindus and Muhammadans to keep pickles and acid articles" (Hallif-fax, Mono. of Punjab Pottery, p. 9). In the endeavour to supply a Hindi derivation it has been derived from im-rita-bain, 'the holder of the water of immortality.' In the Arabian Nights the word appears in the form bartaman, and is used for a crock in which gold is buried. (Burton, xi. 26). Mr. Bell saw some large earthenware jars at Malé, some about 2 feet high, called rumba; others larger and barrel-shaped, called mataban. (Pyrard, Hak. Soc. i. 259.) For the modern manufacture, see Scott, Gazetteer of Upper Burma, 1900, Pt. i. vol. ii. 399 seq.)

c. 1350.—"Then the Princess made me a present consisting of dresses, of two elephant-loads of rice, of two she-buffaloes, ten sheep, four rolls of cordial syrup, and four Matabans, or huge jars, filled with pepper, citron, and mango, all prepared with salt, as for a sea-voyage."—Bun Batuta, iv. 253.

(†).—"Un grand bassin de Martabani."—1001 Jours, ed. Paris 1826, ii. 19. We do not know the date of these stories. The French translator has a note explaining "porcelaine verte."

1508.—"The lac (acre) which your Highness desired me to send, it will be a piece of good luck to get, because these ships depart early, and the vessels from Pegu and Martaban come late. But I hope for a good quantity of it, as I have given orders for it."—Letter from the Viceroy Dom Francisco Almeida to the King. In Correa, i. 900.

1516.—"In this town Martaban are made very large and beautiful porcelain vases, and some of glazed earthenware of a black colour, which are highly valued among the Moors, and they export them as merchandise."—Barbosa, 185.

1593.—"In this town there many of the great earthen pots are made, which in India are called Martavanas, and many of them carried throughout all India, of all sorts both small and great; some are so great that they will hold full two pipes of water. The cause why so many are brought into India is for that they use them in every house, and in their ships instead of casks."—Linschoten, p. 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 101; see also i. 28, 285].

c. 1610.—"... des iarres les plus belles, les mieux vernis et les mieux façonnées que j'aye veu ailleurs. Il y en a qui tiennent autant qu'vne pippe et plus. Elles se font au Royaume de Martabane, d'où on les apporte, et d'ou elles prennent leur nom par toute l'Inde."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 179; [Hak. Soc. i. 259].

1623.—"Je vis un vase d'une certaine terre verte qui vient des Indes, dont les Tares ... font un grand estime, et qu'ils achenent bien cher à cause de la propriété qu'elle a de se rompre à la presence du poison. ... Ceste terre se nomme Merdébani."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, ii. 110.

1673.—"... to that end offer Rice, Oyl, and Cocoa-Nuts in a thick Grove, where they piled an huge Heap of long Jars like Mortivans."—Fryer, 180.

1688.—"They took it out of the cask, and put it into earthen Jars that held about eight Barrels apiece. These they call Montaban Jars, from a town of that name in Pegu, whence they are brought, and carried all over India."—Dampier, ii. 98.

c. 1690.—"Sunt autem haec vastissimae ac turgidae ollae in regionibus Martavanae et Siamae confectae, quae per toman transmiserunt Indian ad varias liquores conservandos."—Rumphius, i. ch. iii.

1711.—"... Pegu, Quedat, Jahore and all their own Coasts, whence they are plentifully supply'd with several Necessaries, they otherwise must want; As Ivory, Beeswax, Mortivan and small Jars, Pepper, &c."—Lockyer, 35.

1726.—"... and the Martavans containing the water to drink, when empty require two persons to carry them."—Valentijn, v. 254.

"The goods exported hitherward (from Pegu) are ... glazed pots (called Martavans after the district where they properly belong), both large and little."—Ibid., v. 128.

1727.—"Martavan was one of the most flourishing Towns for Trade in the East. ... They make earthen Ware there still, and glaze them with Lead-ear. I have seen some Jars made there that could contain two Hogsheads of Liquor."—A. Hamilton, i. 63; [ed. 1744, ii. 62].

1740.—"The Pay Master is likewise ordered ... to look out for all the Pegu Jars in Town, or other vessels proper for keeping water."—In Wheeler, iii. 194.

Such jars were apparently imitated in other countries, but kept the original name. Thus Baillie Fraser says that "certain jars called Martaban were manufactured in Oman."—Journey into Khurasan, 18.

"Two large Pegu Jars from Moulinim."—Official Cudal. Exhibition of 1851, ii. 921.

MARTIL, MARTOL, s. A hammer. Hind mertol, from Port. martelo, but assisted by imaginary connection with Hind mur-nà, 'to strike.'

MARTINGALE, s. This is no specially Anglo-Indian word; our excuse for introducing it is the belief that it is of Arabic origin. Popular assumption, we believe, derives the name from a mythical Colonel Martin-gale. But the word seems to come to us from the French, in which language, besides the English use, Littre gives chausses à la martingale as meaning "culottes dont le pont était placé par derrière," and this he strangely declares to be the true and original meaning of the word. His etymology, after Ménage, is from Martiques in Provence, where, it is alleged, breeches of this kind were worn. Skeat seems to accept these explanations. [But see his Concise Diet., where he inclines to the view given in this article, and adds: "I find Arab. rataka given by Richardson as a verbal root, whence ratak, going with a short quick step." ] But there is a Span. word al-martaga, for a kind of breech, which Urrea quoted by Dozy derives from verb Arab. rataka, "qui, à la IVe forme signifie 'effect ut brevibus assibus incederet.' " This is precisely the effect of a martingale. And we venture to say that probably the word bore its English meaning originally also in French and Spanish, and came from Arabic direct into the latter tongue. Dozy himself, we should add, is inclined to derive the Span. word from al-mišta'a, 'a halter.'

MARWAEE, n.p. and s. This word Mārwārī, properly a man of the Mārwār [Skt. maru, 'desert'], or Jodhpur country in Rājputāna, is used in many parts of India as synonymous with Banya (see BANYAN) or Sowcar, from the fact that many of the traders and money-lenders have come originally from Mārwār, most frequently Jains in religion. Compare the Lombard of medieval England, and the caorviso of Dante's time.

MARYACAR, n.p. According to R. Drummond and a MS. note on the India Library copy of his book R. Catholics in Malabar were so called. Marya Karar, or 'Mary's People.' [The word appears to be really marakkar, of which two explanations are given. Logan (Malabar, i. 332 note) says that Marakkar means 'doer or follower of the Law' (marigam), and is applied to a foreign religion, like that of Christians and Mohammedans. The Madras Gloss. (iii. 474) derives it from Mal. marakkalam, 'boat,' and kar, a termination showing possession, and defines it as a "titular appellation of the Moplah Mahomedans on the S.W. coast."]

MASCABAR, s. This is given by C. P. Brown (MS. notes) as an Indo-Portuguese word for 'the last day of the month,' quoting Calcutta Review, viii. 345. He suggests as its etymology Hind. māś-ke-bəd, 'after a month.' [In N. Indian public offices the māskabār is well known as the monthly statement of cases decided during the month. It has been suggested that it represents the Port. mes-acabar, 'end of the month'; but according to Platts, it is more probably a corruption of Hind. māsik-wār or mās-kā-wār.]

MASKEE. This is a term in Chinese "pigeon," meaning 'never mind,' 'n'importe,' which is constantly in the mouths of Europeans in China. It is supposed that it may be the corruption or ellipsis of a Portuguese expression, but nothing satisfactory has been suggested. [Mr. Skeat writes: "Surely this is simply Port. mas que, probably imported direct through Macao, in the sense of 'although, even, in spite of,' like French malgré. And this seems to be its meaning in 'pigeon':"

"That nightly tim begin chop-chop,
One young man walkee—no can stop.
Maskee snow, maskee ice!
He eally fly with chop so nice—Topsde Gallow!
'Excelsior,' in 'pigeon.'"]

MASULIPATAM, n.p. This coast town of the Madras Presidency is sometimes vulgarly called Machhili-patan or Machhili-bandar, or simply Bandar (see BUUNDER, 2); and its name explained (Hind. machhili, 'fish') as Fish-town, [the Madras Gloss. says from an old tradition of a whale being stranded on the shore.] The etymology may originally have had such a connection, but there can be no doubt that the name is a trace of the Μαυσωλία and Μαισωλόν παταιομένος, which we find in Ptolemy's Tables; and of the Maśāla producing muslins, in the Periplus [in one of the old Logs the name is transformed into Mesopotamia (J.R. As. Soc., Jan. 1900, p. 158). In a letter of 1605-6 it appears as Mesopotamya (Birdwood, First Letter Book, 73).

1619. — “Master Methwold came from Missulapatam in one of the country Boats.” — Pring, in Purchases, i. 638.

[c. 1661. — “It was reported, at one time, that he was arrived at Massipatam . . .” — Ibid., ed. Constable. 112.]

c. 1681. — “The road between had been covered with brocade velvet, and Machibender chintz.” — Seir Mootykerin, iii. 370.

1684. — “These sort of Women are so nimble and active that when the present king went to see Masilipatan, nine of them undertook to represent the figure of an Elephant; four making the four feet, four the body, and one the trunk; upon which the King, sitting in a kind of Throne, made his entry into the City.” — Tavernier, E.T. ii. 65; [ed. Balt., i. 158].

1789. — “Masulipatan, which last word, by the bye, ought to be written Machilipatan (Fish-town), because of a Whale that happened to be stranded there 150 years ago.” — Note on Seir Mootykerin, iii. 370.

MATE, MATY. s. An assistant under a head servant; in which sense or something near it, but also sometimes in the sense of a ‘head-man,’ the word is in use almost all over India. In the Bengal Presidency we have a mate-bearer for the assistant body-servant (see BEARER); the mate attendant on an elephant under the mahout; a mate (head) of coolies or jomponnies (qu.v.) (see JOMPON), &c. And in Madras the maty is an under-servant, whose business it is to clean crockery, knives, &c, to attend to lamps, and so forth.

The origin of the word is obscure, if indeed it has not more than one origin. Some have supposed it to be taken from the English word in the sense of comrade, &c.; whilst Wilson gives metṭi as a distinct Malayalam word for an inferior domestic servant, [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tamil mēl ‘high’]. The last word is of very doubtful genuineness. Neither derivation will explain the fact that the word occurs in the Ain, in which the three classes of attendants on an elephant in Akbar’s establishment are styled respectively Mahāvat, Dhōa, and Meth; two of which terms would, under other circumstances, probably be regarded as corruptions of English words. This use of the word we find in Skt. dictionaries as mētha, mētha; and meṇḍa, ‘an elephant-keeper or feeder.’ But for the more general use we would query whether it may not be a genuine Prakrit form from Skt. mitra, ‘associate, friend’? We have in Pali meta, ‘friendship,’ from Skt. mattā.

1810. — “In some families mates or assistants are allowed, who do the drudgeries.” — Williamson, V. M. i. 241.

1872. — “At last the morning of our departure came. A crowd of porters stood without the veranda, chattering and squabbling, and the mate distributed the boxes and bundles among them.” — A True Reformer, ch. vi.

1873. — “To procure this latter supply (of green food) is the daily duty of one of the attendants, who in Indian phraseology is termed a mate, the title of Mahout being reserved for the head keeper” (of an elephant). — Sat. Rec. Sept. 6, 302.

MATRANEE, s. Properly Hind. from Pers. mīhtarūn; a female sweeper (see MEHTAB). [In the following extract the writer seems to mean Bhathiyyar or Bhathiyyarin, the wife of a Bhathiyyar or inn-keeper.]

[1785.—“. . . a handsome serai . . . where a number of people, chiefly women, called metrahes, take up their abode to attend strangers on their arrival in the city.” — Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. ii. 404.]

MATROSS, s. An inferior class of soldier in the Artillery. The word is quite obsolete, and is introduced here because it seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England, and occurs frequently in old Indian narratives. It is Germ.
Matroos, Dutch matroos, 'a sailor,' identical no doubt with Fr. matelot. The origin is so obscure that it seems hardly worth while to quote the conjectures regarding it. In the establishment of a company of Royal Artillery in 1771, as given in Duncan's Hist. of that corps, we have besides sergeants and corporals, "4 Bombardiers, 8 Gunners, 34 Matroses, and 2 Drummers." A definition of the Matross is given in our 3rd quotation. We have not ascertained when the term was disused in the R.A. It appears in the Establishment as given by Grose in 1801 (Military Antiq. i. 315). As far as Major Duncan's book informs us, it appears first in 1639, and has disappeared by 1793, when we find the men of an artillery force divided (excluding sergeants, corporals, and bombardiers) into First Gunners, Second Gunners, and Military Drivers.

1745.—"... We were told with regard to the Fortifications, that no Expense should be grudged that was necessary for the Defence of the Settlement, and in 1741, a Person was sent out in the character of an Engineer for our Place; but ... he lived not to come among us; and therefore, we could only judge of his Merit and Qualifications by the Value of his Stipend, Six Pagodas a Month, or about Eighteen Pence a Day, scarce the Pay of a common Matross. ..."—Letter from Mr. Burnett to the Secret Committee, in Letter to a Proprietor of the E.I. Co., p. 45.

1757.—"I have with me one Gunner, one Matross, and two Lascars."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Repert. i. 293.

1779.—"Matroses are properly appren-tices to the gunner, being soldiers in the royal regiment of artillery, and next to them; they assist in loading, firing, and spunting the great guns. They carry fire-clocks, and march along with the guns and store-wagons, both as a guard, and to give their assistance in every emergency."—Capt. G. Smith's Universal Military Dictionary.

1792.—"Wednesday evening, the 25th inst., a Matross of Artillery deserted from the Mount, and took away with him his firelock, and nine rounds of powder and ball."—Madras Courier, Feb. 2.

[1800.—"A serjeant and two matrosses employed under a general committee on the captured military stores in Seringapatam."—Wellington Suppl. Desp. i. 32 (Stanf. Dict.).]

MAT, s. Touch (of gold). Tamil māṟṟu (pron. māṟṟu), perhaps from Skt. mātra, 'measure.' Very pure gold is said to be 9 māṟṟu, inferior gold of 5 or 6 māṟṟu.

1693.—"Gold, purified from all other metals... by us is reckoned as of four and Twenty Cans, but by the blacks is here divided and reckoned as of ten mat."—Hawart, 106.

1727.—At Mocha ... "the Coffee Trade brings in a continual Supply of Silver and Gold ... from Turkey, Ebramies and Mograbis, Gold of low Matt."—A. Hamilton, i. 43, [ed. 1744].

1752.—"... to find the Value of the Touch in Fanams, multiply the Matt by 10, and then by 8, which gives it in Fanams."—T. Brooks, 25.

The same word was used in Japan for a measure, sometimes called a fathom.

MAUMLET, s. Domestic Hind. māmlät, for 'omelet'; [Māmlēt is 'marmalade'].

MAUND, s. The authorised Anglo-Indian form of the name of a weight (Hind. man, Mahr. man), which, with varying values, has been current over Western Asia from time immemorial. Professor Sayce traces it (mano) back to the Accadian language.* But in any case it was the Babylonian name for 5/8 of a talent, whence it passed, with the Babylonian weights and measures, almost all over the ancient world. Compare the men or mna of Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions, preserved in the emna or anna of the Copts, the Hebrew mēneh, the Greek μένη, and the Roman mina. The introduction of the word into India may have occurred during the extensive commerce of the Arabs with that country during the 8th and 9th centuries; possibly at an earlier date. Through the Arabs also we find an old Spanish word almén, and in old French almène, for a weight of about 20 lbs. (Marcel Devé). The quotations will show how the Portuguese converted man into māo, of which the English made maune, and so (probably by the influence of the old English word maund) * our present form, which occurs as early as 1611. Some of the older travellers, like Linschoten, misled by the Portuguese mão, identified it with the word for 'hand' in that language, and so rendered it.

The values of the man as weight, even in modern times, have varied immensely, i.e. from little more than 2 lbs. to upwards of 160. The 'Indian Maund,' which is the standard of weight in British India, is of 40 sers, each ser being divided into 16 chhitaks; and this is the general scale of subdivision in the local weights of Bengal, and Upper and Central India, though the value of the ser varies. That of the standard ser is 80 tolas (q.v.) or rupee-weights, and thus the maund = 82½ lbs. avoirdupois. The Bombay maund (or man) of 48 sers = 28 lbs.; the Madras one of 40 sers = 25 lbs. The Palloda man of Ahmadnagar contained 64 sers, and was = 163½ lbs. This is the largest man we find in the 'Useful Tables.' The smallest Indian man again is that of Colachy in Travancore, and that = 18 lbs. 12 oz. 13 dr. The Persian Tabriizi man is, however, a little less than 7 lbs.; the man shāhi twice that; the smallest of all on the list named is the Jeddah man = 2 lbs. 3 oz. 9½ dr.

b.c. 692.—In the "Eponymy of Zazai," a house in Nineveh, with its shrubbery and gates, is sold for one maneh of silver according to the royal standard. Quoted by Sayce, u.s.

b.c. 667.—We find Nergal-sarra-nacir lending "four manehs of silver, according to the maneh of Carchemish."—Ibid.

c. b.c. 524.—"Cambyses received the Libyan presents very graciously, but not so the gifts of the Cyrenaics. They had sent no more than 500 minae of silver, which Cambyses, I imagine, thought too little. He therefore snatched the money from them, and with his own hand scattered it among the soldiers."—Herodot. iii. ch. 13 (E.T. by Rvelinson).

1711.—"Sugar, Coffee, Tutanague, all sorts of Drugs, &c., are sold by the Maund Tabrees; which in the Factory and Custom house is nearest 63½. Avoirdupois... Rattles, and all sorts of Fruit... &c. are sold by the Maund Copara of 7½... The Maund Shaw is two Maunds Tabreez, used at Ispahan."—Lockyer, 230.

c. 1760.—Grose says, "the maund they weigh their indicos with is only 53 lb." He states the maund of Upper India as 69 lb.; at Bombay, 28 lb.; at Goa, 14 lb.; at Surat, 3½ lb.; at Coromandel, 25 lb.; in Bengal, 75 lb.

1854.—"... You only consent to make play when you have packed a good maund of traps on your back."—Life of Lord Lawrence, i. 495.

MAYLA, s. Hind. melā, 'a fair,' almost always connected with some religious celebration, as were so many of the medieval fairs in Europe. The word is Skt. melā, melaka, 'meeting, concourse, assembly.'

1869.—"Le Mela n’est pas précisément une foire telle que nous l’entendons; c’est le nom qu’on donne aux réunions de pêlerins et des marchands qui... se rendent dans les lieux considérés comme sacrés, aux fêtes de certaine dieux indiens et des personnages reçus saints parmi les musulmans."—Garcín de Tassij, Rel. Mus., p. 29.

MAZAGON, MAZAGON, n.p. A suburb of Bombay, containing a large Portuguese population. [The name is said to be originally Meakṣagrādana, 'the village of the Great Lord,' Siva.]

The Ground between this and the Great Breast is well ploughed and bears good Battye. Here the Portugalls have another Church and Religious House belonging to the Franciscans."—Fryer, p. 67.

MECKLEY, n.p. One of the names of the State of Munneepore.

MEEANA, MYYNA, s. H.—P. miyāna, 'middle-sized.' The name of a kind of palankin; that kind out of which the palankin used by Europeans has been developed, and which has been generally adopted in India for the last century. [Buchanan Hamilton writes: "The lowest kind of palanquins, which are small litters suspended under a straight bamboo, by which they are carried, and shaded by a frame covered with cloth, do not admit the passenger to lie at length, and are here called miyana, or Mahapa. In some places, these terms are considered as synonymous, in others the Miyana is open at the sides, while the Mahapa, intended for women, is surrounded with curtains." (Eastern India, ii. 426.) In Williamson's Vade Mecum (i. 319) the word is written Mohannah.

1784.—"... an entire new myannah, painted and gilt, lined with orange silk, with curtains and bedding complete."—In Seton-Karr, i. 49.

... "Patna common chairs, couches and teaposy, two Mahana palanquins."—Ibid. 62.

MEERASS, s., MEERASSY, adj., MEERASSIDAR, s. "Inheritance," 'hereditary,' 'a holder of hereditary property.' Hind. from Arab. mirās, mirās, mirāsdār; and these from varīs, 'to inherit.'

1806.—"Every meerassidar in Tanjore has been furnished with a separate pottah (q.v.) for the land held by him."—Fifth Report (1812), 774.

1812.—"The term meerasse... was introduced by the Mahommedans."—Ibid. 136.

1877.—"All miras rights were reclaimable within a forty years' absence."—Meadows Taylor, Story of My Life, ii. 211.

... "I found a great proportion of the occupants of land to be mirasadar,—that is, persons who held their portions of land in hereditary occupancy."—Ibid. 210.
MEHAUL, s. Hind. from Arab. mahâll, being properly the pl. of Arab. mahâl. The word is used with a considerable variety of application, the explanation of which would involve a greater amount of technical detail than is consistent with the purpose of this work. On this Wilson may be consulted. But the most usual Anglo-Indian application of mahâll (used as a singular and generally written, incorrectly, mahâl) is to 'an estate,' in the Revenue sense, i.e. 'a parcel or parcels of land separately assessed for revenue.' The sing. mahâll (also written in the vernaculars mahâl, and mahâ) is often used for a palace or important edifice, e.g. (see SHISH-MUHULL, TAJ-MAHAL).

MEHTAR, s. A sweeper or scavenger. This name is usual in the Bengal Presidency, especially for the domestic servant of this class. The word is Pers. comp. mikhâr (Lat. major), 'a great personage,' 'a prince,' and has been applied to the class in question in irony, or rather in consolation, as the domestic tailor is called caleefâ. But the name has so completely adhered in this application, that all sense of either irony or consolation has perished; mehtar is a sweeper and nought else. His wife is the Matranee. It is not unusual to hear two mehtars hailing each other as Mahâdrâj! In Persia the menial application of the word seems to be different (see below). The same class of servant is usually called in W. India bhängi (see BUNGY), a name which in Upper India is applied to the caste generally and specially to those not in the service of Europeans. [Examples of the word used in the honorific sense will be found below.]

c. 1800.—"Maitre." See under BUNOW.
1810.—"The mater, or sweeper, is considered the lowest menial in every family." —Williamson, V. M. i. 276-7.
1828.—"... besides many mehtars or stable-boys."—Hajji Baba in England, i. 60.

In the honorific sense:

[1824.—"In each of the towns of Central India, there is ... a mehtur, or head of every other class of the inhabitants down to the lowest."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 555.
1880.—"On the right bank is the fort in which the Mîhter or Bâdshâh, for he is known by both titles, resides."—Bidâduph, Tribes of the Hindoo Kush, 61.]

MELINDE, MELINDA, n.p. The name (Melinda or Malindi) of an Arab town and State on the east coast of Africa, in S. lat. 3° 9'; the only one at which the expedition of Vasco da Gama had amicable relations with the people, and that at which they obtained the pilot who guided the squadron to the coast of India.

c. 1150.—"Melinde, a town of the Zemdi, ... is situated on the sea-shore at the mouth of a river of fresh water. ... It is a large town, the people of which ... draw from the sea different kinds of fish, which they dry and trade in. They also possess and work mines of iron."—Edrisi (Joubert), i. 56.
c. 1520.—See also Abufeda, by Reinaud, ii. 207.

1488.—"And that same day at sundown we cast anchor right opposite a place which is called Millinde, which is 30 leagues from Mombaça. ... On Easter Day those Moors whom we held prisoners, told us that in the said town of Millinde were stopping four ships of Christians who were Indians, and that if we desired to take them these would give us, instead of themselves, Christian Pilots."—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 42-3.

1554.—"As the King of Melinde pays no tribute, nor is there any reason why he should, considering the many tokens of friendship we have received from him, both on the first discovery of these countries, and to this day, and which in my opinion we repay very badly, by the ill treatment which he has from the Captains who go on service to this Coast."—Simão Botelho, Tombo, 17.

c. 1570.—"Di Chial si negotia anco per la costa de Melindi in Ethiopia."—Cesare de Federici in Ramusio, iii. 396v.

1572.—"When Chegava a frota aquella parte Onde o reino Melinde já se via, De toldos adornada, e leda de arte: Que bem mostra estimar a sancta dia Treme a bandeira, voa o estandarte, A cor purpurea ao longe apparecia, Soam os atambores, e pandeiros: E assi entravam ledos e guerreiros."—Camões, ii. 73.

By Burton:

"At such a time the Squadron near the part where first Melinde's goodly shore unseen, in awnings drest and prankt with gallant art, to show that none the Holy Day missew: Flutter the flags, the streaming Estandart gleams from afar with gorgeous purple sheen, tom-toms and timbrels mingle martial jar: thus past they forwards with the pomp of war."
MELIQUE VERIDO.

MELIQUE VERIDO, n.p. The Portuguese form of the style of the princes of the dynasty established at Bidar in the end of the 15th century, on the decay of the Bahmani kingdom. The name represents 'Malik Barid.' It was apparently only the third of the dynasty, 'Ali, who first took the title of (Ali) Barid Shah.

1538.—'And as the folosomiâ (?) of Badur was very great, as well as his presumption, he sent word to Yzam Maluco (Nizamaluco) and to Verido (who were great Lords, as it were Kings, in the Decanam, that lies between the Balagat and Cambaya) . . . that they must pay him homage, or he would hold them for enemies, and would direct war against them, and take away their dominions.'—Correa, iii. 514.

1563.—'And these regents . . . concerted among themselves . . . that they should seize the King of Daquem in Bedar, which is the chief city and capital of the Decan; so they took him and committed him to one of their number, by name Verido; and then he and the rest, either in person or by their representatives, make him a salaam (palme) at certain days of the year . . . the Verido who died in the year 1510 was a Hungarian by birth, and originally a Christian, as I have heard on sure authority.'—Garcia, f. 35 and 35a.

c. 1601.—'About this time a letter arrived from the Prince Sultân Dânûrî, reporting that (Malik) Ambar had collected his troops in Bidar, and had gained a victory over a party which had been sent to oppose him by Malik Barid.'—Indiyat Ullah, in Elliot, vi. 104.

MEM-SAHIB, s. This singular example of a hybrid term is the usual respectful designation of a European married lady in the Bengal Presidency; the first portion representing ma'am. Madam Sahib is used at Bombay; Doreasi (see DORAY) in Madras. (See also BURRA BEEBEE.)

MENDY, s. Hind. mehndî, [meihndî, Skt. mendhikâ]; the plant Lavsonia alba, Lam., of the N. O. Lythraceae, strongly resembling the English privet in appearance, and common in gardens. It is the plant whose leaves afford the henna, used so much in Mahommedan countries for dyeing the hands, &c., and also in the process of dyeing the hair. Mehndî is, according to Royle, the Cypress of the ancients (see Pliny, xii. 24). It is also the campshire of Canticles i. 14, where the margin of A.V. has erroneously cypress for cypris.

[Mercáll, Marcáll, s. Tam. marakkâl, a grain measure in use in the Madras Presidency, and formerly varying much in different localities, though the most usual was 12 sers of grain. [Also known as toom.] Its standard is fixed since 1846 at 800 cubic inches, and = 1 1/2 of a garce (q.v.).

1554.—(Negapatam) "Of ghee (namteigne) and oil, one mercar is=2½ canadas" (a Portuguese measure of about 3 pints).—A. Neve, 36.

1803.—"... take care to put on each bullock full six mercalls or 72 seers."—Wellington Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 85.

MERCUIL, n.p. The name by which we know the most southern district of Lower Bumna with its town; annexed with the rest of what used to be called the "Tenasserim Provinces" after the war of 1824-26. The name is probably of Siamese origin; the town is called by the Burmese Beît (Sir A. Phayre).

1568.—"Tenasuari la quale è Città delle regioni del regno di Siam, posta infra terra due o tre marea sopra vn gran fiuome . . . ad onde il fiuome entra in mare e vna villa chiamata Merghi, nel porto della quale ogni anno si caricano alcune navi di verzino (see BRAZIL-wood and SAPPAN-wood), di nipa (q.v.), di betzuan (see BENJAMÉN), e qualche poco di garofalo, macis, noé . . ."—Cos. Federici, in Raimundo, iii. 327v.

MILK-BUSH, MILK-HEDGE. 568

[1727. — "Merjee." See under TENAS-SERIM.]

MILK-BUSH, MILK-HEDGE, s. Euphorbia Tirucalli, L., often used for hedges on the Coromandel coast. It abounds in acrid milky juices.

c. 1590.—"They enclose their fields and gardens with hedges of the zekoom (saôt-kum) tree, which is a strong defence against cattle, and makes the country almost impenetrable by an army."—Ayton, ed. Gladwin, ii. 68; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 239].

[1773.—"Milky Hedge. This is rather a shrub, which they plant for hedges on the coast of Coromandel. . . ."—Ives, 462.]

1780.—"Thorn hedges are sometimes placed in gardens, but in the fields the milk bush is most commonly used . . . when squeezed emitting a whitish juice like milk, that is deemed a deadly poison. . . . A horse will have his head and eyes pro- ducingly swelled from standing for some time under the shade of a milk hedge."—Munro's Narr. 80.

"So saying, Buddha Silently laid aside sandals and staff, His sacred thread, turban, and cloth, and came Forth from behind the milk-bush on the sand. . . .

Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, Bk. v.

c. 1886.—"The milk-hedge forms a very distinctive feature in the landscape of many parts of Guzerat. Twigs of the plant thrown into running water kill the fish, and are extensively used for that purpose. Also charcoal from the stems is considered the best for making gunpowder."—M. Gen., R. H. Krattinge.

MINCOPIE, n.p. This term is attributed in books to the Andaman islanders as their distinctive name for their own race. It originated with a vocabulary given by Lient. Cobrooke in vol. iv. of the Asiatic Researches, and was certainly founded on some misconception. Nor has the possible origin of the mistake been ascertained. [Mr. Man (Proc. Anthrop. Institute, xii. 71) suggests that it may have been a corruption of the words min kaih! 'Come here!']

MINICOY, n.p. Minikai; [Logan (Malabar, i. 2) gives the name as Menakāyat, which the Madras Gloss. derives from Mal. min, 'fish,' kaih, 'deep pool.' The natives call it Matiku (note by Mr. Gray on the passage from Pyrard quoted below).] An island intermediate between the Maldive and the Laccadive group. Politically it belongs to the latter, being the property of the Ali Raja of Cannanore, but the people and their language are Maldivian. The population in 1871 was 2800. One-sixth of the adults had perished in a cyclone in 1867. A lighthouse was in 1883 erected on the island. This is probably the island intended for Mulkee in that ill-edited book the E.T. of Tahfut al-Mujahidin. [Mr. Logan identifies it with the "female island" of Marco Polo. (Malabar, i. 287.)]

MISCALL, s. Ar. mishkal (mithkāl, properly). An Arabian weight, originally that of the Roman aureus and the gold dinār; about 73 grs.

c. 1340.—"The prince, violently enraged, caused this officer to be put in prison, and confiscated his goods, which amounted to 437,000,000 mithkāls of gold. This anecdote serves to attest at once the severity of the sovereign and the extreme wealth of the country."—Shikābuddin, in Not. et Ext., xiii. 192.

1502.—"Upon which the King (of Sofala) showed himself much pleased . . . and gave them as a present for the Captain-Major a mass of strings of small golden beads which they call pingo, weighing 1000 maticals, every matical being worth 500 reis, and gave for the King another that weighed 3000 maticals. . . ."—Correa, i. 274.

MISREE, s. Sugar candy. Mīšrī, 'Egyptian,' from Mīšr, Egypt, the Missraim of the Hebrews, showing the original source of supply. [We find the Mīšrī or 'sugar of Egypt' in the Arabian Nights (Burton, xi. 396).] (See under SUGAR.)

1810.—"The sugar-candy made in India, where it is known by the name of miscery, bears a price suited to its quality. . . . It is usually made in small conical pots, whence it concretes into masses, weighing from 3 to 6 lbs. each."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 194.

MISSAL, s. Hind. from Ar. misl, meaning 'similitude.' The body of documents in a particular case before a court. [The word is also used in its original sense of a 'clan.'][1861.—"The martial spirit of the Sikhs thus aroused . . . formed itself into clans or confederacies called Misls. . . ."—Cave-Brown, Punjab and Delhi, i. 388.]
MOBED, s. P. mūbīd, a title of Parsee Priests. It is a corruption of the Pehlevi magi-pāt, 'Lord Magus.'

MOCUDDUM, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddam, 'praepositus,' a head-man. The technical applications are many; e.g. to the headman of a village, responsible for the realisation of the revenue (see LUMBERDAR); to the local head of a caste (see CHOWDRY); to the head man of a body of peons or of a gang of labourers (see MATE), &c. &c. (See further detail in Wilson). Cobarruvias (Tesor of the Lengua Castellana, 1611) gives Almocadoen, "Capi- tan of Infanteria."

C. 1347.— "... The princess invited ... the tana[il (see TINDAL) or mukaddam of the crew, and the ațakâlîr or mukaddam of the archers."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 250.*

1538.— "O Mocadão da mazmorra q era o carereiro daquella prisão, tanto q os vio mortos, deu logo rebate disso ao Guazil da justiça, ..."—Pinto, cap. vi.

"... The Jaylor, which in their language is called Mocadan, repairing in the morning to us, and finding our two companions dead, goes away in all haste therewith to acquaint the Guazil, which is as the Judge with us, ..."—Cogua's Transl., p. 5.

1554.— "E a hum naique, com says piães (peons) e hum mocadão, com says tochas, hum boy de sombrero, dous mainatos," &c. —Bodello, Tombo, 51.

1567.— "... furthermore that no infidel shall serve as servire, shroff (xarvârī) mocadam (mocadão), naique (see NAIK), peon (pião) paraptrim (see PARRUTTY), collector of dues, correidor, interpreter, procurator or solicitor in court, nor in any other office or charge in which he can in any way hold authority over Christians."—Decree of the Sacred Council of Goa, Dec. 27. In Arch. Port. Orient. fasc. 4.

[c. 1610.— "They call these Lascarys and their captain Mocadon."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 117.]

[1615.— "The Generall dwelt with the Makadow of Swally."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 45; comp. Dauvers, Letters, i. 294.]

1644.— "Each vessel carries forty mariners and two mocadons."—Bocarro, MS.

1580.— "For the better keeping the Boatmen in order, resolved to appoint Black Tom Muckadum or Master of the Boatmen, being Christian as he is, his wages being paid at 70 fanams per mensem."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., Dec. 23, in Notes and Extz. No. iii. p. 42.

1580.— "This headman was called the Mokadam in the more Northern and Eastern provinces."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 183.

MOCCUDDAMA, s. Hind. from Ar. mukaddama, 'a piece of business,' but especially 'a suit at law.'

MODELIER, MODLIER, s. Used in the Tamil districts of Ceylon (and formerly on the Continent) for a native head-man. It is also a caste title, assumed by certain Tamil people who styled themselves Nudras (an honourable assumption in the South). Tam. muddaliydr, muthaliydr, an honorific pl. from muddal, muthal, 'a chief.'

C. 1320.— "When I was staying at Columbus (see QUILON) with those Christian chiefs who are called Modlial, and are the owners of the pepper, one morning there came to me ..."—John de Marignoli, in Cathay, &c., ii. 381.

1522.— "And in opening this foundation they found about a cubit below a grave made of brickwork, white-washed within, as if newly made in which they found part of the bones of the King who was converted by the holy Apostle, who the natives said they heard was called Tani (Tamil) mudo- lyar, meaning in their tongue 'Thomas Servant of God.'"—Correa, ii. 726.

1544.— "... apud Praefectum locis illis quem Modeliarem vulgo muncupant."—S. Fr. Xavieri Epistolae, 129.

1607.— "On the part of Dom Fernando Modeliar, a native of Ceylon, I have re- ceived a petition stating his services."—Letter of R. Philip III, in L. das Mangues, 135.

1616.— "These entered the Kingdom of Candy ... and had an encounter with the enemy at Matale, where they cut off five- and-thirty heads of their people and took certain archives and modiliales who are chiefs among them, and who had ... deserted and gone over to the enemy as is the way of the Chingados."—Bocarro, 495.

1618.— "The 5 August followed from Candy the Modeliar, or Great Captain ... in order to inspect the ships."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, 38.

1685.—"The Modeliares . . . and other great men among them put on a shirt and doublet, which those of low caste may not wear."—Ribiero, f. 46.

1708.—"Mon Révéré Père. Vous êtes tellement accoutumé à vous mêler des affaires de la Compagnie, que non obstant la prière que je vous ai réitérée plusieurs fois de nous laisser en repos, je ne suis pas étonné si vous prenez parti dans l'aire de Lazaro ci-devant courtier et Modélar de la Compagnie."—Norbert, Mémoires, i. 274.

1726.—"Modélyaar. This is the same as Captain."—Valentin (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 9.

1810.—"We . . . arrived at Barbaireen about two o'clock, where we found that the provident Modélar had erected a beautiful rest-house for us, and prepared an excellent collation."—Maria Graham, 98.

MOFUSSIL, s., also used adjectively, "The provinces,"—the country stations and districts, as contra-distinguished from 'the Presidency'; or, relatively, the rural localities of a district as contra-distinguished from the sudder or chief station, which is the residence of the district authorities. Thus if, in Calcutta, one talks of the Moftussil, he means anywhere in Bengal out of Calcutta; if one at Benares talks of going into the Moftussil, he means going anywhere in the Benares division or district (as the case might be) out of the city and station of Benares. And so over India. The word (Hind. from Ar.) moofasal means properly 'separate, detailed, particular,' and hence 'provincial,' as moofasal 'adlat,' a 'provincial court of justice.' This indicates the way in which the word came to have the meaning attached to it.

About 1845 a clever, free-and-easy newspaper, under the name of The Mofussilite, was started at Meerut, by Mr. John Lang, author of Too Clever by Half, &c., and endured for many years.

1781.—". . . a gentleman lately arrived from the Moussel" (plainly a misprint).—Hickey's Bengal Gazette, March 31.

"A gentleman in the Mofussil, Mr. P., fell out of his chaise and broke his leg. . . ."—Ibid., June 30.

1810.—"Either in the Presidency or in the Moftussil . . ."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 499.

1836.—". . . the Moftussil newspapers which I have seen, though generally disposed to cavil at all the acts of the Government, have often spoken favourably of the measure."—T. B. Macaulay, in Life, &c. i. 399.

MOGUL, n.p. This name should properly mean a person of the great nomad race of Mongols, called in Persia, &c., Mughals; but in India it has come, in connection with the nominally Mongol, though essentially rather Turk, family of Baber, to be applied to all foreign Mahomedans from the countries on the W. and N.W. of India, except the Pathans. In fact these people themselves make a sharp distinction between the Mughal Irâni, of Pers. origin (who is a Shiâh), and the M. Târûndî of Turk origin (who is a Sunni). Deg is the characteristic affix of the Mughal's name, as Khân is of the Pathân's. Among the Mahomedans of S. India the Moguls or Mughals constitute a strongly marked caste. [They are also clearly distinguished in the Punjâb and N.W.P.] In the quotation from Baber below, the name still retains its original application. The passage illustrates the tone in which Baber always speaks of his kindred of the Steppe, much as Lord Clyde used sometimes to speak of "confounded Scotchmen."

In Port. writers Mogul or Moor is often used for "Hindoostan," or the territory of the Great Mogul.

1298.—". . . Mungul, a name sometimes applied to the Tartars."—Marco Polo, i. 276 (2nd ed.).

c. 1300.—"Ipsi vero dicunt se descendisse de Gog et Magog. Vnde ipsi dicuntur Moguli, quasi corrupto vocabulo Magoguli."—Ricollos de Monte Cruci, in Quatuor, p. 118.

c. 1340. — "In the first place from Tana to Gintarchan may be 25 days with an ox-waggon, and from 10 to 12 days with a horse-waggon. On the road you will find plenty of Mocools, that is to say of armed troopers." — Pegolotti, on the Land Route to Cathay, in Cathay, &c., ii. 287.

1404. — "And the territory of this empire of Samarkand is called the territory of Mogalia, and the language thereof is called Muggalia, and they don't understand this language on this side of the River (the Oxus) . . . for the character which is used by those of Samarkand beyond the river is not understood or read by those on this side the river; and they call that character Mongali, and the Emperor keeps by him certain scribes who can read and write this Mogali character." — Claviio, § ciii. (Comp. Markham, 119-120.)

c. 1500. — "The Moghul troops, which had come to my assistance, did not attempt to fight, but instead of fighting, betook themselves to dismounting and plundering my own people. Nor is this a solitary instance; such is the uniform practice of these wretches the Moghuls; if they defeat the enemy they instantly seize the booty; if they are defeated, they plunder and dismount their own allies, and betide what may, carry off the spoil." — Baber, 98.

1534. — "And whilst Badur was there in the hills engaged with his pleasures and luxury, there came to him a messenger from the King of the Moghors, of the kingdom of Dely, called Bobor Mirza." — Corea, i. 571.

1536. — "Dicti Mogores vel populosis Persarum Mogoribus, vel quod nunc Turkaee a Persis Mogores appellatur." — Letter from K. John III. to Pope Paul III.

1555. — Tartaria, otherwise called Mongal, As Vincenzio wrote, is in that part of the earth where the East and the north joine together." — W. Watremans, Parole de Flacions.

1563. — "This Kingdom of Dely is very far inland, for the northern part of it marches with the territory of Corapone (Khorasan). . . . The Mogores, whom we call Tartars, conquered it more than 30 years ago. . . .

— Garcia, f. 34.

[c. 1590. — "In his time (Nasiru'ddin Mahmud) the Mughals entered the Panjub . . . ."] — An. ed. Jarrett, ii. 394.

[c. 1610. — "The greatest ships come from the coast of Persia, Arabia, Mogor." — Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 258.

[1636. — India containeth many Provinces and Realmes, as Cambiala, Deli, Deean, Bisbarar, Malabar, Narsingar, Orixa, Bengala, Sangrah, Mogores, Ava, Pegua, Aureas Chersonesus, Sinia, Cambo, and Campaa." — T. Blundevil, Description and use of Placius his Mappe, in Eight Treatises, ed. 1626, p. 547.]

c. 1650. — "Now shall I tell how the royal house arose in the land of the Monghol . . .

And the Ruler (Chingiz Khan) said . . .

'I will that this people Bade, resembling a precious crystal, which even to the completion of my enterprise hath shown the greatest fidelity in every peril, shall take the name of Kohike (Blue) Monghol." — Swaung Setzen, by Schmidt, pp. 57 and 71.

1741. — "Ao mesmo tempo que a paz se ajusteram entre os referidos generaes Mogor e Marata." — Basquejo das Posseesaoes Porting, na Orientee — Documentos Comprovativas, iii. 21 (Lisbon 1853).

1764. — "Whatever Moguls, whether Oranies or Tournamie, come to offer their services should be received on the aforesaid terms." — Paper of Articles sent to Major Munro by the Nawaub, in Long, 360.

[c. 1773. — . . . the news-writers of Rai Droog frequently wrote to the Nawaub . . . that the besieged Naik . . . had attacked the batteries of the besiegers, and had killed a great number of the Moghuls." — H. of Hyder, 317.]

1781. — "Wanted an European or Mogul Coachman that can drive four Horses in hand." — India Gazette, June 30.

1800. — "I pushed forward the whole of the Mahrratt and Mogul cavalry in one body. . . ." — Sir A. Wellesley to Munro, Munro's Life, i. 268.

1808. — "The Mogul horse do not appear very active; otherwise they ought certainly to keep the pindarries at a greater distance." — Wellington, ii. 281.

In these last two quotations the term is applied distinctively to Hyderabad troops.

1855. — "The Moguls and others, who at the present day settle in the country, intermarrying with these people (Burmanes Mahommedans) speedily sink into the same practical heterodoxies." — Yule, Mission to Ava, 151.

MOGUL, THE GREAT, n.p. Sometimes 'The Mogul' simply. The name by which the Kings of Delhi of the House of Timur were popularly styled, first by the Portuguese (o grão Mogor) and after them by Europeans generally. It was analogous to the Sophy (q.v.), as applied to the Kings of Persia, or to the 'Great Turk' applied to the Sultan of Turkey. Indeed the latter phrase was probably the model of the present one. As noticed under the preceding article, MOGOL, MOGOR, and also Mogolistan are applied among old writers to the dominions of the Great Mogul. We have found no native idiom precisely suggesting the latter title; but Moghul is thus used in the Aravish-i-Mahfil below, and Mogolistan must have been in some native use, for it is a form that Europeans would not have invented. (See quotations from Thévenot here and under MOHWÁ.)
c. 1563.—"Ma già dodici anni il gran Mogol Re Moro d'Agra et del Deli . . . si è impatronato di tutto il Regno de Cambaia."—V. di Messer Cesare Federici, in Ramnaro, iii.

In a picture by Vandyke of William 1st Earl of Denbigh, belonging to the Duke of Hamilton, and exhibited at Edinburgh in July 1883, the subject is represented as out shooting, in a red striped shirt and pyjamas, no doubt the "Mogul breeches" of the period.

MOHUR, GOLD, s. The official name of the chief gold coin of British India, Hind. from Pers. muhr, a (metallic) seal, and thence a gold coin. It seems possible that the word is taken from mühr, 'the sun,' as one of the secondary meanings of that word is 'a golden circlet on the top of an umbrella, or the like' (Vallers). [Platts, on the contrary, identifies it with Skt. mudrâ, 'a seal.']

The term muhr, as applied to a coin, appears to have been popular only and quasi-generic, not precise. But that to which it has been most usually applied, at least in recent centuries, is a coin which has always been in use since the foundation of the Mahommedan Empire in Hindustan by the Ghûrî Kings of Ghaznî and their freedmen, circa A.D. 1200, tending to a standard weight of 100 ratis (see BUTTEE) of pure gold, or about 175 grains, thus equalling in weight, and probably intended then to equal ten times in value, the silver coin which has for more than three centuries been called Rupee.

There is good ground for regarding this as the theory of the system.* But the gold coins, especially, have deviated from the theory considerably; a deviation which seems to have commenced with the violent innovations of Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (1325-1351), who raised the gold coin to 200 grains, and diminished the silver coin to 140 grains, a change which may have been connected with the enormous influx of gold into Upper India, from the plunder of the immemorial accumulations of the Peninsula in the first quarter of the 14th century. After this the coin again settled down in approximation to the old weight, insomuch that, on taking the weight of 46 different mohurs from the lists given in Prinsep's Tables, the average of pure gold is 167-22 grains.†

The first gold mohur struck by the Company's Government was issued in 1766, and declared to be a legal tender for 14 seca rupees. The full weight of this coin was 179-66 grs., containing 149-72 grs. of gold. But it was impossible to render it current at the rate fixed; it was called in, and in 1769 a new mohur was issued to pass as legal tender for 16 seca rupees. The weight of this coin was 190-773 grs. (according to Regn. of 1793, 190-894), and it contained 190-086 grs. of gold. Regulation xxxv. of 1793 declared these gold mohurs to be a legal tender in all public and private transactions. Regn. xiv. of 1818 declared, among other things, that "it has been thought advisable to make a slight deduction in the intrinsic value of the gold mohur to be coined at this Presidency (Fort William), in order to raise the value of fine gold to fine silver, from the present rates of 1 to 14-861 to that of 1 to 15. The gold mohur will still continue to pass current at the rate of 16 rupees." The new gold mohur was to weigh 204-710 grs., containing fine gold 187-651 grs. Once more Act xvii. of 1835 declared that the only gold coin to be coined at Indian mints should be (with propor-

Company. There has been since then no substantive change.

A friend (W. Simpson, the accomplished artist) was told in India that gold mohur was a corruption of gol, ('round') mohr, indicating a distinction from the square mohurs of some of the Delhi Kings. But this we take to be purely fanciful.

MOHURRUM, s. Ar. Muḥarrum ("sacre"), properly the name of the 1st month of the Mahomedan lunar year. But in India the term is applied to the period of fasting and public mourning observed during that month in commemoration of the death of Hassan and of his brother Husain (A.D. 669 and 680) and which terminates in the ceremonies of the 'Ashārā-ā, commonly however known in India as "the Mohurrum." MOHWA, MOHWA, MOWA, s. Hind. &c. mahud, mahud, Skt. madhāka, the large oak-like tree Bassia latifolia.* Roxb. (N. O. Sapotaceae), also the flower of this tree from which a spirit is distilled and the spirit itself. It is said that the Mahvā flower is now largely exported to France for the manufacture of liqueurs. The tree, in groups, or singly, is common all over Central India in the lower lands, and, more sparsely, in the Gangetic provinces. "It abounds in Guzerat. Where the flowers are falling the Hill-men camp under the trees to collect them. And it is a common practice to sit perched on one of the trees in order to shoot the large deer which come to feed on the fallen mhowa. The timber is strong and durable." (M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.)

1814.—"The Mowah... attains the size of an English oak... and from the beauty of its foliage, makes a conspicuous appearance in the landscape."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 452; [2nd ed. ii. 261, reading Mawah].

1871.—"The flower... possesses considerable substance, and a sweet but sickly taste and smell. It is a favourite article of food with all the wild tribes, and the lower classes of Hindus; but its main use is in the distillation of ardent spirits, most of what is consumed being Mhowa. The spirit, when well made, and mellowed by age, is by no means of despicable quality, resembling in some degree Irish whisky. The luscious flowers are no less a favourite food of the brute creation than of man..."—Forsyth, Highlands of C. India, 75.

MOLE-ISMAM, n.p. The title applied to a certain class of rustic Mahommedans or quasi-Mahommedans in Guzerat, said to have been forcibly converted in the time of the famous Sultan Mahnûd Bigarara, Butler's "Prince of Cambay." We are ignorant of the true orthography or meaning of the term. [In the E. Panjab the descendants of Jats forcibly converted to Islam are known as Mûla, or 'unfortunate' (Ibhetson, Panjab Ethnography, p. 142). The word is derived from the nakshatra or lunar asterism of Mûl, to be born in which is considered specially unlucky.]

[1898.—"Mole-Isams." See under GRASSIA.]

MOLEY, s. A kind of (so-called wet) curry used in the Madras Presidency, a large amount of coco-nut being one of the ingredients. The word is a corruption of 'Malay'; the dish being simply a bad imitation of one used by the Malays.

[1885.—"Regarding the Ceylon curry... It is known by some as the 'Malay curry,' and it is closely allied to the moli of the Tamils of Southern India." Then follows the recipe.—Wyvern, Culinary Jottings, 5th ed., 269.]

MOLLY, or (better) MALLEE, s. Hind. măli, Skt. mālikā, 'a garland-maker,' or a member of the caste which furnishes gardeners. We sometimes have heard a lady from the Bengal Presidency speak of the daily homage of "the Molly with his dolly," viz. of the măli with his dăli.

1759.—In a Calcutta wages tariff of this year we find—

"House Molly... 4 Rs."

MOLUCCAS, n.p. The 'Spice Islands,' strictly speaking the five Clove Islands, lying to the west of Gilolo, and by name Ternate (Turnātī), Tidore (Tidōrī), Mortir, Makian, and Bachian. [See Mr. Gray's note on Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 166.] But the application of the name has been extended to all the islands under Dutch rule, between Celebes and N. Guinea. There is a Dutch governor residing at Amboyna, and the islands are divided into 4 residencies, viz. Amboyna, Banda, Ternate and Manado. The origin of the name Molucca, or Maluco as the Portuguese called it, is not recorded; but it must have been that by which the islands were known to the native traders at the time of the Portuguese discoveries. The early accounts often dwell on the fact that each island (at least three of them) had a king of its own. Possibly they got the (Ar.) name of Jazīrat-al-Mulūk, 'The Isles of the Kings.'

Valentijn probably entertained the same view of the derivation. He begins his account of the islands by saying:

"There are many who have written of the Moluccos and of their Kings, but we have hitherto met with no writer who has given an exact view of the subject." (Deel, i. Mol. 3).

And on the next page he says:

"For what reason they have been called Moluccos we shall not here say; for we shall do this circumstantially when we shall speak of the Molukse Kings and their customs."

But we have been unable to find the fulfilment of this intention, though probably it exists in that continent of a work somewhere. We have also..."

seen a paper by a writer who draws much from the quarry of Valentijn. This is an article by Dr. Van Muschenbroek in the Proceedings of the International Congress of Geog. at Venice in 1881 (ii. pp. 596, seqq.), in which he traces the name to the same origin. He appears to imply that the chiefs were known among themselves as MOLOKOS, and that this term was substituted for the indigenous Kolano, or King. "Ce nom, ce titre restèrent, et furent même peut à peu employés, non seulement pour les chefs, mais aussi pour l’état même. A la longue les îles et les états des Molokos devinrent les îles et les états Molokos." There is a good deal that is questionable, however, in this writer’s deductions and etymologies. [Mr. Skeat remarks: "The islands appear to be mentioned in the Chinese history of the Tang dynasty (618-696) as Mi-li-ku, and if this be so the name is perhaps too old to be Arab."

c. 1430.—"Has (Java) ultra xv dierum cursu duae reperientur insulae, orientem versus. Altera Sandali appellatur, in qua mnes musanctae et maces; altera Bandam nomine, in qua sola gariofall producuntur." —N. Conti, in Poggia.

1501.—The earliest mention of these islands by this name, that we know, is in a letter of Amerigo Vespucci (quoted under CANHAMEIRA), who in 1501, among the places heard of by Cabral’s fleet, mentions the Maluche Islands.

1510.—"We disembarked in the island of Monoch, which is much smaller than Bandan; but the people are worse. . . . Here the cloves grow, and in many other neighbouring islands, but they are small and uninhabited." —Varthema, 246.

1514.—"Further on is Timor, whence comes sandalwood, both the white and the red; and further on still are the Maluc, whence come the cloves. The bark of these trees I am sending you; an excellent thing it is; and so are the flowers." —Letter of Giovanni da Empoli, in Archivio Stor. Ital., p. 81.

1515.—"From Malacca ships and junks are come with a great quantity of spice, cloves, mace, nut (meg), sandalwood, and other rich things. They have discovered the five islands of Cloves; two Portuguese are lords of them, and rule the land with the rod. "Tis a land of much meat, oranges, lemons, and clove-trees, which grow there of their own accord, just as trees in the woods with us . . . God be praised for such favour, and such grand things!" —Another letter of do., ibid. pp. 85-86.

1516.—"Beyond these islands, 25 leagues towards the north-east, there are five islands, one before the other, which are called the islands of Maluco, in which all the cloves grow. . . . Their Kings are Moors, and the first of them is called Baozon, the second Maquin, the third is called Motel, the fourth Tidory, and the fifth Ternalty . . . every year the people of Maleca and Java come to these islands to ship cloves . . ." —Barbosa, 201-202.

1521.—"Wednesday the 6th of November . . . we discovered four other rather high islands at a distance of 14 leagues towards the east. The pilot who had remained with us told us these were the Maluco islands, for which we gave thanks to God, and to comfort ourselves we discharged all our artillery . . . since we had passed 27 months all but two days always in search of Maluco." —Pigafetta, Voyage of Magellan, Hak. Soc. 124.

1535.—"We know by our voyages that this part is occupied by sea and land captains who come to far and many thousand islands, these together, sea and islands, embracing a great part of the circuit of the Earth . . . and in the midst of this great multitude of islands are those called Maluco . . . (These) five islands called Maluca . . . stand all within sight of one another embracing a distance of 25 leagues . . . we do not call them Maluco because they have no other names; and we call them five because in that number the clove grows naturally. Moreover, we call them in combination Maluco, as here among us we speak of the Canaries, the Terceiras, the Cabo-Verde islands, including under these names many islands each of which has a name of its own." —Barros, III. v. 5.

1665.—"As when far off at sea a fleet descends Hangs in the clouds, by equinoctial winds Close sailing from Bengal, or the Isles Of Ternate and Tidore, whence merchants bring Their spicy drugs . . . ."

Paradise Lost, ii. 636-640.

MONSOON, s. The name given to the periodical winds of the Indian seas, and of the seasons which they affect and characterize. The original word is the Ar. mausim, 'season,' which the Portuguese corrupted into monção, and our people into monsoon. Dictionaries (except Dr. Badger's) do not apparently give the Arabic word mausim the technical sense of monsoon. But there can be no doubt that it had that sense among the Arab pilots from whom the Portuguese adopted the word. This is shown by the quotations from the Turkish Admiral Sidi 'Ali. "The rationale of the term is well put in the Beirât Mohît, which says: 'Mausim is used of anything that comes round but once a year, like the festivals. In Lebanon the mausim is the season of working with the silk,'—which is the important season there, as the season of navigation is in Yemen." (W. R. S.)

The Spaniards in America would seem to have a word for season in analogous use for a recurring wind, as may be gathered from Tom Cringle.* The Venetian, Leonardo Ca' Masser (below) calls the monsoons li tempi. And the quotation from García de Orta shows that in his time the Portuguese sometimes used the word for season without any apparent reference to the wind. Though monção is general with the Portuguese writers of the 16th century, the historian Diogo de Couto always writes mouçao, and it is possible that the n came in, as in some other cases, by a habitual misreading of the written u for n. Linshoten in Dutch (1596) has monssoyn and monssoen (p. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 53]). It thus appears probable that we get our monsoon from the Dutch. The latter in modern times seem to have commonly adopted the French form mousson. [Prof. Skeat traces our monsoon from Ital. monsone.] We see below ( Ces. Feder.) that Monsoon was used as synonyms with "the half year," and so it is still in S. India.

1783.—"From the Malay word moossin, which signifies season."—Forrest, V. to Morgai, 95.

"Their prey is lodged in England; and the cries of India are given to seas and winds, to be blown about, in every breaking up of the monsoon, over a remote and unhearing ocean."—Burke's Speech on Fox's E.I. Bill, in Works, iii. 468.

[MOOBAREK, adj. Ar. mubarak, 'blessed, happy'; as an interjection, 'Welcome!' 'Congratulations to you!'"—1617. —"... a present . . . is called Mombarek, good News, or good Success."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 413.

"Bombarock . . . which by sailors is also called Bombay Rock, is derived originally from 'moobarek,' 'happy, fortunate.'"—Morier, Journey through Persia, 61.]

MOOCHULKA, s. Hind. muchalka or muchalka. A written obligation or bond. For technical uses see Wilson. The word is apparently Turki or Mongol.

C. 1687.—"Five days thereafter judgment was held on Husmuddin the astrologer, who had executed a muchilkaï that the death of the Khalif would be the calamity of the world."—Hammer's Golden Horde, 166.

C. 1290.—"When he (Kubilai Kaan) approached his 70th year, he desired to raise in his own lifetime, his son Chinkin to be his representative and declared successor . . . The chiefs . . . represented ... that though the measure ... was not in accordance with the Yasa and customs of the world-conquering hero Chinghis Kaan, yet they would grant a muchilka in favour of Chinkin's Kaanship."—Wassdyj's History, Germ. by Hammer, 46.

c. 1360.—"He shall in all divisions and districts execute muchilka to lay no burden on the subjects by extraordinary imposts, and irregular exaction of supplies."—Form of the Warrant of a Territorial Governor under the Mongols, in the above, App. p. 468.

1818.—"You were present at the India Board when Lord B— told me that I should have 10,000 pagodas per annum, and all my expenses paid. ... I never thought of taking a muchalka from Lord B—, because I certainly never suspected that my expenses would ... have been restricted to 100 pagodas, a sum which hardly pays my servants and equipage."—Moorro to Malcolm, in Mwroo's Life, &c., iii. 257.

MOOCHY, s. One who works in leather, either as shoemaker or saddler. It is the name of a low caste, Hind.
mochi. The name and caste are also found in S. India, Telug. muchche. These, too, are workers in leather, but also are employed in painting, gilding, and upholsterer's work, &c.

[1815.]
"Cow-stealing ... is also practised by ... the Mootshee or Shoemaker cast."—Tyler, Considerations, i. 108.]

MOOKTEAR, s. Properly Hind. from Ar. mukhtat, 'chosen,' but corruptly mukhtyār. An authorised agent; an attorney. Mukhtyār-nāmag, 'a power of attorney.'

1806.—"I wish he had been under the scolding when the roof of that new Cutcherry he is building fell in, and killed two mookhtaras."—The Dowk Bungalow (by G. O. Trevelyan), in Fraser's Mag. lxxiii. p. 218.

1878.—"These were the mookhtyars, or Criminal Court attorneys, teaching the witnesses what to say in their respective cases, and suggesting answers to all possible questions, the whole thing having been previously rehearsed at the mookhtyar's house."—Life in the Mofussil, f. 90.

1885.—"The wily Bengali mukhtears, or attorneys, were the bane of the Hill Tracts, and I never relaxed in my efforts to banish them from the country."—Lt.-Col. T. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 336.

MOOLAH, s. Hind. maulā, corr. from Ar. maullā, a der. from wāld, 'propinquity.' This is the legal bond which still connects a former owner with his manumitted slave; and in virtue of this bond the patron and client are both called maulā. The idea of patronage is in the other senses; and the word comes to mean eventually 'a learned man, a teacher, a doctor of the Law.' In India it is used in these senses, and for a man who reads the Korān in a house for 40 days after a death. When oaths were administered on the Korān, the servitor who held the book was called Mullah Korānī. Mullah is also in India the usual Mussulman term for 'a schoolmaster.'

1616.—"Their Moolas employ much of their time like Scrieners to doe businesse for others."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1476.

1617.—"He had shewed it to his Mulaias."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 417.]

1638.—"While the Body is let down into the grave, the kindred munter certain Prayers between their Teeth, and that done all the company returns to the house of the deceased, where the Mollas continue their Prayers for his Soul, for the space of two or three days. ..."—Mandelslo, E.T. 63.

1673.—"At funerals, the Mullahs or Priests make Orations or Sermons, after a Lesson read out of the Alchoran."—Fryer, 94.

1680.—"The old Mulla having been discharged for misconduct, another by name Cozee (see CAZEE) Mahmud entertained on a salary of 5 Pagodas per mensem, his duties consisting of the business of writing letters, &c., in Persian, besides teaching the Persian language to such of the Company's servants as shall desire to learn it."—Fr. St. Geo. Consn. March 11. Notes and Lcts. No. iii. p. 12; [also see Pringle, Diary, Fr. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 2, with note].

1763.—"The Mulla in Indoostan superintends the practice, and punishes the breach of religious duties."—Orme, reprint, i. 26.

1809.—"The British Government have, with their usual liberality, continued the allowance for the Moolahs to read the Korān."—Ld. Valentia, i. 423.

1842.—See the classical account of the Moolahs of Kabul in Elphinstone's Caubul, ed. 1842, i. 281 seqq.

1879.—"... struck down by a fanatical crowd impelled by a fierce Moola."—Sat. Rev. No. 1254, p. 494.

MOOLVEE, s. Popular Hind. mulō, Ar. mulolvh, from same root as mulā (see MOOLLAH). A Judge, Doctor of the Law, &c. It is a usual prefix to the names of learned men and professors of law and literature. (See LAW-OFFICER.)

1784.—
"A Pandit in Bengal or Molavee
May daily see a carcase burn;
But you can't furnish for the soul of ye
A dirge sans ashes and an urn.

N. B. Hathel, see Calc. Review, xxvi. 79.
MOONAUL. s. Hind. muniy or mony (it seems to be in no dictionary); [Platts gives "Muny (dialec.). The Lophostorus Impeyanus, most splendid of all game-birds, rivaling the brilliancy of hue, and the metallic lustre of the humming-birds on the scale of the turkey. "This splendid pheasant is found throughout the whole extent of the Himalayas, from the hills bordering Afghanistan as far east as Sikkim, and probably also to Bootan" (Jerdon). "In the autumnal and winter months numbers are generally collected in the same quarter of the forest, though often so widely scattered that each bird appears to be alone" (Ibid.). Can this last circumstance point to the etymology of the name as connected with Skt. muni, 'an eremite'?"

It was pointed out in a note on Marco Polo (1st ed. i. 246, 2nd ed. i. 272), that the extract which is given below from Aelian undoubtedly refers to the Muniy. We have recently found that this indication had been anticipated by G. Cuvier, in a note on Pliny (tom. vii. p. 409 of ed. Ajasson de Grandesagne, Paris, 1830). It appears from Jerdon that Monaual is popularly applied by Europeans at Darjeeling to the Sikkim horned pheasant Ceriornis satyra, otherwise sometimes called 'Argus Pheasant' (q.v.).

c. A.D. 350.—"Cocks too are produced there of a kind bigger than any others. These have a crest, but instead of being red like the crest of our cocks, this is variegated like a coronet of flowers. The tail-feathers moreover are not arched, or bent into a curve (like a cock's), but flattened out. And this tail they trail after them as a peacock does, unless when they erect it, and set it up. And the plumage of these Indian cocks is golden, and dark blue, and of the hue of the emerald." —De Nat. Animal. xvi. 2.

MOON BLINDNESS. This affection of the eyes is commonly believed to be produced by sleeping exposed to the full light of the moon. There is great difference of opinion as to the facts, some quoting experience as incontrovertible, others regarding the thing merely as a vulgar prejudice, without substantial foundation. Some remarks will be found in Collingwood's Rambles of a Naturalist, pp. 308-10. The present writer has in the East twice suffered from a peculiarity affection of the eyes and face, after being in sleep exposed to a bright moon, but he would hardly have used the term moon-blindness.

MOONG, MOONGO. s. Or, 'green-gram'; Hind. mung, [Skt. mudge]. A kind of vetch (Phaseolus Mungo, L.) in very common use over India; according to Garcia the mesce (mâsh?) of Avicenna. Garcia also says that it was popularly recommended as a diet for fever in the Deccan; [and is still recommended for this purpose by native physicians (Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 191)].

c. 1336.—"The munj again is a kind of mâsh, but its grains are oblong and the colour is light green. Munj is cooked along with rice, and eaten with butter. This is what they call Kichri (see KEDGEREE), and it is the diet on which one breakfasts daily." — Ibn Batuta, iii. 131.

1557.—"The people were obliged to bring hay, and corn, and mungo, which is a certain species of seed that they feed horses with." — Albuquerque, Hak. Soc. ii. 132.

1563.—"Servant-maid.—That girl that you brought from the Deccan asks me for mungo, and says that in her country they give it to them to eat, husked and boiled. Shall I give it her?" —Orta.—"Give it her since she wishes it; but bread and a boiled chicken would be better. For she comes from a country where they eat bread, and not rice." —Garcia, f. 145.

MOONGA, MOOGA. s. Beng. muga. A kind of wild silk, the produce of Antheraea assama, collected and manufactured in Assam. ["Its Assamese name is said to be derived from the amber mung, 'coral' colour of the silk, and is frequently used to denote silk in general" (B. C. Allen, Mono. on the Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899, p. 10).] The quotations in elucidation of this word may claim some peculiar interest. That from Purchas is a modern illustration of the legends which reached the Roman Empire in classic times, of the growth of silk in the Seric jungles ("velleraque ut foliis deponent tenuia Seres"); whilst that from Robert Lindsay may possibly throw light on the statements in the Periplus regarding an overland importation of silk from Thim into Gangetic India.
1626.—"... Moga is made which is of the bark of a certaine tree."— Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1005.

c. 1676.—"The kingdom of Asen is one of the best countries of all Asia. ... There is a sort of Silk that is found under the trees, which is spun by a Creature like our Silk-worms, but rounder, and which lives all the year long under the trees. The Silks which are made of this Silk glist'n very much, but they fret presently."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 157-8; [ed. Ball, ii. 281].

1690.—"The Florenta yarn or Muckta examined and priced. ... The Agent informed that 'twas called Arundee, made neither with cotton nor silke, but of a kind of Herba spun by a worme that feeds upon the leaves of a stalk or tree called Arundee which bears a round prickly berry, of which oyle is made; vast quantitty of this cloth is made in the country about Goora Ghaut beyond Seripore Merchata; where the worms are kept as silke worms here; twill never come white, but will take any colour &c.—F. St. Geo. Agent on Torr. Conon., Nov. 19. Notes and Exa. iii. p. 58. Aranya or ransil is the castor-oil plant, and this must be the *Attaca rica*ni, Jones, called in H. Arrindi, Arrindiaria (!) and in Bengali Eri, Eriu, Eritic according to Forbes Watson's Nomenclature, No. 8002, p. 371. [For full details see Allen, Mono. pp. 5, seq.]

1763.—"No duties have ever yet been paid on Lacks, Mugga-dootis, and other goods brought from Assam."—In Van Sittrt, i. 219.

c. 1778.—"... Silks of a coarse quality, called Moonga duties, are also brought from the frontiers of China for the Malay trade."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindays, iii. 171.

MOONSHEE, s. Ar. munisif, but written in Hind. munski. The verb visha, of which the Ar. word is the participle, means 'to educate' a youth, as well as 'to compose' a written document. Hence 'a secretary, a reader, an interpreter, a writer.' It is commonly applied by Europeans specifically to a native teacher of languages, especially of Arabic, Persian, and Urdu, though the application to a native amanuensis in those tongues, and to any respectable, well-educated native gentleman is also common. The word probably became tolerably familiar in Europe through a book of instruction in Persian bearing the name (viz. "The Persian Moonshee, by F. Gladwyn," 1st ed. s.a., but published in Calcutta about 1790-1800).

1777.—"Moonshi. A writer or secretary."—Halted, Code, 17.

1782.—"The young gentlemen exercise themselves in translating ... they reason and dispute with their munchees (tutors) in Persian and Moors. ..."—Price's Tracts, i. 89.

1785.—"Your letter, requiring our authority for engaging in your service a Munsdy, for the purpose of making out passports, and writing letters, has been received."—Tipoo's Letters, 67.

"A lasting friendship was formed between the pupil and his Moonshee. ... The Moonshee, who had become wealthy, afforded him yet more substantial evidence of his recollection, by earnestly requesting him, when on the point of leaving India, to accept a sum amounting to £1600, on the plea that the latter (i.e. Shore) had saved little."—Mem. of Lord Teignmouth, i. 32-33.

1814.—"... They presented me with an address they had just composed in the Hindoo language, translated into Persian by the Durbar munsee."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 365; [2nd ed. ii. 344].

1817.—"... Its authenticity was fully proved by ... and a Persian Moonshee who translated."—Mill, Hist. v. 127.

1828.—"... the great Moonshi of State himself had applied the whole of his genius to selecting such flowers of language as would not fail to diffuse joy, when exhibited in those dark and dank regions of the north."—Hoaji Baba in England, i. 39.

1867.—"... When the Mirza grew up, he fell among English, and ended by carrying his rupees as a Moonshee, or a language-master, to that infidel people."—Select Writings of Viscount Strangford, i. 265.

MOONSIFF, s. Hind. from Ar. munisif, 'one who does justice' (insaf), a judge. In British India it is the title of a native civil judge of the lowest grade. This office was first established in 1793.

1812.—"... munsifs, or native justices."—Fifth Report, p. 32.

[1852.—"... I wonder, Mr. Deputy, if Providence had made you a Moonisiff, instead of a Deputy Collector, whether you would have been more lenient in your strictures upon our system of civil justice!"—Rutikes, Notes on the N. W. Provinces, 155.]

MOOR, MOORMAN, s. (and adj. MOORISH). A Mahommedan; and so from the habitual use of the term (Mouro), by the Portuguese in India, particularly a Mahommedan inhabitant of India.

In the Middle Ages, to Europe generally, the Mahommedans were known as the Saracens. This is the word always used by Joinville, and by Marco Polo. Ibn Batuta also mentions the fact in a curious passage (ii. 425-6). At a later day, when the fear of the Ottoman had made itself felt in Europe, the word Turk was that which identified itself with the Moslem, and thus we have in the Collect for Good Friday,—"Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics." But to the Spaniards and Portuguese, whose contact was with the Musalmans of Mauritania who had passed over and conquered the Peninsula, all Mahomedans were Moores. So the Mahomedans whom the Portuguese met with on their voyages to India, on what coast soever, were alike styled Mouros; and from the Portuguese the use of this term, as synonymous with Mahomedan, passed to Hollanders and Englishmen.

The word then, as used by the Portuguese discoverers, referred to religion, and implied no nationality. It is plain indeed from many passages that the Moores of Calicut and Cochin were in the beginning of the 16th century people of mixed race, just as the Moplahs (q.v.) are now. The Arab, or Arabo-African occupants of Mozambique and Melinda, the Sumalis of Magadoxo, the Arabs and Persians of Kalhät and Ornuez, the Boras of Guzerat, are all Mouros to the Portuguese writers, though the more intelligent among these are quite conscious of the impropriety of the term. The Moores of the Malabar coast were middlemen, who had adopted a profession of Islam for their own convenience, and in order to minister for their own profit to the constant traffic of merchants from Ormuz and the Arabian ports. Similar influences still affect the boatmen of the same coast, among whom it has become a sort of custom in certain families, that different members should profess respectively Mahommedanism, Hinduism, and Christianity.

The use of the word Moor for Mahomedan died out pretty well among educated Europeans in the Bengal Presidency in the beginning of the last century, or even earlier, but probably held its ground a good deal longer among the British soldiery, whilst the adjective Moorish will be found in our quotations nearly as late as 1840. In Ceylon, the Straits, and the Dutch Colonies, the term Moorman for a Musalman is still in common use. Indeed the word is still employed by the servants of Madras officers in speaking of Mahommedans, or of a certain class of these. Moor is still applied at Manilla to the Muselman Malays.

1498.—"... the Moores never came to the house when this trading went on, and we became aware that they wished us ill, insomuch that when any of us went ashore, in order to annoy us they would spit on the ground, and say 'Portugal, Portugal.'"—Roteiro de V. da Gama, p. 75.

"For you must know, gentlemen, that from the moment you put into port here (Calcut) you caused disturbance of mind to the Moores of this city, who are numerous and very powerful in the country."—Correa, Hak. Soc. 166.

1499.—"We reached a very large island called Sumatra, where pepper grows in considerable quantities. ... The Chief is a Moor, but speaking a different language."—Stefano, in India in the XVth Cent. [7].

1513.—"Hanc (Malaccam) rex Mauritius gubernabat."—Emanueltis Regis Epistola, f. 1.

1553.—"And for the hatred in which they hold them, and for their abhorrence of the name of Frangue, they call in reproach the Christians of our parts of the world Frangues (see FIRINGHEE), just as we improperly call them again Moores."—Barros, IV. iv. 16.

c. 1560.—"When we lay at Fuquien, we did see certain Moores, who knew so little of their secte that they could say nothing else but that Mahomet was a Moor, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moor."—Reports of the Province of China, done into English by R. Willes, in Hakl. ii. 567.

1563.—"And as to what you say of Ludovico Vartomano, I have spoken both here and in Portugal, with people who knew him here in India, and they told me that he went about here in the garb of a Moor, and that he came back among us doing penance for his sins; and that the man never went further than Calcut and Cochin, nor indeed did we at that time navigate those seas that we now navigate."—Garcia, f. 30.

1568.—"... always whereas I have spoken of Gentiles is to be understood Idolaters, and whereas I speak of Moores, I mean Mahometans secte."—Caesar Frederick, in Hakl. ii. 359.

1610.—"The King was fled for fear of the King of Makasar, who... would force the King to turne Moor, for he is a Gentile."—Middleton, in Purchas, i. 239.

1618.—"King Jangier (Johangir) used to make use of a reproach: That one Portugese was better than three Moors, and one Hollander or Englishman better than two Portuguese."—Van Twis, 59.

1655.—"Il y en a de Moors et de Gentils Raspoues (see RAJPOOT) parce que je savoir qu'ils servent mieux que les Mores qui sont superbess, and ne veulent pas qu'on so plaige d'eux, quelque sotise ou quelque tromperie qu'ils fassent."—Thevenot, v. 217.

1673.—"Their Crew were all Moors (by which Word hereafter must be meant those of the Mahometan faith) apparel'd all in white."—Fryer, p. 24.

1685.—"We putt out a peece of a Red Ancient to appear like a Moor's Vessel: not judging it safe to be known to be English; Our nation having lately gott an ill name by abusing ye Inhabitants of these Islands: but no boat would come near us ..." (in the Maldives).—Hedges, Diary, March 9; [Hak. Soc. i. 190].

1688.—"Lascars, who are Moors of India."—Dampier, ii. 57.

1689.—"The place where they went ashore was a Town of the Moors: Which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolators, Gentous or Rashroots (see RAJPOOT)."—Dampier, l. 507.

1747.—"We had the Misfortune to be reduced to almost inevitable Danger, for as our Success chiefly depended on the assistance of the Moors, We were soon brought to the utmost Extremity by being abandoned by them."—Letter from Ft. St. Geo. to the Court, May 2 (India Office MS. Records).

1752.—"His successor Mr. Godheue ... even permitted him (Dupleix) to continue the exhibition of those marks of Moorish dignity, which both Murzafa-jing and Sallabed-jing had permitted him to display."—Orme, i. 367.

1757.—In Ives, writing in this year, we constantly find the terms Moornen and Moorish, applied to the forces against which Clive and Watson were acting on the Hoogly.

1763.—"From these origins, time has formed in India a mighty nation of near ten millions of Mahomedans, whom Europeans call Moors."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 24.

1770.—"Before the Europeans doubled the Cape of Good Hope, the Moors, who were the only maritime people of India, sailed from Surat and Bengal to Malacca."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 210.

1781.—"Mr. Hicky thinks it a Duty incumbent on him to inform his friends in particular, and the Public in General, that an attempt was made to Assassinate him last Thursday Morning between the Hours of One and two o'Clock, by two armed Europeans aided and assisted by a Moorman ..."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 7.

1784.—"Lieutenants Speediman and Rutledge ... were bound, circumsized, and clothed in Moorish garments."—In Seton-Karr, i. 15.

1797.—"Under the head of castes entitled to a favourable term, I believe you comprehend Brahmans, Moormen, merchants, and almost every man who does not belong to the Sudra or cultivating caste. ..."—Minute of Sir T. Mungo, in Arbathnot, i. 17.

1809.—"The rest of the inhabitants, who are Moors, and the richer Gentooes, are dressed in various degrees and fashions."—Ld. Minto in India, p. 17.

1829.—"I told my Moorman, as they call the Mussulmans here, just now to ask the drum-major when the mail for the Pradewan (!) was to be made up."—Memo. of Col. Mountain, 2nd ed. p. 50.

1839.—"As I came out of the gate I met some young Moorish dandies on horseback; one of them was evidently a 'crack-rider,' and began to show off."—Letters from Madras, p. 290.

MOORA, s. Sea Hind. mūra, from Port. murra, Ital. mura; a tack (Roebuck).

MOORAH, s. A measure used in the sale of paddy at Bombay and in Guzerat. The true form of this word is doubtful. From Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. it would seem that mūdī and mūdi are properly cases of rice-straw bound together to contain certain quantities of grain, the former larger and the latter smaller. Hence it would be a vague and varying measure. But there is a land measure of the same name. See Wilson, s.v. Mādi. [The Madras Gloss. gives mūda, Mal. māṭa, from māṭa, 'to cover,' a fastening package; especially the packages in a circular form, like a Dutch cheese, fastened with wisps of straw, in which rice is made up in Malabar and Canara." The mūda is said to be 1 cubic foot and 1,116 cubic inches, and equal to 3 Kulsies (see CULSEY).]

1554.—"(At Baçaim) the Mūra of batzę (see Batta) contains 3 candis (see CANDY), which (batzę) is rice in the husk, and after it is stripped it amounts to a candy and a half, and something more."—A. Nunes, p. 30.

1611.—"I send your worship by the bearer 10 moraes of rice."—Dawers, Letters, i. 116.

s. The Hindustani language was in the 18th century commonly thus styled. The idiom is a curious old English one for the denomination of a language, of which 'broad Scots' is perhaps a type, and which we find exemplified in 'Malabar' (see MALABAR) for Tamil, whilst we have also met with Bengalis for Bengali, with Indostans for Urdu, and with Turks for Turkish. The term Moors is probably now entirely obsolete, but down to 1830, at least, some old officers of the Royal army and some old Madras civilians would occasionally use the term as synonymous with what the former would also call 'the black language.' [Moors for Urdu was certainly in use among the old European pensioners at Chunâr as late as 1892.]

1813.—"Batty Measure.—"* 25 paras ....make 1 moorah.* 4 candies....", 1 moorah."—Milburn, 2nd ed. p. 143.

MOORPUNKY, s. Corr. of Móor-punky, 'peacock-tailed,' or 'peacock-winged'; the name given to certain state pleasure-boats on the Gangetic rivers, now only (if at all) surviving at Murshidâbâd. They are a good deal like the Burmese 'war-boats;' see cut in Mission to Ava (Major Phayre's), p. 4. [A similar boat was the Feelchehra (Hind. fil-chëhra, 'elephant-faced'). In a letter of 1784 Warren Hastings writes: 'I intend to finish my voyage to-morrow in the feelchehra' (Busteed, Echoes, 3rd ed. 291).]

1767.—"Charges Dewanny, viz.:

—Dacca Accounts, in Long, 524.

1780.—"Another boat ... very curiously constructed, the Moor-punky; these are very long and narrow, sometimes extending to upwards of 100 feet in length, and not more than 8 feet in breadth; they are always paddled, sometimes by 40 men, and are steered by a large paddle from the stern, which rises in the shape of a peacock, a snake, or some other animal."—Hodges, 40.

1785.—"... moor-punkees, or peacock-boats, which are made as much as possible to resemble the peacock."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 450.

Hadley, however, mentions in his preface that a small pamphlet had been received by Mr. George Bogle in 1770, which he found to be the mutilated embryo of his own grammatical scheme. This was circulating in Bengal "at his expense."

MOPLAH, s. Malayil, mappila. The usual application of this word is to the indigenous Mahommedans of Malabar; but it is also applied to the indigenous (so-called) Syrian Christians of Cochin and Travancore. In Morton’s Life of Leyden the word in the latter application is curiously misspainted as madilla. The derivation of the word is very obscure. Wilson gives mā-pilla, ‘mother’s son,’ “as sprung from the intercourse of foreign colonists, who were persons unknown, with Malabar women.” Nelson, as quoted below interprets the word as ‘bridegroom’ (it should however rather be ‘son-in-law’).* Dr. Badger suggests that it is from the Arabic verb fālahā, and means ‘a cultivator’ (compare the fehah of Egypt), whilst Mr. C. P. Brown expresses his conviction that it was a Tamil mispronunciation of the Arabic mū'abbār, ‘from over the water.’ No one of these greatly commends itself. [Mr. Logan (Malabar, ii. cxxiii.) and the Madras Glossary derive it from Mal. ma, Skt. maha, ‘great,’ and Mal. pilla, ‘a child.’ Dr. Gundert’s view is that Māppila was an honorary title given to colonists from

MORT-DE-CHEIN, s. A name for cholera, in use, more or less, up to the end of the 18th century, and the former prevalence of which has tended probably to the extraordinary and baseless notion that epidemic cholera never existed in India till the governorship of the Marquis of Hastings. The word in this form is really a corruption of the Portuguese mordexim, shaped by a fanciful French etymology. The Portuguese word again represents the Konkani and Maharatti modachi, modshi, or mod zwarshi, 'cholera,' from a Mahr. verb modmen, 'to break up, to sink' (as under infirmities, in fact 'to collapse'). The Guzaratī appears to be morchi or morachi.

[1504.—Writing of this year Corea mentions the prevalence of the disease in the Samorin's army, but he gives it no name. "Besides other illness there was one almost sudden, which caused such a pain in the belly that a man hardly survived 8 hours of it."—Corea, i. 489.]

1543.—Corea's description is so striking that we give it almost at length: "This winter they had in Goa a mortal distemper which the natives call morxy, and attacking persons of every quality, from the smallest infant at the breast to the old man of fourscore, and also domestic animals and fowls: so that it affected every living thing, male and female. And this malady attacked people without any cause that could be assigned, falling upon sick and sound alike, on the fat and the lean; and nothing in the world was a safeguard against it. And this malady attacked the stomach, caused as some experts affirmed by chill; though later it was maintained that no cause whatever should be discovered. The malady was so powerful and so evil that it immediately produced the symptoms of strong poison; e.g., vomiting, constant desire for water, with drying of the stomach; and cramps that contracted the hams and the soles of the feet, with such pains that the patient seemed dead, with the eyes broken and the nails of the fingers and toes black and crumpled. And for this malady our physicians never found any cure; and the patient was carried off in one day, or at the most in a day and night; insomuch that not ten in a hundred recovered, and those who did recover were such as were healed in haste with medicines of little importance known to the natives. So great was the mortality this season that the bells were tolling all day ... insomuch that the governor forbade the tolling of the church bells, not to frighten the people ... and when a man died in the hospital of this malady of mortexy the Governor ordered all the experts to come together and open the body. But they found nothing wrong except that the paunch was shrunk up like a hen's gizzard, and wrinkled like a piece of scorched leather. ..."—Correa, iv. 288-289.

"Page.—He has got morzi; and he has been ill two hours.

"Orta. — I will follow you.

"Ruano.—Is this the disease that kills so quickly, and that few recover from? Tell me how it is called by our people, and by the natives, and the symptoms of it, and the treatment you use in it.

"Orta. — Our name for the disease is Collerica passo; and the Indians call it morzi; whence again by corruption we call it morixi. ... It is sharper here than in our own part of the world, for usually it kills in four and twenty hours. And I have seen some cases where the patient did not live more than ten hours. The most that it lasts is four days; but as there is no rule without an exception, I once saw a man with great constancy of virtue who lived twenty days continually throwing up ("carginosa") ... bile, and died at last. Let us go and see this sick man; and as for the symptoms you will yourself see what a thing it is."—Garcia, ii. 74v.

1573.—"There is another thing which is useless called by them cannar, which the Canare Brahman physicians usually employ for the collerica passo sickness, which they call morzi; which sickness is so sharp that it kills in fourteen hours or less."—Acosta, Tractado, 27.

1599.—"The disease which in India is called Mordecin. This is a species of Colic, which comes on in those countries with such force and vehemence that it kills in a few hours; and there is no remedy discovered. It causes evacuations by stool or vomit, and makes one burst with pain. But there is a herb proper for the cure, which bears the same name of mordescin."—Corletti, 227.

1602.—"In those islets (off Aracan) they found bad and brackish water, and certain Jeans like ours both green and dry, of which they are some, and in the same moment this gave them a kind of dysentery, which in India they corruptly call mordecin, which ought to be morzis, and which the Arabs call sah zarówno (Ar. huyyat), which is what Basis calls sakida, a disease which kills in 24 hours. Its action is immediately to produce a sunken and slender pulse, with cold sweat, great inward fire, and excessive thirst, the eyes sunken, great vomittings, and in fact it leaves the natural power so collapsed (cuerdoado) that the patient seems like a dead man."—Coata, Dec. IV. liv. iv. cap. 10.

c. 1610.—"Il regne between eux vne autre maladie qui vient a l'improviste, ils la nomment Mordesin, et vient avec grande douleur des testes, et vomissement, et crient fort, et le plus souvent en meurent."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 19; [Hak. Soc. ii. 13].

1631.—"Pulvis ejus (Calumbac) ad scrup. unius pondus sumptus cholerae prodest, quam Mordexin inocae vocant."—Jac. Bossiti, lib. iv. p. 43.

1638.—"... celles qui y regnent le plus, sont celles qu'ils appellent Mordexin, qui tue subitement."—Mandelslo, 265.

1648.—See also the (questionable) Voyages Fames de St. Vincent le Blanc, 76.

c. 1665.—"Les Portugais appellent Mordechin les quatre sortes de Coliques qu'on soufriit dans les Indes ou elles sont frequents ... ceux qui ont la quatrireme enfermez, a savoir le vomissement, le flux de ventre, les extremes douleurs, et je crois que cette derniere est le Colera-Morbus."—Thevenot, v. 324.

1673.—"They apply Cauteries most unmercifully in a Mordisheen, called so by the Portugals, being a Vomiting with Loose-ness."—Fryer, 114.

[174. — "The disease called Mordechi generally commences with a violent fever, accompanied by tremblings, horrors and vomittings; these symptoms are generally followed by delirium and death. He prescribes a hot iron applied to the soles of the feet. He attributes the disease to indigestion, and remarks bitterly that at least the prisoners of the Inquisition were safe from this disease.—Dellon, Relation de l'Inquisition de Goa, ii. ch. 71.]

apply a thin rod, like a spit, and heated, under the heel, till the patient screams with pain, and then to slap the same part with the sole of a shoe, &c.

1705.—"Ce mal s'appelle mort-de-chien."—Laville, 113.

The following is an example of literal translation, as far as we know, unique:

1716.—"The extraordinary distempers of this country (I. of Bourbon) are the Cholick, and what they call the Dog's Disease, which is cured by burning the heel of the patient with a hot iron."—Acct. of the I. of Bourbon, in La Rpaque's Voyage to Arabia the Happy, &c., E.T. London, 1728, p. 155.

1727.—"... the Mordexin (which seizes one suddenly with such oppression and palpitation that he thinks he is going to die on the spot)."—Valentijn, v. (Malabar) 5. c. 1760.—"There is likewise known, on the Malabar coast chiefly, a most violent disorder they call the Mordelein; which seizes the patient with such fury of purging, vomiting, and torments of the intestines, that it will often carry him off in 30 hours."—Grose, i. 250.

1768.—"This (cholera morbus) in the East Indies, where it is very frequent and fatal, is called Mort-de-chien."—Lind, Essay on Diseases incidental to Hot Climates, 248.

1778.—In the Vocabulary of the Portuguese Grammatica Indostana, we find Mordechin, as a Portuguese word, rendered in Hind. by the word badazmi, i.e. bad haizah, 'dyspepsia' (p. 99). The most common modern Hind. term for cholera is Arab. haizah. The latter word is given by Garcia de Orta in the form hahaijx, and in the quotation from Couto as sachaitx (1). Jahangir speaks of one of his nobles as dying in the Deccan, of haizah, in A.D. 1615 (see note to Elliot, vi. 346). It is, however, perhaps not to be assumed that haizah always means cholera. Thus Macpherson mentions that a violent epidemic, which raged in the Camp of Aurangzib at Bijapur in 1689, is called so. But in the history of Khârân Khân (Elliot, vii. 337) the general phrases ta'ân and vâlâ are used in reference to this disease, whilst the description is that of bubonic plague.

1781.—"Early in the morning of the 21st June (1781) we had two men seized with the mort-de-chien."—Curtis, Diseases of India, 3rd ed., Edinb., 1807.

1782.—"Les indigestions appelées dans l'Inde Mort-de-chien, sont fréquentes. Les Castes qui mangent de la viande, nourriture trop pesante pour un climat si chaud, en sont souvent attaquées. ..."—Soumerat, i. 205. This author writes just having described two epidemics of cholera under the name of Flux aigu. He did not apprehend that this was in fact the real Mort-de-chien.

1783.—"A disease generally called 'Mort-de-chien' at this time (during the defence of Onore) raged with great violence among the native inhabitants."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 122.

1796.—"Far more dreadful are the consequences of the above-mentioned intestinal colic, called by the Indians sani, mordexin, and also Nivomben. It is occasioned, as I have said, by the winds blowing from the mountains ... the consequence is that malignant and bilious slimy matter adheres to the bowels, and occasions violent pains, vomiting, fevers, and stupefaction; so that persons attacked with the disease die very often in a few hours. It sometimes happens that 30 or 40 persons die in this manner, in one place, in the course of the day. ... In the year 1782 this disease raged with such fury that a great many persons died of it."—Fra Paolo, E.T. 409-410 (orig. see p. 353). As to the names used by Fra Paolo, for his Shani or Ciuni, we find nothing nearer than Tamil and Mal. sani, 'convulsion, paralysis.' (Winslow in his Tamil Dict. specifies 13 kinds of sani. Komben is explained as 'a kind of cholera or smallpox' (?); and nir-komben ('water-k.') as a kind of cholera or bilious disease). Paolo adds: 'La droga amara costa assai, e non si poteva amministrare a tanti miserabili che pervano. Adunque in mancanza di questa droga amara noi distillavamo in Togatara, o acqua vite di coca, molto sterco di cavalli (!), e l'amministravamo all' infermi. Tutti quelli che prendevano questa guarivano.'

1808.—"Morchée or Mortshee (Guz. and Mideoe (Mah.).) A morbid affection in which the symptoms are convulsive action, followed by evacuations of the first passage up and down, with intolerable tenesmus, or severe convulsive sensation in the intestines, corresponding remarkably with the cholera-morbis of European synoptists, called by the country people in England (i) mortsheen, and by others mord-du-chien and Mana des chienes, as if it had come from France."—R. Drummond, Illustrations, &c. A curious notice; and the author, was, we presume, from his title of "Dr.," a medical man. We suppose for England above should be read India.

The next quotation is the latest instance of the familiar use of the word that we have met with:

1812.—"General M— was taken very ill three or four days ago; a kind of fit—mort-de-chien—the doctor said, brought on by eating too many radishes."—Original Familiar Correspondence between Residents in India, &c., Edinburgh, 1846, p. 257.

1813.—"Mort de chien is nothing more than the highest degree of Cholera Morbus."—Johnson, Inf. of Tropical Climate, 405.

The second of the following quotations evidently refers to the outbreak of cholera mentioned, after Macpherson, in the next paragraph.

1780.—"I am once or twice a year (!) subject to violent attacks of cholera morbus, here called mort-de-chien. . . ."—Impey to Dunning, quoted by Sir James Stephen, ii. 399.

1781.—"The Plague is now broke out in Bengal, and rages with great violence; it has swept away already above 4000 persons; 200 or upwards have been buried in the different Portuguese churches within a few days."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, April 21.

These quotations show that cholera, whether as an epidemic or as sporadic disease, is no new thing in India. Almost in the beginning of the Portuguese expeditions to the East we find apparent examples of the visitations of this terrible scourge, though no precise name is given in the narratives. Thus we read in the Life of Giovanni da Emboli, an adventurous young Florentine who served with the Portuguese, that, arriving in China in 1517, the ships' crews were attacked by a pesima malattia di frasso (virulent flux) of such kind that there died thereof about 70 men, and among these Giovanni himself, and two other Florentines (Vita, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 39). Correa says that, in 1503, 20,000 men died of a like disease in the army of the Zamorin. We have given above Correa's description of the terrible Goa pest of 1543, which was most evidently cholera. Madras accounts, according to Macpherson, first mention the disease at Arcot in 1756, and there are frequent notices of it in that neighbourhood between 1763 and 1787. The Hon. R. Lindsay speaks of it as raging at Sylhet in 1781, after carrying off a number of the inhabitants of Calcutta (Macpherson, see the quotation of 1781 above). It also raged that year at Ganjam, and out of a division of 5000 Bengal troops under Col. Pearse, who were on the march through that district, 1143 were in a few days sent into hospital, whilst "death raged in the camp with a horror not to be described." The earliest account from the pen of an English physician is by Dr. Paisley, and is dated Madras, Feb. 1774. In 1783 it broke out at Hardwar Fair, and is said, in less than 8 days, to have carried off 20,000 pilgrims. The paucity of cases of cholera among European troops in the returns up to 1817, is ascribed by Dr. Macnamara to the way in which facts were disguised by the current nomenclature of disease. It need not perhaps be denied that the outbreak of 1817 marked a great recrudescence of the disease. But it is a fact that some of the more terrible features of the epidemic, which are then spoken of as quite new, had been prominently described at Goa nearly three centuries before.

See on this subject an article by Dr. J. Macpherson in Quarterly Review, for Jan. 1867, and a Treatise on Asiatic Cholera, by C. Macnamara, 1876. To these, and especially to the former, we owe several facts and references; though we had recorded quotations relating to mordexin and its identity with cholera some years before even the earlier of these publications.

MORDEXIM, MORDIXIM, s. Also the name of a sea-fish. Bluteau says 'a fish found at the Isle of Quin- enbe on the Coast of Mozambique, very like bogas (?) or river-pikes.'

MOSELLAY, n.p. A site at Shīrāz often mentioned by Hāfiz as a favourite spot, and near which is his tomb.

c. 1350.—
"Boy ! let you liquid ruby flow,
And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
Whate'er the frowning zealots say ;

1811.—"The stream of Rūknavād murred near us; and within three or four hundred yards was the Mossella and the Tomb of Hāfiz."—W. Osney's Travels, i. 318.

1813.—"Not a shrub now remains of the bower of Mossella, the situation of which is now only marked by the ruins of an ancient tower."—Macdonald's Kinnear's Persia, 92.

MOSQUE, s. There is no room for doubt as to the original of this word being the Ar. masjid, 'a place of worship,' literally the place of sujud, i.e. 'prostration.' And the probable course is this. Masjid becomes (1) in Span. mesquita, Port. mesquita; * (2)

* According to Pyrard mesquita is the word used in the Maldivie Islands. It is difficult to suppose the people would adopt such a word from the Portuguese. And probably the form both in east and west is to be accounted for by a hard pronunciation of the Arabic j, as in Egypt now; the older and probably the most widely diffused. (See Mr. Gray's note in Hak. Soc. ii. 417.)
MOSQUE.

Ital. meschita, moschea; French (old) mosquete, mosquée; (3) Eng. mosque.

Some of the quotations might suggest a different course of modification, but they would probably mislead.

Apropos of masjid rather than of mosque we have noted a ludicrous misapplication of the word in the advertisement to a newspaper story, "Musjeed the Hindoo: Adventures with the Star of India in the Sepoy Mutiny of 1857." The Weekly Detroit Free Press, London, July 1, 1862.

MOSQUITO, s. A gnat is so called in the tropics. The word is Spanish and Port. (dim. of moza, 'a fly'), and probably came into familiar English use from the East Indies, though the earlier quotations show that it was first brought from S. America. A friend annotates here: "Arctic mosquitoes are worst of all; and the Norfolk ones (in the Broads) beat Calcutta!"

It is related of a young Scotch lady of a former generation who on her voyage to India had heard formidable, but vague accounts of this terror of the night, that on seeing an elephant for the first time, she asked: "Will you be what's called a musquetae?"

1539.—"To this misery was there adjoined the great affliction, which the Flies and Gnats (por parte dos almode e mosquitos), that coming out of the neighbouring Woods, bit and stung us in such sort, as not one of us but was gore blood," as to whether "Pinto (orig. cap. xxii.), in Clov. p. 29.

1562.—"We were oftentimes greatly annoyed with a kind of fly, which in the Indian tongue is called Tigurai, and the Spanish call them Muskitos."—Miles Phillips, in Hakl. iii. 564.

1584.—"The 29 Day we set Saile from Saint Iohns, being many of vs stung before upon Shoare with the Muskitos; but the same night we tooke a Spanish Frigat."—

Sir Richard Grenville's Voyage, in Hakl. iii. 308.

1616 and 1673.—See both Terry and Fryer under Chints.

1662.—"At night there is a kind of insect that plagues one mightily; they are called Muscioten,—it is a kind that by their noise and sting cause much irritation."—Salor, 68-69.

1673.—"The greatest Pest is the Mosquito, which not only wheals, but dominneers by its continual Hums."—Fryer, 189.

1690.—(The Governor) "carries along with him a Peon or Servant to Fan him, and drive away the busie Flies, and troublesome Musktoes. This is done with the Hair of a Horse's Tail."—Ovington, 227-8.

1740.—"... all the day we were pestered with great numbers of muscatoos, which are not much unlike the gnats in England, but more venomous. ..."—Anson's Voyage, 9th ed., 1756, p. 46.

1764.—

"Mosquitos, sandflies, seek the sheltered roof, And with full rage the stranger guest assail, Nor spare the sportive child."—Graymer, bk. i.

1833.—"Among rank weeds in deserted Bombay gardens, too, there is a large, speckled, unmusical mosquito, raging and intolerable and thirsty, which will give a new idea in pain to any one that visits its haunts."—Tribes on My Frontier, 27.

MOTURPHA, s. Hind. from Ar. muhtarafa; but according to C. P. B. mohitarifa; [rather Ar. muthtarifa, mukhtarif, 'an artizan']. A name technically applied to a number of miscellaneous taxes in Madras and Bombay, such as were called sayer (q.v.), in Bengal.

[1813.—"Mohterefa. An artificer. Taxes, personal and professional, on artificers, merchants and others; also on houses, implements of agriculture, looms, &c., a branch of the sayer."—Gloss. 5th Report, s.v.]

1826.—"... for example, the tax on merchants, manufacturers, &c. (called mohturfa). ..."—Grant Duff, H. of the Mahrattas, 3rd ed. 356.]

MOULMEIN, n.p. This is said to be originally a Talaing name Mutt-muvu-leem, syllables which mean (or may be made to mean) 'one-eye-destroyed'; and to account for which a cock-and-bull legend is given (probably invented for the purpose): "Tradition says that the city was founded ... by a king with three eyes, having an extra eye in his forehead, but that by the machinations of a woman, the eye in his forehead was destroyed. ..." (Mason's Burmah, 2nd ed. p. 18). The Burmese corrupted the name into Moul-ba-yaing, whence the foreign (probably Malay) form Maulmain. The place so called is on the opposite side of the estuary of the Saiwin R. from Mottaban (q.v.), and has entirely superseded that once famous port. Moulmein, a mere site, was chosen as the headquarters of the Tenasserim provinces, when those became British in 1826 after the first Burmese War. It has lost political importance since the annexation of Pegu, 26 years later, but is a thriving city which numbered in 1881, 53,107 inhabitants; [in 1891, 55,785].

MOUNT DELY, n.p. (See DELLY, MOUNT.)

MOUSE-DEER, s. The beautiful little creature, Meminna indica (Gray), [Tragulus meminna, the Indian Chevrotain (Blanford, Mammalia, 555),] found in various parts of India, and weighing under 6 lbs., is so called. But the name is also applied to several pigmy species of the genus Tragulus, found in the Malay regions, [where, according to Mr. Skeat, it takes in popular tradition the place of Brer Rabbit, outwitting even the tiger, elephant, and crocodile.] All belong to the family of Musk-deer.

MUCHÁN, s. Hind. machán, Dekh. manchán, Skt. maniche. An elevated platform; such as the floor of huts among the Indo-Chinese races; or a stage or scaffolding erected to watch a tiger, to guard a field, or what not.

1662.—"As the soil of the country is very damp, the people do not live on the ground-floor, but on the machán, which is the name for a raised floor."—Shah-buddan Tâlish, by Blockmann, in J.A.S.B. xli. Pt. i. 84.

1882.—"In a shady green mechan in some fine tree, watching at the cool of evening. ..."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed. 284.]

MUCHWA, s. Mahr. māchāvā, Hind. machāva, machāvā. A kind of boat or large in use about Bombay.

MUCKNA, s. Hind. makhnā, which comes from Skt. mākhuna, 'a bug, a flea, a beardless man, an elephant without tusks'. A male elephant without tusks or with only rudimentary tusks. These latter are familiar in Bengal, and still more so in Ceylon, where according to Sir S. Baker, "not more than one in 300 has tusks; they are merely provided with short grubbors, projecting generally about 3 inches from the upper jaw, and about 2 inches in diameter." (The Rifle and Hound in Ceylon, 11.) Sanderson (13 Years among the Wild Beasts of India, [3rd ed. 66]) says: "On the Continent of India mucknas, or elephants born without tusks, are decidedly rare . . . Muckwas breed in the herds, and the peculiarity is not hereditary or transmitted." This author also states that out of 51 male elephants captured by him in Mysore and Bengal only 5 were mucknas. But the definition of a mukuva in Bengal is that which we have given, including those animals which possess only feminine or rudimentary tusks, the 'short grubbors' of Baker; and these latter can hardly be called rare among domesticated elephants. This may be partially due to a preference in purchasers.* The same author derives the term from mukkha, 'face'; but the reason is obscure. Shakespear and Platts give the word as also applied to 'a cock without spurs.'

c. 1780.—"An elephant born with the left tooth only is reckoned sacred; with black spots in the mouth unlucky, and not saleable; the mukna or elephant born without teeth is thought the best."—Hon. R. Lindsay in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 194.

MUCAOA, MUKUVA, n.p. Malayal. and Tamil, mukkuvan (sing.), 'a diver,' and mukkuvar (pl.). [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. s.v.) derives it from Drav. mukkuva, 'to dive'; the Madras Gloss. gives Tam. mukkud, with the same meaning.] A name applied to the fishermen of the western coast of the Peninsula near C. Comorin. [But Mr. Pringle (Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 187) points out that formerly as now, the word was of much more general application. Orme in a passage quoted below employs it of boatmen at Karikal. The use of the word extended as far N. as Madras, and on the W. coast; it was not confined to the extreme S.] It was among these, and among the corresponding class of Paravars on the east coast, that F. Xavier's most noted labours in India occurred.

1510.—"The fourth class are called Meccha, and these are fishers."—Varthema, 142.

1525.—"And Dom Joao had secret speech with a married Christian whose wife and children were inside the fort, and a valiant man, with whom he arranged to give him 200 pardaos (and that he gave him on the spot) to set fire to houses that stood round the fort. . . . So this Christian, called Duarte Fernandes . . . put on a lot of old rags and tags, and powdered himself with ashes, and the fashion of jogues (see JOGEE . . . also defiling his hair with a mixture of oil and ashes, and disguising himself like a regular jogue, whilst he tied under his rags a parcel of gunpowder and pieces of slow-match, and so commending himself to God, in which all joined, slipped out of the fort by night, and as the day broke, he came to certain huts of macuas, which are fishermen, and began to beg alms in the usual palaver of the jogues, i.e. prayers for their long life, and health, and the conquest of enemies, and easy deliveries for their womenkind, and prosperity for their children, and other grand things."—Correa, ii. 871.

1552.—Barros has mucuaria, 'a fisherman's village.'

1600.—"Those who gave the best reception to the Gospel were the Macoaos; and, as they had no church in which to assemble, they did so in the fields and on the shores, and with such fervour that the Father found himself at times with 5000 or 6000 souls about him."—Lucena, Vida do P. P. Xavier, 117.

—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

1677.—Resolved "to raise the rates of hire of the Meusilas (see MUSSOOLA) boatmen called Macquars."—Pt. St. Geo. Com., Jan 12, in Notes and Exts. No. i. 54.

1684.—"The Macquas or Boatmen ye Ordinary Astrlogers (sic) for weather did . . . prognosticate great Rains . . ."—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo., 1st ser. iii. 181.

1727.—"They may marry into lower Tribes . . . and so may the Muckwas, or Fishers, who, I think, are a higher tribe than the Poulisias (see POLEA)."—A. Hamilton, i. 310, [ed. 1744], i. 312.

* Sir George Yule notes: "I can distinctly call to mind 6 muknas that I had (1 may have had more) out of 30 or 40 elephants that passed through my hands." This would give 15 or 20 per cent, of muknas, but as the stud included females, the result would rather consist with Mr. Sanderson's 5 out of 51 males.

1746.—"194 Macquars attending the seaside at night..."—Account of Extraordinary Expenses, at Ft. St. David (India Office MS. Records).

1760.—"Fifteen massocolas (see Mus-Soola) accompanied the ships; they took in 170 of the troops, besides the Macoas, who are the black fellows that row them."—Orme, ed. 1803, iii. 617.

[1813.—"The Muckwas or Macquars of Tellicherry are an industrious, useful set of people."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 202.]

MUDÁR, s. Hind. madár, Skt. mandára; Calotropis procera, R. Brown, N.O. Asclepiadaceae. One of the most common and widely diffused plants in uncultivated plains throughout India. In Sind the bark fibre is used for halters, &c., and experiment has shown it to be an excellent material worth £40 a ton in England, if it could be supplied at that rate; but the cost of collection has stood in the way of its utilisation. The seeds are imbedded in a silky floss, used to stuff pillows. This also has been the subject of experiment for textile use, but as yet without practical success. The plants abound with an acrid milky juice which the Rájputs are said to employ for infanticide. (Punjab Plants.) The plant is called Ak in Sind and throughout N. India.

MUDDLE, s. (?) This word is only known to us from the clever—perhaps too clever—little book quoted below. The word does not seem to be known, and was probably a misapprehension of budlee. [Even Mr. Brandt and Mrs. Wyatt are unable to explain this word. The former does not remember hearing it. Both doubt its connection with budlee. Mrs. Wyatt suggests with hesitation Tamil muder, "boiled rice," mudei-palli, "the cook-house."]

1836-7.—"Besides all these acknowledged and ostensible attendants, each servant has a kind of muddle or double of his own, who does all the work that can be put off upon him without being found out by his master or mistress."—Letters from Madras, 38.

"They always come accompanied by their Vakaels, a kind of Secretaries, or interpreters, or flappers,—their muddies in short; everybody here has a muddle, high or low."—Letters from Madras, 86.

a. Ar. Muftí, an expounder of the Mahommedan Law, the utterer of the futūwá (see FUTWAH). Properly the Muftí is above the Kāżí who carries out the judgment. In the 18th century, and including Regulation IX. of 1793, which gave the Company's Courts in Bengal the reorganisation which substantially endured till 1862, we have frequent mention of both Cauzies and Mufties as authorized expounders of the Mahommedan Law; but, though Kāżís were nominally maintained in the Provincial Courts down to their abolition (1829-31), practically the duty of those known as Kāżís became limited to quite different objects and the designation of the Law-officer who gave the futūwá in our District Courts was Mauvāzi. The title Muftí has been long obsolete within the limits of British administration, and one might safely say that it is practically unknown to any surviving member of the Indian Civil Service, and never was heard in India as a living title by any Englishman now surviving. (See CAZÉE, LAW-OFFICE, MOOLVÉE.)

b. A slang phrase in the army, for 'plain clothes.' No doubt it is taken in some way from a, but the transition is a little obscure. [It was perhaps originally applied to the attire of dressing - gown, smoking - cap, and slippers, which was like the Oriental dress of the Muftí who was familiar in Europe from his appearance in Molière's Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Compare the French en Pekin.]

MUGG, n.p. Beng. Magh. It is impossible to deviate without deterioration from Wilson's definition of this obscure name: "A name commonly applied to the natives of Arakan, particularly those bordering on Bengal, or residing near the sea; the people of Chittagong." It is beside the question of its origin or proper application, to say, as Wilson goes on to say, on the authority of Lieut. (now Sir Arthur) Phayre, that the Arakanese disclaim the title, and restrict it to a class held in contempt, viz. the descendants of Arakanese settlers on the frontier of Bengal by Bengali mothers. The proper names of foreign nations in any language do not require the sanction of the nation to whom they are applied, and are often not recognised by the latter. German is not the German name for the Germans, nor Welsh the Welsh name for the Welsh, nor Hindu (originally) a Hindu word, nor China a Chinese word. The origin of the present word is very obscure. Sir A. Phayre kindly furnishes us with this note: "There is good reason to conclude that the name is derived from Maga, the name of the ruling race for many centuries in Magadha (modern Behar). The kings of Arakan were no doubt originally of this race. For though this is not distinctly expressed in the histories of Arakan, there are several legends of Kings from Benares reigning in that country, and one regarding a Brahman who marries a native princess, and whose descendants reign for a long period. I say this, although Buchanan appears to reject the theory (see Montg. Martin, ii. 18 seqq.)" The passage is quoted below.

On the other hand the Mahomedan writers sometimes confound Buddhists with fire-worshippers, and it seems possible that the word may have been Pers. magh = magus.' [See Risley, Tribes and Castes, ii. 28 seq.] The Chittagong Muggs long furnished the best class of native cooks in Calcutta; hence the meaning of the last quotation below.

1585.—"The Mogen, which be of the kingdom of Recon (see ARAKAN) and Rame, be stronger than the King of Tipara; so that Chatigam or Porto Grande (q.v.) is often under the King of Recon."—R. Fitch, in Hakti, ii. 389.

c. 1590.—(In a country adjoining Pegu)
"there are mines of ruby and diamond and gold and silver and copper and petroleum and sulphur and (the lord of that country) has war with the tribe of Magh about the mines; also with the tribe of Tiparn there are battles."—Atin (orig.) i. 388; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 120].

c. 1604.—"Defeat of the Magh Raja.—This short-sighted Raja... became elated with the extent of his treasures and the number of his elephants. ... He then openly rebelled, and assembling an army at Sunargwân laid seige to a fort in that vicinity... Raja Mân Singh... despatched a force... These soon brought the Magh Raja and all his forces to action... regardless of the number of his boats and the strength of his artillery."—Indiayutullah, in Elliot, vi. 109.

MUGGUR, s. Hind. and Mahr. magar and makar, from Skt. makara a sea-monster (see MACAREO). The destructive broad-snouted crocodile of the Ganges and other Indian rivers, formerly called Crocodylus biporcatus, now apparently subdivided into several sorts or varieties.

1611. "Alligators or Crocodiles there called MUGGUR match. "—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 438. The word is here intended for mugar-mats or machh, crocodile-fish."

1878. "The mugur is a gross pleb, and his features stamp him as low-born. His manners are coarse."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 82-3.

1879. "En route I killed two crocodiles; they are usually called alligators, but that is a misnomer. It is the mugger... these muggers kill a good many people, and have a playful way of getting under a boat, and knocking off the steersman with their tails, and then swallowing him afterwards."—Pollok, Sport, &c., i. 168.

1881. "Alligator leather attains by use a beautiful gloss, and is very durable... and it is possible that our rivers contain a sufficient number of the two varieties of crocodile, the muggar and the garial (see GAVIAL) for the tanners and leather-dressers of Calncrope to experiment upon."—Pioneer Mail, April 26.

MUGGARABEE, n.p. Ar. maghrabi, western. This word, applied to western Arabs, or Moors proper, is as might be expected, not now common in India. It is the term that appears in the Hayraddin Mograbbin of Quentin Durward. From gharb, the root of this word, the Spaniards have the province of Algarve, and both Spanish and Portuguese have garbin, a west wind. [The magician in the tale of Alaeddin is a Maghrabi, and to this day in Languedoc and Gascony Magraby is used as a term of cursing. (Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 35, 379). Muggerbee is used for a coin (see GUBBER.)]

1563. "The proper tongue in which Avicenna wrote is that which is used in Syria and Mesopotamia and in Persia and in Tartsry (from which latter Avicenna came) and this tongue they call Avaby; and that of our Moors they call Magrarby, as much as to say Moorish of the West."—Garcia, f. 19v.

MULL, s. A contraction of Mulligatawny, and applied as a distinctive sobriquet to members of the Service belonging to the Madras Presidency, as Bengal people are called Quhihis, and Bombay people Ducks or Be-nighted.

1860.—"It ys ane darke Londe, and ther dwellen ye Cimmerians whereof spoketh Homeris Poeta in his Odyssea, and to thys Daye thei clepen Tenembros or 'ye Benyghted ffolke.' Bot thei clepen hemselfys Mullys from Mulligatawne whch ys ane of thei goddys from weh thei ben ysprong."—Ext. from a lately discovered Ms. of Sir John Maunderville.

MULLIGATAWNY, s. The name of this well-known soup is simply a corruption of the Tamil muligu-tannir, pepper-water; showing the correctness of the popular belief which ascribes the origin of this excellent article to Madras, whence—and not merely from the complexion acquired there—the sobriquet of the preceding article.

1784.—"In vain our hard fate we repine; In vain our fortune we rail; On Mullighee-tawny we dine, Or Congee, in Bangalore Jail,"—Song by a Gentleman of the Navy (one of Hyder's Prisoners), in Selon-Karr, i. 18.

MULMULL, s. Hind. mulmal; Muslin.

[c. 1590.—"Malmal, per piece ... 4 B."—Ain, ed. Blochmann, i. 94.]

1663.—"Ye said Ellis told your Petitioner that he would not take 500 Pieces of your Petitioner's mulmulls unless your Petitioner gave him 200 Rups, which your Petitioner being poor could not do."—

MUNCH, manjeel, s. This word is proper to the S.W. coast ; Malayal, manjul, mächul, from Skt. mancha. It is the name of a kind of hammock-litter used on that coast as a substitute for palanquin or dooly. It is substantially the same as the dandy of the Himâlaya, but more elaborate. Correa describes but does not name it.

1561.—"... He came to the factory in a litter which men carried on their shoulders. These are made with thick canes, bent upwards and arched, and from them are suspended some clothes half a fathom in width, and a fathom and a half in length; and at the extremities pieces of wood to sustain the cloth hanging from the pole; and upon this cloth a mattress of the same size as the cloth ... the whole very splendid, and as rich as the gentlemen ... may desire."—Correa, Three Voyages, &c., p. 199.

1811.—"The Inquisition is about a quarter of a mile distant from the convent, and we proceeded thither in manjeel."—Buchanan, Christian Researches, 2nd ed., 171.

1819.—"Munchel, a kind of litter resembling a sea-cot or hammock, hung to a long pole, with a moveable cover over the whole, to keep off the sun or rain. Six men will run with one from one end of the Malabar coast to the other, while twelve are necessary for the lightest palanquin."—Welsh, ii. 142.

1844.—"Muncheel, with poles complete. ... Poles, Muncheel, Spare."—Jameson's Bombay Code, Ordinance Nomenclature.

1862.—"We ... started ... in Muncheels or hammocks, slung to bamboo, with a shade over them, and carried by six men, who kept up uneartly yells the whole time."—Markham, Peru and India, 353.

c. 1886.—"When I landed at Diu, an officer met me with a Muncheel for my use, viz. a hammock slung to a pole, and protected by an awning."—M.-Gen. R. H. Keatinge.

A form of this word is used at Réunion, where a kind of palanquin is called "le manchay." It gives a title to one of Leconte de Lisle's Poems:

c. 1858.—"Sous un nuage frais de claire mousseline Tous les dimanches au matin, Tu venais à la ville en manchay de rotin,
Par les rampes de la colline.

Le Manchay.

The word has also been introduced by the Portuguese into Africa in the forms maxilla, and mouchila.

1810.—"... tangas, que elles chamão maxilas."—Annaes Maritimas, iii. 344.

1880.—"The Portuguese (in Quiliman) seldom even think of walking the length of their own street, and ... go from house to house in a sort of palanquin, called here a machilla (pronounced masheela). This usually consists of a pole placed upon the shoulders of the natives, from which is suspended a long plank of wood, and upon that is fixed an old-fashioned-looking chair, or sometimes two. Then there is an awning over the top, hung all round with curtains. Each machilla requires about 6 to 8 bearers, who are all dressed alike in a kind of livery."—A Journey in E. Africa, by M. A. Pringle, p. 89.

MUNGOOSE, s. This is the popular Anglo-Indian name of the Indian ichneumons, represented in the South by Mangusta Mungos (Elliott), or Herpestes griseus (Geoffroy) of naturalists, and in Bengal by Herpestes malaccensis. [Blanford (Mammalia, 119 seqq.) recognizes eight species, the "Common Indian Mungoose" being described as Herpestes mungo.] The word is Telugu, manjisu, or mungisa. In Upper India the animal is called neval, neold, or nyaul. Jerdon gives mangis however as a Deccani and Mahr. word; [Platts gives it as dialectic, and very doubtfully derives it from Skt. makhua, 'moving quickly.'] In Ar. it is bint-arâs, 'daughter of the bridgroom,' in Egypt kitît or katt Farâün, 'Pharaoh's cat' (Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 369).

1673.—"... a Mongoose is akin to a Ferret. ..."—Fryer, 116.

1681.—"The knowledge of these antidotal herbs they have learned from the Munggutia, a kind of Ferret."—Knox, 115.

1685.—"They have what they call a Mangus, creatures something different from ferrets; these hold snakes in great antipathy, and if they once discover them never give up till they have killed them."—Ribeyro, f. 566.

Bluteau gives the following as a quotation from a History of Ceylon, tr. from Portuguese into French, published at Paris in 1701, p. 153. It is in fact the gist of an anecdote in Ribeyro.

"There are persons who cherish this animal and have it to sleep with them, although it is ill-tempered, for they prefer to be bitten by a mangus to being killed by a snake."

1774.—"He (the Dharma Raja of Bhootan) has got a little lap-dog and a Mungooos, which he is very fond of."—Bogle's Diary, in Markham's Tibet, 27.
1790. — "His (Mr. Glan's) experiments have also established a very curious fact, that the ichneumon, or mungoose, which is very common in this country, and kills snakes without danger to itself, does not use antidotes . . . but that the poison of snakes is, to this animal, innocent."—Letter in Colebrooke's Life, p. 40.

1829. — "Il Mongüe animale simile ad una donnola."—Papi, in de Gubernatis, St. dei Viagg. Ital., p. 279.

MUNNIEPORE. n.p. Properly Manipur; a quasi-independent State lying between the British district of Cachar on the extreme east of Bengal, and the upper part of the late kingdom of Burma, and in fact including a part of the watershed between the tributaries of the Brahmaputra and those of the Irawadi. The people are of genuinely Indo-Chinese and Mongoloid aspect, and the State, small and secluded as it is, has had its turn in temporary conquest and domination, like almost all the States of Indo-China from the borders of Assam to the mouth of the Mekong. Like the other Indo-Chinese States, too, Manipur has its royal chronicle, but little seems to have been gathered from it. The Rajas and people have, for a period which seems uncertain, professed Hindu religion. A disastrous invasion of Manipur by Alompra, founder of the present Burmese dynasty, in 1755, led a few years afterwards to negotiations with the Bengal Government, and the conclusion of a treaty, in consequence of which a body of British sepoys was actually despatched in 1763, but eventually returned without reaching Manipur. After this, intercourse practically ceased till the period of our first Burmese War (1824-25), when the country was overrun by the Burmese, who also entered Cachar; and British troops, joined with a Manipuri force, expelled them. Since then a British officer has always been resident at Manipur, and at one time (c. 1838-41) a great deal of labour was expended on opening a road between Cachar and Manipur. [The murder of Mr. Quinton, Chief-Commissioner of Assam, and other British officers at Manipur, in the close of 1890, led to the infliction of severe punishment on the leaders of the outbreak. The Mahāraja, whose abdication led to this tragedy, died in Calcutta in the following year, and the State is now under British management during the minority of his successor.]

This State has been called by a variety of names. Thus, in Rennell's Memoir and maps of India it bears the name of Meckley. In Synes's Narrative, and in maps of that period, it is Cassay; names, both of which have long disappeared from modern maps. Meckley represents the name (Makli?') by which the country was known in Assam; Majii (apparently a form of the same) was the name in Cachar; Ku-se or Ku-thé (according to the Ava pronunciation) is the name by which it is known to the Shans or Burmese.

1755. — "I have carried my Arms to the confines of China . . . on the other quarter I have reduced to my subjection the major part of the Kingdom of Cassay; whose Heir I have taken captive, see there he sits behind you . . ."—Speech of Alomppra to Capt. Baker at Monichabun. Dalrymeyle, Or. Rep., i. 152.

1759. — "Cassay, which . . . lies to the N. Westward of AVA, is a Country, so far as I can learn, hitherto unheard of in Europe . . ."—Letter, dd. 22 June 1759, in ibid. 116.

[1762. — . . . the President sent the Board a letter which he had received from Mr. Verelst at Chittagong, containing an invitation which had been made to him and his Council by the Rajah of Meckley to assist him in obtaining redress . . . from the Burmas . . ."—Letter, in Wheeler, Early Records, 291.]

1763. — "Meckley is a Hilly Country, and is bounded on the North, South, and West by large tracts of Cookie Mountains, which prevent any intercourse with the countries beyond them; and on the East *by the Burampoota (see BURRAM-FOOTER); beyond the Hills, to the North by Assam and Poong; to the West Cashar; to the South and East the BURMAH Country, which lies between Meckley and China. . . . The Burampoota is said to divide, somewhere to the north of Poong, into two large branches one of which passes through Asam, and down by the way of Dacca, the other through Poong into the Burma Country."—Act. of Meckley, by Ncher Doss Goswinnen, in Dalrymple's Or. Rep., ii. 477-478.

1793.—"... The first ridge of mountains towards Thibet and Bootan, forms the limit of the survey to the north; to which I may now add, that the surveys extend no farther eastward, than the frontiers of Assam and Meckley. ... The space between Bengal

Meckley and other districts, subject to the King of Burmah, or Ava. ..."—Rennell's Memoir, 295.

1799.—(Referring to 1757). "Elated with success Alompra returned to Monchaboo, now the seat of imperial government. After some months ... he took up arms against the Cassayers. ... Having landed his troops, he was preparing to advance to Munnepora, the capital of Cassay, when information arrived that the Peguers had revolted. ..."—Symes, Narrative, 41-42.

"All the troopers in the King's service are natives of Cassay, who are much better horsemen than the Birmans." —Ibid, 318.

(seen NEGRAIS), as faras Azen (see ASSAM), and even further, there is a small chain of mountains that divides Aracan and Cassé from the Burmese. ..."—Sangermano, p. 33.

1827.—"The extensive area of the Burman territory is inhabited by many distinct nations or tribes, of whom I have heard not less than eighteen enumerated. The most considerable of these are the proper Birmans, the Peguans or Talains, the Shans or people of Lao, the Cassay, or more correctly Kathé. ..."—Crawfurd's Journal, 372.

1856.—"The weaving of these silks ... gives employment to a large body of the population in the suburbs and villages round the capital, especially to the Mun-npoorians, or Kathé, as they are called by the Burmese.

"These people, the descendants of unfortunates who were carried off in droves from their country by the Burmans in the time of King Mentaragyi and his predecessors, form a very great proportion ... of the metropolitan population, and they are largely diffused in nearly all the districts of Central Burma. ... Whatever work is in hand for the King or for any of the chief men near the capital, these people supply the labouring hands; if boats have to be manned they furnish the rowers; and whilst engaged on such tasks any remuneration they may receive is very scanty and uncertain."—Tyle, Mission to Ava, 158-154.

MUNSUBDAR. Hind, from Pers, mansubdár, 'the holder of office or dignity' (Ar. mansab). The term was used to indicate quasi-feudal dependents of the Mogul Government who had territory assigned to them, on condition of their supplying a certain number of horse, 500, 1000 or more. In many cases the title was but nominal, and often it was assumed without warrant.

[Mr. Irvine discusses the question at length and represents mansab by "the word 'rank'; as its object was to set precedence and fix gradation of pay; it did not necessarily imply the exercise of any particular office, and meant nothing beyond the fact that the holder was in the employ of the State, and bound in return to yield certain services when called upon."

MUNTREE, s. Skt. Mantri. A minister or high official. The word is especially affected in old Hindu States, and in the Indo-Chinese and Malay States which derive their ancient civilisation from India. It is the word which the Portuguese made into mandarin (q.v.).

1810.—"When the Court was full, and

MUSCÁT, n.p., properly Māskāt. A port and city of N.E. Arabia; for a long time the capital of 'Oman. (See IMAUM.)

MUSIC. There is no matter in which the sentiments of the people of India differ more from those of Englishmen than on that of music, and curiously enough the one kind of Western music which they appreciate, and seem to enjoy, is that of the bagpipe. This is testified by Captain Munro in the passage quoted below; but it was also shown during Lord Canning's visit to Lahore in 1860, in a manner which dwells in the memory of one of the present writers. The escort consisted of part of a Highland regiment. A venerable Sikh chief who heard the pipes exclaimed: 'That is indeed music! it is like that which we hear of in ancient story, which was so exquisite that the heavers became insensible (behosh).'

1780.—"The bagpipe appears also to be a favourite instrument among the natives. They have no taste indeed for any other kind of music, and they would much rather listen to this instrument a whole day than to an organ for ten minutes."—Munro's Narrative, 33.

MUSK, s. We get this word from the Lat. muschus, Greek μῦχος, and the latter must have been got, probably through Persian, from the Skt. mushka, the literal meaning of which is rendered in the old English phrase 'a cod of musk.' The oldest known European mention of the article is that which we give from St. Jerome; the oldest medical prescription is in a work of Aetius, of Amida (c. 540). In the quotation from Cosmas the word used is μῦχος, and kasturi is a Skt. name, still, according to Royle, applied to the musk-deer in the Himalaya. The transfer of the name to (or from) the article called by the Greeks καστόριον, which is an analogous product of the beaver, is curious. The Musk-deer (Moschus moschiferus, L.) is found throughout the Himalaya at elevations rarely (in summer) below 8000 feet, and extends east to the borders of Szechuen, and north to Siberia.

c. 515.—"This little animal is the Musk (μῦχος). The natives call it in their own tongue καστούρι. They hunt it and shoot it, and binding tight the blood collected about the navel they cut this off, and this is the sweet smelling part of it, and what we call musk."—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi.

There are a certaine beast in Tartaria, which is wilde and big as a wolfe, which beast they take alue, and beat him to death with small stanes yt his blood may be spread through his whole body, then they cut it in pieces, and take out all the bones, and beat the flesh with the blood in a mortar very smal, and dry it, and make purses to put it in the skin and these be the Codis of Muske."—Cesar Frederick, in Hakl. ii. 572.]

1673.—"Musk. It is best to buy it in the Cod . . . that which openeth with a bright Musk colour is best."—Fryer, 212.

MUSK-RAT, s. The popular name of the Sorex caeruleus, Jerdon, [Grocilura caerulea, Blanford], an animal having much the figure of the common shrew, but nearly as large as a small brown rat. It diffuses a strong musky odour, so penetrative that it is commonly asserted to affect bottled beer by running over the bottles in a cellar. As Jerdon judiciously observes, it is much more probable that the corks have been affected before being used in bottling; [and Blanford (Mammalia, 237) writes that "the absurd story . . . is less credited in India than it formerly was, owing to the discovery that liquors bottled in Europe and exported to India are not liable to be tainted." When the female is in heat she is often seen to be followed by a string of males giving out the odour strongly. Can this be the mus peregrinus mentioned by St. Jerome (see MUSK), as P. Vinzenzo supposes?

c. 1590.—“Here (in Tooman Bekhrad, n. of Kabul R.) are also mice that have a fine musky scent”—Aggen, by Gladwin (1800) in his Muske;—J. Jarrett, ii. 106.

[1598.—“They are called sweet smelling Ratties, for they have a smell as if they were full of Muske.”—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 303.]

1672.—P. Vinzenzo Maria, speaking of his first acquaintance with this animal (il ratto del musco), which occurred in the Casparian Convent at Surat, says with simplicity (or malignity?): “I was astonished to perceive an odour so fragrant in the vicinity of those most religious Fathers, with whom I was at the moment in conversation.”—Viaggio, p. 385.

1681.—“This country has its vermin also. They have a sort of Rats they call Musk-rats, because they smell strong of musk. These the inhabitants do not eat of, but of all other sorts of Rats they do.”—Knox, p. 31.

1759.—H. Munro in his Narrative (p. 34) absurdly enough identifies this animal with the Bandicoot, q.v.

1813.—See Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 42; [2nd. ed. i. 26].

MUSLIN. s. There seems to be no doubt that this word is derived from Mosul (Mausal or Mauvil) on the Tigris,† and it has been from an old date the name of a texture, but apparently not always that of the thin semi-transparent tissue to which we now apply it. Dozy (p. 323) says that the Arabs employ musvili in the same sense as our word, quoting the Arabian Nights (Macnaghten’s ed., i. 176, and ii. 159), in both of which the word indicates the material of a fine turban. [Burton (i. 211) translates ‘Mosul stuff,’ and says it may mean either of ‘Mosul fashion,’ or muslin.] The quotation from Ives, as well as that from Marco Polo, seems to apply to a different texture from what we call muslin.

1298.—“All the cloths of gold and silk that are called Mosolins are made in this country (Mausul).”—Marco Polo, Bk. i. chap. 5.

c. 1544.—“Almosulisti est regio in Mesopotamia, in qua texuntur tela ex bombyce valde pulchrae, quae apud Syros et Aegyptios et apud mercatores Venetos appelantur musolisti, ex hoc regionis nomine. Et principes Aegypti et Syri, tempore aetatis sedentem in loco honorauliori indunt vestes ex hujusmodi musolisti.”—Andreae Bello-venesian, Araboricorum nominum quae in libris Arabicis sparsim legiuntur Interpretatio.

c. 1580.—“For the rest the said Agiani (misprint for Bagnani, Banyans) wear clothes of white mossolo or mossi (†); having their garments very long and crossed over the breast.”—Galgaro Balbi, t. 336.

1673.—“Le drap qu’on estend sur les matelas est une toile aussy fine que de la musceline.”—App. to Journal d’Ant. Galloud, ii. 198.

1685.—“I have been told by several, that muscellin (so much in use here for cravats) and Calligio (†), and the most of the Indian linens, are made of nettles, and I see not the least improbability but that they may be made of the fibres of them.”—Dr. Hans Sloane to Mr. Ray, in Ray Correspondence, 1848, p. 163.

c. 1760.—“This city (Mosul)’s manufactory is Mussolin [read Mussole] (a cotton cloth) which they make very strong and pretty fine, and sell for the European and other markets.”—Isee, Voyage, p. 324.

MUSNUD. s. H.—Ar. masnad, from root sanad, ‘he leaned or rested upon it.’ The large cushion, &c., used by native Princes in India, in place of a throne.

1752.—“Salabat-jing... went through the ceremony of sitting on the musnud or throne.”—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 250.

1757.—“On the 29th the Colonel went to the Soubab’s Palace, and in the presence of all the Rajahs and great men of the court, 1803.—“The Peshwah arrived yesterday, and is to be seated on the musnud.”—A. Wellesley, in Munro’s Life, i. 343.

1809. —“In it was a musnud, with a carpet, and a little on one side were chairs on a white cloth.”—Ld. Valentia, i. 346.

1824.—“They spread fresh carpets, and prepared the royal musnud, covering it with a magnificent shawl.”—Haji Baba, ed. 1835, p. 142.

1827.—“The Prince Tippoo had scarcely dismounted from his elephant, and occupied the musnud, or throne of cushions.”—Sir W. Scott, Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. xiv.

MUSSALLA. s. P.-H. (with change of sense from Ar. masülîh, pl. of masûlah) ‘materials, ingredients,’ lit. ‘things for the good of, or things or affairs conducive to good.’ Though sometimes used for the ingredients of any mixture, e.g. to form a cement, the most usual application is to spices, curry-stuffs and the like. There is a tradition of a very gallant Governor-General that he had found it very tolerable, on a sharp but brief campaign, to "rough it on chupassies and mussaulchees" (qq.v.), meaning chupatties and musalla.

1780.—“A dose of marsall, or purgative spices.”—Munro, Narrative, 85.

1809.—“At the next hut the woman was grinding missala or curry-stuff on a flat smooth stone with another shaped like a rolling pin.”—Maria Graham, 20.

MUSSAUL, s. Hind. from Ar. mash'âl, ‘a torch.’ It is usually made of rags wrapped round a rod, and fed at intervals with oil from an earthen pot.

1810.—“The Mosaul, or flambeau, consists of old rags, wrapped very closely round a small stick.”—Williamson, V. M. i. 219.

[1813.—“These nocturnal processions illuminated by many hundred massauls or torches, illustrate the parable of the ten virgins. . . .”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 274.

[1857.—“Near him was another Hindoo. . . . he is called a Mussal; and the lamps and lights are his special department.”—Lady Falkland, Chow-Chor, 2nd ed. i. 35.]

MUSSAULCHEE, s. Hind. mash'al-chî from mash'âl (see MUSSAUL), with the Turkish termination čî, generally implying an agent. [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, i. 239) almashâlî is the executioner.] The word properly means a link-boy, and was formerly familiar in that sense as the epithet of the person who ran alongside of a palankin on a night journey, bearing a mussaul. “In Central India it is the special duty of the barber (nâî) to carry the torch; hence nâî commonly = ‘torch-bearer’” (M. Gen. Keatinge). The word [or sometimes in the corrupt form mussaul] is however still more frequent as applied to a humble domestic, whose duty was formerly of a like kind, as may be seen in the quotation from Ld. Valentia, but who now looks after lamps and washes dishes, &c., in old English phrase ‘a scullion.’

1610.—“He always had in service 500 Massalgees.”—Finch, in Purchas, i. 432.

1662.—(In Asam) “they fix the head of the corpse rigidly with poles, and put a lamp with plenty of oil, and a mash’alchî [torch-bearer] alive into the vault, to look after the lamp.”—Shihâbuddin Tâlisî, tr. by Blochmann, in J. A. S. B. xli. Pt. i. 82.

[1665.—“They (flambeaux) merely consist of a piece of iron hafted in a stick, and surrounded at the extremity with linen rags steeped in oil, which are renewed. . . by the Masalchis, or link boys, who carry the oil in long narrow-necked vessels of iron or brass.”—Berenger, ed. Constantin, 361.]

1673.—“Trois Massaligis du Grand Seigneur vinrent faire honneur à M. l’Ambassadeur avec leurs feux allumés.”—Journal d’Ant. Galland, ii. 103.

1886. —“After strict examination he chose out 2 persons, the Chout (Chousis), an Armenian, who had charge of watching my tent that night, and my Mossalagee, a person who carries the light before me in the night.”—Hedges, Diary, July 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 282].

Valentia, i. 240.

1813.—"The occupation of massaulachee, or torch-bearer, although generally allotted to the village barber, in the purgannas under my charge, may vary in other districts."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 417; [2nd ed. ii. 43].

1826.—"After a short conversation, they went away, and quickly returned at the head of 200 men, accompanied by Massalchees or torch-bearers."—Pandurang Hari, 557; [ed. 1873, ii. 69].

MUSSENDOM, CAPE, n.p. The extreme eastern point of Arabia, at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. Properly speaking, it is the extremity of a small precipitous island of the name, which protrudes beyond the N.E. horn of 'Omán. The name is written Masándim in the map which Dr. Badger gives with his H. of Oman. But it is Ras Masandam (or possibly Masandum) in the Mohit of Sidi 'Ali Kapudán (J. As. Soc. Beng., v. 459). Sprenger writes Musandum (Alt. Geog. Arabiens, p. 107). [Morier gives another explanation (see the quotation below).]

1516.—"... it (the coast) trends to the N.E. by N. 30 leagues until Cape Mocondon, which is at the mouth of the Sea of Persia."—Barboua, 32.

1553.—"... before you come to Cape Moçandam, which Ptolomy calls Asaboro ('Aras Öw dkarov) and which he puts in 23°, but which we put in 26°; and here terminates our first division" (of the Eastern Coasts).—Barros, I. ix. 1.

By Burton:

"Behold of Asabón the Head, now hight Mosandam, by the men who plough the Main:
Here lies the Gulf whose long and lake-like Bight, parts Araby from fertile Persia's plain."

The fact that the poet copies the misprint or mistake of Barros in Asaboro, shows how he made use of that historian.

1777.—"At the mouth of the Strait of Mocandon, which leads into the Persian gulf, lies the island of Gombroon" (!)—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 86.

[1808.—"Musseldom is a still stronger instance of the perversion of words. The genuine name of this head-land is Mama Selemeh, who was a female saint of Arabia, and lived on the spot or in its neighbourhood."—Morier, Journey through Persia, p. 6.]

MUSSOOLA, MUSSOOLAH, BOAT, s. The surf boat used on the Coromandel Coast; of capacious size, and formed of planks sewn together with cowrie-twine; the open joints being made good with a caulkling or wadding of twisted coir. The origin of the word is very obscure. Leyden thought it was derived from "masoula ... the Mahrra term for fish" (Morton's Life of Leyden, 64). As a matter of fact the Mahr. word for fish is məsəl, Konk. məsəl. This etymology is substantially adopted by Bp. Heber (see below); [and by the compiler of the Madras Gloss., who gives Tel. məsələ, Hind. machhə]. But it may be that the word is some Arabic sea-term not in the dictionaries. Indeed, if the term used by C. Federici (below) be not a clerical error, it suggests a possible etymology from the Ar. masul, 'the fibrous bark of the palm-tree, a rope made of it.' Another suggestion is from the Ar. mašul, 'joined,' as opposed to 'dug-out,' or canoes; or possibly it may be from məshaλ, 'tax,' if these boats were subject to a tax. Lastly it is possible that the name may be connected with Masulipatam (q.v.), where similar boats would seem to have been in use (see Fryer, 26). But these are conjectures. The quotation from Gasparo Balbi gives a good account of the handling of these boats, but applies no name to them.

certe barchette fatte aposta molto alte e large, ch' essi chiamano Masudi, e sono fatte con taule sottili, e con corde sottili custite insieme via taule con l'altre, &c. (there follows a very correct description of their use).—C. Federici, in Rammuto, iii. 301.

c. 1550.—"... where (Negapastam) they cannot land anything but in the Maçules of the same country."—Primor e Honra, &c., t. 93.

c. 1552.—"... There is always a heavy sea there (San Thome), from swell or storm; so the merchandise and passengers are transported from shipboard to the town by certain boats which are sewn with fine cords, and when they approach the beach, where the sea breaks with great violence, they wait till the perilous wave has past, and then, in the interval between one wave and the next, those boatmen pull with great force, and so run a great hazard and being there overtaken by the waves they are carried still further up the beach. And the boats do not break, because they give to the wave, and because the beach is covered with sand, and the boats stand upright on their bottoms."—G. Balbi, f. 59.

1673.—"I went ashore in a Mussoola, a Boat wherein ten Men paddle, the two aftermost of whom are Steer-men, using their Paddles instead of a Rudder. The Boat is not strengthened with Knee-Timbers, as ours are; the bended Planks are sowed together with Rope-Yarn of the Cocoe, and called with Dammar (see DAMMER) (a sort of Resin taken out of the Sea), so artificially that it yields to every ambitious Surf."—Fryer, 37.

[1683.—"This Evening about seven a Clock a Mussula coming ashour... was oversett in the Surf and all four drowned."—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 54.]

1685.—"This morning two Mussolas and two Cattamarans came off to ye Shippe."—Holles, Diary, Feb. 3; [Hak. Soc. i. 182.]

1760.—"As soon as the yaws and pinnaees reached the surf they dropped their grappling, and cast off the masoolas, which immediately rowed ashour, and landed the troops."—Orme, iii. 617.

1762.—"No European boat can land, but the natives make use of a boat of a particular construction called a Mussole." &c.—MS. Letter of James Rennell, April 1.

[1773.—"... the governor ... sent also four Mussolas, or country boats, to accommodate him. ..."—Ives, 182.]

1783.—"The want of Mussola boats (built expressly for crossing the surf) will be severely felt."—In Life of Colebrooke, 9.

1826.—"The masuli-boats (which first word is mere'y a corruption of 'mochuli,' fish) have been often described, and except that they are sewed together with coco-nut twine, instead of being fastened with nails, they very much resemble the high, deep, charcoal boats... on the Ganges."—Iber, ed. 1844, ii. 174.

1879.—"Madras has no harbour; nothing but a long open beach, on which the surf dashes with tremendous violence. Unlucky passengers were not landed there in the ordinary sense of the term, but were thrown violently on the shore, from springy and elastic Musulah boats, and were occasionally carried off by sharks, if the said boats chanced to be upset in the rollers."—Saty. Review, Sept. 20.

MUSSUCK, s. The leathern water-bag, consisting of the entire skin of a large goat, stript of the hair and dressed, which is carried by a bhishki (see BHEESTY). Hind. mashak, Skt. maśaka.

1842.—"Might it not be worth while to try the experiment of having mussocks made of waterproof cloth in England?"—Sir G. Arthur, in Ind. Adm. of Lord Ellenborough, 220.

MUSSULMAN, adj. and s. Mahometan. Muslim, 'resigning' or 'submitting' (sc. oneself to God), is the name given by Mahommed to the Faithful. The Persian plural of this is Musulmân, which appears to have been adopted as a singular, and the word Mussulman or Musulman thus formed. [Others explain it as either from Ar. pl. Muslimân, or from Musulmân, 'like a Muslim,' the former of which is adopted by Platts as most probable.]

c. 1540.—"... disse por tres vezes, Lah, hilah, hilah, lah Mahomed vogal hahah, o Masoleymoos e homes posto da santa ley de Mogiamento."—Pinto, ch. lix.

1559.—"... Although each horde (of Tartars) has its proper name, e.g. particularly the hordes of the Savolheusians... and many others, which are in truth Mahometans; yet do they hold it for a grievous insult and reproach to be called and styled Turks; they wish to be styled Besermani, and by this name the Turks also desire to be styled."—Herberstein, in Ramusio, ii. ff. 171.

[1568.—"I have noted here before that if any Christian will become a Busorman, and be a Mahumetan of their religion, they give him any gifts."—A. Edcuador, in Hakl. i. 442.]

c. 1580.—"Tutti sopradetti Tartari seguirono la fede de Turchi et alla Turchesca credono, ma si tégono a gran vergogna, e molto si corriciono l'esser detti Turchi, secondo che all' incontro godono d'esser Besermani, cioè gète eletta, chiamati."—Descrittione della Sarmatia Europæa del magn. caval. Aless. Gragnino, in Ramusio, ii. Pt. ii. f. 72.

1619.—"... i Musulmani, cioè i salvati: che cosa pazzamente si chiamano fra di loro i maomettani."—P. della Valle, i. 794.

"The precepts of the Moslemens are first, circumsicion ..."—Gabriel Sionta, in Purchas, ii. 1564.

1653.—"... son infanterie d'Indistannis Mansuilmans, ou Indiens de la secte des Sonnis."—De la Boulaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 283.

1783.—"Yet here are a sort of bold, lusty, and most an end, drunken Beggers of the Muslemen Cast, that if they see a Christian in good clothes, mounted on a stately horse ... are presently upon their Punetillo's with God Almighty, and interrogate him, Why he suffers him to go a Foot, and in Rags, and this Coffery (see CAFFER) (Unbeliever) to vaunt it thus?"—Fryer, 91.

1788.—"We escape an ambiguous termination by adopting Moslem instead of Musulman in the plural number."—Gibbon, pref. to vol. iv.

MUST, adj. Pers. mast, 'drunk.' It is applied in Persia also, and in India specially, to male animals, such as elephants and camels, in a state of periodical excitement.

[1889.—"Fits of Must differ in duration in different animals (elephants): in some they last for a few weeks, in others for even four or five months."—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 3rd ed., 59.]

MUSTEES, MESTIZ, &c., s. A half-caste. A corruption of the Port, mestigo, having the same meaning; "a mixling; applied to human beings and animals born of a father and mother of different species, like a mule." (Bluteau); French, mètis et mètiff.

1546.—"The Governor in honour of this great action (the victory at Diu) ordered that all the mestigos who were in Dio should be inscribed in the Book, and that pay and subsistence should be assigned to them,—subject to the King's confirmation. For a regulation had been sent to India that no mestigo of India should be given pay or subsistence: for, as it was laid down, it was their duty to serve for nothing, seeing that they had their houses and heritages in the country, and being on their native soil were bound to defend it."—Correa, iv. 580.

1552.—"... the sight of whom as soon as they came, caused immediately to gather about them a number of the natives, Moslems in belief, and Negroes with curly hair in appearance, and some of them only swarthly, as being mistigos."—Barros, i. i. 1.

1586.—"... che se sono nati qua di donne indiane, gli domandano mestizi."—Sassetti, in De Gubernatis, 188.

1588.—"... an Interprete ... which was a Mestizo, that is half an Indian, and half a Portuguese."—Candish, in Hakl. iv. 337.

c. 1610.—"Le Capitaine et les Marchands estoient Mestis, les autres Indiens Christianises."—Pyrard de Lavall, i. 165; [Hak. Soc. i. 78; also see i. 240]. This author has also Mefis (ii. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 373]), and again: ... qu'ils appellent Mefises, c'est à dire Mefis, meslez" (ii. 23; [Hak. Soc. ii. 38]).

"We see vyn moustre generalle de tous les Habitanz portans armes, tant Portugais que Mefises et indiens, et so tromuerent environ 4000."—Moquot, 352.

[1615.—"A Mestizo came to demand passage in our junck."—Cocke's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 216.]

c. 1665.—"And, in a word, Bengale is a country abounding in all things; and 'tis for this very reason that so many Portugalz, Mestavics, and other Christians are fled thither."—Bernier, E.T. 140; [ed. Constable, 438].

[1673.—"Beyond the Outworks live a few Portugaals Musteroes or Mesterdoes."—Fryer, 57.]

1678.—"Noe Roman Catholick or Papist, whether English or of any other nation shall bear office in this Garrison, and shall have no more pay than 80 fanams per mensem, as private centinals, and the pay of those of the Portuguese nation, as Europeans, Mustees, and Topases, is from 70 to 40 fanams per mensem."—Articles and Orders, 15. of Ft. St. Geo., Madraspatam. In Notes and Extas., i. 88.

1699.—"Wives of Freemen, Mustees."—Census of Company's Servants on the Coast, in Wheeler, i. 356.

1727.—"A poor Seaman had got a pretty Mustice Wife."—A. Hamilton, ii. 10; [ed. 1744, ii. 8].
1781.—"Eloped from the service of his Mistress a Slave Boy aged 20 years, or thereabouts, pretty white or colour of "Musty," tall and slender."—Hicky's Bengal Gazette, Feb. 24.

1799.—"August 13th. . . . Visited by appointment . . . Mrs. Carey, the last survivor of those unfortunate persons who were imprisoned in the Black Hole of Calcutta. . . . This lady, now fifty-eight years of age, as she herself told me, is . . . of a fair Mestiza colour. . . . She confirmed all which Mr. Holwell has said. . . ."—Note by Thomas Boleau (an attorney in Calcutta, the father of Major-Generals John Theophilus and A. H. E. Boleau, R.E. (Bengal)), quoted in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 34.

1834.—"You don't know these Baboos, . . . Most of them now-a-days have their Misteeas Beebees, and their Moosulmaunes, and not a few their Gore Beebees likewise."—The Baboo, &c., 167-168.

1868.—"These Mestizas, as they are termed, are the native Indians of the Philippines, whose blood has to a great extent perhaps been mingled with that of their Spanish rulers. They are a very exclusive people . . . and have their own places of amusement . . . and Mestiza balls, to which no one is admitted who does not don the costume of the country."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, p. 296.

MUSTER, s. A pattern, or a sample. From Port. mostra (Span. muestra, Ital. mostra). The word is current in China, as well as India. See Wells Williams's Guide, 237.

1444.—"Vierão as nossas Galês por comissão sua com algumas amostras de água da Madeira, de Sangue do Dragão, e de outras cousas."—Cedamosta, Navegação primeira, 6.

1563.—"And they gave me a mostra of annomum, which I brought to Goa, and showed to the apothecaries here; and I compared it with the drawings of the simples of Dioscorides."—Garcia, f. 15.

1612.—"A Moore came aboard with a muster of Cloves."—Sarté, in Purchas, i. 357.

1673.—"Merchants bringing and receiving Musters."—Fryer, 84.

1727.—"He advised me to send to the King . . . that I designed to trade with his Subjects . . . which I did, and in twelve Days received an Answer that I might, but desired me to send some person up with Musters of all my Goods."—A. Hamilton, ii. 200; [ed. 1745].

c. 1760.—"He (the tailor) never measures you; he only asks muster for muster, as he terms it, that is for a pattern."—Ives, 52.

1772.—"The Governor and Council of Bombay must be written to, to send round Musters of such kinds of silk, and silk piece-goods, of the manufacture of Bengal, as will serve the market of Surat and Bombay."—Price's Travels, i. 38.

[1846.—"The above muster was referred to a party who has lately arrived from . . . England. . . ."—J. Agric. Hort. Soc., in Watt, Econ. Dict., vi. pt. ii. 601.]

MUTLUB, s. Hind, from Ar. matlab. The Ar. from talab, 'he asked,' properly means a question, hence intention, wish, object, &c. In Anglo-Indian use it always means 'purpose, gist,' and the like. Illiterate natives by a common form of corruption turn the word into matbal. In the Punjab this occurs in printed books; and an adjective is formed, matballi, 'opinionated,' and the like.

MUTT, MUTH, s. Skt. mātha; a sort of convent where a celibate priest (or one making such profession) lives with disciples making the same profession, one of whom becomes his successor. Buildings of this kind are very common all over India, and some are endowed with large estates.

1874.—"The monastic Order is celibate, and in a great degree erratic and mendicant, but has anchorage places and head-quarters in the maths."—Calc. Review, exvii. 212.

MUTTONGOSHT, s. (i.e. 'Mutton-flesh.') Anglo-Indian domestic Hind. for 'Mutton.'

MUTTONGYE, s. Sea-Hind. mātangai, a (nautical) martingale; a corruption of the Eng. word.

MUTTRA, n.p. A very ancient and holy Hindu city on the Jumna, 30 miles above Agra. The name is Mathura, and it appears in Ptolemy as Μάθουρα ή των Θεών. The sanctity of the name has caused it to be applied in numerous new localities; see under MADURA. [Tavernier (ed. Ball, ii. 240) calls it Matura, and Bernier (ed. Constable, 66), Maturas.]

in books of the 18th century. It pertains to the same city that has latterly been called Murshedabad, the capital of the Nawabs of Bengal since the beginning of the 18th century. The town Maksudabad is stated by Tiefenthaler to have been founded by Akbar. The Governor of Bengal, Murshid Kuli Khan (also called in English histories Jafier Khan), moved the seat of Government hither in 1704, and gave the place his own name. It is written Muxudavad in the early English records down to 1760 (Sir W. W. Hunter).

1884.— "Dec. 26.— In ye morning I went to give Bulchand a visit according to his invitation, who rose up and embraced me when I came near him, enquired of my health and bid me welcome to Muxoodavadd. . . ."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 59.

1703.— "The first act of the Nawab, on his return to Bengal, was to change the name of the city of Makkhososabad to Moorsudabad; and by establishing in it the mint, and by erecting a palace . . . to render it the capital of the Province."—Stewart, H. of Bengal, 309.

1726.— "Moxadabath."—Valentijn, Chorom., &c., 147.

1727.— "Muxad abandonment is but 12 miles from it (Cossimbazar), a Place of much greater Antiquity, and the Mogul has a Mint there; but the ancient name of Muxadabad has been changed for Rajah-nal, for above a Century."—A. Hamilton, ii. 20; [ed. 1744]. (There is great confusion in this.)

1751.— "I have heard that Ram Kissen Seat, who lives in Calcutta, has carried goods to that place without paying the Muxiravadd Syre (see Sayer) Chowkey duties. I am greatly surprised, and send a Chubdar to bring him, and desire you will be speedy in delivering him over."—Letter from Naweb Allyerd Chaw to the Pres't of the Council, dated Muxiravadd, May 20.

1758.— "En omettant quelques lieux de moindre considération, je m'arrête d'abord à Moosudabad. Ce nom signifie ville de la monnaie. Et en effet c'est là où se frappe celle du pays; et un grand faubourg de cette ville, appelé Azingone, est la résidence du Nabab, qui gouverne le Bengale presque souverainement."—D'Anville, 63.

1756.— "The Nabob, irritated by the disappointment of his expectations of immense wealth, ordered Mr. Holwell and the two other prisoners to be sent to Muxiravadd."—Orme, iii. 79.

1782.— "You demand an account of the East Indies, the Mogul's dominions and Muxadabad. . . . I imagine when you made the above requisition that you did it with a view rather to try my knowledge than to increase your own, for your great skill in geography would point out to you that Muxudabad is as far from Madras, as Constantinople is from Glasgow."—T. Munro to his brother William, in Life, &c. iii. 41.

1884.— "It is alleged in a passage introduced in Mrs. C. Mackenzie's interesting memoir of her husband, Storms and Sunshine of a Soldier's Life, that "Admiral Watson used to sail up in his ships to Moorshedabad." But there is no ground for this statement. So far as I can trace, it does not appear that the Admiral's flag-ship ever went above Chandernagore, and the largest of the vessels sent to Hoogly even was the Bridgewater of 20 guns. No vessel of the fleet appears to have gone higher.

MUZBEE, s. The name of a class of Sikhs originally of low caste, vulgo mazbi, apparently mazhab from Ar. mazhab, 'religious belief.' Cunningham indeed says that the name was applied to Sikh converts from Mahommedanism (History, p. 379). But this is not the usual application now. ["When the sweepers have adopted the Sikh faith they are known as Mazhabis. . . . When the Churra is circumcised and becomes a Muselman, he is known as a Musalli or a Kohdā" (Maclagan, Punjāb Census Rep., 1891, p. 202.)] The original corps of Muzbees, now represented by the 32nd Bengal N.I. (Pioneers) was raised among the men labouring on the Baree Dooab Canal.

1858.— "On the 19th June (1857) I advocated, in the search for new Military classes, the raising of a corps of Muzbees. . . . The idea was ultimately carried out, and improved by making them pioneers."—Letter from Col. H. B. Edwards to R. Montgomery, Esq., March 23.

... "To the same destination (Delhi) was sent a strong corps of Muzhubees (low-caste) Sikhs, numbering 1200 men, to serve as pioneers."—Letter from R. Temple, Secretary to Punjab Govt., dd. Lahore, May 26, 1858.

MYDAN, MEI-DUN, s. Hind. from Pers. mādān. An open space, an esplanade, parade-ground or green, in or adjoining a town; a piazza (in the Italian sense); any open plain with grass on it; a chaugun (see CHICANE) ground; a battle-field. In Ar., usually, a hippodrome or race-course.

c. 1330.— "But the brethren were meanwhile brought out to the Medan, i.e., the piazza of the City, where an exceeding great fire had been kindled. And Friar Thomas went forward to cast himself into the fire, but as he did so a certain Saracen caught him by the hood ..."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, 63.

1618.—"When it is the hour of complines, or a little later to speak exactly, it is the time for the promenade; and every one goes on horseback to the meidan, which is always kept clean, watered by a number of men whose business is this, who water it carrying the water in skins slung over the shoulder, and usually well shaded and very cool."—P. della Valle, i. 707.

c. 1665.—"Celui (Quervansera) des Étrangers est bien plus spacieux que l'autre et est quarre, et tous deux font face au Meidan."—Thevenot, v. 214.

1670.—"Before this house is a great square meidan or promenade, planted on all sides with great trees, standing in rows."—Andriesz, 35.

1673.—"The Midan, or open Space before the Caun's Palace, is an Oblong and Stately Plateau, with real not belted Cloisters."—Flyger, 249.

1681.—"All this was done with as much coolness and precision, as if he had been at exercise upon the maidan."—The Kazzilib- bash, i. 223.

MYNA, MINA.

A name applied to several birds of the family of starlings. The common myna is the Acridotheres tristis of Linn. ; the southern Hill-Myna is the Gracula, also Eulabes religiosa of Linn. ; the Northern Hill-Myna, Eulabes intermedia of Hay (see Jordan's Birds, ii. Pt. i. 325, 337, 339). Of both the first and last it may be said that they are among the most teachable of imitative birds, articulating words with great distinctness, and without Polly's nasal tone. We have heard a wild one (probably the first), on a tree in a field, spontaneously echoing the very peculiar call of the black partridge from an adjoining jungle, with unmistakable truth. There is a curious description in Aelian (De Nat. An, xvi. 2) of an Indian talking bird which we thought at one time to be the Myna; but it seems to be nearer the Shâma, and under that head the quotation will be found. [Mr. M'Crindle (Invasion of India, 186) is in favour of the Myna.]

1631.—Jac. Bontius describes a kind of Myna in Java, which he calls Pica, seu potius Sturnus Indicus. "The owner, an old Mussulman woman, only lent it to the author to be drawn, after great persuasion, and on a stipulation that the beloved bird should get no swine's flesh to eat. And when he had promised accordingly, the avis perissima immediately began to chant: Orang Nasrani catjor macam bâbi! i.e. 'Dog of a Christian, enter of swine!'"—Lib. v. cap. 14, p. 67.

[1664.—"In the Duke's chamber there is a bird, given him by Mr. Pierce, the surgeon, comes from the East Indys, black the greatest part, with the finest collar of white about the neck; but talks many things and neyes like the horse, and other things, the best almost that ever I heard bird in my life."—Pepys, Diary, April 25, Prof. Newton in Mr. Wheatley's ed. (iv. 118) is inclined to identify this with the Myna, and notes that one of the earliest figures of the bird is by Eleazar Albin (Nat. Hist. of Birds, ii. pl. 38) in 1738.

[1793.—"Among singing birds that which in Bengalla is called the Minaw is the one only that comes within my knowledge."—In Yule, Hodges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxxxiv.]

1803.—"During the whole of our stay two minahs were talking almost incessantly, to the great delight of the old lady, who often laughed at what they said, and praised their talents. Her hookah filled up the interval."—Ed. Valentia, i. 227-8.

1813.—"The myneh is a very entertaining bird, hopping about the house, and articulating several words in the manner of the starling."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47; [2nd ed. i. 32.]

1817.—"Of all birds the chiong (miner) is the most highly prized."—Raffles, Java, i. 290.

1875.—"A talking mina in a cage, and a rat-trap, completed the adornments of the veranda."—The Dilemma, ch. xii.

1878.—"The myna has no wit ... His only way of catching a worm is to lay hold of its tail and pull it out of its hole, generally breaking it in the middle and losing the bigger half."—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 28.

1879.—"So the dog went to a mainâ, and said: 'What shall I do to hurt this cat!'"—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 18.

MYROBALAN, s. A name applied to certain dried fruits and kernels of...
The kinds recognised in the Medieval pharmacopoeia were five, viz.:-

(1) The Emblica myrobalan; which is the dried astringent fruit of the Anuvula, anuula of Hind., the Emblica officinalis of Gaertner (Phyllanthus Emblica, L., O. Euphorbiaceae).

The Persian name of this is amlak, but, as the Arabic amlaj suggests, probably in older Persian amlaj, and hence no doubt Emblica. Garcia says it was called by the Arab physicians embeligi (which we should write ambaligi).

(2) The Belleric Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Belleria, Roxb. (N.O. Combretaceae), consisting of a small nut enclosed in a thin exterior rind. The Arabic name given in Ibn Baithar is baltij; in the old Latin version of Avicenna beliteli; and in Persian it is called balti and balita. Garcia says the Arab physicians called it belerigi (balirij, and in old Persian probably baltirij) which accounts for Belleria.

(3) The Chebulic Myrobalan; the fruit of Terminalia Chebula, Roxb. The derivation of this name which we have given under CHEBULI is confirmed by the Persian name, which is Halila-i-Kabuli. It can hardly have been a product of Kabul, but may have been imported into Persia by that route, whence the name, as calicoces got their name from Calicut. Garcia says these myrobalans were called by his Arabs quebulig. Ibn Baithar calls them halilaj, and many of the authorities whom he quotes specify them as Kabiuli.

(4) and (5). The Black Myrobalan, otherwise called 'Indian,' and the Yellow or Citrine. These, according to Royle (Essay on Antig. of Hindoo Medicine, pp. 36-37), were both products of T. Chebula in different states; but this does not seem quite certain. Further varieties were sometimes recognised, and mine are said to be specified in a paper in an early vol. of the Philos. Transactions.* One kind

* This article we have been unable to find. Dr. Hunter in As. Res. (xi. 182) quotes from a Persian work of Mahomed Husain Shirazi, communicated to him by Mr. Colebrooke, the names of 6 varieties of Halita (or Myrobalan) as afforded in different stages of maturity by the Terminalia Chebula.—1. H. Zira, when just set (from Zira, cummin-seed). 2. H. Jowit (from Jao, barley). 3. Zangi or Hindi (The Black M.). 4. H. Chinn. 5. H. Jafar, or Yellow. 6. H. Kabiyl, the mature fruit. [See Dr. Murray's article in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 29 seqq.] called Śītu or Chinese, is mentioned by one of the authorities of Ibn Baithar, quoted below, and is referred to by Garcia.

The virtues of Myrobolans are said to be extolled by Charaka, the oldest of the Sanskrit writers on Medicine. Some of the Arabian and Medieval Greek authors, referred to by Royle, also speak of a combination of different kinds of Myrobolan called Tryphera or Tryphala; a fact of great interest. For this is the triphala ("Tree-fruits") of Hindu medicine, which appears in Amarakosa (c. A.D. 500), as well as in a prescription of Susruta, the disciple of Charaka, and which is still, it would seem, familiar to the native Indian practitioners. It is, according to Royle, a combination of the black, yellow and Chebulic; but Garcia, who calls it tinepala (tīn-phalin in hind. = "Three-fruits"), seems to imply that it consisted of the three kinds known in Goa, viz. citrine (or yellow), the Indian (or black), and the belleric. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iv. 32 seqq.] The emetic, he says, were not used in medicine there, only in tanning, like sumach. The Myrobolans imported in the Middle Ages seem often to have been preserved (in syrup).

Some people say that in India they are candied when unripe (acerba), just as we candy the unripe tender walnuts, and that when they are candied in this way they have no nut within, but are all through tender like our walnut-comfits. But if this is really done, anyhow none reach us except those with a nut inside, and often very hard nuts too. They should be kept in brown earthen pots glazed, in a syrup made of cassia fistula † and honey or sugar; and they should remain large in the syrup, for they form a moist preserve and are not fit to use dry."—Pogolotti, p. 377.

* "Confettiomo," "make comfits of"; "preserve," but the latter word is too vague.
† This is surely not what we now call Cassia Fistula, the long cylindrical pod of a leguminous tree, affording a mild laxative. But Hanbury and Flückiger (pp. 195, 475) show that some Cassia bark (of the cinnamon kind) was known in the early centuries of our era as κασία σφργώδης and cassia fistularis; whilst the drug now called Cassia Fistula, L., is first noticed by a medical writer of Constantinople towards A.D. 1800. Pogolotti, at p. 366, gives a few lines of instruction for judging of cassia fistula: "It ought to be black, and thick, and unbroken (salde), and heavy, and the thicker it is, and the blacker the outside rind is, the riper and better it is; and it retains its virtue well for 2 years. This is not very decisive, but on the whole we should suppose Pogolotti's cassia fistula to be either a spice-bark, or solid tiges of a like plant (H. & F. 476).

MYSORE, n.p. Tam. Maisăr, Can. Maisāru. The city which was the capital of the Hindu kingdom, taking its name, and which last was founded in 1610 by a local chief on the decay of the Vijayanagar (see BISNAGAR, NARSINGA) dynasty. C. P. Brown gives the etym. as Maisî-ūr, Maisi being the name of a local goddess like Pomona or Flora; ār, 'town, village.' It is however usually said to be a corruption of Mahish-ōśura, the buffalo demon slain by the goddess Durga or Kali. [Rice (Mysore, i. 1) gives Can. Maisa, from Skt. Mahisha, and āru, 'town.]

N

NABOB, s. Port. Nabábo, and Fr. Nabob, from Hind. Nawáb, which is the Ar. pl. of sing. Nāyab (see NAB), 'a deputy,' and was applied in a singular sense* to a delegate of the supreme chief, viz. to a Viceroy or chief Governor under the Great Mogul, e.g. the Nawáb of Surat, the Nawáb of Oudh, the Nawáb of Arcot, the Nawáb Náźim of Bengal. From this use it became a title of rank without necessarily having any office attached. It is now a title occasionally conferred, like a peerage, on Mahommedan gentlemen of distinction and good service, as Rāż and Rājā are upon Hindus.

Nabob is used in two ways: (a) simply as a corruption and representative of Nawáb. We get it direct from the Port. nabábo, see quotation from Bluteau below. (b) It began to be applied in the 18th century, when the transactions of Clive made the epithet familiar in England, to Anglo-Indians who returned with fortunes from the East; and Foote's play of 'The Nabob' (Nabob) (1768) aided in giving general currency to the word in this sense.

* Dozy says (2nd ed. 220) that the plural form has been adopted by mistake. Wilson says 'honorifically.' Possibly in this and other like cases it came from popular misunderstanding of the Arabic plural. So we have omra, i.e. unara, pl. of amir used singularly and forming a plural smirduin. "At that time (c. 1830) the Royal Society was very differently composed from what it is now. Any wealthy or well-known person, any M.P. . . . or East Indian Nabob, who wished to have F.R.S. added to his name, was sure to obtain admission."—Grekke, Life of Merchison, i. 197.

1875.—". . . A Tunis?—interrompt le duc. . . . Alors pourquoi ce nom de Nabab?—Bah! les Parisiens n'y regardent pas de si prés. Pour eux tout riche étranger est un Nabab, n'importe d'où il vienne."—Le Nabab, par Alph. Daudet, ch. i.

It is purism quite erroneously applied when we find Nabob in this sense misspelt Nawab; thus:

1878.—"These were days when India, little known still in the land that rules it, was less known than it had been in the previous generation, which had seen Warren Hastings impeached, and burghs* bought and sold by Anglo-Indian Nawabs."—Smith's Life of Dr John Wilson, 30.

But there is no question of purism in the following delicious passage:

1878.—"If... the spirited proprietor of the Daily Telegraph had been informed that our aid of their friends the Turks would have saved the form of a tax upon paper, and a concession of the Levits to act as Commanders of Regiments of Bashi-Bozouks, with a request to the Generalissimo to place them in as forward a position as Nabob was given in the host of King David, the harp in Peterborough Court would not have twanged long to the tune of a crusade in behalf of the Sultan of Turkey."—Truth, April 11, p. 470. In this passage in which the wit is equalled only by the scriptural knowledge, observe that Nabob=Naboth, and Naboth=Uriah.

NACODA, NACODER, &c., s. Pers. na-khudd (navis dominus) 'a skipper'; the master of a native vessel. (Perhaps the original sense is rather the owner of the ship, going with it as his own supercargo.) It is hard to understand why Reinaud (Relation, ii. 42) calls this a "Malay word . . ."

* Qu. boroughs? The writer does injustice to his country when he speaks of burghs being bought and sold. The representation of Scotch burghs before 1832 was bad, but it never was purchasable. There are no burghs in England. derived from the Persian," especially considering that he is dealing with a book of the 9th and 10th centuries. [Mr. Skeat notes that the word is sometimes, after the manner of Hobson-Jobson, corrupted by the Malays into Anak kuda, 'son of a horse.']

c. 916.—"Bientôt l'on ne garde pas même des même auges pour les patrons de navires (navishkuda, pl. of nakhudd) Arabes, et les maîtres de batiments marchands furent en butte à des pretensions injustes."—Relation, &c., i. 68.

c. 1348.—"The second day after our arrival at the port of Kailâkûrî, this princess invited the nakhodha, or owner of the ship (sâhib-al-markab), the kawâni (see CRANNY) or clerk, the merchants, the chief people, the tandail (see TINDAL) or commander of the crew, the sipa'wâlar (see SIPAHSELAR) or commander of the fighting men."—Du Batut, iv. 250.

1502.—"But having been seen by our fleet the caravels made for them, and the Moors being laden could no longer escape. So they brought them to the Captain General, and all struck sail, and from six of the Zambucos (see SAMBOOK) the nacodas came to the Captain General."—Correa, i. 302.

1540.—"Whereupon he desired us that the three nacodas of the Junks, so are the commanders of them called in that country ..."—Pinto, (orig. cap. xxxv.) in Cogan, p. 42.

NAGA, n.p. The name applied to an extensive group of uncivilised clans of warlike and vindictive character in the eastern part of the hill country which divides Assam Proper (or the valley of the Brahmaputra) from Kachâr and the basin of the Surma. A part of these hills was formed into a British district, now under Assam, in 1867, but a great body of the Nâga clans is still independent. The etymology of the name is disputed; some identifying it with the Nâga or Snake Aborigines, who are so prominent in the legends and sculptures of the Buddhists. But it is, perhaps, more probable that the word is used in the sense of 'naked' (Skt. naga, Hind. wanga, Beng. nenâta, &c.), which, curiously enough, is that which Ptolemy attributes to the name, and which the spelling of Shihâbuldin also indicates. [The word is also used for a class of ascetics of the Dâdapanthi sect, whose head-quarters are at Jaypur.]

c. 1662. — "The Râjâ had first intended to fly to the Nâga Hills, but from fear of our army the Nâgâs* would not afford him an asylum. 'The Nâgâs live in the southern mountains of Assâm, have a light brown complexion, are well built, but treacherous. In number they equal the helpers of Yagog and Magog, and resemble, in hardness and physical strength, the 'Adis (an ancient Arabian tribe). They go about naked like beasts. . . Some of their chiefs came to see the Nawâb. They wore dark hip-clothes (lung), ornamented with cowries, and round about their heads they wore a belt of boar's tusks, allowing their black hair to hang down their neck.'—shikâbuldin Tâlibh, tr. by Prof. Blockmann, in J. As. Soc. Beng., xli. Pt. i. p. 84. [See Plate xvi. of Dulton's Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal; Journ. Anthrop. Inst. xxvi. 161 seqq.]

1883. — A correspondent of the "Indian Agriculturist" (Calcutta), of Sept. 1, dates from the Naga Hills, which he calls "Noga, from Nok, not Naga, . . ." an assertion which one is not bound to accept. "One on the Spot" is not bound to know the etymology of a name several thousand years old.

NAIK, NAIQUE, &c. s. Hind. náyak. A term which occurs in nearly all the vernacular languages; from Skt. náyaka, 'a leader, chief, general.' The word is used in several applications among older writers (Portuguese) referring to the south and west of India, as meaning a native captain or headman of some sort (a). It is also a title of honour among Hindus in the Deccan (b). It is again the name of a Telugu caste, whence the general name of the Kings of Vijayanagara (A.D. 1325-1674), and of the Lords of Madura (1559-1741) and other places (c). But its common Anglo-Indian application is to the non-commissioned officer of Sepoys who corresponds to a corporal, and wears the double chevron of that rank (d).

We may add as a special sense that in West India Nāïk is applied to the head-man of a hamlet (Kāri) or camp (Tūnda) of Brinjarries (q.v.). [Bhangi and Jhangi Naiks, the famous Banjāra leaders, are said to have had 180,000 bullocks in their camp. See Berar Gazetteer, 196.]

NAIR, s. Malayal. näyār; from the same Skt. origin as Naïk. Name of the ruling caste in Malabar. [The Greek ναύαρα as a tract stood for the country of the Nairs. For their customs, see Logan, Malabar, i. 131.]

1510.—"The first class of Pagans in Calicut are called Brahmins. The second are Naari, who are the same as the gentlefolk amongst us; and these are obliged to bear sword and shield or bows and lances."—Varthema, pp. 141-142.

1516.—"These kings do not marry...only each has a mistress, a lady of great lineage and family, which is called näyre."—Barboos, 165.

1553.—"And as...the Gentiles of the place are very superstitious in dealing with foreign people to their blood, and chiefly those called Brammanes and Naïres."—Barros, Dico. i. liv. iv. cap. 7.

1563.—"The Naïres who are the Knights."—Garcia.

1582.—"The Men of Warre which the King of Calicent and the other Kings have, are Naîres, which be all Gentlemen."—Cassanara (by N. L.), f. 351.

1644.—"We have much Christian people throughout his territory, not only the Christians of St. Thomas, who are the best soldiers that he (the King of Cochim) has, but also many other vassals who are converts to our Holy Catholic Faith, through the preaching of the Gospel, but none of these are Naîres, who are his fighting men, and his nobles or gentlemen."—Bocarro, MS., f. 315.

1755.—"The king has disciplined a body of 10,000 Naïres; the people of this denomination are by birth the Military tribe of the Malabar coast."—Orme, i. 400.

1781.—"The soldiers preceded the Naïres or nobles of Malabar."—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

It may be added that Nāyār was also the term used in Malabar for the mahout of an elephant; and the fact that Nāyār and Nāyaka are of the same origin may be considered with the etymology which we have given of Cornac (see Garcia, 85v).

NALKEE, s. Hind. nālki. A kind of litter formerly used by natives of rank; the word and thing are now obsolete. [It is still the name of the bride’s litter in Behar (Grierson, Behār Peasant Life, 46).] The name was perhaps a fictitious imitation of palki? [Platts suggests Skt. nālka, ‘a tube.’]

1789.—"A naleky is a palky, either opened or covered, but it bears upon two bamboos, like a sedan in Europe, with this difference only, that the poles are carried by four or eight men, and upon the shoulders."—Note by Tr. of Neý Mungahirin, iii. 269.

[1844.—"This litter is called a ‘nali.’ It is one of the three great insignia which the Mogul emperors of Delhi conferred upon independent princes of the first class, and could never be used by any person upon whom, or upon whose ancestors, they had not been so conferred. These were the nali, the order of the Fish, and the fan of peacock’s feathers."—Sleeman, Rambles, ed. V. A. Smith, i. 165.]

NAMBEADARIM, s. Malayal. nambiyattiri, nambiyattiri; a general, a prince. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 121.]

1503.—"Afterwards we were presented to the King called Nambiodara; who received us with no small gladness and kindness."—Grov. du Empoli, in Ramusio, f. 146.

1552.—"This advice of the Nambeadarim was disapproved by the kings and lords."—Costanzada; see also Transl. by N. L., 1582, f. 147.

1557.—"The Nambeadarim who is the principal governor."—D’Albquerque, Hak. Soc. i. 9. The word is, by the translator, erroneously identified with Nambiodiri (see NAMBOORÉE), a Malabar Brahman.

1631.—"Entra em Cochim no thalamo secreto Aonde Nambooré dorme quieto." Malaca Conquist. i. 50.

NAMBOORÉE, Malayal. nambi- diri, Tam. nambru; [Logan (Malabar, ii. Gloss. cxxi.) gives nambētiri, nam- bēri, from Drav. nambūka, ‘to trust,’ tirī, Skt. ərī, ‘blessed.’ The Madras Gloss. has Mal. nambru, ‘the Veda,’ otkur, ‘to teach,’ tiru, ‘holy.’] A Brahman of Malabar. (See Logan, i. 118 seqq.)

1644.—"No more than any of his Nambores (among Christian converts) who are his padres, for you would hardly see any one of them become converted and baptized because of the punishment that the king has attached to that."—Bocarro, MS., f. 313.

1727.—"The Nambouries are the first in both Capacities of Church and State, and some of them are Popes, being sovereign Princes in both."—A. Hamilton, i. 312; [ed. 1744].

[1800.—"The Namburis eat no kind of animal food, and drink no spirituous liquors."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 426.]
NANKEEN, s. A cotton stuff of a brownish yellow tinge, which was originally imported from the city of Nanking. It was not dyed, but made from a cotton of that colour, the Gossypium religiosum of Roxb., a variety of G. herbaceum. It was, however,imitated with dyed cotton in England, and before long exports of this imitation were made to China. Nankeen appears to be known in the Central Asia markets under the modified name of Nanka (see below).

1793-4.—"The land in this neighbourhood produces the cloth usually called Nankeens in Europe...in that growing in the province of Kiangman, of which the city of Nan-kin is the capital, the down is of the same yellow tinge which it possesses when spun and woven into cloth."—Staunton's Narr. of Ld. Macartney's Embassy, ii. 425.

1794-5.—"The colour of Name-King is thus natural, and not subject to fade. The opinion (that it was dyed) that I combat was the cause of an order being sent from Europe a few years ago to dye the pieces of Name-King of a deeper colour, because of late they had grown paler."—Van Braam's Embassy, E.T. ii. 141.

1797.—"China Investment per Upton Castle...Company's broad and narrow Nankeen, brown Nankeen."—In Selon-Karr, ii. 935.

c. 1809.—"Cotton in this district (Paraviga or Parnea) is but a trifling article. There are several kinds mentioned. The Kubli is the most remarkable, its wool having the colour of Nankeen cloth, and it seems in fact to be the same material which the Chinese use in that manufacture."—F. Buchanan, in Eastern India, iii. 244. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iv. 16, 29.]

1838.—"Nanka is imported in the greatest quantity (to Kabul) from Russia, and is used for making the outer garments for the people, who have a great liking to it. It is similar to Nankeen cloth that comes to India from China, and is of a strong durable texture."—Report by Baines, in Persian Trade Report, App. p. ix. See also p. clixvii.

1843.—"Don't be trying to depreciate the value of the lot, Mr. Moss," Mr. Hammer- down said; 'let the company examine it as a work of art—the attitude of the gallant animal quite according to nature, the gentleman in a Nankeen-jacket, his gun in hand, is going to the chase; in the distance a banghann tree (see BANYAN-TREE) and a pagody."—Vanity Fair, i. 178.

NANKING, n.p. The great Chinese city on the lower course of the Yangtsi-kiang, which was adopted as capital of the Empire for a brief space (1368-1410) by the (native) Ming dynasty on the expulsion of the Mongol family of Chinghiz. The city, previously known as Kin-ling-fu, then got the style of Nan-king, or 'South Court.' Peking ('North Court') was however re-occupied as imperial residence by the Emperor Ching-su in 1410, and has remained such ever since. Nanking is mentioned as a great city called Chilenfu (Kin-ling), whose walls had a circuit of 40 miles, by Friar Odoric (c. 1323). And the province bears the same name (Chel'un) in the old notices of China translated by R. Willes in Hakluyt (ii. 546).

It appears to be the city mentioned by Conti (c. 1430), as founded by the emperor; "Hinc prope XV. dierum itinere (i.e. from Cambalec or Peking), alia civitas Nenpetai nomine, ab imperatore condita, cujus ambitus patet triginta milliiaribus, eaque est popolosissima omnium." This is evidently the same name that is coupled with Cambalec, in Petis de la Croix's translation of the Life of Timour (iii. 218) under the form Nemmat. The form Lankin, &c., is common in old Portuguese narratives, probably, like Liampo (q.v.), a Fukien form.

c. 1520.—"After that follows Great China, the king of which is the greatest sovereign in the world. The port of this kingdom is called Guantan, and among the many cities of this empire two are the most important, namely Nankin and Comlaka (read Combalak), where the king usually resides."—Pigafetta's Magellan (Hak. Soc.), p. 156.

c. 1540.—"Thereunto we answered that we were strangers, natives of the Kingdom of Siam, and that coming from the port of Liampo to go to the fishing of Nanquin, we were cast away at sea...that we purposed to go to the city of Nanquin there to imbarque ourselves as rowers in the first Lantea (see LANTEAS) that should put to sea, for to pass unto Cantan. ..."—Pinto, E.T. p. 99 (orig. cap. xxxi.).

1553.—"Further, according to the Cosmographies of China...the maritime provinces of this kingdom, which run thereafter in a N.W. direction almost, are these three: Nanqui, Xanton (Shantung), and Quinej (Kingsze or capital, i.e. Pecheli).—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1556.—"Ogni anno va di Persia alla China vna grossa Caruana, che camina sei mesi prima ch'arrivi alla Città de Lanchin, Città nella quale risiede il Re con la sua Corte."—Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 911v.

NARCONDAM, n.p. The name of a strange weird-looking volcanic cone, which rises, covered with forest, to a height of some 2,330 feet straight out of the deep sea, to the eastward of the Andamans. One of the present writers has observed (Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 13, note) that in the name of Narconda... of which the pit was Avith Hell; perhaps Naraka-kundam, "a pit of hell"; adding: "Can it be that in old times, but still contemporary with Hindu navigation, this volcano was active, and that some Brahmin St. Brandon recognised in it the mouth of Hell, congenial to the Rakshasas of the adjacent group" of the Andamans? We have recently received an interesting letter from Mr. F. R. Mallet of the Geological Survey of India, who has lately been on a survey of Narcondam and Barren Island. Mr. Mallet states that Narcondam is "without any crater, and has certainly been extinct for many thousand years. Barren Island, on the other hand, forms a complete amphitheatre, with high precipitous encircling walls, and the volcano has been in violent eruption within the last century. The term 'pit of hell,' therefore, while quite inapplicable to Narcondam, applies most aptly to Barren Island." Mr. Mallet suggests that there may have been some confusion between the two islands, and that the name Narcondam may have been really applicable to Barren Island. [See the account of both islands in Ball, Jungle Life, 397 seqq.] The name Barren Island is quite modern. We are told in Purdy's Or. Navigator (350) that Barren Island was called by the Portuguese Ilha alta, a name which again would be much more apt for Narcondam, Barren Island being only some 800 feet high. Mr. Mallet mentions that in one of the charts of the E.I. Pilot or Oriental Navigator (1781) he finds "Narcondam according to the Portuguese" in 13° 45' N. lat. and 110° 35' E. long. (from Ferro) and "Narcondam or High Island, according to the French," in 12° 50' N. lat. and 110° 55' E. long. This is valuable as showing both that there may have been some confusion between the islands, and that Ilha alta or High Island has been connected with the name of Narcondam. The real positions by our charts are of Narcondam, N. lat.

13° 24', E. long. 94° 12'. Barren Island, N. lat. 12° 16', E. long. 93° 54'.

The difference of lat. (52 miles) agrees well with that between the Portuguese and French Narcondam, but the difference in long., though approximate in amount (18 or 20 miles), is in one case plus and in the other minus; so that the discrepancies may be due merely to error in the French reckoning. In a chart in the E.I. Pilot (1778) "Monday or Barren Island, called also High Island" and "Ayconda or Narcondam," are marked approximately in the positions of the present Barren Island and Narcondam. Still, we believe that Mr. Mallet's suggestion is likely to be well founded. The form Ayconda is nearer that found in the following: 1598.—"... as you put off from the Ilandes of Audtaman towards the Coast... there lyth one in the middle way an Ilande which the inhabitanteres call Viacondam, which is a small Iland having faire ground round about it, but very little fresh water."—Linschoten, p. 328.

The discrepancy in the position of the islands is noticed in D'Anville: 1753.—"Je n'oublierai pas Narcondam, et d'autant moins que ce que j'en trouve dans les Portugais ne repone point à la position que nos cartes lui donnent. Le routier de Gaspar Pereira de los Reys indique l'Ile Narcondo ou Narcondam à 6 lieues des lises Cocos, 12 de la tête de l'Andaman; et le rhumb de vent à l'égard de ce point il le determine, teste quarta du nordeste, neya quarta mais para les nordestes, c'est à dire à peu-près 17 degrés de l'est au nord. Selon les cartes Françaises, Narcondam s'étarit environ 25 lieues marines de la tête d'Andaman; et au lieu de prendre plus du nord, cette ile basse vers le sud d'une fraction de degré plus ou moins considérable selon différentes cartes."—D'Anville, Éclairce, 111-112.

I may add that I find in a French map of 1701 (Carte Marine depuis Surtattte jusqu'au Detroit de Malacca, par le Père P. P. Tachard) we have, in the (approximately) true position of Narcondam, Isle Haute, whilst an islet without name appears in the approximate position of Barren Island.

NARD. s. The rhizome of the plant Nardostachys Satumansi, D.C., a native of the lofty Himalaya (allied to Valerian). This is apparently an Indian word originally, but, as we have it, it has come from the Skt. nalada through Semitic media, whence the change of \( i \) into \( r \); and in this form it is found both in Hebrew and Greek. [Prof. Skeat gives: "F. nard, L. nardus. Greek νάρδος, Pers. nard (whence Skt. nalada), spikenard. Skt. nanda, a reed."] The plant was first identified in modern times by Sir W. Jones. See in Canticles, i. 12, and iv. 13, 14.

NARSINGA. n.p. This is the name most frequently applied in the 16th and 17th centuries to the kingdom in Southern India, otherwise termed Vijayanagara or Bisnagar (q.v.), the latest powerful Hindu kingdom in the Peninsula. This kingdom was founded on the ruins of the Belâla dynasty reigning at Dwâra Samudra, about A.D. 1341 [see Rice, Mysore, i. 344 seqq.]. The original dynasty of Vijayanagara became extinct about 1487, and was replaced by Narsinha, a prince of Telugu origin, who reigned till 1508. He was therefore reigning at the time of the first arrival of the Portuguese, and the name of Narsinga, which they learned to apply to the kingdom from his name, continued to be applied to it for nearly two centuries.

NAWSICK, n.p. Näsik; Naśka of Ptolemy (vii. i. 63); an ancient city of Hindu sanctity on the upper course of the Godavery R., and the headquarter of a district of the same name in the Bombay Presidency. A curious discussion took place at the R. Geog. Society in 1867, arising out of a paper by Mr. (afterwards Sir) George Campbell, in which the selection of a capital for British India was determined on logical principles in favour of Nassick. But logic does not decide the site of capitals, though government by logic is quite likely to lose India. Certain highly elaborated magic squares and magic cubes, investigated by the Rev. A. H. Frost (Cambridge Math. Jour., 1857) have been called by him Nāśik squares, and Nāśik cubes, from his residence in that ancient place (seeEncyc. Briton, 9th ed. xv. 216).

NAT, s. Burmese nāt, [apparently from Skt. nātha, 'lord']; a term applied to all spiritual beings, angels, elves, demons, or what not, including the gods of the Hindus.

[1878.—"Indeed, with the country population of Pegu the worship, or it should rather be said the propitiation of the 'Nāts' or spirits, enters into every act of their ordinary life, and Buddha's doctrine seems kept for sacred days and their visits to the kyoung (monastery) or to the pagoda."—Forbes, British Burma, 222.]

NAUND, s. Hind. nānd. A coarse earthen vessel of large size, resembling in shape an inverted bee-hive, and useful for many economic and domestic purposes. The dictionary definition in Fallon, 'an earthen trough,' conveys an erroneous idea.

[1832.—"The ghūrī (see Ghurry), or copper cup, floats usually in a vessel of coarse red pottery filled with water, called a nān."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 250.

NAUTCH, s. A kind of ballet-dance performed by women; also any kind of stage entertainment; an European ball. Hind. and Mahr. nàch, from Skt. nritva, dancing and stage-playing, through Prakrit nàcchæa. The word is in European use all over India. [A pogglà nautch (see POGGLE) is a fancy-dress ball. Also see POTTLY NAUTCH.] Browning seems fond of using this word, and persists in using it wrongly. In the first of the quotations below he calls Fifine the 'European nautch,' which is like calling some Hindu dancing-girl 'the Indian ballet.' He repeats the mistake in the second quotation.

[1809.—"You Europeans are apt to picture to yourselves a Nach as a most attractive spectacle, but once witnessed it generally dissolves the illusion."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 142.]

1823.—"I joined Lady Macnaghten and a large party this evening to go to a nàch given by a rich native, Roupall Mullich, on the opening of his new house."—Mrs. Heber, in Heber, ed. 1841, i. 37.

NAUTCH GIRL. s. (See BAYADERE, DANCING GIRL.) The last quotation is a glorious jumble, after the manner of the compiler.

[1809.—"Nach Girls are exempted from all taxes, though they pay a kind of voluntary one monthly to a Fuqeer. ..."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 113-4.]

1825.—"The Nach women were, as usual, ugly, huddled up in huge bundles of red petticoats; and their exhibition as dull and insipid to an European taste, as could well be conceived."—Heber, ii. 102.

1836.—"In India and the East dancing-girls are trained called Almeh, and they give a fascinating entertainment called a nautch, for which they are well paid."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, s22.

NAVAIT, NAITEA, NEVOYAT, &c., n.p. A name given to Mahomedans of mixt race in the Konkan and S. Canara, corresponding more or less to Moplabs (q.v.) and Lubbies of Malabar and the Coromandel coast. [The head-quarters of the Navayats are in N. Canara, and their traditions state that their ancestors fled from the Persian Gulf about the close of the 7th century, to escape the cruelty of a Governor of Iran. See Sturrock, Man. of S. Canara, i. 181.] It is apparently a Konkani word connected with Skt. nava, 'new,' and implying 'new convert.' [The Madras Gloss. derives the word from Pers. nātīf, from Nātīf, the name of an Arab clan.]

1552.—"Sons of Moors and of Gentile women, who are called Naiteas...."—Castanheda, iii. 24.

1553.—"Naiteas que são mesticos: quanto aos padres de geração dos Arabios... e perparte das maduras as Gentias."—Barros, i. ix. 3.

... And because of this fertility of soil, and of the trade of these ports, there was here a great number of Moors, natives of the country, whom they call Naiteas, who were accustomed to buy the horses and sell them to the Moors of the Decan. ..."—Ibid. i. viii. 9.

c. 1612.—"From this period the Mahomedans extended their religion and their influence in Malabar, and many of the princes and inhabitants, becoming converts to the true faith, gave over the management of some of the seaports to the strangers, whom they called Nowayits (literally the New Race). ..."—Firishta, by Briggs, iv. 566.

1615.—"... et passim infiniti Mahometani reperiebantur, tum indigenae quos: naiteas vocabunt, tum externi. ..."—Jahir, i. 57.

1626.—"There are two sorts of Moors, one: Mesticos of mixed seed of Moore-fathers and Ethnike-mothers, called Naiteani, Mungrels also in their religion, the other Forreiners: ..."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.
NAZIR, s. Hind, from Ar. nazar, 'inspector' (nazar, 'sight'). The title of a native official in the Anglo-Indian Courts, sometimes improperly rendered 'sheriff,' because he serves processes, &c.

1670.—"The Khan . . . ordered his Nazir, or Master of the Court, to assign something to the servants. . . ."—Andriesz, 41.

1708.—"He especially, who is called Nader, that is the chief of the Mahal . . ."—Catton, II. of the Mogul Dynasty, E.T. 295.

[1826.—"The Nazir is a perpetual sheriff, and executes writs and summonses to all the parties required to attend in civil and criminal cases."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 118.]

1878.—"The Nazir had charge of the treasury, stamps, &c., and also the issue of summonses and processes."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 204.

In the following the word represents nakhir, 'a kettle-drum.'

1763.—"His Excellency ( Nawab Meer Cossim) had not eaten for three days, nor allowed his Nazir to be beaten."—Diary of a Prisoner at Patna, in Wheeler, Early Records, 223.

NEELAM, LEELAM, s. Hind. nildam, from Port. leilao. An auction or public outcry, as it used to be called in India (corresponding to Scotch rouping; comp. Germ. rufen, and outrou of Linschoten's translator below). The word is, however, oriental in origin, for Mr. C. P. Brown (MS. notes) points out that the Portuguese word is from Ar. ildam (al-ildam), 'proclamation, advertisement.' It is omitted by Dozy and Engelmann. How old the custom in India of prompt disposal by auction of the effects of a deceased European is, may be seen in the quotation from Linschoten.

1515.—"Pero d'Alpoym came full of sorrow to Cochin with all the apparel and servants of Afonso d'Albuquerque, all of which Dom Gracia took charge of; but the Governor (Lopo Soares) gave orders that there should be a leilão (auction) of all the warelode, which indeed made a very poor show. Dom Gracia said to D. Alexio in the church, where they met: The Governor your uncle orders a leilão of all the old warelode of Afonso d'Albuquerque. I can't praise his intention, but what he has done only adds to my uncle's honour; for all the people will see that he gathered no rich Indian stuffs, and that he despised everything but to be foremost in honour."—Correa, ii. 469.

1527.—"And should any man die, they at once make a Leylam of his property."—India Office MSS., Corpus Chronologico, vol. i.

Letter of Fernando Nunes to the King, Sept. 7.

[1554.—"All the spoil of Mombasa that came into the general stock was sold by leilão."—Castanheda, Bk. ii. ch. 13.]

1598.—"In Goa there is holden a daylie assembly . . . which is like the meeting upô the burse in Andwarpe . . . and there are all kinds of Indian commodities to sell, so that in a manner it is like a Fare . . . it beginmeth in the morning at 7 of the ecklocke, and continueth till 9 . . . in the principal streets of the citie . . . and is called the Leylon, which is as much as to say, as an outroop . . . and when any man dieth, all his goods are brought theretoe and sold to the last penniworth, in the same outroop, whosoever they be, yea although they were the Vicerooyesgoodes."—Linschoten, ch. xix.; [Hak. Soc. i. 184; and compare Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 52, who spells the word Leylon.]

c. 1610.—". . . le mary vient frapper à la porte, dont la femme faisant fort l'estonnée, prie le Portuwin de se cacher dans une petite cuve à pourcelaine, et l'ayant fait entrer là dedans, et ferme tres bien à clef, ouvrit la porte a son mary, qui . . . le laissa tremper là jusqu'en lendemain matin, qu'il fit porter ceste cuve au marché, ou lialain ainsi qu'ils appellent. . . ."—Mocquet, 344.

Linschoten gives an engraving of the Rua Direita in Goa, with many of these auctions going on, and the superscription: "O Leilao que se faz cada dia pola menha na Rua direita de Goa." The Portuguese word has taken root at Canton Chinese in the form yelang; but more distinctly betrays its origin in the Amoy form le-lang and Swatow loyiang (see Giles; also Denny's Notes and Queries, vol. i.).

NEELGYE, NILGAUH, &c., s. Hind. nilgâ, nilgai, lîlgâ, i.e. 'blue cow'; the popular name of the great antelope, called by Pallas Antilope tragocamelus (Portax pictus, of Jerdon, [Bosealaphus tragocamelus of Blanford, Mammalia, 517]), given from the slaty blue which is its predominant colour. The proper Hind. name of the animal is rogh (Skt. rîgha, or rîshya).

1663.—"After these Elephants are brought divers tamed Gazelles, which are made to fight with one another; as also some Nil- gaux, or grey oxen, which in my opinion are a kind of Elands, and Rhinoceros, and those great Buffalos of Bengal . . . to combat with a Lion or Tiger."—Bernier, E.T. p. 84; [ed. Constable, 262; in 218 nilgau; in 364, 377, nil-gahaus].

1773.—"Captain Hamilton has been so obliging as to take charge of two deer, a male and a female, of a species which is called neelgow, and is, I believe, unknown in Europe, which he will deliver to you in my name."—Warren Hastings to Sir G. Colebrooke, in Gleig, i. 288.

1824.—"There are not only neelghaus, and the common Indian deer, but some noble red-deer in the park" (at Lucknow).—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 214.

1882.—"All officers, we believe, who have served, like the present writers, on the canals of Upper India, look back on their peripatetic life there as a happy time . . . occasionally on a winding part of the bank one intruded on the solitude of a huge nilgai."—Mem. of General Sir W. E. Baker, p. 11.

NEEM, s. The tree (N.O. Meliaceae) Azadirachta indica, Hind, &c.; Hindi. nimb; (and nib, according to Playfair, Taleef Shereef, 170), Mahr. nimd, from Skt. nimba. It grows in almost all parts of India, and has a repute for various remedial uses. Thus poultices of the leaves are applied to boils, and their fresh juice given in various diseases; the bitter bark is given in fevers; the fruit is described as purgative and emollient, and as useful in worms, &c., whilst a medicinal oil is extracted from the seeds; and the gum also is reckoned medicinal. It is akin to the bakain (see BUCKYNE), on which it grafts readily.

1563.—"R, I beg you to recall the tree by help of which you cured that valuable horse of yours, of which you told me, for I wish to remember it.

"O, You are quite right, for in sooth it is a tree that has a great repute as valuable and medicinal among nations that I am acquainted with; and the name among them all is nimbo. I came to know its virtues in the Balaghat, because with it I there succeeded in curing sore backs of horses that were most difficult to clean and heal; and these sores were cleaned very quickly, and the horses very quickly cured. And this was done entire with the leaves of this tree pounded and put over the sores, mixed with lemon-juice . . ."—Garcia, t. 153.

1578.—"There is another tree highly medicinal . . . which is called nimbo; and the Malabars call it Bepole [Malayali, ekpypp]."—Acosta, 284.

[1812. — " . . . the principal square . . . regularly planted with beautiful nym or lyn-cres."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 445.

[1856.—"Once on a time Guj Singh . . . said to those around him, 'Is there any one who would leap down from that limb tree into the court?"—Forbes, R̤as Mālā, ed. 1878, p. 465.]

1877.—"The elders of the Clans sat every day on their platform, under the great neem tree in the town, and attended to all complaints."—Meadows Taylor, Story, &c., ii. 85.

NEGAPATAM, n.p. A seaport of Tanjore district in S. India, written Ngai-ppattanam, which may mean 'Snake Town.' It is perhaps the Nypma Mptropholas of Ptolemy; and see under COROMANDEL.

1534.—"From this he (Cunhall Marcar, a Mahommedan corsair) went plundering the coast as far as Negapatão, where there were always a number of Portuguese trading, and Moorish merchants. These latter, dreading that this pirate would come to the place and plunder them, to curry favour with him, sent him word that if he came he would make a famous haul, because the Portuguese had there a quantity of goods on the river bank, where he could come up . . ."—Coretta, iii. 554.

[1598.—"The coast of Choromandel beginneth from the Cape of Negapatan."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 82.

NEGOMBO, n.p. A pleasant town and old Dutch fort nearly 20 miles north of Colombo in Ceylon; formerly famous for the growth of the best cinnamon. The etymology is given in very different ways. We read recently that the name is properly (Tamil) Nîr-Kolombu, i.e. 'Columbo in the water.' But, according to Emerson Tennent, the ordinary derivation is Mi-gamoa, the 'Village of bees'; whilst Burnouf says it is properly Nâya-bhî, 'Land of Naga,' or serpent worshippers (see Tennent, ii. 630).

1613.—"On this he cast anchor; but the wind blowing very strong by daybreak, the ships were obliged to weigh, as they could not stand at their moorings. The vessel of Andrea Coelho and that of Nuno Alvares Teixeira, after weighing, not being able to weather the reef of Negombo, ran into the bay, where the storm compelled them to be beached: but as there were plenty of people there, the vessels were run up by hand and not wrecked."—Bocarro, 42.

NEGRAIS, CAPE, n.p. The name of the island and cape at the extreme south end of Arakan. In the charts, the extreme south point of the mainland is called Pagoda Point, and the seaward promontory, N.W. of this, Cape Negrais. The name is a Portuguese corruption probably of the Arab or Malay form of the native name which the Burmese express as Naga-rät, 'Dragon's whirlpool.' The set of the tide here is very apt to carry vessels ashore, and thus the locality is famous for wrecks. It is possible, however, that the Burmese name is only an effort at interpretation, and that the locality was called in old times by some name like Nágārāsthtra. Ibn Batuta touched at a continental coast occupied by uncivilised people having elephants, between Bengal and Sumatra, which he calls Baranagor. From the intervals given, the place must have been near Negrais, and it is just possible that the term Barra de Negrais, which frequently occurs in the old writers (e.g. see Balbi, Fitch, and Bocarro below) is a misinterpretation of the old name used by Ibn Batuta (iv. 224-228).

1559.—"Up to the Cape of Negrais, which stands in 16 degrees, and where the Kingdom of Pegu commences, the distance may be 100 leagues."—Barros, I. i. x. 1.

1568.—"Then the wind came from the S.W., and we made sail with our stern to the N.E., and running our course till morning we found ourselves close to the Bar of Negrais, as in their language they call the port which runs up into Pegu."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 92.

1568.—"We entered the barre of Negrais, which is a braue barre," &c. (see COSMIN).

—R. Fitch, in Halkl. ii. 390.

1613.—"Philip de Brito having sure intelligence of this great armament... ordered the arming of seven ships and some sanguiçedas, and appointing as their commodore Paulo de Rego Pinheiro, gave him precise orders to engage the prince of Arracan at sea, before he should enter the Baravand rivers of Negrais, which form the mouth of all those on the kingdom of Pegu."—Dalrymple, 157.

1727.—"The Sea Coast of Arracan reaches from Xatigam (see CHITTAGONG) to Cape Negrais, about 400 Miles in length, but few places inhabited..." (after speaking of 'the great Island of Negrais')... he goes on..."The other Island of Negrais, which makes the Point called the Cape...is often called Diamond Island, because its Shape is a Rhombus... Three Longues to the Southward of Diamond Island lies a Reef of Rocks a League long... conspicuous at all Times by the Sea breaking over them...the Rocks are called the Legart, or in English, the Lizard."—A. Hamilton, ii. 29. This reef is the Aigua da, on which a noble lighthouse was erected by Capt. (afterwards Lieut.-Gen.) Sir A. Fraser, C.B., of the Engineers, with great labour and skill. The statement of Hamilton suggests that the original name may have been Legart, but Aigua da, 'overflowed,' is the real origin. It appears in the old French chart of d'Après as Ile Noye. In Dunn it is Negorda or Neijada, or Lequdo, or Sunken Island (N. Dir. 1780, 325).

1759.—"The Dutch by an Inscription in Teutonic Characters, lately found at Negrais, on the Tomb of a Dutch Colonel, who died in 1607 (qu. if not 1627?), appear then to have had Possession of that Island."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 98.

1763.—"It gives us pleasure to observe that the King of the Burmahs, who caused our people at Negrais to be so cruelly massacred, is since dead, and succeeded by his son, who seems to be of a more friendly and humane disposition."—Fort William Consns., Feb. 19. In Long, 288.

[1819.—"Negraglia." See under MUN-NEEPORE.]

NELLY, NELE, s. Malayál. nel, 'rice in the husk'; [Tel. and Tam. nelli, 'rice-like?]. This is the Dravidian equivalent of paddy (q.v.), and is often used by the French and Portuguese in South India, where Englishmen use the latter word.

1606.—"... when they sell nele, after they have measured it out to the purchaser, for the seller to return and take out two grains for himself for luck (com superstição), things that are all heathen vanities, which the synod entirely prohibits, and orders that those who practise them shall be severely punished by the Bishop."—Gouvea, Synodo, f. 526.

1651.—"Nili, that is ungrounded rice, which is still in the husk."—Rogerius, p. 93.

[1796.—"75 paras Nelly."—List of Export Duties, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 285.]

NELLORE, n.p. A town and district north of Madras. The name may be Tamil. Nall-år, 'Good Town.' But the local interpretation is from nel (see NELLY); and in the local records it is given in Skt. as Dhänya-puram, meaning 'rice-town' (Seshaqirî Sästri). [The Madras Mun. (ii. 214) gives Nall-år, 'Good-town'; but the Gloss. (s.v.) has nello, 'paddy,' ärı, 'village.' Mr. Boswell (Nellore, 687) suggests that it is derived from a nelli chett tree under which a famous lingam was placed.]

c. 1310.—"Ma'bar extends in length from Kulam to Nilawar, nearly 300 parasangs along the sea coast."—Vassäf, in Elliot, iii. 32.

NERBUDDA, R., n.p. Skt. Narmadd, 'causing delight'; Ptol. Námuados; Peripl. L.mvówn (amended by Fabricius to Námuados). Dean Vincent's conjectured etymology of Nahr-Budda, 'River of Buddha,' is a caution against such guesses.

c. 1020.—'*From Dhaar southwards to the R. Nerbadda nine (parasangs); thence to Maharat-des ... eighteen ...'—Al-Biruni, in Elliot, i. 60. The reading of Nerbadda is however doubtful.

c. 1310.—'*There were means of crossing all the rivers, but the Nerbadda was such that you might say it was a remnant of the universal deluge.'—Amir Khusrâd, in Elliot, i. 79.

[1616.—"The King rode to the river of Darbadath."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 413. In his list (ii. 559) he has Narbahad.]

1727.—"The next Town of Note for Commerce is Barach ... on the Banks of the River Nerdaba."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 145.]

NERCHA. s. Malayâl. nercha; 'a vow,' from verb nerwa, 'to agree or promise.'

1606.—"They all assemble on certain days in the porches of the churches and dine together ... and this they call nercha."—Gouwen, Synodo, f. 63. See also f. 11. This term also includes offerings to saints, or to temples, or particular forms of devotion. Among Hindus a common form is to feed a lamp before an idol with ghee instead of oil.

NERRICK. NERRUCK, NIRK. &c., s. Hind. from Pers. nirkh, vulgarly nirakh, nirikh. A tariff, rate, or price-current, especially one established by authority. The system of publishing such rates of prices and wages by local authority prevailed generally in India a generation or two back, and is probably not quite extinct even in our own territories. [The provincial Gazettes still publish periodical lists of current prices, but no attempt is made to fix such by authority.] It is still in force in the French settlements, and with no apparent ill effects.

1799.—"I have written to Campbell a long letter about the nerrick of exchange, in which I have endeavoured to explain the principles of the whole system of shroffing (see SHROFF). ..."—Wellington, i. 56.

1800.—"While I was absent with the army, Col. Sherbrooke had altered the nerrick of artificers, and of all kinds of materials for building, at the instigation of Capt. Norris ... and on the examination of the subject a system of engineering came out, well worthy of the example set at Madras."—Ibid. i. 67.

[","Here is established a niruc, or regulation, by which all coins have a certain value affixed to them; and at this rate they are received in the payment of the revenue; but in dealings between private persons attention is not paid to this rule."—F. Buchanan, Myore, ii. 279.]

1878.—"On expressing his surprise at this, the man assured him that it was really the case that the bazar nerik or market-rate, had so risen."—Life in the Mofussil, i. p. 33.

[See Forbes, British Burma, 83.]

1855.—"Makertich, the Armenian, assured us that the jars of ngâpê at Amarpooora exhibited a flux and reflux of tide with the changes of the moon. I see this is an old belief. De la Loubère mentions it in 1688 as held by the Siamese."—Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 160.

NICOBAR ISLANDS, n.p. The name for centuries applied to a group of islands north of Sumatra. They appear to be the Bâravoara of Ptolomy, and the Lankha Balus of the oldest Arab Relation. [Sir G. Birdwood identifies them with the Island of the Bell (Nâkâs) to which Sindbad, the Seaman, is carried in his fifth voyage. (Report on Old Records, 108; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 368.)] The Danes attempted to colonize the islands in the middle of the 18th century, and since, unsuccessfully. An account of the various attempts will be found in the voyage of the Novara. Since 1869 they have been partially occupied by the British Government, as an appendage of the Andaman settlement. Comparing the old forms Lankha and Nakkavarâm, and the nakedness constantly attributed to the people, it seems possible that the name may have had reference to this (nâgâ). [Mr. Man (Journ. Anthrop. Institute, xviii. 359) writes: 'A possible derivation may be suggested by the following extract from a paper by A. de Candolle (1885) on 'The Origin of Cultivated Plants': 'The presence of the coconut in Asia three or four thousand years ago is proved by several Sanskrit names. . . . The Malays have a name widely diffused in the Archipelago, kalupa, klapa, klopo. At Sumatra and Nicobar we find the name vjoer, vnero, in the Philippines vioj, at Bali, vioh, vjo . . .']

While the Nicobars have long been famed for the excellence of their coconuts, the only words which bear any resemblance to the forms above given are ngat, 'a ripe nut,' and nî-nâu, 'a half-ripe nut.'"

c. 1050.—The name appears as Nakka-vâram in the great Tanjore Inscription of the 11th century.
c. 1292.—"When you leave the island of Java (the Less) and the Kingdom of Lombok, you sail north about 150 miles, and then you come to two Islands, one of which is called Nucuveran. In this island they have no king nor chief, but live like beasts. . . ."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 12.
c. 1300.—'Opposite Lâmiri is the island of Lûkwâram (probably to read Nákâwâram), which produces plenty of red amber. Men and women go naked, except that the latter cover the pudenda with cocoanut leaves. They are all subject to the Kiân.—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.
c. 1322.—'Departing from that country, and sailing towards the south over the Ocean Sea, I found many islands and countries, where among others was one called Nicoeveran, both the men and women there have faces like dogs, etc. . . ."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 97.

1510.—'In front of the before named island of Samatra, across the Gulf of the Ganges, are 5 or 6 small islands, which have very good water and ports for ships. They are inhabited by Gentiles, poor people, and are called Niconvar (Nacabar in Lisbon ed.), and they find in them very good amber, which they carry thence to Malaca and other parts."—Barbosa, 195.

1514.—"Seeing the land, the pilot said it was the land of Nicubar. . . . The pilot was at the top to look out, and coming down he said that this land was all cut up (i.e. in islands), and that it was possible to pass through the middle; and that now there was no help for it but to chance it or turn back to Cochín. . . . The natives of this country had sight of us and suddenly came forth in great boats full of people. . . . They were all Caffres, with fish-bones inserted in their lips and chin: big men and frightful to look on; having their boats full of bows and arrows poisoned with herbs."—Giov. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. pp. 71-72.

NIGGER. s. It is an old brutality of the Englishman in India to apply this title to the natives, as we may see from Ives quoted below. The use originated, however, doubtless in following the old Portuguese use of negros for "the blacks" (q.v.), with no malice prepense, without any intended confusion between Africans and Asians.

1539.—See quot. from Pinto under COBRA DE CAPELLO, where negros is used for natives of Sumatra.

1548.—"Moreover three blacks (negros) in this territory occupy lands worth 3000 or 4000 pardoos of rent; they are related to one another, and are placed as guards in the outlying parts."—S. Botelho, Cartas, 111.

1582.—"A nigroe of John Courbages, Pilot to Paulo da Gama, was that day run away to the Moores."—Costaúnda, by N. L., f. 19.

[1608.—"'The King and people niggers.'—Danvers, Letters, i. 10.]

1622.—Ed. Grant, purser of the Diamond, reports capture of vessels, including a junk "with some stoor of neger, which was devised bytwick the Duch and the English."—Sainsbury, iii. p. 78.

1755.—"You cannot affront them (the natives) more than to call them by the name of negro, as they conceive it implies an idea of slavery."—Ives, Voyage, p. 28.

1757.—"Gli Gesuiti sono missionari e parochie de' negri detti Malabar."—Della Tomba, 3.

1760.—"The Dress of this Country is entirely linen, save Hats and Shoes; the latter are made of tanned Hides as in England . . . only that they are no thicker than coarse paper. These shoes are neatly made by Negroes, and sold for about 16l. a Pr. each of which will last two months with care."—M. S. Letter of James Kennell, Sept. 30.

1866.—"Now the political creed of the frequenter of dawk bungalow is too uniform . . . it consists in the following tenets . . . that Sir Mordant Wells is the greatest judge that ever sat on the English bench; and that when you hit a nigger he dies on purpose to spite you."—The Dawk Bungalow, p. 225.

NILGHERY, NEILGHERY, &c., n.p. The name of the Mountain Peninsula at the end of the Mysore table land (originally known as Malai-nâlu, 'Hill country'), which is the chief site of hill sanatoria in the Madras Presidency. Skt. Nilagiri, 'Blue Mountain.' The name Nila or Nilâdri (synonymous with Nilagiri) belongs to one of the mythical or semi-mythical ranges of the Puranic Cosmography (see Vishnu Purâna, in Wilson's Works, by Hall, ii. 102, 111, &c.), and has been applied to several ranges of more assured locality, e.g. in Orissa as well as in S. India. The name seems to have been fancifully applied to the Ootacamund range about 1829, by some European. [The name was undoubtedly applied by natives to the range before the appearance of Europeans, as in the Konjû-deôa Rajâkal, quoted by Grigg (Nilagiri Man. 363), and the name appears in a letter of Col. Mackenzie of about 1816 (Ibid. 278). Mr. T. M. Horsfall writes:
"The name is in common use among all classes of natives in S. India, but when it may have become specific I cannot say. Possibly the solution may be that the Nilgiris being the first large mountain range to become familiar to the English, that name was by them caught hold of, but not \textit{coined}, and stuck to them by mere priority. It is on the face of it improbable that the Englishmen who early in the last century discovered these Hills, that is, explored and shot over them, would call them by a long Skt. name.")"

Probably the following quotation from Dampier refers to Orissa, as does that from Hedges:

"One of the English ships was called the \textit{Neldegree}, the name taken from the \textit{Nellegree} Hills in Bengal, as I have heard."— \textit{Dampier}, ii. 145.

1683.—"In ye morning early I went up the \textit{Nillgree} Hill, where I had a view of a most pleasant fruitfull valley."— \textit{Hedges, Diary}, March 2 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 67].

The following also refers to the Orissa Hills:

1769.—"Weavers of Balasore complain of the great scarcity of rice and provisions of all kinds occasioned by the devastations of the Maharratts, who, 600 in number, after plundering Balasore, had gone to the \textit{Nellgree} Hills."—In \textit{Long}, 42.

\textbf{NIPA}, s. Malay \textit{nipeah}.

\textbf{a.} The name of a stemless palm (\textit{Nipa fruticans}, Thunb.), which abounds in estuaries from the Ganges delta eastwards, through Tenasserim and the Malay countries, to N. Australia, and the leaves of which afford the chief material used for thatch in the Archipelago. "In the \textit{Philippines}," says Crawford, "but not that I am aware of anywhere else, the sap of the \textit{Nipa} . . . is used as a beverage, and for the manufacture of vinegar, and the distillation of spirits. On this account it yields a considerable part of the revenue of the Spanish Government." (\textit{Desp. Dict.} p. 301). But this fact is almost enough to show that the word is the same which is used in sense b; and the identity is placed beyond question by the quotations from Teixeira and Mason.

\textbf{b.} Arrack made from the sap of a palm tree, a manufacture by no means confined to the Philippines. The Portuguese, appropriating the word \textit{Nipa} to this spirit, called the tree itself \textit{nipiera}.

1611.—"Other wine is of another kind of palm which is called \textit{Nipa} (growing in watery places), and this is also extracted by distillation. It is very mild and sweet, and clear as pure water; and they say it is very wholesome. It is made in great quantities, with which ships are laden in Pegu and Tenasserim, Malaca, and the Philippines or Manilla; but that of Tenasserim exceeds all in goodness."—\textit{Teixeira, Relaciones}, i. 17.

1613.—"And then on from the marsh to the \textit{Nypeiras} or wild-palms of the rivulet of Paret China."—\textit{Godoio de Eredia}, 6.

"And the wild palms called \textit{Nypeiras} . . . from those flowers is drawn the liquor which is distilled into wine by an alembic, which is the best wine of India."—\textit{Ibid.} 166.

[1817.—"In the maritime districts, \textit{apat}, or thatch, is made almost exclusively from the leaves of the \textit{nipa} or \textit{bûyu}."—\textit{Raffles, H. of Java}, 2nd ed. i. 185.]

1848.—"Steamimg amongst the low swampy islands of the Sunderbunds . . . the paddles of the steamer tossed up the large fruits of the \textit{Nipa fruticans}, a low stemless palm that grows in the tidal waters of the Indian ocean, and bears a large head of nuts. It is a plant of no interest to the common observer, but of much to the geologist, from the nuts of a similar plant abounding in the tertiary formations at the mouth of the Thames, having floated about there in as great profusion as here, till buried deep in the silt and mud that now form the island of Sheppey."—\textit{Hooker, Himalayan Journals}, i. 1-2.

1860.—"The \textit{Nipa} is very extensively cultivated in the Province of Tavoy. From incisions in the stem of the fruit, toddy is extracted, which has very much the flavour of mead, and this extract, when boiled down, becomes sugar."—\textit{Mason's Burmah}, p. 506.

1874.—"It (sugar) is also got from \textit{Nipa fruticans}, Thunb., a tree of the low coast-regions, extensively cultivated in Tavoy."—\textit{Hanbury and Flückiger}, 655.

These last quotations confirm the old travellers who represent Tenasserim as the great source of the \textit{Nipa} spirit.

1583.—"I Portoghesi e noi altri di queste bande di quà non mangiamo nel Regno di Pegù pane di grano . . . ne si beve vino;
ma una certa acqua lambiccata da vn albero detto Annippa, ch'è alla bocca assai gustevole; ma al corpo giova e nuoce, secondo le complessioni de gli huomini."—G. Balbi, f. 127.

1591.—"Those of Tanaseri are chiefly freighted with Rice and Nipar wine, which is very strong."—Barker's Account of Lancaster's Voyage, in Hakt. ii. 592.

In the next two quotations wipe is confounded with coco-nut spirit.

1598.—"Likewise there is much wine brought thither, which is made of Cocus or Indian Nuttes, and is called Nype de Tanassariva, that is Aquis Composita of Tanassariva."—Linschoten, 30; [Hak. Soc. i. 108.

"The Sura, being distilled, is called Futa (see FOOL'S RACK) or Nipe, and is an excellent Aquis Vitae as any is made in Dort."—Ibid. 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 49].

[1616.—"One jar of Nepee."—Foster, Letters, iv. 162].

1623.—"In the daytime they did nothing but talk a little with one another, and some of them got drunk upon a certain wine they have of raisins, or on a kind of aqua vitæ with other things mixt in it, in India called nippa, which had been given them."—P. della Valle, ii. 669; [Hak. Soc. ii. 272].

We think there can be little doubt that the slang word nip, for a small dram of spirits, is adopted from nippa. [But compare Dutch nippen, 'to take a dram.' The old word nippitatun was used for 'strong drink'; see Stanf. Dict.]

NIRVÁNA, s. Skt. nirvīnā. The literal meaning of this word is simply 'blown out,' like a candle. It is the technical term in the philosophy of the Buddhists for the condition to which they aspire as the crown and goal of virtue, viz. the cessation of sentient existence. On the exact meaning of the term see Childer's Pali Dictionary, s.v. nibbāna, an article from which we quote a few sentences below, but which covers ten double-column pages. The word has become common in Europe along with the growing interest in Buddhism, and partly from its use by Schopenhauer. But it is often employed very inaccurately, of which an instance occurs in the quotation below from Dr. Draper. The oldest European occurrence of which we are aware is in Purchas, who had met with it in the Pali form common in Burma, &c., nibban.

1626.—"After death they (the Talapoyis) beleevve three Places, one of Pleasure Sceṇa (perhaps sukha) like the Mahumitan Paradise; another of Torment Nācæ (read Nitra); the third of Annihilation which they call Nība."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 506.

c. 1815.—"... the state of Nīban, which is the most perfect of all states. This consists in an almost perpetual extacy, in which those who attain it are not only free from troubles and miseries of life, from death, illness and old age, but are abstracted from all sensation; they have no longer either a thought or a desire."—Nisangermano, Burmese Empire, p. 6.

1858.—"... Transience, Pain, and Unreality... these are the characters of all existence, and the only true good is exemption from these in the attainment of nirvāna, whether that be, as in the view of the Brahmin or the theistic Buddhist, absorption into the supreme essence; or whether it be, as many have thought, an absolute mental oblivion, or whether it be, as Mr. Hodgson quaintly phrases it, the sū or the modū in which the infinitely attenuated elements of all things exist, in this last and highest state of abstraction from all particular modifications such as our senses and understandings are cognisant of."

—Yule, Mission to Ava, 206.

"When from between the sāl trees at Kusinārā he passed into nirvāna, he (Buddha) ceased, as the extinguished fire ceases."—Ibid. 239.

1869.—"What Bishop Bigandet and others represent as the popular notion of the Nirvāna, in contradistinction to that of the Buddhist divines, was, in my opinion, the conception of Buddha and his disciples. It represented the entrance of the soul into rest, a subduing of all wishes and desires, indifference to joy and pain, to good and evil, an absorption of the soul into itself, and a freedom from the circle of existences from birth to death, and from death to a new birth. This is still the meaning which educated people attach to it. But the Buddhist Nirvāna suggests rather a kind of Mohanmedan Paradise or of blissful Elysian fields to the minds of the larger masses."—Prof. Max Müller, Lecture on Buddhistic Nīlabām, in Trübner's Or. Record, Oct. 16.

1875.—"Nīlabām. Extinction; destruction; annihilation; annihilation of being, Nirvāna; annihilation of human passion, Arhatship or final sanctification. . . . In Trübner's Record for July, 1870, I first proposed a theory which meets all the difficulties of the question, namely, that the word Nirvāna is used to designate two different things, the state of blissful sanctification called Arhatship, and the annihilation of existence in which Arhatship ends."—Childers, Pali Dictionary, Ph. 203-206.

"But at length reunion with the universal intellect takes place; Nirwana is reached, oblivion is attained . . . the state in which we were before we were born."—Draper, Conflict, &c., 122.
1879.—
"And how—in fulness of the times—it fell
That Buddha died . . .
And how a thousand thousand crores since then Have trod the Path which leads whither he went Unto Nirvāṇa where the Silence lives."
Sir E. Arnold, Light of Asia, 237.

NIZAM, THE, n.p. The hereditary style of the reigning prince of the Hyderabad Territories; 'His Highness the Nizam,' in English official phraseology. This in its full form, Nizām-ul-Mulk, was the title of Aśaf Jāh, the founder of the dynasty, a very able soldier and minister of the Court of Aurangzīb, who became Sūbadār (see SOUBADAR) of the Deccan in 1713. The title is therefore the same that had pertained to the founder of the Ahmednagar dynasty more than two centuries earlier, which the Portuguese called that of Nizamaluco. And the circumstances originating the Hyderabad dynasty were parallel. At the death of Aśaf Jāh (in 1748) he was independent sovereign of a large territory in the Deccan, with his residence at Hyderabad, and with dominions in a general way corresponding to those still held by his descendant.

NIZAMALUCO, n.p. Izam Maluco is the form often found in Correa. One of the names which constantly occur in the early Portuguese writers on India. It represents Nizām-ul-Mulk (see NIZAM). This was the title of one of the chiefs at the court of the Bāhmāni king of the Deccan, who had been originally a Brahman and a slave. His son Ahmed set up a dynasty at Ahmednagar (A.D. 1490), which lasted for more than a century. The sovereigns of this dynasty were originally called by the Portuguese Nizamaluco. Their own title was Nizām Shāh, and this also occurs as Nizamuzza. [Linschoten’s etymology given below is an incorrect guess.]

1521.—"Meanwhile (the Governor Diego Lopes de Sequeira) . . . sent Fernão Camello as ambassador to the Nizamaluco, Lord of the lands of Choul, with the object of making a fort at that place, and arranging for an expedition against the King of Cymbaya, which the Governor thought the Nizamaluco would gladly join in, because he was in a quarrel with that King. To this he made the reply that I shall relate hereafter."—Correa, ii. 623.

1543.—"Izam maluco." See under COTAMALUCO.

1553.—"This city of Chaul . . . is in population and greatness of trade one of the chief ports of that coast; it was subject to the Nizamaluco, one of the twelve Captains of the Kingdom of Deccan (which we call Deccan). The Nizamaluco being a man of great estate, although he possessed this maritime city, and other ports of great revenue, generally in order to be closer to the Kingdom of the Deccan, held his residence in the interior in other cities of his dominion; instructing his governors in the coast districts to aid our fleets in all ways and content their captains; and this was not merely out of dread of them, but with a view to the great revenue that he had from the ships of Malabar. . . ."—Barros, ii. ii. 7.

1563.—". . . This King of Dely conquered the Deccan (see DECCAN) and the Cunam (see CONCAM); and retained the dominion a while; but he could not rule territory at so great a distance, and so placed in it a nephew crowned as king. This king was a great favourer of foreign people, such as Turks, Ramiis, Coraçois, and Arabs, and he divided his kingdom into capitancies, bestowing upon Adelbach (whom we call Idaloom—see IDALCAN) the coast from Angediva to Cifardam . . . and to Nizamaluco the coast from Cifardam to Negotana. . . ."—Garcia, f. 34v.

1594.—"E. Let us mount and ride in the country; and by the way you shall tell me who is meant by Nizamuxa, as you often use that term to me.

1598.—"Maluco is a Kingdome, and Nisa a Lance or Speare, so that Nisa Maluco is as much as to say as the Lance or Speare of the Kingdom."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 172. As if Nea-ul-mulk, 'spear of the kingdom.'

NOKAR, s. A servant, either domestic, military, or civil, also pl. Nokar-logue, 'the servants.' Hind. naukar, from Pers. and naukar-lag. Also naukar-chakar, 'the servants,' one of those jingling double-barrelled phrases in which Orientalists delight even more than Englishmen (see LOOTY). As regards Englishmen, compare hugger-mugger, hurdy-gurdy, tip-top, high light-fully, piggledy, hocus-pocus,
tit for tat,
topsy-turvy,
harum-searum, roly-poly,
"fiddle-faddle, rump and stumpy, slipslop. In this case chokar (see CHAKUR) is also Persian. Naukar would seem to be a Mongol word introduced into Persia by the hosts of Chinghiz. According to I. J. Schmidt, Forschungen im Gebiete der Volker Mittel Asiens, p. 96, nikur is in Mongol, 'a comrade, dependent, or friend.'

c. 1407.—"L'Emir Khodaia'dad fit partir avec ce député son serviteur (naukar) et celui de Mirza Djihanghir. Ces trois per-sonnages joignent la cour auguste. . . ."— Abdurrazdk, in Notices et Estroges, XIV. i. 146.

c. 1690.—"Mahmûd Sultân . . . understood accounts, and could reckon very well by memory the sums which he had to receive from his subjects, and those which he had to pay to his 'naukar' (apparently armed followers)."—Abulghazi, by Desmaisons, 271.

[1810.—"Nôker." See under CHAKUR.

[1834. — "Its (Balkh) present population does not amount to 2000 souls; who are chiefly . . . the remnant of the Kara Noukur, a description of the militia established here by the Afghans."—Burnes, Travels into Bokhara, i. 238.]

1840.—"Nôker, 'the servant'; this title was borne by Tuli the fourth son of Chchengh Khan, because he was charged with the details of the army and the administration."
—Hammer, Golden Horde, 460.

NOL-KOLE, s. This is the usual Anglo-Indian name of a vegetable a good deal grown in India, perhaps less valued in England than it deserves, and known here (though rarely seen) as Kol-ralbi, kokol-ralbi, 'cabbage-turnip,'
It is the Brassica oleracea, var. caulorapa. The stalk at one point expands into a globular mass resembling a turnip, and this is the edible part.
I see my friend Sir G. Birdwood in his Bombay Products spells it Knollikol.
It is apparently Dutch, 'knollkool' 'Turnip-cabbage; Chou rave of the French.'

NON-REGULATION, adj. The style of certain Provinces of British India (administered for the most part under the more direct authority of the Central Government in its Foreign Department), in which the ordinary Laws (or Regulations, as they were formerly called) are not in force, or are in force only so far as they are specially declared by the Government of India to be applicable. The original theory of administration in such Provinces was the union of authority in all departments under one district chief, and a kind of paternal despotism in the hands of that chief. But by the gradual restriction of personal rule, and the multiplication of positive laws and rules of administration, and the division of duties, much the same might now be said of the difference between Regulation and Non-regulation Provinces that a witty Frenchman said of Intervention and Non-intervention:

—La Non-intervention est une phrase politique et technique qui veut dire enfin a-peu-près la même chose que l'Intervention.'

Our friend Gen. F. C. Cotton, R.E., tells us that on Lord Dalhousie's visit to the Neilgherry Hills, near the close of his government, he was riding with the Governor-General to visit some new building. Lord Dalhousie said to him: "It is not a thing that one must say in public, but I would give a great deal that the whole of India should be Non-regulation.'

The Punjab was for many years the greatest example of a Non-regulation Province. The chief survival of that state of things is that there, as in Burma and a few other provinces, military men are still eligible to hold office in the civil administration.

1860.—"... Nowe what ye ffloke of Bengala worschypen Sir Jhonie discourseth lyt. This moche wey gadere. Some wors-chesypen ane Idolc yelept Regulacions, and some worschypen Non-regulasen (zelui Cog et Ragag). . . ."—Ext. from a MS. of The Travels of Sir John Mandevill in the E. Indies, lately discovered.

1867.—"... We believe we should indicate the sort of government that Sicily wants, tolerably well to Englishmen who know anything of India, by saying that it should be treated in great measure as a 'non-regulation' province."—Quarterly 1883.—"The Delhi district, happily for all, was a non-regulation province."—Life of Lt. Lawrence, i. 44.

NORIMON, s. Japanese word. A sort of portable chair used in Japan.

[1615. — "He kept himselfe close in a neremon."—Cocks's Diary, i. 164.]
and horses, they would not make me way to passe, but fell a quarrelling with my neremoners, and offered me great abuse.

1768-71. "Sedan-chairs are not in use here (in Batavia). The ladies, however, sometimes employ a conveyance that is somewhat like that, and is called a norimon."—Stevorius, E.T. i. 324.

NOR'-WESTER, s. A sudden and violent storm, such as often occurs in the hot weather, bringing probably a 'dust-storm' at first, and culminating in hail or torrents of rain. (See TYPHOON.)

1810.—"... those violent squalls called 'north-westers,' in consequence of their usually either commencing in, or veering round to that quarter. The force of these north-westers is next to incredible."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 35.

1827.—"A most frightful nor wester had come on in the night, every door had burst open, the peals of thunder and torrents of rain were so awful. ..."—Mrs. Fenton, Diary, 98.

NOWBEHAR, n.p. This is a name which occurs in various places far apart, a monument of the former extension of Buddhism. Thus, in the early history of the Mahommedans in Sind, we find repeated mention of a temple called Nawshdar (Nava-vihdra, 'New Monastery'). And the same name occurs at Bakh, near the Oxus. (See VIHARA).

NOWROZE, s. Pers. nau-roz, 'New (Year's) Day'; i.e. the first day of the Solar Year. In W. India this is observed by the Parsees. [For instances of such celebrations at the vernal equinox, see Frazer, Pausanius, iv. 75.]

c. 1590.—"This was also the cause why the Nauruz i Jalali was observed, on which day, since his Majesty's accession, a great feast was given. ... The New Year's Day feast ... commences on the day when the Sun in his splendour moves to Aries, and lasts till the 19th day of the month (Forward)."—Ains, ed. Blockman, i. 183, 276.

1614. — "Their Noroose, which is an annual feast of 20 days continuance kept by the Moors, with great solemnity."—Foster, Letter, iii. 65.

1615. — "The King and Prince went a hunting ... that his house might be fitted against the Norose, which began the first Newe Moon in March."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 188; also see 142.

1638. — "There are two Festivals which are celebrated in this place with extraordinary ceremonies; one whereof is that of the first day of the year, which, with the Persians, they call Nauros, Nauros, or Norose, which signifies nine days, though now it lasts eighties at least, and it falls at the moment that the Sun enters Aries."—Mandelstho, 41.

1673. — "On the day of the Vernal Equinoct. we returned to Gomboon, when the Moores in Aria their New-Year Jlede (see EED) or Noe Rose, with Banqueting and great Solemnity."—Fryer, 306.

1712. — "Restat Nauros, i.e. vertens anni initium, incidens in diem aequinocii verni. Non legalis est, sed ab antiquis Persis haereditate accepta festivitas, omnium caeterarum maxima et solennissima."—Kaeuenyer, Am. Ecdot. 162.

1815. — "Jemsheed also introduced the solar year; and ordered the first day of it, when the sun entered Aries, to be celebrated by a splendid festival. It is called Nauroze, or new year's day, and is still the great festival in Persia."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 17.

1832. — "Nowroz (new year's day) is a festival or eed of no mean importance in the estimation of Mussulman society. The trays of presents prepared by the ladies for their friends are tastefully set out, and the work of many days' previous arrangement. Eggs are boiled hard, some of these are stained in colours resembling our mottled papers; others are neatly painted in figures and devices; many are ornamented with gilding; every lady evincing her own peculiar taste in the prepared eggs for now-roze."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Obser. on the Mussulmans of India, 283-4.

NOWSHADDER, s. Pers. naushadad (Skt. nasastra, but recent), Sal-ammoniaci, i.e. chloride of ammonium.

c. 1300.—We find this word in a mediaeval list of articles of trade contained in Capmany's Memorias de Barcelona (ii. App. 74) under the form nozadro.

1343. — "Salarmoniaci, sicut lisciadro, e non si dà nè sacco no cassa con essa."—Pegolotti, p. 17; also see 57, &c.

1384. — "Sal ammoniaci (nonchadur) is found in its native state among the hills near Juzzak."—Burnes, Travels into Bukhara, ii. 166.

NUDDDEEA RIVERS, n.p. See under GOOGLY RIVER, of which these are branches, intersecting the Nadīqī District. In order to keep open navigation by the directest course from the Ganges to Calcutta, much labour is, or was, annually expended, under a special officer, in endeavouring during the dry season to maintain sufficient depth in these channels.
NUJEEB.

This is the form used in olden times, and even now not obsolete, for the name of the ancient fortress in the Punjab Himalaya which we now usually know by the name of Kotkāngra, both being substantially the same name, Nagarkot, 'the fortress town,' or Kot-ki-nagara, 'the town of the fortress.' [If it be implied that Kāngra is a corruption of Kot-ki-nagara, the idea may be dismissed as a piece of folk-etymology. What the real derivation of Kāngra is is unknown. One explanation is that it represents the Hind. khaukhara, 'dried up, shrivelled.'] In yet older times, and in the history of Muhīmd of Ghazni, it is styled Bām-nagar. The name Nagarkot is sometimes used by older European writers to designate the Himalayan mountains.

1008.—"The Sultan himself (Muhīm) joined in the pursuit, and went after them as far as the fort called Bhām-nagar, which is very strong, situated on the promontory of a lofty hill, in the midst of impasable waters."—Al-'Udī, in Elliot, i. 34.

1337.—"When the sun was in Cancer, the King of the time (Mohammed Tughlak) took the stone fort of Nagarkot in the year 738. . . . It is placed between rivers like the pupil of an eye . . . and is so impregnable that neither Sikander nor Dara were able to take it."—Badr-i-cha,h, ibid. iii. 570.
c. 1370.—"Sultan Firoz . . . marched with his army towards Nagarkot, and passing by the valleys of Nākhach-nuhgargh, he arrived with his army at Nagarkot, which he found to be very strong and secure. This idol Dādāmūnkhī (Jawāulla Mookhī), much worshiped by the Hindus, was situated in the road to Nagarkot. . . ."—Sha ms-i-Sirāj, ibid. iii. 317-318.

1398.—"When I entered the valley on that side of the Siwālik, information 'was brought to me about the town of Nagarkot, which is a large and important town of Hindustān, and situated in these mountains. The distance was 30 kos, but the road lay through jungles, and over lofty and rugged hills.'—Autobiog. of Timur, ibid. 465.

1533.—"But the sources of these rivers (Indus and Ganges) though they burst forth separately in the mountains which Ptolemy calls Imaus, and which the natives call Dhalangar and Nangrācot, yet are these mountains so closely joined that it seems as if they sought to hide these springs."—Barros, l. iv. 7.
c. 1590.—"Nagarkote is a city situated upon a mountain, with a fort called Kangara. In the vicinity of this city, upon a lofty mountain, is a place called Mahamaey (Māhamāyā), which they consider as one of the works of the Divinity, and come in pilgrimage to it from great distances, thereby obtaining the accomplishment of their wishes. It is most wonderful that in order to effect this, they cut out their tongues, which grow again in the course of two or three days. . . ."—Ayeen, ed. Ghudevin, i. 119; [ed. Farrett, ii. 312].

1609.—"Bordering to him is another great Rāwā called Tuli be Chand, whose chief City is Negrcoot, 80 c. from Lahor, and as much from Syrinian, in which City is a famous Pagod, called Je or Durgā, unto which worlds of People resort out of all parts of Indus. . . . Diners Moore also resort to this Peer. . . ."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 438.

1616.—"27. Nagra Cutt, the chiefe Citie so called. . . ."—Terry, in Purchas, ii.; [ed. 1777, p. 82].
c. 1617.—"Nakarkutt."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 534.
c. 1676.—"The caravan being arriv'd at the foot of the Mountains which are call'd at this day by the name of Nanngrocot, abundance of people come from all parts of the Mountain, the greatest part whereof are women and maids, who agree with the Merchants to carry them, their Goods and provisions cross the Mountains. . . ."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 183; [ed. Ball, ii. 269].

1788.—"Kote Kangrah, the fortress belonging to the famous temple of Nagrocote, is given at 49 royal cosses, equal to 99 G. miles, from Sirhind (northward)."—Rennell, Memoir, ed. 1793, p. 107.

1809.—"At Patancote, where the Padshah (so the Sikhs call Ranjeet) is at present engaged in preparations and negotiations for the purpose of obtaining possession of Cote Caungrah (or Nagar Cote), which place is besieged by the Raja of Nepaul. . . ."—Elphinston, in Life, i. 217.

NUJEEB. s. Hind. from Ar. najib, 'noble.' A kind of half-disciplined infantry soldiers under some of the native Governments; also at one time a kind of militia under the British; receiving this honorary title as being gentlemen volunteers.

[c. 1790.—"There were 1000 men, nujeeves, sword men. . . ." Evidence of Sheikh Mohammed, quoted by Mr. Plumer, in Trial of W. Hastings, in Bond, iii. 393.]

1796.—"The Nezibs are Matchlock men."—W. A. Tone, A Letter on the Mahratta People, Bombay, 1798, p. 50.]

1813.—"There are some corps (Mahratta) styled Njeeb or men of good family. . . . These are foot soldiers invariably armed with a sabre and matchlock, and having adopted some semblance of European discipline are much respected."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 46; [2nd ed. i. 343].

[i. , "A corps of Njeebs, or infantry with matchlocks. . . ."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahratta Camp, ed. 1892, p. 11.]
NULLAH, s. Hind. nullā. A watercourse; not necessarily a dry watercourse, though this is perhaps more frequently indicated in the Anglo-Indian use.

1776.—"When the water falls in all the nullahs..."—Halded's Code, 52.

c. 1785.—"Major Adams had sent on the 11th Captain Hebbert...to throw a bridge over Shinga nullah."—Curvaccoli, Life of Olive, i. 93.

1789.—"The ground which the enemy had occupied was entirely composed of sandhills and deep nullahs..."—Monro, Narrative, 224.

1790.—"I think I can show you a situation where two embrasures might be opened in the bank of the nullah with advantage."—Wellington, Despatches, i. 26.

1817.—"On the same evening, as soon as dark, the party which was destined to open the trenches marched to the chosen spot, and before daylight formed a nullah...into a large parallel."—Mill's Hist. v. 377.

1843.—"Our march tardy because of the nullahs. Watercourses is the right name, but we get here a slip-slop way of writing quite contemptible."—Life of Sir G. Napier, ii. 310.

1860.—"The real obstacle to movement is the depth of the nullahs hollowed out by numerous rivulets, when swollen by the rains."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 574.

NUMDA, NUMNA. s. Hind. namda, namdē, from Pers. namad, [Skt. namata]. Felt; sometimes a woollen saddle-cloth, properly made of felt. The word is perhaps the same as Ar. namat, 'a coverlet,' spread on the seat of a sovereign, &c.

Hawway, Hist. Account of British Trade, i. 226.]

1815.—"That chief (Temengin or Chingiz), we are informed, after addressing the Khans in an eloquent harangue, was seated upon a black felt or numud, and reminded of the importance of the duties to which he was called."—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 410.

[1819.—"A Kattie throws a numda on his mare."—Trina. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 279.]

1828.—"In a two-plied tent of a great size, and lined with yellow woollen stuff of Europe, sat Nader Koolee Khan, upon a coarse numud..."—The Kuzzilbash, i. 254.

[1850.—"The natives use (for their tents) a sort of woolen stuff, about half an inch thick, called 'numbda.'...By the bye, this word 'numbda' is said to be the origin of the word nomade, because the nomade tribes used the same material for their tents"

NUMERICAL AFFIXES, COEFFICIENTS, or DETERMINATIVES.* What is meant by these expressions can perhaps be best elucidated by an extract from the Malay Grammar of the late venerable John Crawford:

"In the enumeration of certain objects, the Malay has a peculiar idiom which, as far as I know, does not exist in any other language of the Archipelago. It is of the same nature as the word 'head,' as we use it in the tale of cattle, or 'sail' in the enumeration of ships; but in Malay it extends to many familiar objects. Alai, of which the original meaning has not been ascertained, is applied to such tenuous objects as leaves, grasses, &c.; Batang, meaning 'stem,' or 'trunk,' to trees, logs, spears, and javelins; Bantak, of which the meaning has not been ascertained, to such objects as rings; Bidang, which means 'spreading' or 'spacious,' to mats, carpets, thatch, sails, skins, and hides; Biji, 'seeds,' to corn, seeds, stones, pebbles, gems, eggs, the eyes of animals, lamps, and candlesticks," and so on. Crawford names 8 or 9 other terms, one or other of which is always used in company with the numeral, in enumerating different classes of objects, as if, in English, idiom should compel us to say 'two stems of spears,' 'four spreads of carpets,' 'six corns of diamonds.' As a matter of fact we do speak of 20 head of cattle, 10 jile of soldiers, 100 sail of ships, 20 pieces of cannon, a dozen stand of rifles. But still the practice is in none of these cases obligatory, it is technical and exceptional; insomuch that I remember, when a boy, in old Reform-Bill days, and when disturbances were expected in a provincial town, hearing it stated by a well-informed lady that a great proprietress in the neighbourhood was so alarmed that she had ordered from town a whole stand of muskets!

To some small extent the idiom occurs also in other European languages.

* Other terms applied have been Numeratio, Quantitative Auxiliaries, Numeral Auxiliaries, Segregatives, &c. including French and German. Of French I don't remember any example now except tête (de betail), nor of German except Stück, which is, however, almost as universal as the Chinese piecëy. A quaint example dwells in my memory of a German courier, who, when asked whether he had any employer at the moment, replied: 'Ja freilich! dreizehn Stück Amerikaner!'

The same peculiar idiom that has been described in the extract from Crawford as existing in Malay, is found also in Burmese. The Burmese affixes seem to be more numerous, and their classification to be somewhat more arbitrary and sophisticated. Thus oos, a root implying 'chief' or 'first,' is applied to kings, divinities, priests, &c.; Yaw, 'a male,' to rational beings not divine; Gaung, 'a brute beast,' to irrational beings; Pya implying superficial extent, to dollars, countries, dishes, blankets, &c.; Loo, implying rounduity, to eggs, loaves, bottles, cups, toes, fingers, candles, bamboo, hands, feet, &c.; Tseng and Gyaung, 'extension in a straight line,' to rods, lines, spears, roads, &c.

The same idiom exists in Siamese, and traces of it appear in some of the vocabularies that have been collected of tribes on the frontier of China and Tibet, indicated by the fact that the numerals in such vocabularies in various instances show identity of origin in the essential part of the numeral, whilst a different aspect is given to the whole word by a variation in what appears to be the numeral-affix* (or what Mr. Brian Hodgson calls the 'servile affix'). The idiom exists in the principal vernaculars of China itself, and it is a transfer of this idiom from Chinese dialects to Pigeon-English which has produced the piecëy, which in that quaint jargon seems to be used as the universal numerical affix ("Two piecëy cooly," "three piecëy dollar," &c.).

This one pigeon phrase represents scores that are used in the vernaculars. For in some languages the system has taken what seems an extravagant development, which must form a great difficulty in the acquisition of colloquial use by foreigners. Some approximate statistics on this subject will be given below.

The idiom is found in Japanese and Corean, but it is in these cases possibly not indigenous, but an adoption from the Chinese.

It is found in several languages of C. America, i.e. the Quiché of Guatemala, the Nahualt of Mexico Proper; and in at least two other languages (Tep and Pirinda) of the same region. The following are given as the coefficients or determinatives chiefly used in the (Nahualt or) Mexican. Compare them with the examples of Malay and Burmese usage already given:

Tell (a stone) used for roundish or cylindrical objects; e.g. eggs, beans, cacao beans, cherries, prickly-pears, Spanish loaves, &c., also for books, and fowls:

Pantli (?) for long rows of persons and things; also for walls and furrows:

Tlamantli (from mana, to spread on the ground), for shoes, dishes, basins, paper, &c., also for speeches and sermons:

Oloti (maize-grains) for ears of maize, cacao-pods, bananas: also for flint arrow-heads (see W. v. Humboldt, Kawi-Sprache, ii. 265).

I have, by the kind aid of my friend Professor Terrien de la Couperie, compiled a list of nearly fifty languages in which this curious idiom exists. But it takes up too much space to be inserted here. I may, however, give his statistics of the number of such determinatives, as assigned in the grammars of some of these languages in Chinese vernaculars, from 33 in the Shanghai vernacular to 110 in that of Fuchau. In Corean, 12; in Japanese, 16; in Annamite, 106; in Siamese, 24; in Shan, 42; in Burmese, 40; in Malay and Javanese, 19.

If I am not mistaken, the propensity to give certain technical and appropriated titles to couples of certain beasts and birds, which had such an extensive development in old English sporting phraseology, and still partly survives, had its root in the same state of mind, viz. difficulty in grasping the idea of abstract numbers, and a dislike to their use. Some light to me was, many years ago, thrown upon this feeling, and on the origin of the idiom of which we have been speaking, by a passage in a modern book, which is the more noteworthy as the author does not make any reference to the existence of this idiom in any language, and possibly was not aware of it:

"On entering into conversation with the (Red) Indian, it becomes speedily apparent that he is unable to comprehend the idea of abstract numbers. They exist in his mind only as associated ideas. He has a distinct conception of five dogs or five deer, but he is so unaccustomed to the idea of number as a thing apart from specific objects, that I have tried in vain to get an Indian to admit that the idea of the number five, as associated in his mind with five dogs, is identical, as far as number is concerned, with that of five fingers."—(Wilson's Prehistoric Man, 1st ed. ii. 470.) [Also see Tylor, Primitive Culture, 2nd ed. i. 252 seqq.]

Thus it seems probable that the use of the numerical co-efficient, whether in the Malay idiom or in our old sporting phraseology, is a kind of survival of the effort to bridge the difficulty felt, in identifying abstract numbers as applied to different objects, by the introduction of a common concrete term.

Traces of a like tendency, though probably grown into a mere fashion and artificially developed, are common in Hindustani and Persian, especially in the official written style of munshis, who delight in what seemed to me, bettering my attention was called to the Indo-Chinese idiom, the wilful surplusage (e.g.) of two 'sheets' (fard) of letters, also used with quilts, carpets, &c.; three 'persons' (nafir) of bar-kandazes; five 'rope' (ras) of buffaloes;
ten 'chains' (zenjur) of elephants;
twenty 'grips' (kabza) of swords, &c.
But I was not aware of the extent of the idiom in the munshi's repertory till I found it displayed in Mr.
Carnegy's Kachahri Technicalities, under the head of Mahawara (Idioms or Phrases). Besides those just quoted, we there find 'adad ('number') used with coins, utensils, and sleeveless garments; dana ('grain') with pearls and coral beads; dost ('hand') with falcons, &c., shields, and robes of honour; jilk ('volume, lit. 'skin') with books; mulah ('nose-bit') with camels; kita ('portion, piecey') with precious stones, gardens, tanks, fields, letters; mansil ('a stage on a journey, an alighting place') with tents, boats, houses, carriages, beds, howdas, &c.; sit ('an instrument') with guitars, &c.; silk ('thread') with necklaces of all sorts, &c. Several of these, with others purely Turkish, are used also in Osmanli Turkish.*

NUNCATIES, s. Rich cakes made by the Mahommedans in W. India chiefly imported into Bonbay from Surat. [There is a Pers. word, nan-khatai, 'bread of Cathay or China,' with which this word has been connected.
But Mr. Weir, Collector of Surat, writes that it is really nankhatai, Pers.
naan, 'bread,' and Mahr. khat, shat,
'six'; meaning a special kind of cake composed of six ingredients—wheat-flour, eggs, sugar, butter or ghee, leaven produced from toddy or grain, and almonds.]

[NUT, s. Hind. nath, Skt. nastā,
'the nose.' The nose-ring worn by Indian women.

[1819.—"An old fashioned nath or nose-ing, stuck full of precious or false stones."
—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. i. 284.

[1832.—"The nut (nose-ring) of gold wire, which is strung a ruby between the two pearls, worn only by married women."
—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Oibs. i. 45.]

NUT PROMOTION, s. From its supposed indigestible character, the kernel of the cashew-nut is so called in S. India, where, roasted and hot, it is a favourite dessert dish. [See Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 28.]

NUZZER, s. Hind. from Ar. nazar or nasur (prop. naddir), primarily 'a vow or votive offering'; but, in ordinary use, a ceremonial present, properly an offering from an inferior to a superior, the converse of inām.
The root is the same as that of Nazarite (Numbers, vi. 2).

[1765.—"The congratulatory nazirs, &c., shall be set opposite my ordinary expenses;
and if ought remains, it shall go to Poplar, or some other hospital."—Letter of Ld.
Cteve, Sept. 30, in Verelst, View of Bengal, 127.

* Some details on the subject of these deter-matives, in reference to languages on the eastern border of India, will be found in Prof. Max Müller's letter to Bunsen in the latter's Outlines of the Phil.
of Universal History, i. 390 seqq. ; as well as in W.
von Humboldt, quoted above. Prof. Max Müller refers to Humboldt's Complete Works, vi.
402: but this I have not been able to find, nor, in either writer, any suggested rationale of the idiom.
635 OLD STRAIT.

[c. 1775.—"The Governor lays before the board two bags... which were presented to him in nuzzers... "]—Pros. of Council, quoted by Fox in speech against W. Hastings, in Bond, iv. 201.]

1782.—"Col. Monson was a man of high and hospitable household expenses; and so determined against receiving of presents, that he would not only not touch a nuzzier (a few silver rupees, or perhaps a gold mohor) always presented by country gentlemen, according to their rank... "]—Prie's Tracts, ii. 61.

1785.—"Present of ceremony, called nuzzers, were to many a great portion of their subsistence... "]—Letter in Life of Colebrooke, 16.

1786.—Tippoo, even in writing to the French Governor of Pondichery, whom it was his interest to conciliate, and in acknowledging a present of 500 muskets, cannot restrain his insolence, but calls them "sent by way of nuzzir."—Select Letters of Tippoo, 377.

1809.—"The Aumil himself offered the nuzzir of fruit."—Id. Valentina, i. 458.

1832.—"I... looked to the Meer for explanation; he told me to accept Mackabeg's 'nuzzar.'"—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observ. i. 193.]

1876.—"The Standard has the following curious piece of news in its Court Circular of a few days ago:—'Sir Salar Jung was presented to the Queen by the Marquis of Salisbury, and offered his Muggur as a token of allegiance, which her Majesty touched and returned.'"—Punch, July 15.

For the true sense of the word so deliciously introduced instead of Nuzzzer, see MUGGUR.

O

OART, s. A coco-nut garden. The word is peculiar to Western India, and is a corruption of Port. orta (now more usually horta). "Any man's particular allotment of coco-nut trees in the groves at Mahim or Girgaum is spoken of as his oart." (Sir G. Birdwood.)

1564.—"... e me praz de fazer merce a dita cidade enfatiosa para sempre que a ortaliza das ortas dos moradores Portuguezes o cristãos que nesta cidade de Goa e ilha te... possão vender." &c.—Proclamation of Dom Sebastian, in Archiv. Port. Orient. fase. 2, 157.

[Oebans—"... as well Vargems (Port. vergem, 'a field') lands as Hortas."—Letter in Logan, Malabar, iii. 487. c. 1760.—"As to the Oarts, or Coco-nut groves, they make the most considerable part of the landed property."—Grose, i. 47.

1793.—"For sale... That neat and commodious Dwelling House built by Mr. William Beal; it is situated in a most lovely Oart... "]—Bombay Courier, Jan. 12.

OBANG, s. Jap. Oh'o-hon, lit. 'greater division.' The name of a large oblong Japanese gold piece, similar to the kobang (q.v.), but of 10 times the value; 5 to 6 inches in length and 3 to 4 inches in width, with an average weight of 2564 grs. troy. First issued in 1580, and last in 1860, Tavennier has a representation of one.

[1662.—"A thousand Oebans of gold, which amount to forty seven thousand Thayls, or Crowns."—Mandelslo, E. T. Bk. ii. 147 (Stavn. Dict.).

[1859.—"The largest gold coin known is the Obang, a most inconvenient circulating medium, as it is nearly six inches in length, and three inches and a half in breadth."—Elephant, Narrative of Mission, ii. 292.]

OLD STRAIT, n.p. This is an old name of the narrow strait between the island of Singapore and the mainland, which was the old passage followed by ships passing towards China, but has long been abandoned for the wider strait south of Singapore and north of Bintang. It is called by the Malays Salat Tambru, from an edible fish called by the last name. It is the Strait of Singapura of some of the old navigators; whilst the wider southern strait was known as New Strait or Governor's Straits (q.v.).

1727.—"... Johore Lami, which is sometimes the Place of that King's Residence, and has the Benefit of a fine deep large River, which admits of two Entrances into it. The smallest is from the Westward, called by Europeans the Straights of Singapure, but by the Natives Salleta de Breu" (i.e. Salat Tambru, as above).—A. Hamilton, ii. 92; [ed. 1744].
1860.—“The Old Straits, through which formerly our Indians passed on their way to China, are from 1 to 2 miles in width, and except where a few clearings have been made... with the shores on both sides covered with dense jungle... doubtless, in old times, an isolated vessel... must have kept a good look out against attack from piratical prahus darting out from one of the numerous creeks.”—Cavenough, Rem. of an Indian Official, 255-6.

OLLAH, s. Tam. olari, Mal. ola. A palm-leaf; but especially the leaf of the Palmyra (Borassus flabellifer) as prepared for writing on, often, but incorrectly, termed cadjan (q.v.). In older books the term ola generally means a native letter; often, as in some cases below, a written order. A very good account of the royal scribes at Calicut, and their mode of writing, is given by Barbosa as follows:—

1516.—“The King of Calicut keeps many clerks constantly in his palace; they are all in one room, separate and far from the king, sitting on benches, and there they write all the affairs of the king’s revenue, and his alms, and the pay which is given to all, and the complaints which are presented to the king, and, at the same time, the accounts of the collectors of taxes. All this is on broad stiff leaves of the palm-tree, without ink, with pens of iron; they write their letters in lines drawn like ours, and write in the same direction as we do. Each of these clerks has great bundles of these written leaves, and wherever they go they carry them under their arms, and the iron pen in their hands... and amongst these are 7 or 8 who are great confidants of the king, and men held in great honour, who always stand before him with their pens in their hand and a bundle of paper under their arm; and each of them has always several of these leaves in blank but signed at the top by the king, and when he commands them to despatch any business they write it on these leaves.”—Pp. 110-111, Hak. Soc., but translation modified.

1533.—“All the Gentiles of India... when they wish to commit anything to written record, do it on certain palm-leaves which they call ola, of the breadth of two fingers.”—Barros, I. ix. 3.

“... All the rest of the town was of wood, thatched with a kind of palm-leaf, which they call ola.”—Ibid. I. iv. vii.

1561. —“All this was written by the king’s writer, whose business it is to prepare his olas, which are palm-leaves, which they use for writing-paper, scratching it with an iron point.”—Correa, i. 212-213.

Correa uses the word in three applications: (a) for a palm-leaf as just quoted; (b) for a palm-leaf letter; and (c) for (Coco) palm-leaf thatch.

1560.—“... in the Maldives... they make a kind of vessel which with its nails, its sails, and its cordage is all made of palm; with the fronds (which we call olla in Malavar) they cover houses and vessels.”—Garcia, f. 67.

1586.—“I answered that I was from Venice, that my name was Gasparo Balbi... and that I brought the emeralds from Venice expressly to present to his majesty, whose fame for goodness, courtesy, and greatness flew through all the world... and all this was written down on an olla, and read by the aforesaid ‘Master of the Word’ to his Majesty.”—G. Balbi, f. 104.

“... But to show that he did this as a matter of justice, he sent a further order that nothing should be done till they received an olla, or letter of his sign manual written in letters of gold; and so he (the King of Pegû) ordered all the families of those nobles to be kept prisoners, even to the women big with child, and the infants in bands, and so he caused the whole of them to be led upon the said scaffolding; and then the king sent the olla, ordering them to be burnt; and the Decagini executed the order, and burned the whole of them.”—Ibid. f. 112-113.

[1611.—“Two Ollahs, one to Gimp Baya...”—Dawers, Letters, i. 154.]

1626. —“The writing was on leaves of Palmyra, which they called Olla.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 554.

1673.—“The houses are low, and thatched with ollas of the Cocoe-Trees.”—Fryer, 66.

c. 1690.—“... Ola peculiariter Malabaris dieta, et inter alia Papyri loco adhibetur.”—Rumphius, i. 2.

1718.—“... Damulian Leaves, commonly called Oles.”—Prop. of the Gospel, &c., iii. 37.

1760.—“He (King Alompra) said he would give orders for Olias to be made out for delivering of what Englishmen were in his Kingdom to me.”—Capt. Alves, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 377.

1806.—“... Many persons had their Ollahs in their hands, writing the sermon in Tamil shorthand.”—Buchanan, Christian Res. 2nd ed. 70.

1860.—“The books of the Singhalese are formed to-day, as they have been for ages past, of ollas, or strips taken from the young leaves of the Talipot or the Palmyra palm.”—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 512.

1870.—“... Un manuscrit sur ollas...”—Recue Critiq., June 11, 374.

OMEDWAUR, s. Hind. from Pers. ummedevwar (ummed, umed, ‘hope’); literally, therefore, ‘a hopeful one’; i.e. “an expectant, a candidate for employment, one who awaits a favourable answer to some representation or request.” (Wilson.)
OMLAH. s. This is properly the Ar. pl. 'analat, 'amalā, of āmid (see AUMIL). It is applied on the Bengal side of India to the native officers, clerks, and other staff of a civil court or cutcherry (q.v.) collectively.

c. 1778.—"I was at this place met by the Omlah or officers belonging to the establishment, who hailed my arrival in a variety of boats dressed out for the occasion."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsays, iii. 167.

1866.—"At the worst we will hint to the Omlahs to discover a fast which it is necessary they shall keep with great solemnity."

—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxiii. 390.

The use of an English plural, omalas, here is incorrect and unusual; though omrahs is used (see next word).

1878.—"... the subordinate managers, young, inexperienced, and altogether in the hands of the Omlah."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 6.

OMRAH, s. This is properly, like the last word, an Ar. pl. (Umārā, pl. of Amīr—see AMEER), and should be applied collectively to the higher officials at a Mahomedan Court, especially that of the Great Mogul. But in old European narratives it is used as a singular for a lord or grandee of that Court; and indeed in Hindustani the word was similarly used, for we have a Hind. plural umardān, 'omrahs.' From the remarks and quotations of Blochmann, it would seem that Mansabdārs (see MUNSUB-DAR), from the commandant of 1000 upwards, were styled umārā-i-kabār, or umārā-i-ızām, 'Great Amirs'; and these would be the Omrahs properly. Certain very high officials were styled Amīr-ul-Umārā (Aīn, i. 239-240), a title used first at the Court of the Caliphs.

1616.—"Two Omrahs who are great Commanders."—Sir T. Roe.

[", "The King lately sent out two Vmbras with horse to fetch him in."—Ibid. Hak. Soc. ii. 417; in the same page he writes Vmrees, and in ii. 445, Vmrees.]

c. 1630.—"Howbeit, out of this prodigious rent, goes yearly many great payments: to his Lieutenants of Provinces, and Vmbrayes of Townes and Forts."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 55.

1653.—"Il y a quantité d'éléphants dans les Indes... les Omras s'en servent par grandeur."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, p. 250.

c. 1664.—"It is not to be thought that the Omrahs, or Lords of the Mogul’s Court, are sons of great Families, as in France... these Omrahs then are commonly but Adventurers and Strangers of all sorts of Nations, some of them slaves; most of them without instruction, which the Mogul thus raiseth to Dignities as he thinks good, and degrades them again, as he pleaseth."—Beranger, E. T. 66; [ed. Constable, 211].

c. 1666.—"Les Omras sont les grand seigneurs du Roaume, qui sont pour la plupart Persans ou fils de Persans."—Therestot, v. 307.

1763.—"The President... has a Noise of Trumpets... an Horse of State led before him, a Mirchall (see MORCHAL) (a Fan of Ostrich Feathers) to keep off the Sun, as the Omrahs or Great Men have."—Fryer, 86.

1766.—"Their standard, planted on the battlement, Despair and death among the soldiers sent; You the bold Omrah tumbled from the wall, And shouts of victory pursued the fall."

Dryden, Aurengzebe, ii. 1.

1710.—"Donna Juliana... let the Heer Ambassador know... that the Emperor had ordered the Ammaras Enay Ullah Chan (k.) to take care of our interests."—Valentijn, iv. Suratte, 284.

1727.—"You made several complaints against former Governors, all of which I have here from several of my Umbras."—Firman of Aurengzib, in A. Hamilton, ii. 227; [ed. 1744, i. 231].

1791.—"... les Omrahs ou grands seigneurs Indiens..."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chauviere Indienne, 92.

OMUM WATER, s. A common domestic medicine in S. India, made from the strong-smelling carminative seeds of an umbrelliferous plant, Carum coticum, Bent. (Psychotis coticica, and Pzych. Ajowan of Decand), called in Tamil omam, [which comes from the Skt. amand, yavant, in Hind. ajwān.] See Hanbury and Buckeiger, 269.

OJOYNE, n.p. Ujjayani, or, in the modern vernacular, Ujjan, one of the most ancient of Indian cities, and one of their seven sacred cities. It was the capital of King Vikramaditya, and was the first meridian of Hindu astronomers, from which they calculated their longitudes.
The name of Ujjain long led to a curious imbroglio in the interpretation of the Arabic geographers. Its meridian, as we have just mentioned, was the zero of longitude among the Hindus. The Arab writers borrowing from the Hindus wrote the name apparently Azīn, but this by the mere omission of a diacritical point became Aрин, and from the Arabs passed to medieval Christian geographers as the name of an imaginary point on the equator, the intersection of the central meridian with that circle. Further, this point, or transposed city, had probably been represented on maps, as we often see cities on medieval maps, by a cupola or the like. And hence the "Cupola of Aрин or Arym," or the "Cupola of the Earth" (Al-kuвba al-ardhb) became an established commonplace for centuries in geographical tables or statements. The idea was that just 180° of the earth's circumference was habitable, or at any rate cognizable as such, and this meridian of Aрин bisected this habitable hemisphere. But as the western limit extended to the Fortunate Isles, it became manifest to the Arabs that the central meridian could not be so far east as the Hindu meridian of Aрин (or of Lanka, i.e. Ceylon). (See quotation from the Arjabhatta, under JAVA.) They therefore shifted it westward, but shifted the mystic Aрин along the equator westward also. We find also among medieval European students (as with Roger Bacon, below), a confusion between Aрин and Syene. This Reinaud supposes to have arisen from the Essiva emvdrarn of Ptolemy, a place which he locates on the Zanzibar coast, and approximating to the shifted position of Aрин. But it is perhaps more likely that the confusion arose from some survival of the real name Azīn. Many conjectures were vainly made as to the origin of Arym, and M. Sedillot was very positive that nothing more could be learned of it than he had been able to learn. But the late M. Reinaud completely solved the mystery by pointing out that Aрин was simply a corruption of Ujжain. Even in Arabic the mistake had been thoroughly ingrained, insomuch that the word Aрин had been adopted as a generic name for a place of medium temperature or qualities (see Jorjdm, quoted below).

OOLOOBALLONG, s. Malay, Ulubalang, a chosen warrior, a champion. [Mr. Skeat notes: "hulu or ulu certainly means 'head,' especially the head of a Raja, and balang probably means 'people'; hence ulu-balang, 'men of the head,' or 'body-guard.'].

This fuel which is also common in Egypt and Western Asia, appears to have been not unknown even in England a century ago, thus:

1799.—"We rode about 20 miles that day (near Woburn), the country . . . is very open, with little or no wood. They have even less fuel than we (i.e. in Scotland), and the poor burn cow-dung, which they scrape off the ground, and set up to burn as we do divots (i.e. turf)."—Lord Minto, in Life, i. 301.

1863.—A passage in Mr. Marsh's Man and Nature, p. 242, contains a similar fact in reference to the practice, in consequence of the absence of wood, in France between Grenoble and Briançon.

[For the use of this fuel, in Tartary under the name of argols, see Huc, Travels, 2nd ed. i. 23. Numerous examples of its use are collected in 8 ser. Notes and Queries, iv. 226, 277, 377, 417.]

OORDOO, s. The Hindustani language. The (Turki) word urdu means properly the camp of a Tartar Khan, and is, in another direction, the original of our word horde (Russian orda), [which, according to Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 30, note), "is now commonly used by the Russian soldiers and Cossacks in a very amusing manner as a contemptuous term for an Asiatic."]. The 'Golden Horde' upon the Volga was not properly (pace Littré) the name of a tribe of Tartars, as is often supposed, but was the style of the Royal Camp, eventually Palace, of the Khans of the House of Batu at OORDOO. 640 OPIUM.

Sarai. Horde is said by Pihan, quoted by Dozy (Oosterl. 43) to have been introduced into France by Voltaire in his Orphelin de la Chine. But Littré quotes it as used in the 16th century. Urdu is now used in Turkistan, e.g. at Tashkend, Khokhand, &c., for a 'citadel' (Schreyler, loc. cit. i. 30). The word urdū, in the sense of a royal camp, came into India probably with Baber, and the royal residence at Delhi was styled urdā-i-mu'talā, 'the Sublime Camp.' The mixt language which grew up in the court and camp was called zabīn-i-urdā, 'the Camp Language,' and hence we have elliptically Urdā. On the Peshawar frontier the word urdā is still in frequent use as applied to the camp of a field-force.

OORIYA, n.p. The adjective 'pertaining to Orissa.' (native, language, what not); Hind. Uriya. The proper name of the country is Odra-desa, and Or-deśa, whence Or-īya and Ur-īya. ["The Ooryah bearers were an old institution in Calcutta, as in former days palankeens were chiefly used. From a computation made in 1776, it is stated that they were in the habit of carrying to their homes every year sums of money sometimes as much as three lакhs made by their business" (Carey, Good Old Days of Honble. John Company, ii. 148).]

OOTACAMUND, n.p. The chief station in the Neilgherry Hills, and the summer residence of the Governor of Madras. The word is a corruption of the Badaga name of the site of 'Stone-house,' the first European house erected in those hills, properly Hottaga-mand (see Metz, Tribes of the Neilgherries, 6). [Mr. Grigg (Man. of the Nilagiris, 6, 1859), followed by the Madras Gloss., gives Tam. Ottamainandu, from Can.OTTAM, 'dwarf bamboo,' Tam. kany, 'fruit,' mandu, 'a Toda village.']

OPAL, s. This word is certainly of Indian origin: Lat. opalus, Greek ὀπάλιος, Skt. upala, 'a stone.' The European word seems first to occur in Pliny. We do not know how the Skt. word received this specific meaning, but there are many analogous cases.

OPIUM, s. This word is in origin Greek, not Oriental. [The etymology accepted by Platts, Skt. ahīphena, 'snake venom' is not probable.] But from the Greek ἀθίφā the Arabs took ʿafṣūn, which has sometimes reacted on old spellings of the word. The 1770.—"Patna . . . is the most celebrated place in the world for the cultivation of opium. Besides what is carried into the inland parts, there are annually 3 or 4000 chests exported, each weighing 300 lbs. . . . The Chinese emperors have suppressed it in their dominions, by condemning to the flames every vessel that imports this species of poison."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 424.

ORANGE, s. A good example of plausible but entirely incorrect etymology is that of orange from Lat. aurantium. The latter word is in fact an ingenious medieval fabrication. The word doubtless came from the Arab, nārānī, which is again a form of Pers. nārang, or naranjī, the latter being still a common term for the orange in Hindustan. The Persian indeed may be traced to Skt. nāgawrāṇa, and nārāṇa, but of these words no satisfactory etymological explanation has been given, and they have perhaps been Sanscritized from some southern term. Sir W. Jones, in his article on the Spikenard of the Ancients, quotes from Dr. Anderson of Madras, "a very curious philological remark, that in the Tamil dictionary, most words beginning with nar have some relation to fragrance; as nárakaṇu, to yield an odour; nártum pillei, lemon-grass; nártei, citron; nārta manum (read mārum), the wild orange-tree; nārum panei, the Indian jasmine; nārum alleri, a strong smelling flower; and nārtu, which is put for naēd in the Tamil version of our scriptures." (See As. Res. vol. ii. 414). We have not been able to verify many of these Tamil terms. But it is true that in both Tamil and Malayalam naru is 'fragrant.' See, also, on the subject of this article, A. E. Pott, in Lassen's Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, vii. 114 seqq.

The native country of the orange is believed to be somewhere on the northern border of India. A wild orange, the supposed parent of the cultivated species, both sweet and bitter, occurs in Garhwal and Sikkim, as well as in the Kásia (see COSSYA) country, the valleys of which last are still abundantly productive of excellent oranges. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 336 seqq.] It is believed that the orange first known and cultivated in Europe was the bitter or Seville orange (see Hambury and Flückiger, 111-112).

From the Arabic, Byzantine Greek got ἔπωφρησις, the Spaniards naranja, old Italian narancia, the Portuguese laranja, from which last, or some similar form, by the easy detachment of the l (taken probably, as in many other instances, for an article), we have the Ital. arancia, L. Latin aurantium, French orange, the modification of these two being shaped by aurum and or. Indeed, the quotation from Jacques de Vitry possibly indicates that some form like al-arangi may have been current in Syria. Perhaps, however, his phrase ab indigenis nuncupatur may refer only to the Frank or quasi-Frank settlers, in which case we should have among them the birthplace of our word in its present form. The reference to this passage we derived in the first place from Hênh, who gives a most interesting history of the introduction of the various species of citrus into Europe. But we can hardly think he is right in supposing that the Portuguese first brought the sweet orange (Citrus aurantium dulce) into Europe from China, c. 1548. No doubt there may have been a re-introduction of some fine varieties at that time.* But as early as the beginning of the 14th century we find Abulfeda extolling the fruit of Cintra. His words, as rendered by M. Reinaud, run: "Au nombre des dependances de Lisbonne est la ville de Schintara ; à Schintara on receuille des pommes admirablez pour la grosseur et le gout." (244 f). That these pommes were the famous Cintra oranges can hardly be doubted. For Baber (Autoj/.og. 328) describes an orange under the name of Sangatarah, which is, indeed, a recognised Persian and Hind. word for a species of the fruit. And this early propagation of the sweet orange in Portugal would account not only for such wide diffusion of the name of Cintra, but for the persistence with which the alternative name of Portugals has adhered to the fruit in question. The familiar name of the large sweet orange in Sicily and Italy is porgalmo, and nothing else; in Greece πορτογαλια, in Albanian protokole, among the Kurds portoghul, whilst even colloquial Arabic has burukān. The testimony of Ṣaṣūdī as to the introduction of the orange into Syria before his time (c. A.D. 930), even if that were (as it would seem) the Seville orange, renders it quite possible that better qualities should have reached Lisbon or been developed there during the Saracenic occupation. It was indeed suggested in our hearing by the late Sir Henry M. Elliot that sangutarah might be interpreted as sansutar, ‘green stones’ (or in fact ‘moist pipes’); but we hardly think he would have started this had the passage in Abulfeda been brought to his notice. [In the Ain (ed. Gladwin, 1800, ii. 20) we read: ]

* There seems to have been great oscillation of traffic in this matter. About 1878, one of the present writers, then resident at Palermo, sent, in compliance with a request from Laboro, a collection of plants of many (about forty) varieties of citrus cultivated in Sicily, for introduction into the Punjab. This despatch was much aided by the kindness of Prof. Todaro, in charge of the Royal Botanic Garden at Palermo.

"Sircar Silhet. ... Here grows a delicious fruit called Soontara, in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form.” This passage reads in Col. Jarrett’s translation (ii. 124): “There is a fruit called Sansutarah in colour like an orange but large and very sweet.” Col. Jarrett disputes the derivation of Sangatarah from Cintra, and he is followed by Mr. H. Beveridge, who remarks that Humayun calls the fruit Soontra. Mr. Beveridge is inclined to think that Sansa is the Indian hill name of the fruit, of which Sangatarah is a corruption, and refers to a village at the foot of the Bhutan Hills called Santra-bārī, because it had orange groves.

A.D. c. 930.—“The same may be said of the orange-tree (Shajr-ul- māna) and of the round citron, which were brought from India after the year (A.H.) 300, and first sown in ‘Oman. They were transplanted to Basra, to Trāk, and to Syria ... but they lost the sweet and penetrating odour and beauty that they had in India, having no longer the benefits of the climate, soil, and water peculiar to that country.”—Maṣūdī, ii. 483-9.

C. 1220.—“In parvis arboribus quae sanum crescent alia poma citrina, minoris quantitatis frigida et acidri seu pontici (bitter) saporis, qua et poma oran-ge separa ab indigenis nuncupatur.”—Jacobus Vitriacius, in Bongars. These were apparently our Seville oranges.

c. 1290.—“In the 18th of Edward the first a large Spanish ship came to Portsmouth; out of the cargo of which the Queen bought one frail (see FRASOLA) of Seville figs, one frail of raisins or grapes, one bale of dates, two hundred and thirty pomegranates, fifteen citrons, and seven oranges (Poma de oranje).”—Mawers and Household Expenses of England in the 13th and 15th Centuries, Roxb. Club, 1841, p. xlviii. The Editor deigns only to say that ‘the MS. is in the Tower.’ [Prof. Skeat writes (9 ser. Notes and Queries, v. 321): ‘The only known allusion to oranges, previously to 1400, in any piece of English literature (in household documents) is in the ‘Alternative Poems,’ edited by Dr. Morris, ii. 1044. The next reference, soon after 1400, is in Lydgate’s ‘Minor Poems,’ ed. Halliwell, p. 15. In 1440 we find ·orange in the ‘Promptorium Parvulorum,’ and in 1470 we find oranges in the ‘Poston Letters,’ ed. Gairdner, ii. 394.’] 1481.—‘I tem to the galeman (galley man) brought the lampreis and oranges ... ilijd.’—Household Book of John D. of Norfolk, Roxb. Club, 1844, p. 38.

c. 1526.—“They have besides (in India) the nāranj (or Seville orange, Tr.) and the various fruits of the orange species. ... I always struck me that the word nāranj was accentuated in the Arab fashion; and I found that it really was so; the men of Bajour and Siwād call nāranj nārānk” (or perhaps rather nārang).—Baber, 328. In this passage Baber means apparently to say that the right name was nārang, which had been changed by the usual influence of Arabic pronunciation into nāranj.

1583.—“Sometimes the foreign products thus east up (on Shetland) at their doors were a new revelation to the islanders, as when a cargo of oranges was washed ashore on the coast of Delting, the natives boiled them as a new kind of potatoes.”—Saty. Revicr, July 14, p. 57.

ORANG-OTANG, ORANG-OUTAN, &c. s. The great man-like ape of Sumatra and Borneo; Simiu Satyrus, L. This name was first used by Bontius (see below). It is Malay, ḍorang-ātun, ‘homo sylvaticus.’ The proper name of the animal in Borneo is mius. Crawford says that it is never called orang-utan by the natives. But that excellent writer is often too positive—especially in his negatives! Even if it be not (as is probable) anywhere a recognised specific name, it is hardly possible that the name should not be sometimes applied popularly. We remember a tume hooluck belonging to a gentleman in E. Bengal, which was habitually known to the natives as jangli adin, literally = orang-utan. [There seems reason to believe that Crawfurd was right after all. Mr. Scott (Malayan Words in English, p. 87) writes: "But this particular application of orang utan to the ape does not appear to be, or ever to have been, familiar to the Malays generally; Crawfurd (1852) and Swettenham (1889) omit it, Pijnappel says it is 'Low Malay,' and Klinkert (1893) denies the use entirely. This uncertainty is explained by the limited area in which the animal exists within even native observation. Mr. Wallace could find no natives in Sumatra who had ever heard of such an animal, and no 'Dutch officials who knew anything about it.' Then the name came to European knowledge more than 260 years ago; in which time probably more than one Malay name has faded out of general use or wholly disappeared, and many other things have happened." Mr. Skeat writes: "I believe Crawfurd is absolutely right in saying that it is never called orang-utan by the natives. It is much more likely to have been a tailor's mistake or joke than an error on the part of the Malays who know better. Throughout the Peninsula orang-utan is the name applied to the wild tribes, and though the mawas or mixas is known to the Malays only by tradition, yet in tradition the two are never confused, and in those islands where the mawas does exist he is never called orang-utan, the word orang being reserved exclusively to describe the human species."

ORANKAY, ARANGKAIO, &c.

s. Malay Orang kayâ. In the Archipelago, a person of distinction, a chief or noble, corresponding to the Indian omrah; literally 'a rich man,' analogous to the use of riche-homme by Joinville and other old French authors. [Mr. Skeat notes that the terminal o in arangkaio represents a dialectical form used in Sumatra and Java. The Malay leader of the Pahang rising in 1891-2, who was supposed to bear a charmed life, was called by the title of Orang Kayâ Pahlawan (see PULWAUN).]

1613.—"An Oran Caya came aboard, and told me that a Cuapa Curra (see CARACOA) of the Flanmings had searched three or foure Praws or Canoas comming aboard vs with Cloues, and had taken them from them, threatening death to them for the next offence."—Saris, in Purchas, i. 348.

1615.—"Another conference with all the Arrankayos of Lughio and Cambello in the hills among the bushes: their reverence for the King and the honourable Company."—Sainsbury, i. 420.

"... gave him the title of Oran-caya Pute, which is white or clear hearted lord."—Donners, Letters, i. 270.

1711.—"Two Pieces of Callico or Silk to the Shabander (see SHABUNDER), and head Orankoy or Minister of State."—Lockyer, 36.

1727.—"As he was entering at the Door, the Orankay passed a long Lance through his Heart, and so made an end of the Beast."—A. Hamilton, ii. 97; [ed. 1744, ii. 96].

However, the reigning King not expecting that his Customs would meet with such Opposition, sent an Orangkaya aboard of my Ship, with the Linguist, to know why we made War on him."—Ibid. 106; [ed. 1744].

1811.—"From amongst the orang kayas the Sultan appoints the officers of state, who as members of Council are called ma mistr (see MUNTREE, MANDARIN)."—Masden, H. de Sumatra, 350.

"An Oriental form of mitrailleuse. Steingass (Dict. 38) has Pers. arghan, arghon, from the Greek όργανον, 'an organ.'

1790.—"A weapon called an organ, which is composed of about thirty-six gun barrels so joined as to fire at once."—Letter from De Boigne's Camp at Mairtha, dated Sept. 13, in H. Compton, A particular Account of the European Military Adventurers of Hindoos, from 1754 to 1803, p. 61.

"A land of the Odras" (see ORIYA). The word is said to be the Prakrit form of uttara, 'north,' as applied to the N. part of Kalinga.] The name of the ancient kingdom and modern province which lies between Bengal and the Coromandel Coast.

1516.—"Kingdom of Orisa. Further on towards the interior there is another kingdom which is conterminous with that of Narasunga, and on another side with Bengal, and on another with the great Kingdom of Dely. ..."—Barbou, in Lisbon ed. 306.

1568.—"Orisa fu già vn Regno molto bello e sereno ... sina che regnò il suo Re legittimo, qual era Gentile."—Ces. Federici, Ramusio, iii. 392.

[ed. 1746.—"Vdeza, the Chefe City called Iekanat (Juggurnaut)."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.

ORMESINE, s. A kind of silk texture, which we are unable to define. The name suggests derivation from Ormus. [The Draper's Dict. defines "Armozeen, a stout silk, almost invariably black. It is used for hant-bands and scarfs at funerals by those not family mourners. Sometimes sold for making clergy-men's gowns." The N.E.D. s.v. Armozeen, leaves the etymology doubtful. The Stanf. Dict. gives Ormuzeine, "a fabric exported from Ormus."] 1566.—"... a little Island called Tana, a place very populous with Portugals, Moores and Gentiles: these have nothing but Rice; they are makers of Armesie and weavers of girdles of wool and bumbast."—Caes. Fredericks, in Hadel. ii. 344.

1726.—"Velvet, Damasks, Armosyn, Sattyn."—Valentijn, v. 183.

ORMUS, ORMUZ, n.p. Properly Hurmus or Hurmuz, a famous maritime city and minor kingdom near the mouth of the Persian Gulf. The original place of the city was on the northern shore of the Gulf, some 30 miles east of the site of Bandar Abbâs or Gombroon (q.v.); but about A.D. 1300, apparently to escape from Tartar raids, it was transferred to the small island of Gerân or Jerûn, which may be identified with the Orjana of Nearchus, about 12 m. westward, and five miles from the shore, and this was the seat of the kingdom when first visited and attacked by the Portuguese under Albuquerque in 1506. It was taken by them about 1515, and occupied permanently (though the nominal reign of the native kings was maintained), until wrested from them by Shâh Abbâs, with the assistance of an English squadron from Surat, in 1622. The place was destroyed by the Persians, and the island has since remained desolate, and all but uninhabited, though the Portuguese citadel and water-tanks remain. The islands of Hormuz, Kishm, &c., as well as Bandar 'Abbās and other ports on the coast of Kerman, had been held by the Sultans of Oman as fiefs of Persia, for upwards of a century, when in 1854 the latter State asserted its dominion, and occupied those places in force (see Badger's Imams of Oman, &c., p. xciv.).

B.c. c. 325.—"They weighed next day at dawn, and after a course of 100 stadia anchored at the mouth of the river Anamis, in a country called Harmozea."—Arrian, Voyage of Nearchus, ch. xxxiii., tr. by M'Crimie, p. 202.

c. A.D. 150.—(on the coast of Carmania)

1503.—"Habitant autem ex eorum (Francorum) gente homines fere viginti in urbe Cananoro: ad quos profecti, postquam ex Hormuzda urbe ad eam Indorum civitatem Cananorum venimus, significavimus illis nos esse Christianos, nostramque conditionem et gradum indicavimus; et ab illis magni cum gaudio suscepi sumus. . . . Eorundem autem Francorum regio Portugalus vocat, una ex Francorum regionibus; eorumque Rex Emanuel appellatur; Emanuelum oramus ut illum custodiat."—Letter from Nestorian Bishops on Mission to India, in Assemani, iii. 591.

1505.—"In la bocha de questo mare (di Persia) è vn altra insula chiamata Agramuzo dove son perle infinit; (e) causali che per tutte quelle parti sono in gran precio."—Letter of K. Emanuel, p. 14.

1572.—

"Mas vê a illa Gerum, como discobre O que fazem do tempo os intervallos; Que da cidade Armuza, que ali esteve Ella o nome depois, e gloria teve."

Cambes, x. 103.

By Burton:

"But see yon Gerum's isle the tale unfold of mighty things which Time can make or mar;

for of Armuz-town yon shore upon 1623.—"Non volli lasciar di andare con gli Inglesi in Hormus a veder la forteza, la città, e ciò che ve en in fine di notabile in quell'isola."—P. della Valle, ii. 483. Also see ii. 61.

1667.—

"High on a throne of royal state, which far

Outshone the wealth of Ormus and of Ind,

Or where the gorgeous East with richest hand

Shower on her kings barbaric pearl and gold."—

Paradise Lost, ii. 1-44.

s. This odd word seems to have been used as griffin (q.v.) now is. It is evidently the Malay orang-baharu, or orang bharu, 'a new man, a novice.' This is interesting as showing an unquestionable instance of an expression imported from the Malay factories to Continental India. [Mr. Skeat remarks that the form of the word shows that it came from the Malay under Portuguese influence.]
1711.—At Madras . . . "refreshments for the men, which they are presently supply'd with from Country Boats and Cattamarans, who make a good Pong at the first coming of Orobarros, as they call those who have not been there before."—Lockyer, 28.

ORTOLAN, s. This name is applied by Europeans in India to a small lark, Calandrella brachyactyla, Temn., in Hind. barget and bager; [Skt. varga, 'a troop']. Also sometimes in S. India to the finch-lark, Pyrrhaluda grisea, Scopoli.

OTTA, OTTER, s. Corruption of āṭā, 'flour,' a Hindi word having no Skt. original; [but Platts gives Skt. ādrā, 'soft']. Popular rhyme:

"At terti Shekhawati Ādhā āṭā ādhā mati!"

"Confound this Shekhawati land,
My bread's half wheat-meal and half sand."

Boileau, Tour through Rajpura, 1837, p. 274.

[1853.—"After travelling three days, one of the prisoners bought some ottah. They prepared bread; some of which was given him; after eating it he became insensible. . . ."—Law Report, in Chevres, Ind. Med. Jurispr. 166.]

OTTO, OTTER, s. Or usually 'Otto of Roses;' or by imperfect purists 'Attar of Roses,' an essential oil obtained in India from the petals of the flower, a manufacture of which the chief seat is at Ghāzipur on the Ganges. The word is the Arab. īṭr, 'perfume.' From this word are derived āṭṭār, a 'perfumer or druggist,' āṭṭārī, adj., 'pertaining to a perfumer.' And a relic of Saracen rule in Palermo is the Via Lattineri, 'the street of the perfumers' shops.' We find the same in an old Spanish account of Fez:

1573.—"Issuing thence to the Caizerle by a gate which faces the north there is a handsome street which is called of the Atarim, which is the Spicery."—Marmol, Africa, ii. 7. 88.

[Īṭr of roses is said to have been discovered by the Empress Nur-jahān on her marriage with Jahāngīr. A canal in the palace garden was filled with rose-water in honour of the event, and the princess, observing a scum on the surface, caused it to be collected, and found it to be of admirable fragrance, whence it was called āṭṭār-i-Jahāngīr.]

1712.—Kaempfer enumerating the departments of the Royal Household in Persia names: "Pharmacopoeia . . . Athaahr chowd, in quæ medicamenta, et praesertim variae virtutis opiata, pro Majestate et aliis praeparantur. . . ."—Am. Exot. 124. 1759.—"To presents given, &c."

Accts. of Entertainment to Jugger Set, in Long, 89.

c. 1790.—"Elles ont encore une prédilection particulière pour les huiles odoriférantes, surtout pour celle de rose, appelée otta."—Haafner, ii. 122.

1824.—"The attar is obtained after the rose-water is made, by setting it out during the night and till sunrise in the morning in large open vessels exposed to the air, and then skimming off the essential oil which floats at the top."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 164.

OUDH, OUDE, n.p. Awadh; properly the ancient and holy city of Ayodhýa (Skt. 'not to be warred against'), the capital of Ráma, on the right bank of the river Sarayu, now commonly called the Gogra. Also the province in which Ayodhya was situated, but of which Lucknow for about 170 years (from c. 1732) has been the capital, as that of the dynasty of the Nawás, and from 1814 kings, of Oudh. Oudh was annexed to the British Empire in 1856 as a Chief Commissionership. This was re-established after the Mutiny was subdued and the country reconquered, in 1858. In 1877 the Chief Commissionership was united to the Litté.-Governorship of the N.W. Provinces. (See JUDEA.)

B. C. a.—"The noble city of Ayodhýa crowned with a royal highway had already cleaned and besprinkled all its streets, and spread its broad banners. Women, children, and all the dwellers in the city eagerly looking for the consecration of Ráma, waited with impatience the rising of the morrow's sun."—Rāmâyana, Bk. iii. (Ayodhýa Ránda), ch. 3.

636. —"Departing from this Kingdom (Kaypákhyo or Kanapà) he (Hen писание) traveled about 600 li to the S.E., crossed the Ganges, and then taking his course southerly he arrived at the Kingdom of Oyut'ó (Ayódhýa)."—Pélérins Bouddh. ii. 267.

1255,—"A peremptory command had been issued that Malik Kutlugh Khan . . . should leave the province of Awadh, and proceed to the fief of Bharájí, and he had not obeyed. . . ."—Tabakât-i-Nasiri, E.T. by Raverty, 107.

1289.—"Mu'izzu-d din Kai-Kubód, on his arrival from Delhi, pitched his camp at OUTCRY.

OUTCRY, s. Auction. This term seems to have survived a good deal longer in India than in England. (See NEELAM.) The old Italian expression for auction seems to be identical in sense, viz. gridaggio, and the auctioneer gridatore, thus:

c. 1343.—"For jewels and plate; and (other) merchandise that is sold by outcry (gridaggio), i.e. by auction (uncanta) in Cyprus, the buyer pays the crier (gridatore) a quarter oxcat per bezant on the price bid for the thing bought through the crier, and the seller pays nothing except," &c.—Pegolotti, 74.

[1700.—"The last week Mr. Proby sold a outcry of lace."—In Yule, Hedges‘ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. colix.]

1782.—"On Monday next will be sold by Public outcry . . . large and small China silk Kittisals (KITTYSOL). . . ."—India Gazette, March 31.

1787.—"Having put up the Madras Galley at Outcry and nobody offering more for her than 2300 Rupees, we think it more for the Company’s Int. to make a Sloop of Her than let Her go at so low a price."—Pt. William MS. Reports, March.

1841.—"When a man dies in India, we make short work with him; . . . an ‘out-cry’ is held, his goods and chattels are brought to the hammer. . . ."—Society in India, ii. 227.

OVERLAND.

OVERLAND. Specifically applied to the Mediterranean route to India, which in former days involved usually the land journey from Antioch or thereabouts to the Persian Gulf; and still in vogue, though any land journey may now be entirely dispensed with, thanks to M. Lesseps.

1612.—"His Catholic Majesty the King Philip III. of Spain and II. of Portugal, our King and Lord, having appointed Dom Hieronymo de Azedo to succeed Ruy Lourenço de Tavira . . . in January 1612 ordered that a courier should be despatched overland (por terru) to this Government to convey these orders and he, arriving atOrmuz at the end of May following. . . ."—Boccaro, Decada, p. 7.

1629.—"The news of his Exploits and Death being brought together to King Philip the Fourth, he wrote with his own hand as follows. Considering the two Pinsks that were fitting for India may be gone without an account of my Concern for the Death of Nuno Alvarez Botello, an Express shall immediately be sent by Land with advice."—Parsia y Sousa (Stevens), iii. 373.

1673.—"French and Dutch Jewellers coming overland . . . have made good Purchase by buying Jewels here, and carrying them to Europe to Cut and Set, and returning thence sell them here to the Ombrabs (see OMRAH), among whom were Monsieur Tavernier. . . ."—Freyer, 89.

1675.—"Our last to you was dated the 17th August past, overland, transcripts of which we herewith send you."—Letter from Court to Pt. St. Geo. In Notes and Exts. No. i. p. 5.

1676.—"Docket Copy of the Company’s General Overland. . . . Our Agent and Counsel Fort St. George. . . ."

1684.—"That all endeavors would be used to prevent my going home the way I intended, by Persia, and so . . . overland."—Hedges, Diary, Aug. 19; [Hak. Soc. i. 155].

1686.—"Those Gentleman’s Friends in the Committee of the Company in England, acquainted them by Letters over Land, of the Danger they were in, and gave them Warning to be on their guard."—A. Hamilton, i. 196; [ed. 1744, i. 195].

1737.—"Though so far apart that we can only receive letters from Europe once a year, while it takes 18 months to get an answer, we Europeans get news almost every year over Land by Constantinople, through Arabia or Persia . . . A few days ago we received the news of the Peace in Europe; of the death of Prince Eugene; of the marriage of the P. of Wales with the Princess of Saxe-Gotha. . . . —Letter of the Germ. Missionary Sutorius, from Madras, Feb. 18. In Notice of Madras, and Cuddalore, &c. 1858, p. 150.

1763.—"We have received Overland the news of the taking of Havannah and the Spanish Fleet, as well as the defeat of the Spaniards in Portugal. We must surely make an advantageous Peace, however I'm no Politician."—MS. Letter of James Rennell, June 1, fr. Madras.

1774.—"Les Marchands to Bengal envoyèrent un Vaisseau à Suez en 1772, mais il fut endommagé dans le Golfe de Bengale, et obligé de retourner; en 1773 le Sr. Holford entreprit encore ce voyage, réussit cette fois, et fut ainsi le premier Anglois qui eut conduit un vaisseau à Suez. . . . On s'est déjà servi plusieurs fois de cette route comme d'un chemin de poste; car le Gouvernement actuel des Indes envoie ordinairement dans les cas d'importance ses Courriers par Suez en Angleterre, et peut presqu'avoir plutôt reponse de Londres que leurs lettres ne peuvent venir en Europe par le Chemin ordinaire du tour du Cap de bonne esperance."—Nieuhof, Voyage, ii. 10.

1778.—"We had advices long ago from England, as late as the end of May, by way of Suez. This is a new Route opened by Govr. Hastings, and the Letters which left Marseilles the 3rd June arrived here the 20th August. This, you'll allow, is a ready communication with Europe, and may be kept open at all times, if we choose to take a little pains."—MS. Letter from James Rennell, Oct. 16, "from Islamabad, capital of Chittogong."

1781.—"On Monday last was Married Mr. George Greenley to Mrs. Anne Barrington, relict of the late Capt. William B——, who unfortunately perished on the Desart, in the attack that was made on the Caravans of Bengal Goods under his and the other Gentlemen's care between Suez and Grand Cairo."—India Gazette, March 7.

1782.—"When you left England with an intention to pass overland and by the route of the Red Sea into India, did you not know that no subject of these kingdoms can lawfully reside in India . . . without the permission of the United Company of Merchants? . . ."—Price, Treats, i. 130.

1783.—". . . Mr. Paul Benfield, a gentleman whose means of intelligence were known to be both extensive and expeditious, publicly declared, from motives the most benevolent, that he had just received overland from England certain information that Great Britain had finally concluded a peace with all the belligerent powers in Europe."—Moore's Narrative, 317.

1786.—"The packet that was coming to us overland, and that left England in July, was cut off by the wild Arabs between Aleppo and Bussora."—Lord Cornwallis, Dec. 28, in Correspondence, &c. i. 217.

1793.—"Ext. of a letter from Poonama ee, dated 7th June.
'The dispatch by way of Suez has put us all in a commotion.'—Bombay Courier, June 29.

OVIDORE, s Port. Ouvidor, i.e. 'auditor,' an official constantly mentioned in the histories of Portuguese India. But the term is also applied in an English quotation below to certain Burmese officials, an application which must have been adopted from the Portuguese. It is in this case probably the translation of a Burmese designation, perhaps of Nekhan-dau, 'Royal Ear,' which is the title of certain Court officers.

1500.—"The Captain-Major (at Melinde) sent on board all the ships to beg that no one when ashore would in any way misbehave or produce a scandal; any such offence would be severely punished. And he ordered the mariners of the ships to land, and his own Provost of the force, with an Ouvidor that he had on board, that they might keep an eye on our people to prevent mischief."—Corre, i. 185.

1507.—"And the Viceroy ordered the Ouvidor General to hold an inquiry on this matter, on which the truth came out clearly that the Holy Apostle (Sanetiago) showed himself to the Moors when they were fighting with our people, and of this he sent word to the King, telling him that such martyrs were the men who were serving in these parts that our Lord took thought of them and sent them a Helper from Heaven."—Ibid. i. 717.

1698.—(At Syriam). "Ovidores (Persons appointed to take notice of all passages in the Runaday (office of administration) and advise them to Ava . . . Three Ovidores that always attend the Runaday, and are sent to the King, upon errands, as occasion obliges."—Fleetwood's Diary, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 355, 360.

PADDY, s. Rice in the husk; but the word is also, at least in composition, applied to growing rice. The word appears to have in some measure, a double origin.

There is a word batty (see BATT) used by some writers on the west coast of India, which has probably helped to propagate our uses of paddy. This seems to be the Canarese batta or bhatta, 'rice in the husk,' which is also found in Mahr. as bhatt with the same sense, a word again which in Hind. is applied to 'cooked rice.' The last meaning is that of Skt. bhatita, which is perhaps the original of all these forms.

But in Malay padsi [according to Mr. Skeat, usually pronounced padi] Javan, pâri, is 'rice in the straw.' And the direct parentage of the word in India is thus apparently due to the Archipelago; arising probably out of the old importance of the export trade of rice from Java (see Raffles, Java, i. 239-240, and Crawford's Hist. iii. 345, and Descript. Dict., 368). Crawford, (Journ. Ind. Arch., iv. 187) seems to think that the Malayo-Javanese word may have come from India with the Portuguese. But this is impossible, for as he himself has shown (Des. Dict., u.s.), the word pâri, more or less modified, exists in all the chief tongues of the Archipelago, and even in Madagascar, the connection of which last with the Malay regions certainly was long prior to the arrival of the Portuguese.

1580.—"Certaine Wordes of the naturall language of Jana ... Paree, ryce in the huske."—Sir F. Drake's Voyage, in Hakl. iv. 246.

1598.—"There are also divers other kinds of Rice, of a lesse price, and slighter than the other Ryce, and is called Batte ..."—Linschoten, 79; [Hak. Soc. i. 246].

1600.—"In the fields is such a quantity of rice, which they call bate, that it gives its name to the kingdom of Calou, which is called on that account Batesalou."—Lucena, Vida do Padre F. Xavier, 121.

1615.—"... oryzae quoque agri feraces quam Batum incolae dicunt."—Jarric, Theaurae, i. 461.

1673.—"The Ground between this and the great Breach is well ploughed, and bears good Battie."—Fryer, 67, see also 125. But in the Index he has Paddy.

1798.—"The paddie which is the name given to the rice, whilst in the husk, does not grow ... in compact ears, but like oats, in loose spikes."—Staurois, tr. i. 231.

1837.—"Parrots brought 900,000 loads of hill-paddy daily, from the marshes of Chandata,—nice husking the hill-paddy, without breaking it, converted it into rice."—Turnour's Mahawanso, 22.

1871.—"In Ireland Paddy makes riots, in Bengal raiyats make paddy; and in this lies the difference between the paddy of green Bengal, and the Paddy of the Emerald Isle."—Gorcina Samanta, ii. 25.

1878.—"Il est établi un droit sur les riz et les paddy exportés de la Colonie, excepté pour le Cambodge par la voie du fleuve."—Courrier de Saigon, Sept. 20.

PADDY-BIRD, s. The name commonly given by Europeans to certain baser species of the family Ardeidæ or Herons, which are common in the rice-fields, close in the wake of grazing cattle. Jerdon gives it as the European's name for the Ardea leucoptera, Boddaert, andhâ baugâ ('blind heron') of the Hindus, a bird which is more or less coloured. But in Bengal, if we are not mistaken, it is more commonly applied to the pure white bird—Herodias alba, L., or Ardea Torra, Buch. Ham., and Herodias argenteola, Temminck, or Ardea putea, Buch. Ham.

1727.—"They have also Store of wild Fowl; but who have a Mind to eat them must shoot them. Flamingoes are large and good Meat. The Paddy-bird is also good in their season."—A. Hamilton, i. 161; [ed. 1744, i. 162-3].

1868.—"The most common bird (in Formosa) was undoubtedly the Padi bird, a species of heron (Ardea prasinoscelis), which was constantly flying across the padi, or rice-fields."—Collingwood, Rambles of a Naturalist, 44.

PADDY-FIELD, s. A rice-field, generally in its flooded state.

1759.—"They marched onward in the plain towards Preston's force, who, seeing them coming, halted on the other side of a long morass formed by paddy-fields."—Orme, ed. 1803, iii. 430.

1800.—"There is not a single paddy-field in the whole county, but plenty of cotton ground (see REGUR) swamps, which in this wet weather are delightful."—Wellington to Munro, in Despatches, July 3.

1809.—"The whole country was in high cultivation, consequently the paddy-fields were nearly impassable."—J. Valentin, i. 350.

PADRE, s. A priest, clergyman, or minister, of the Christian Religion; when applied by natives to their own priests, as it sometimes is when they speak to Europeans, this is only by way of accommodation, as 'church' is also sometimes so used by them.

The word has been taken up from the Portuguese, and was of course applied originally to Roman Catholic priests only. But even in that respect there was a peculiarity in its Indian use among the Portuguese. For P. della Valle (see below) notices it as a singularity of their practice at Goa that they gave the title of Padre to secular priests, whereas in Italy this was reserved to the religiosi or regulars.

In Portugal itself, as Bluteau's explanation shows, the use is, or was formerly, the same as in Italy; but, as the first ecclesiastics who went to India were monks, the name apparently became general among the Portuguese there for all priests.

It is a curious example of the vitality of words that this one which had thus already in the 16th century in India a kind of abnormally wide application, has now in that country a still wider embrace, embracing all Christian ministers. It is applied to the Protestant clergy at Madras early in the 18th century. A bishop is known as Lord (see LAT) padre. See LAT Sodih.

According to Leland the word is used in China in the form pa-ti-li.

1541.—"Chegando á Porta da Igreja, o sahirão a receber oito Padres."—Pinto, ch. lix. (see Cogan, p. 85).

1584.—"It was the will of God that we found there two Padres, the one an Englishman, and the other a Fleming."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 381.

1609.—"... had it not pleased God to put into the minds of the archbishop and other two Padres of Jesuits of S. Paul's Colledge to stand our friends, we might have rotted in prison."—Newborough, ibid. ii. 380.

1659.—"Learned monks also come from Europe, who go by the name of Padre. They have an infallible head called Papd. He can change any religious ordinances as he may think advisable, and kings have to submit to his authority."—Baddoni, in Blockmann's Aout, i. 182.

c. 1606.—"Et ut adesse Patres comperint, minor exulant Padrigi, Padrigi, id est Domine Pater, Christianus sum."—Jurie, iii. 165.

1614.—"The Padres make a church of one of their Chambers, where they say Masse twice a day."—W. Whittington, in Purchas, i. 486.

1616.—"So seeing Master Terry whom I brought with me, he (the King) called to him, Padre you are very welcome, and this house is yours."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 564; [Hak. Soc. ii. 385].

1623.—"I Portoghesi chiamano anche i preti secolari padri, come noi i religiosi ..."—P. della Valle, ii. 586; [Hak. Soc. i. 142].

1665.—"They (Hindu Jogis) are importent enough to compare themselves with our Religious Men they meet with in the Indies. I have often taken pleasure to catch them, using much ceremony with them, and giving them great respect; but I soon heard them say to one another, This Francois knows who we are, he hath been a great while in the Indies, he knows that we are the Padrys of the Indians. A fine comparison, said I, within myself, made by an importent and idolatrous rabble of Men!"—Bernier, E.T. 104; [ed. Constable, 523].

1675.—"The Padre (or Minister) complains to me that he hath not that respect and place of preferrence at Table and elsewhere that is due unto him. ... At his request I promised to move it at ye next meeting of ye Counsell. PAGAR, s.
a. This word, the Malay for a 'fence, enclosure,' occurs in the sense of 'factory' in the following passage:

1702.—"Some other out-pagars or Factories, depending upon the Factory of Ben-coolen."—Charters of the E.I. Co. p. 324.

In some degree analogous to this use is the application, common among Hindustani-speaking natives, of the Hind.—Arab. word iðâta, 'a fence, enclosure,' in the sense of Presidency: Bombay ki [ka] iðâta, Bangâl ki [ka] iðâta, a sense not given in Shakespeare or Forbes; [it is given in Fallon and Platts. Mr. Skeat points out that the Malay word is pâgar, 'a fence,' but that it is not used in the sense of a 'factory' in the Malay Peninsula. In the following passage it seems to mean 'factory stock':

[1615.—"The King says that at her arrival he will send them their house and pâgar upon rafts to them."—Foster, Letters, iii. 151.]

b. (pâjâr). This word is in general use in the Bombay domestic dialect for wages, Mahr. pâjâr. It is obviously the Port. verb pâgar, 'to pay,' used as a substantive.

[1875.—" ... the heavy-browed sultana of some Gangetic station, whose stern look palpably interrogates the amount of your monthly pâgar."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 46.]

PAGODA, s. This obscure and remarkable word is used in three different senses.
a. An idol temple; and also specifically, in China, a particular form of religious edifice, of which the famous "Porcelain tower" of Nanking, now destroyed, may be recalled as typical. In the 17th century we find the word sometimes misapplied to places of Mahommedan worship, as by Faria-y-Sousa, who speaks of the "Pagoda of Mecca."
b. An idol.
c. A coin long current in S. India. The coins so called were both gold and silver, but generally gold. The gold pagoda was the varada or hân of the natives (see HOON); the former name (fr. Skt. for 'boar') being taken from the Boar avatar of Vishnu, which was figured on a variety of ancient coins of the South; and the latter signifying 'gold,' no doubt identical with sōna, and an instance of the exchange of h and s. (See also PARDÃO.)

Accounts at Madras down to 1818 were kept in pagodas, fanams, and kâs (see CASH); 8 kâs = 1 fanam, 42 fanams = 1 pagoda. In the year named the rupee was made the standard coin.* The pagoda was then reckoned as equivalent to 33 rupees.

In the suggestions of etymologies for this word, the first and most prominent meaning alone has almost always been regarded, and doubtless justly; for the other uses are deducible from it. Such suggestions have been many.

Thus Chinese origins have been propounded in more than one form; e.g. Pao-fah, 'precious pile,' and Poh-kuh-fah ('white-bones-pile').† Anything can be made out of Chinese monosyllables in the way of etymology; though no doubt it is curious that the first at least of these phrases is actually applied by the Chinese to the polygonal towers which in China foreigners specially call pagodas. Whether it be possible that this phrase may have been in any measure formed in imitation of pagoda, so constantly in the mouth of foreigners, we cannot say (though it would not be a solitary example of such borrowing—see NEELAM); but we can say with confidence that it is impossible pagoda should have been taken from the Chinese. The quotations from Corsali and Barboza set that suggestion at rest.

Another derivation is given (and adopted by so learned an etymologist as H. Wedgwood) from the Portuguese pagão, 'a pagan.' It is possible that this word may have helped to facilitate the Portuguese adoption of pagoda; it is not possible that it should have given rise to the word. A third theory makes pagoda a transposition of da- goba. The latter is a genuine word, used in Ceylon, but known in Continental India, since the extinction of Buddhism, only in the most rare and exceptional way.

A fourth suggestion connects it with the Skt. bhagavat, 'holy, divine,' or Bhagavati, applied to Durgā and other goddesses; and a fifth makes it a corruption of the Pers. but-kadah, 'idol-temple'; a derivation given below by Ovington. There can be little doubt that the origin really lies between these two.

The two contributors to this book are somewhat divided on this subject:—

(1) Against the derivation from bhagavat, 'holy,' or the Mahr. form bhagavant, is the objection that the word pagode from the earliest date has the final e, which was necessarily pronounced. Nor is bhagavant a name for a temple in any language of India. On the other hand but-kadah is a phrase which the Portuguese would constantly hear from the Mahommedans with whom they chiefly had to deal on their first arrival in India. This is the view confidently asserted by Reinaud (Mémoires sur l'Inde, 90), and is the etymology given by Littré.

As regards the coins, it has been supposed, naturally enough, that they were called pagoda, because of the figure of a temple which some of them bear; and which indeed was borne by the pagodas of the Madras Mint, as may be seen in Thomas's Prînsep, pl. xliv. But in fact coins with this impress were first struck at Ikkeri at a date after the word pagode was already in use among the Portuguese. However, nearly all bore on one side a rude representation of a Hindu deity (see e.g. Krishparaja's pagoda, c. 1520), and sometimes two such images. Some of these figures are specified by Prînsep (Useful Tables, p. 41), and Varthema speaks of them: "These pardai. . . have two devils stamped upon one side of them, and certain letters on the other" (115-116). Here the name may have been appropriately taken from bhagavat (A. B.).

On the other hand, it may be urged that the resemblance between but-kadah and pagode is hardly close enough, and that the derivation from but-kadah does not easily account for all the uses of the word. Indeed, it seems admitted in the preceding para-the goddess Vallur Bhagavati.” The term Bhagavati seems thus to have been very commonly attached to objects of worship in Malabar temples (see also Fra Paolino, p. 79 and p. 57, quoted under c. below). And it is very interesting to observe that, in a paper on “Coorg Superstitions,” Mr. Kittel notices parenthetically that Bhadrā Kāli (i.e. Durgā) is “also-called Pogōdi, Pavodi, a tadbhavs of Bagavati” (Ind. Antiq. ii. 170)—an incidental remark that seems to bring us very near the possible origin of pagode. It is most probable that some form like pogodi or pagode was current in the mouths of foreign visitors before the arrival of the Portuguese; but if the word was of Portuguese origin there may easily have been some confusion in their ears between Bagavati and but-kadah which shaped the new word. It is no sufficient objection to say that bhagavati is not a term applied by the natives to a temple; the question is rather what misunderstanding and mispronunciation by foreigners of a native term may probably have given rise to the term?—(H. Y.)

Since the above was written, Sir Walter Elliot has kindly furnished a note, of which the following is an extract:—

“I took some pains to get at the origin of the word when at Madras, and the conclusion I came to was that it arose from the term used generally for the object of their worship, viz., Bhagavati, ‘god’; bhagavati, ‘goddess.’

“Thus, the Hindu temple with its lofty gopura or propylon at once attracts attention, and a stranger enquiring what it was, would be told, ‘the house or place of Bhagavat.’ The village divinity throughout the south is always a form of Durga, or, as she is commonly called, simply ‘Devi’ (or Bhagavati, ‘the goddess’). . . . In like manner a figure of Durga is found on most of the gold Hunus (i.e. pagoda coins) current in the Dakhan, and a foreigner inquiring what such a coin was, or rather what was the form stamped upon it, would be told it was ‘the goddess,’ i.e., it was ‘Bhagavati’.

As my friend, Dr. Burnell, can no longer represent his own view, it seems right here to print the latest remarks graph that bhagavat may have had to do with the origin of the word in one of its meanings.

Now it is not possible that the word in all its applications may have had its origin from bhagavat, or some current modification of that word? We see from Marco Polo that such a term was currently known to foreign visitors of S. India in his day—a term almost identical in sound with pagoda, and bearing in his statement a religious application, though not to a temple.* We thus have four separate applications of the word pacawada, or pagoda, picked up by foreigners on the shores of India from the 13th century downwards, viz. to a Hindu ejaculatory formula, to a place of Hindu worship, to a Hindu idol, to a Hindu coin with idols represented on it. Is it not possible that all are to be traced to bhagavat, ‘sacred,’ or to Bhagavat and Bhagavati, used as names of divinities—of Buddha in Buddhist times or places, of Krishna and Durga in Brahminical times and places? (uses which are fact). How common was the use of Bhagavatī as the name of an object of worship in Malabar, may be seen from an example. Turning to Wilson’s work on the Mackenzie MSS, we find in the list of local MS. tracts belonging to Malabar, the repeated occurrence of Bhagavati in this way. Thus in this section of the book we have at p. xcvi. (vol. ii.) note of an account “of a temple of Bhagavati”; at p. ci.ii. “Temple of Mannadi Bhagavati goddess . . .”; at p. civ. “Temple of Mangombu Bhagavati . . .”; “Temple of Paddeparkave Bhagavati . . .”; “Temple of the goddess Pannāyennar Kave Bhagavati. . .”; “Temple of the goddess Patāli Bhagavati. . .”; “Temple of Bhagavati . . .”; p. cvii. “Account of the goddess Bhagavati at, &c. . . .”; p. cviii. “Acc. of the goddess Yalanga Bhagavati,” “Acc. of

of his on the subject that I can find. They are in a letter from Tanjore, dated March 10, 1880:

"I think I overlooked a remark of yours regarding my observation that the e in Pagode was pronounced, and that this was a difficulty in deriving it from Bhagavat. In modern Portuguese e is not sounded, but verses show that it was in the 16th century. Now, if there is a final vowel in Pagoda, it must come from Bhagavati; but though the goddess is and was worshipped to a certain extent in S. India, it is by other names (Amma, &c.). Gundert and Kittel give 'Pogodi' as a name of a Durga temple, but assuredly this is no corruption of Bhagavati, but Pagoda! Malayalam and Tamil are full of such adopted words. Bhagavati is little used, and the goddess is too insignificant to give rise to pagoda as a general name for a temple.

"Bhagavat can only appear in the S. Indian languages in its (Skt.) nominative form bhagavän (Tamil paṟavaṇ). As such, in Tamil and Malayalam it equals Vishnu or Siva, which would suit. But pagoda can't be got out of bhagavän; and if we look to the N. Indian forms, bhagavant, &c., there is the difficulty about the e, to say nothing about the n."

The use of the word by Barbosa at so early a date as 1516, and its application to a particular class of temples must not be overlooked.

1516.—"There is another sect of people among the Indians of Malabar, which is called Cuværan [Kushavan, Logaη, Malabar, i. 115]. Their business is to work at baked clay, and tiles for covering houses, with which the temples and Royal buildings are roofed. Their idolatry and their idols are different from those of the others; and in their houses of prayer they perform a thousand acts of worship and mer­c­mancy; they call their temples pagodes, and they are separate from the others."—Barbosa, 135. This is from Lord Stanley of Alderley's translation from a Spanish MS. The Italian of Ramusio reads: "nelle loro orazioni fanno molte strigherie e necromìtice, le quali chiamano Pagodes, differenti assai dall' altre" (Ramusio, i. f. 308c.). In the Portuguese MS., published by the Lisbon Academy in 1812, the words are altogether absent; and in interpolating them from Ramusio the editor has given the same sense as in Lord Stanley's English.

1516.—"In this city of Goa, and all over India, there are an infinity of ancient build­nings of the Gentiles, and in a small island near this, called Dinari, the Portuguese, in order to build the city, have destroyed an ancient temple called Pagode, which was built with marvellous art, and with ancient figures wrought to the greatest perfection in a certain black stone, some of which remain standing, ruined and shattered, because these Portuguese care nothing about them. If I can come by one of these shattered images I will send it to your Lordship, that you may perceive how much in old times sculpture was esteemed in every part of the world" — Letter of Andrea Corradi to Giuliano de Mediçi, in Ramusio, i. t. 177.

1543.—"And with this fleet he anchored at Coaño (see QUILON) and landed there with all his people. And the Governor (Martim Afonso de Sousa) went thither because of information he had of a pagode which was quite near in the interior, and which, they said, contained much treasure. ... PAGODA-TREE. A slang phrase once current, rather in England than in India, to express the openings to rapid fortune which at one time existed in India. [For the original meaning, see the quotation from Ryklof Van Goens under FO TREE. Mr. Skewet writes: It seems possible that the idea of a coin tree may have arisen from the practice, among some Oriental nations at least, of making cash in moulds, the design of which is based on the plan of a tree. On the E. coast of the Malay Peninsula the name cash-tree (poko' pitis) is applied to cash cast in this form. Gold and silver tributary trees are sent to Siam by the tributary States: in these the leaves are in the shape of ordinary tree leaves.]

PAHLAVI, PEHLAVI. The name applied to the ancient Persian language in that phase which prevailed from the beginning of the Sassanian monarchy to the time when it became corrupted by the influence of Arabic, and the adoption of numerous Arabic words and phrases. The name Pahluvi was adopted by Europeans from the Parsi use. The language of Western Persia in the time of the Achaemenian kings, as preserved in the cuneiform inscriptions of Persepolis, Behistun, and elsewhere, is nearly akin to the dialects of the Zend-Avesta, and is characterised by a number of inflections agreeing with those of the Avesta and of Sanskrit. The dissolution of inflectional terminations is already indicated as beginning in the later Achaemenian inscriptions, and in many parts of the Zend-Avesta but its course cannot be traced, as there are no inscriptions in Persian.
language during the time of the Arsa-cidae; and it is in the inscriptions on rocks and coins of Ardakshir-i-Papâkân (A.D. 226-240)—the Ardâshir Babâgân of later Persian—that the language emerges in a form of that which is known as Pahlavi. "But, strictly speaking, the medieval Persian language is called Pahlavi when it is written in one of the characters used before the invention of the modern Persian alphabet, and in the peculiarly enigmatical mode adopted in Pahlavi writings. . . . Like the Assyrians of old, the Persians of Parthian times appear to have borrowed their writing from a foreign race. But, whereas the Semitic Assyrians adopted a Turanian syllabary, these later Aryan Persians accepted a Semitic alphabet.
Besides the alphabet, however, which they could use for spelling their own words, they transferred a certain number of complete Semitic words to their writings as representatives of the corresponding words in their own language. . . . The use of such Semitic words, scattered about in Persian sentences, gives Pahlavi the motley appearance of a compound language. . . . But there are good reasons for supposing that the language was never spoken as it was written.
The spoken language appears to have been pure Persian; the Semitic words being merely used as written representatives, or logograms, of the Persian words which were spoken. Thus, the Persians would write malkân malkâ,
'King of Kings,' but they would read shâhân shâh. . . . As the Semitic words were merely a Pahlavi mode of writing their Persian equivalents (just as 'viz.' is a mode of writing 'namely,' in English*), they disappeared with the Pahlavi writing, and the Persians began at once to write all their words with their new alphabet, just as they pronounced them? (E. W. West, Introd. to Pahlavi Texts, p. xiii.; Sacred Books of the East, vol. v.).†

Extant Pahlavi writings are confined to those of the Parsis, translations from the Avesta, and others almost entirely of a religious character.
Where the language is transcribed, either in the Avesta characters, or in those of the modern Persian alphabet, and freed from the singular system indicated above, it is called Pazand (see PAZEND); a term supposed to be derived from the language of the Avesta, paâtizânti, with the meaning 're-explanation.'

Various explanations of the term Pahlavi have been suggested. It seems now generally accepted as a changed form of the Parthian of the cuneiform inscriptions, the Parthia of Greek and Roman writers. The Parthians, though not a Persian race, were rulers of Persia for five centuries, and it is probable that everything ancient, and connected with the period of their rule, came to be called by this name.
It is apparently the same word that in the form pâhlav and pâhlavan, &c., have become the appellation of a warrior or champion in both Persian and Armeanian, originally derived from that most warlike people the Parthians.
(See PULWAUN.) Whether there was any identity between the name thus used, and that of Pahlava, which is applied to a people mentioned often in Sanskrit books, is a point still un-settlement.

The meaning attached to the term Pahlavi by Orientals themselves, writing in Arabic or Persian (exclusive of Paras), appears to have been 'Old Persian' in general, without restriction to any particular period or dialect. It is thus found applied to the cuneiform inscriptions at Persepolis. (Derived from West as quoted
London, 1878.)

* Or our symbol (â), now modified into (ê), which is in fact Latin æ, but is read 'â.'
† 'The peculiar mode of writing Pahlavi here alluded to long made the character of the lan-dage a standing puzzle for European scholars, and was first satisfactorily explained by Professor Haug, of Munich, in his admirable Essay on the Pahlavi Language, already cited" (West, p. xii.)
has shown the construction to have been derived from India with Buddhism (see Indian and Eastern Architecture, pp. 700-702). [So the Torii of Japan seem to represent Skt. torana, 'an archway' (see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 407 seq.).]

PÁLAGILÁSS. s. This is domestic Hind. for 'Asparagus' (Panjab N. & Q. ii. 189).

PALANKEEN, PALANQUIN. s. A box-litter for travelling in, with a pole projecting before and behind, which is borne on the shoulders of 4 or 6 men—4 always in Bengal, 6 sometimes in the Telugu country.

The origin of the word is not doubtful, though it is by no means clear how the Portuguese got the exact form which they have handed over to us. The nasal termination may be dismissed as a usual Portuguese addition, such as occurs in mandarin, Bayaim (Wasaí), and many other words and names as used by them. The basis of all the forms is Skt. paryaśka, or paryaśka, 'a bed,' from which we have Hind. and Mahr. palanq, 'a bed,' Hind. palki, 'a palankin,' [Telugu pallakki, which is perhaps the origin of the Port. word], Pali palanka, 'a couch, bed, litter, or palankin' (Childers), and in Javanese and Malay palangki, 'a litter or sedan' (Craneford).*

It is curious that there is a Spanish word palanca (L. Lat. phalangy) for a pole used to carry loads on the shoulders of two bearers (called in Sp. palanquinos); a method of transport more common in the south than in England, though even in old English the thing has a name, viz. 'a cowlestaff' (see N.E.D.). It is just possible that this word (though we do not find it in the Portuguese dictionaries) may have influenced the form in which the early Portuguese visitors to India took up the word.

The thing appears already in the Rámâyana. It is spoken of by Ibn Batuta and John Marignolli (both c. 1350), but neither uses this Indian name; and we have not found evidence of palki older than Akbar (see Elliot, iv. 515, and Aín, i. 254).

As drawn by Linschoten (1597), and as described by Grose at Bombay (c. 1760), the palankin was hung from a bamboo which bent in an arch over the vehicle; a form perhaps not yet entirely obsolete in native use. William- son (V. M., i. 316 seqq.) gives an account of the different changes in the fashion of palankins, from which it would appear that the present form must have come into use about the end of the 18th century. Up to 1840-50 most people in Calcutta kept a palankin and a set of bearers (usually natives of Orissa—see ORIYA), but the practice and the vehicle are now almost, if not entirely, obsolete among the better class of Europeans. Till the same period the palankin, carried by relays of bearers, laid out by the post-office, or by private chowdries (q.v.), formed the chief means of accomplishing extensive journeys in India, and the elder of the present writers has undergone hardly less than 8000 or 9000 miles of travelling in going considerable distances (excluding minor journeys) after this fashion. But in the decade named, the palankin began, on certain great roads, to be superseded by the dawk-garry (a Palkee-garry or palankin-carriage, hORED by ponies posted along the road, under the post-office), and in the next decade to a large extent by railway, supplemented by other wheel-carriage, so that the palankin is now used rarely, and only in out-of-the-way localities.

c. 1340. — 'Some time afterwards the pages of the Mistress of the Universe came to me with a dāla. . . . It is like a bed of state . . . with a pole of wood above . . . this is curved, and made of the Indian cane, solid and compact. Eight men, divided into two relays, are employed in turn to carry one of these; four carry the palankin whilst four rest. These vehicles serve in India the same purpose as donkeys in Egypt; most people use them habitually in going and coming. If a man has his own slaves, he is carried by them; if not he hires men to carry him. There are also a few found for hire in the city, which stand in the bazaars, at the Sultan's gate, and also at the gates of private citizens.'— Ibn Batuta, iii. 386.

* In Canticles, iii. 9, the "ferculum quod fecit sibi rex Salomon de lignis Libani" is in the Hebrew oppýrgos, which has by some been supposed to be Greek φορέος; highly improbable, as the litter came to Greece from the East. Is it possible that the word can be in some way taken from paryaśka? The R.V. has palanquin. [See the discussion in Encyclopaedia Biblica, iii. 2804 seq.].
The following is the remonstrance of the city of Goa against the ecclesiastical action in this matter, addressed to the King:

1606.—"Last year this City gave your Majesty an account of how the Archbishop Primate proposed the issue of orders that the women should go with their palanquins uncovered, or at least half uncovered, and how on this matter were made to him all the needful representations and remonstrances on the part of the whole community, giving the reasons against such a proceeding, which were also sent to Your Majesty. Nevertheless in a Council that was held this last summer, they dealt with this subject, and they agreed to petition Your Majesty to order that the said palanquins should travel in such a fashion that it could be seen who was in them.

"The matter is of so odious a nature, and of such a description that Your Majesty should grant their desire in no shape whatever, nor give any order of the kind, seeing this place is a frontier fortress. The reasons for this have been written to Your Majesty; let us beg Your Majesty graciously to make no new rule; and this is the petition of the whole community to Your Majesty."—Carta, que a Ciudad de Goa escreveu a Sua Magestade, o anno de 1606. 1608-9.—"If comming forth of his Pallace, hee (Jahangir) get vp on a Horse, it is a signe that he goth for the Warres; but if he be vp vpon an Elephant or Palankine, it will bee but an hunting Voyage."—Hakius, in Purchas, i. 219.

1616.—"... Abdula Chan, the great governour of Amadavas, being sent for to Court in disgrace, comming in Pilgrims Clothes with forti servants on foote, about sixe miles in counterfeit humiliation, finished the rest in his Pallancke."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 552; [Hak. Soc. ii. 278, which reads Palankee, with other minor variances].

In Terry's account, in Purchas, ii. 1475, we have a Pallankee, and (p. 1481) Palanka; in a letter of Tom Coryate's (1615) Palancken.

1623.—"In the territories of the Portuguse in India it is forbidden to men to travel in palankin (Palanchino) as in good sooth too effeminate a proceeding; neither as the Portuguese pay very little attention to their laws, as soon as the rains begin to fall they commence getting permission to use the palankin, either by favour or by bribery; and so, gradually, the thing is relaxed, until at last nearly everybody travels in that way, and at all seasons."—F. della Valle, i. 611; [comp. Hak. Soc. i. 31].

1659.—"The designing rascal (Sivaji) . . . conselilated Afsal Khan, who fell into the snare. . . . Without arms he mounted the palki, and proceeded to the place appointed under the fortress. He left all his attendants at the distance of a long arrow-shot. . . . Sivaji had a weapon, called in the language of the Dakhin bichikh (i.e. 'scorpion') on the fingers of his hand, hidden under his sleeve. . . ."—Khdir Khan, in Elliot, viii. 259. See also p. 508.

c. 1660.—"... From Golconda to Mysdeen there is no travelling by waggons. . . . But instead of Coaches they have the convenience of Palkies, wherein you are carried with more speed and more ease than in any part of India."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 70; [ed. Ball, i. 175]. This was quite true up to our own time. In 1840 the present writer was carried on that road, a stage of 25 miles in little more than 5 hours, by 12 bearers, relieving each other by sixes.

1672. The word occurs several times in Baldeaus as Pallinkijn. Tavernier writes Palki and sometimes Palankine [Ball, i. 45, 175, 390, 392]; Bernier has Paleky [ed. Constable, 214, 283, 372].

The following measures a change in ideas. A palakkin is now hardly ever used by a European, even of humble position, much less by the opulent:

1708.—"Palkee. A litter well known in India, called by the English Palankeen.

cences, i. 282.

1809.—"Woe! Woe! around their palankeen,

As on a bridal day

With symphony and dance and song,

Their kindred and their friends come on,

The dance of sacrifice! The funeral song!"—Kehama, i. 6.

1850.—"It will amaze readers in these days to learn that the Governor-General

PALEMPORE, s. A kind of chintz bed-cover, sometimes made of beautiful patterns, formerly made at various places in India, especially at Sadras and Masulipatam, the importation of which into Europe has become quite obsolete, but under the greater appreciation of Indian manufactures has recently shown some tendency to revive. The etymology is not quite certain,—we know no place of the name likely to have been the eponymic,—and possibly it is a corruption of a hybrid (Hind. and Pers.) palang-posh, 'a bed-cover,' which occurs below, and which may have been perverted through the existence of Salempore as a kind of stuff. The probability that the word originated in a perversion of palang-posh, is strengthened by the following entry in Blount's Dict. (Suppt. 1727.)

"Chaudus or Chaudrus são huns panos grandes, que servem para cobrir camas e outras cousas. São pintados de cores muy vistosas, e alguns mais finos, a que chamam palangpuzes. Fabrica-se de algodão em Bengala e Choromandel,"—i.e. "Chaudus or Chauduses" (this I cannot identify, perhaps the same as Choutar among Piece-goods) 'are a kind of large cloths serving to cover beds and other things. They are painted with gay colours, and there are some of a finer description which are called palangposhes,' &c.

[For the mode of manufacture at Masulipatam, see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 14. Mr. Pringle (Madras Selections, 4th ser. p. 71, and Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 173) has questioned this derivation. The word may have been taken from the State and town of Palempur in Guzerat, which seems to have been an emporium for the manufactures of N. India, which was long noted for chintz of this kind.]

PARI, s. The name of the sacred language of the Southern Buddhists, in fact, according to their apparently well-founded tradition Magadhī, the dialect of what we now call South Bahar, in which Sakyamuni discoursed. It is one of the Prākritis (see PRACRIT) or Aryan vernaculars of India, and has probably been a dead language for nearly 2000 years. Pāli in Skt. means 'a line, row, series'; and by the Buddhists is used for the series of their Sacred Texts. Pāli-bhāṣā is then 'the language of the Sacred Texts,' i.e. Magadhī; and this is called elliptically by the Singalaese Pāli, which we have adopted in like use. It has been carried, as the sacred language, to all the Indo-Chinese countries which have derived their religion from India through Ceylon. Pāli is 'a sort of Tuscan among the Prākritis' from its inherent grace and strength (Childers). But the analogy to Tuscan is closer still in the parallelism of the modification of Sanskrit words, used in Pāli, to that of Latin words used in Italian.

Robert Knox does not apparently know by that name the Pāli language in Ceylon. He only speaks of the Books of Religion as "being in an elegant style which the Vulgar people do not understand" (p. 75); and in another passage says: "They have a language something differing from the vulgar tongue (like Latin to us) which their books are writ in" (p. 109).

1690.—"... this Doubt proceeds from the Sinames understanding two Languages, viz., the vulgar, which is a simple Tongue, consisting almost wholly of Monosyllables, without Conjugation or Declension; and another Language, which I have already spoken of, which to them is a dead Tongue, known only by the Learned, which is called the Balīe Tongue, and which is enriched with the inflexions of words, like the Languages we have in Europe. The terms of Religion and Justice, the names of Offices, and all the Ornaments of the Vulgar Tongue are borrowed from the Balīe."—De la Loubère's Siam, L.T. 1693, p. 9.

1795.—"Of the ancient Pālīs, whose language constitutes at the present day the sacred text of Ava, Pogue, and Siam, as well as of several other countries eastward of the Ganges: and of their migration from India to the banks of the Cali, the Nile of Ethiopia, we have but very imperfect information... It has been the opinion of some of the most enlightened writers on the languages of the East, that the Pāli, the sacred language of the priests of Boodh, is nearly allied to the Sanscrit of the Bramins: and there certainly is much of that holy idiom interwoven on the vulgar language of Ava, by the introduction of the Hindoo religion."—Sims, 337.8.

1818.—"The Talapoins... do apply themselves in some degree to study, since according to their rules they are obliged to learn the Sādā, which is the grammar of the Pāli language or Magatā, to read the Vini, the Padimot... and the sermons of Godama... All these books are written in the Pāli tongue, but the text is accompanied by a Burmese translation. They were all brought into the kingdom by a certain Brahmin from the island of Ceylon."—Sangermano's Burmese Empire, p. 141.

1837.—"Buddhists are impressed with the conviction that their sacred and classical language, the Māgadhi or Pāli, is of greater antiquity than the Sanscrit; and that it had attained also a higher state of refinement than its rival tongue had acquired. In support of this belief they adduce various arguments, which, in their judgment, are quite conclusive. They observe that the very word Pāli signifies original, text, regularity; and there is scarcely a Buddhist scholar in Ceylon, who, in the discussion of this question, will not quote, with an air of triumph, their favourite verse,—

Sā Māgadhi: māla bhāṣā (kē.).
There is a language which is the root;... men and brāhmans at the commencement of the creation, who never before heard nor uttered a human accent, and even the Supreme Deities, spokè it: it is Māgadhi.'

'This verse is a quotation from Kachchhā-yānō's grammar, the oldest referred to in the Pāli literature of Ceylon... Let me... at once aver, that, exclusive of all philological considerations, I am inclined, on prima facie evidence—external as well as internal—to entertain an opinion adverse to the claims of the Buddhists on this particular point."—George Turnour, Introd. to Mahāwamsa, p. xxiii.

1874.—"The spoken language of Italy was to be found in a number of provincial dialects, each with its own characteristics, the Piedmontese harsh, the Neapolitan nasal, the Tuscan soft and flowing. These dialects had been rising in importance as Latin declined; the birth-time of a new literary language was imminent. Then came Dante, and choosing for his immortal Commedia the finest and most cultivated of the vernaculars, raised it at once to the position of dignity for which it still retains. Read Sanskrit or Latin, Magadhese for Tuscan, and the Three Baskets for the Divina Commedia, and the parallel is complete... Like Italian Pāli is at once flowing and sonorous; it is a characteristic of both languages that nearly every word ...ends in a vowel, and that all harsh conjunctions are softened down by assimilation, elision, or crisis, while on the other hand both lend themselves easily to the expression of sublime and vigorous thought." — Children, Preface to Pali Dict. pp. xiii-xiv.

PALMYRA POINT, n.p. Otherwise called Pt. Pedro, a corruption of the Port. Punta das Pedros, 'the rocky cape,' a name descriptive of the natural features of the coast (Tennent, ii. 533). This is the N.E. point of Ceylon, the high palmya trees on which are conspicuous.

PALMYRES, POINT, n.p. This is a headland on the Orissa coast, quite low, but from its prominence at the most projecting part of the combined Mahanadi and Brâhmany delta an important landmark, especially in former days, for ships bound from the south for the mouth of the Hoogly, all the more for the dangerous shoal off it. A point of the Mahanadi delta, 24 miles to the south-west, is called False Point, from its liability to be mistaken for P. Palmiras.

Panchanga is used also, at least by Buchanan below, for the Brahman who keeps and interprets the almanac for the villagers. [This should be Skt. panchângi.]

1612.—"Every year they make new almanacs for the eclipses of the Sun and of the Moon, and they have a perpetual one which serves to pronounce their auguries, and this they call Panchagao."—Coute, V. vi. 4.

1651.—"The Bramins, in order to know the good and bad days, have made certain writings after the fashion of our Almanacks, and these they call Panjangam."—Rogerius, 55. This author gives a specimen (pp. 63-69).

1800.—"No one without consulting the Panchanga, or almanac-keeper, knows when he is to perform the ceremonies of religion."—Buchanan's Mysore, &c., i. 294.

PANDAL, PENDAUL, s. A shed. Tamil. pandal, [Skt. bandh, 'to bind'].

1651.—"... it is the custom in this country when there is a Bride in the house to set up before the door certain stakes somewhat taller than a man, and these are covered with lighter sticks on which foliage is put to make a shade. ... This arrangement is called a Pandæi in the country speech."—Rogerius, 12.

1717.—"Water-Bandels, which are little sheds for the Conveniency of drinking Water."—Phillip's Account, 19.

1745.—"Je sui vis la procession d'un peu loin, et arrivé aux sepultures, j'y vis un pandel ou tente dressée, sur la fosse du defunt; elle etait ornée de branches de figuier, de toiles peintes, &c. L'intérieur était garnie de petites lampes allumées."—Norbert, Mémoires, iii. 32.

1781.—"Les gens riches font construir devant leur porte un autre pandel."—Sonnerat, ed. 1752, i. 184.

1800.—"I told the farmer that, as I meant to make him pay his full rent, I could not take his fowl and milk without paying for them; and that I would not enter his pun-dull, because he had not paid the labourers who made it."—Letter of Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 282.

1814.—"There I beheld, assembled in the same pandaul, or reposing under the friendly banian-tree, the Gostanee (see GOSAIN (see JOGEE) in a state of nudity, the Yooge (see JOGEE) with a lark or paroquet his sole companion for a thousand miles."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 465; [2nd ed. ii. 72. In ii. 109 he writes Pendall].

1815.—"Pandauls were erected opposite the two principal fords on the river, where under my medical superintendence skilful natiives provided with eau-de-luce and other remedies were constantly stationed."—Dr. McKenzie, in Asiatic Researches, xiii. 329.

PANDARAM, s. A Hindu ascetic mendicant of the (so-called) Sídhras, or even of a lower caste. A priest of the lower Hindu castes of S. India and Ceylon. Tamil, pandhiram. C. P. Brown says the Pandiram is properly a Vaishnava, but, other authors apply the name to Saiva priests. [The Madras Gloss, derives the word from Skt. pandhu-ranya, 'white-coloured.' Messrs. Cox and Stuart (Man of N. Arcot. i. 199) derive it from Skt. bhaja-dagara, 'a temple-treasury,' wherein were employed those who had renounced the world. "The Pandarams seem to receive numerous recruits from the Saivite Sídhras castes, who choose to make a profession of piety and wander about begging. They are, in reality, very lax in their modes of life, often drinking liquor and eating animal food furnished by any respectable Sídhras. They often serve in Siva temples, where they make up garlands of flowers to decorate the lingam, and blow brass trumpets when offerings are made or processions take place" (ibid.).]

1711. "... But the destruction of 50 or 60,000 pagodas worth of grain... and killing the Pandaram; these are things which make his demands really carry too much justice with them."—Letter in Wheeler, ii. 169.

1717. "... Bramans, Pantarongal, and other holy men."—Phillips's Account, 18. The word is here in the Tamil plural.

1745. "On voit ici quelquefois les Pandarums ou Penkiens qui ont été en pêlerinage à Bengale; quand ils retournent ils apportent ici avec grand soin de l'eau du Gange dans des pots ou vases bien formés,"—Norbert, Mém. iii. 28.

c. 1760. "The Pandarams, the Mahometan priests, and the Bramins themselves yield to the force of truth."—Grose, i. 252.

1781. "Les Pandarons ne sont pas moins revérs que les Sàvîrâs. Ils sont de la secte de Chiven, se barbouillent toute la figure, la poitrine, et les bras avec des cendres de bouze de vache," &c.—Sonnert, Svo. ed., ii. 113-114.

1798. "... The other figure is of a Pandaram or Sàvîrâ, of the class of pilgrims to the various pagodas."—Pennant's View of Hindostan, preface.

1800. "In Chena the Pûtrâs (see POUJAREE) or priests in these temples are all Pandarums, who are the Sàvîrâs dedicated to the service of Siva's temples..."—Buchanan's Mysore, &c., ii. 335.

1809. "The chief of the pagoda (Ramswaram), or Pandaram, waiting on the beach."—Id. Valentin, i. 338.

1860. "In the island of Nainativoe, to the south-west of Jafna, there was till recently a little temple, dedicated to the goddess Naga Tambiram, in which consecrated serpents were tenderly reared by the Pandarams, and daily fed at the expense of the worshippers."—Tennent's Ceylon, i. 373.

PANDARANI, n. p. The name of a port of Malabar of great reputation in the Middle Ages, a name which has gone through many curious corruptions. Its position is clear enough from Varthema's statement that an uninhabited island stood opposite at three leagues distance, which must be the "Sacrifice Rock" of our charts. [The Madras Gloss. identifies it with Collam.] The name appears upon no modern map, but it still attaches to a miserable fishing village on the site, in the form Pantalâni (approx. lat. 11° 26'), a little way north of Koiland. It is seen below in Don Batuta's notice that Pandarani afforded an exceptional shelter to shipping during the S.W. monsoon. This is referred to in an interesting letter to one of the present writers from his friend Col. (now Lt.-Gen.) R. H. Sankey, C.B., R.E., dated Madras, 13th Feb., 1881: "One very extraordinary feature on the coast is the occurrence of mud-banks in from 1 to 6 fathoms of water, which have the effect of breaking both surf and swell to such an extent that ships can run into the patches of water so sheltered at the very height of the monsoon, when the elements are raging, and not only find a perfectly still sea, but are able to land their cargoes. ... Possibly the snugness of some of the harbours frequented by the Chinese junks, such as Pandarani, may have been mostly due to banks of this kind? By the way, I suspect your 'Pandarani' was nothing but the roadstead of Coulete (Coulandi or Quelande of our Atlas). The Master Attendant who accompanied me, appears to have a good opinion of it as an anchorage, and as well sheltered.

[See Logan, Malabar, i. 72.]

c. 1150. — "Pandarana is a town built at the mouth of a river which comes from Mau'dar (see MALABAR), where vessels from India and Sind cast anchor. The inhabitants are rich, the markets well supplied, and trade flourishing." — Ediri, in Elliot, i. 90.

1296. — "In the year (1296) it was prohibited to merchants who traded in fine or costly products with Majapah (Ma'bar or Coromandel), Pei-nan (?) and Fantalaina, three foreign kingdoms, to export any one of them more than the value of 50,000 tining in paper money." — Chinese Annals of the Mongol Dynasty, quoted by Pauthier, Marc Pol, 592.

c. 1300. — "Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindibdr, then Faknur, then the country of Manjarur, then the country of Hil, then the country of (Pandarana)." — Raskuddin, in Elliot, i. 165.

c. 1321. — "And the forest in which the pepper growth extendeth for a good 18 days' journey, and in that forest there be two cities, the one whereof is called Pandrina, and the other Cypsitlin" (see SHINKALI). — Friar Odorjo, in Cathay, &c., 75.

c. 1343. — "From Boddfattan we proceeded to Pandaraina, a great and fine town with gardens and barns. The Musulmans there occupy three quarters, each having its mosque. . . . It is at this town that the ships of China pass the winter" (i.e. the S.W. monsoon). — Ibn Batuta, iv. 88. (Compare Roteiro below.)

c. 1442. — "The humble author of this narrative having received his order of dispatch to return from Calicut by sea, after having passed the port of Bendinah (read Bandarana, and see MANGALORE, a) situated on the coast of Melabar, (he) reached the port of Mangalor. . . ." — Abhurazzaq, in India in Xith Cent., 20.

1508. — "Da poi fecemo vela et in vn porto de dicto Re chiamato Fundarane amazorno molta gente co artelaria et delibera andare verso il regno de Cuchin . . ." — Letter of King Emanuel, p. 5.

c. 1506. — "Questo capitano si trovò nave 17 de mercandori Mori in uno porto se chima Pandarami, e combatte con queste le quali se messeno in terra ; per modo che questo capitano mandò tutti li soi copani ben armati con un baril de polvere per cadun copano, e mise fuoco dentro dette navi de Mori ; e tutte quelle brasilone, con tutte quelle spezierie che erano cargeh per la Mecha, e s'intende ch' erano molto ricche. . . ." — Leonardo Co' Masser, 20-21.

1510. — "Here we remained two days, and then departed, and went to a place which is called Pandarani, distant from this one day's journey, and which is subject to the King of Calicut. This place is a wretched affair, and has no port." — Varthema, 153.

1516. — "Further on, south south-east, is another Moorish place which is called Pandarani, in which also there are many ships." — Barbosa, 152.

In Rowlandson's Translation of the Tokjutul-Majaddimin (Or. Transl. Fund, 1833), the name is habitually misread Fundreah for Fundaraina.

1536. — "Martim Afonso . . . ran along the coast in search of the paroas, the galleys and caravels keeping the sea, and the foists hugging the shore. And one morning they came suddenly on Cunhalaremcur with 25 paroas, which the others had sent to collect rice; and on catching sight of them as they came along the coast towards the Isles of Pandarane, Diogo de Reynoso, who was in advance of our foists, he and his brother . . . and Diogo Corvo . . . set off to engage the Moors, who were numerous and well armed. And Cunha, when he knew it was Martim Afonso, laid all pressure on his oars to double the Point of Tiraccle. . . ." — Correia, iii. 775.

PANDY, s. The most current colloquial name for the Sepoy mutineer during 1857-58. The surname Pándy [Skt. Pandita] was a very common one among the high-caste Sepoys of the Bengal army, being the title of a Jat [got, gotra] or subdivisional branch of the Brahmins of the Upper Provinces, which furnished many men to the ranks. "The first two men hung" (for mutiny) "at Barrackpore were Pandies by caste, hence all sepoys were Pandies, and ever will be so called" (Bourchier, as below). "In the Bengal army before the Mutiny, there was a person employed in the quarter-guard to strike the gong, who was known as the gunt Pandy" (M.-G. Keatinge). "Ghant, 'a gong or bell."

1857. — "As long as I keep the entire confidence I do, that we shall triumph over this iniquitous combination, I cannot feel gloom. I leave this feeling to the Pandies, who have sacrificed honour and existence to the ghost of a delusion." — H. Greathead, Letters during the Siege of Delhi, 99.

"We had not long to wait before the line of guns, howitzers, and mortar carts, chiefly drawn by elephants, soon hove in sight. . . Poor Pandy, what a pounding was in store for you! . . .—Bourchier, Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoy Army, 47.

PANGARA, PANGAIA, s. From the quotations, a kind of boat used on the E. coast of Africa. [Pryard de Laval (i. 33, Hak. Soc.) speaks of a "kind of raft called a panguaye," on which Mr. Gray comments: "As Rivara points out, Pryard mistakes the use of the word panguaye, or, as the Portuguese write it, pangario, which was a small sailing canoe. . . Rivara says the word is still used in Portuguese India and Africa for a two-masted barge with lateen sails. It is mentioned in Lancaster's Voyages (Hak. Soc. pp. 5, 6, and 26), where it is described as being like a barge with one mat sail of coco-nut leaves. 'The barge is sowed together with the rindes of trees and pinned with wooden pinnes.' See also Alb. Comm. Hak. Soc. iii. p. 60, note; and Dr. Burnell's note to Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. p. 32, where it appears that the word is used as early as 1505, in Dom Manoel's letter."

[1513.—Pandejada and Punguagada are used for a sort of boat near Malacca in D'Andrade's Letter to Alboquerque of 22 Febly.; and we have "a Pandejada laden with supplies and arms" in India Office MS., Corpo Chronologico, vol. i.]

1591.——". . . divers Pangaras or boats, which are pinned with wooden pinnes, and sowed together with Palmito cordes."—Barker, in Hakluyt, ii. 558.

1598.—"In this fortesse of Sofala the Captaine of Mosambique hath a Factor, and twice or thrice every yer he sendeth certaine boats called "Pangaios, which saine along the shore to fetch gold, and bring it to Mosambique. These Pangaios are made of light planks, and sowed together with cords, without any nails."—Linschoten, ch. 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 32].

1618.—"Each of these bars, of Quilumane, Cumama, and Loubo, allows of the entrance of vessels of 100 tons, viz., galeots and pangaios, loaded with cloth and provisions; and when they enter the river they discharge cargo into other light and very long boats called almadias. . . ."—Bocarro, Decada, 534.

[1766.—"Their larger boats, called panguays, are raised some feet from the sides with reeds and branches of trees, well bound together with small-cord, and afterwards made water-proof, with a kind of bitumen, or resinous substance."—Grose, 2nd ed. i. 18.]

PANGOLIN, s. This book-name for the Manis is Malay Panggaling, 'the creature that rolls itself up.' [Scott says: "The Malay word is peng-goling, transcribed also peng-guling; Katingan penguling. It means 'roller,' or, more literally, 'roll up.' The word is formed from goling, 'roll, wrap,' with the denominative prefix pe-, which takes before g the form peng.' Mr. Skeat remarks that the modern Malay form is teng-giling or sengiling, but the latter seems to be used, not for the Manis, but for a kind of centipede which rolls itself up. 'The word pangolin, to judge by its form, should be derived from guling, which means to 'roll over and over.' The word pengguling or peng-guling in the required sense of Manis, does not exist in standard Malay. The word was either derived from some out-of-the-way dialect, or was due to some misunderstanding on the part of the Europeans who first adopted it."

Its use in English begins with Pennant (Synopsis of Quadrupeds, 1771, p. 329).—Adam Burt gives a dissection of the animal in Asiat. Res. ii. 353 seqq. It is the Manis pentedactyla of Linn.; called in Hind. bajirkit (i.e. Skt. vraja-kita 'adamant reptile'). We have sometimes thought that the Manis might have been the creature which was shown as a gold-digging ant (see Busbeck below); but was not this also the creature that Bertrandon de la Brocquére met with in the desert of Gaza? When pursued, "it began to cry like a cat at the approach of a dog. Pierre de la Vaudrie struck it on the back with the point of his sword, but it did no harm, from being covered with scales like a sturgeon." A.D. 1432. (T. Wright's Early Travels in Palestine, p. 290) (Bohn). It is remarkable to find the statement that these ants were found in the possession of the King of Persia recurring in Herodotus and in Busbeck, with an interval of nearly 2000 years! We see that the suggestion of the Manis being the gold-digging ant has been anticipated by Mr. Blakesley in his Herodotus. [It is now understood that the gold-digging ants were neither, as ancients supposed, an extraordinary kind of real ants, nor, as many learned men have since supposed, large animals mistaken for ants, but Tibetan miners who, like their descendants of the present day, preferred working their mines in winter when the frozen soil stands well and is not likely to trouble them by falling in. The Sanskrit word psulpika denotes both an ant and a particular kind of gold* [McCrindle, Ancient India, its Invasión by Alexander the Great, p. 341 seq.]

c. B.C. 445.—"Here in this desert, there live amid the sand great ants, in size somewhat less than dogs, but bigger than foxes. The Persian King has a number of them, which have been caught by the hunters in the land whereof we are speaking. . . ."—Hered. iii. 102 (Rawlinson's tr.).

1562.—Among presents to the G. Turk from the King of Persia: "in his insutatis generis animantes, qualem memini dictum fuisse allatum formicam Indicam medioeris canis magnitudine, mordacem admodum et saevam."—Busbequii Opera, Elżev., 1653, p. 343.

PANICALE, s. This is mentioned by Bluteau (vi. 223) as an Indian disease, a swelling of the feet. Céle is here probably the Tamil kál, 'leg.' [Ānakkāl is the Tamil name for what is commonly called Cochin Leg.]

PANIKAR, PANYCA, &c., s. Malayal. panikan, 'a fencing-master, a teacher' [Mal. *pāri, 'work, kuran, 'doer']; but at present it more usually means 'an astrologer.'

1518.—"And there are very skilful men who teach this art (fencing), and they are called Panickers."—Barbous, 128.

1553.—"And when (the Naire) comes to the age of 7 years he is obliged to go to the fencing-school, the master of which (whom they call Panical) they regard as a father, on account of the instruction he gives them."—Barros, I. ix. 3.

1554.—"To the panical (in the Factory at Cochin) 300 reis a month, which are for the year 3600 reis."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 24.

1583.—"The maisters which teach them, be graduates in the weapons which they teach, and they bee called in their language Panicaes."—Castaneda (by N. L.), t. 36v.

1599.—"L'Archidacire pour assurer sa personne fit appeller quelques-uns des principaux Maistres d'Armes de sa Nation. On appelle ces gens la Panicalcs. ... Ils sont extremement redoutez."—La Croze, 101.

1604.—"The deceased Panical had engaged in his pay many Nayres, with obligation to die for him."—Guererro, Relacion, 90.

1606.—"Paniquaus is the name by which the same Malauares call their masters of fence."—Gouvea, f. 28.

1614.—"To the cost of a Panical and 4 Nayres who serve the factory in the conveyance of the pepper on rafts for the year 12,960 res."—Bocarro, MS. 316.

PANTHAY, PANTHÉ, s. This is the name applied of late years in Burma, and in intelligence coming from the side of Burma, to the Mahommedans of Yunnan, who established a brief independence at Talifu, between 1867 and 1873. The origin of the name is exceedingly obscure. It is not, as Mr. Baber assures us, used or known in Yunnan itself (i.e. by the Chinese). It must be remarked that the usual Burmese name for a Mahommedan is Pithi, and one would have been inclined to suppose Panthé to be a form of the same; as indeed we see that Gen. Fryche has stated it to be (Burma, Past and Present, ii. 297-8).

But Sir Arthur Phayre, a high authority, in a note with which he has favoured us, observes: 'Panthé, I believe, comes from a Chinese word signifying 'native or indigenous.' It is quite a modern name in Burma, and is applied exclusively to the Chinese Mahommedans who come with caravans from Yunnan. I am not aware that they can be distinguished from other Chinese caravan traders, except that they do not bring hams for sale as the others do. In dress and appearance, as well as in drinking samshu (see Samosho) and gambling, they are like the others. The word Pa-thi again is the old Burmese word for 'Mahommedan.' It is applied to all Mahommedans other than the Chinese Panthé. It is in no way connected with the latter word, but is, I believe, a corruption of Pārsi or Fārsi, i.e. Persian." He adds: "The Burmese call their own indigenous Mahommedans 'Pathi-Kulā,' and Hindus 'Hindu-Kulā,' when they wish to distinguish between the two" (see Kula). The last suggestion is highly probable, and greatly to be preferred to that of M. Jacquet, who supposed that the word might be taken from Pasei in Sumatra, which was during part of the later Middle Ages a kind of metropolis of Islam, in the Eastern Seas.*

We may mention two possible origins for Panthé, as indicating lines for enquiry:—

a. The title Pathi (or Passi, for the former is only the Burmese lisping utterance) is very old. In the remarkable Chinese Account of Camboja, dating from the year 1296, which has been translated by Abel-Rémusat, there is a notice of a sect in Camboja called Pa-sse. The author identifies them in a passing way, with the Taosse, but that is a term which Fah-hian also in India uses in a vague way, apparently quite inapplicable to the Chinese sect properly so called. These Pa-sse, the Chinese writer says, "wear a red or white cloth on their heads, like the head-dress of Tartar women, but not so high. They have edifices or towers, monasteries, and temples, but not to be compared for magnitude with those of the Buddhists. ... In their temples there are no images ... they are allowed to cover their towers and their buildings with tiles. The Pa-sse never eat with a stranger to their sect, and do not allow themselves to be seen eating; they drink no wine," &c. (Rémusat, Nouv. Mél. As., i. 112). We cannot be quite sure that this applies to Mahommedans, but it is on the whole probable that the name is the same as the Pathi of the Burmese, and has the same application. Now the people from whom the Burmese were likely to adopt a name for the Yunnan Mahommedans are the Shans, belonging to the great Siamese race, who occupy the intermediate country. The question occurs:—Is Panthé a Shan term for Mahommedan? If so, is it not probably only a dialectic variation of the Passe of Camboja, the Pathi of Burma, but entering Burma from a new quarter, and with its identity thus disguised? (Cushing, in his Shan Dict. gives Paái for Mahommedan. We do not find Panthé). There would be many analogies to such a course of things.

["The name Panthay is a purely Burmese word, and has been adopted by us from them. The Shan word Pang-hse is identical, and gives us no help to the origin of the term. Among themselves and to the Chinese they are known as Hui-hui or Hui-tzu (Mahommedans).—J. G. Scott, Gazetteer Upper Burma, i. i. 606.]

b. We find it stated in Lieut. Garnier's narrative of his great expedition to Yunnan that there is a hybrid Chinese race occupying part of the plain of Tali-fu, who are called Pen-ty (see Garnier, Voy. d'Expl. i. 518). This name again, it has been suggested, may possibly have to do with Panthé. But we find that Pen-ty ('root-soil') is a generic expression used in various parts of S. China for 'aborigines'; it could hardly then have been applied to the Mahommedans.

PANWELL, n.p. This town on the mainland opposite Bombay was in pre-railway times a usual landing-place on the way to Poona, and the English form of the name must have struck many besides ourselves. [Hamilton (Descri. ii. 151) says it stands on the river Pan, whence perhaps the name]. We do not know the correct form; but this one has substantially come down to us from the Portuguese: e.g.

1644.—"This Island of Caranja is quitenear, almost frontier-place, to six cities of the Moors of the Kingdom of the Melique, viz. Carnessi, Drugo, Poona, Sabaya, Abitta, and Panool."—Bocarro, MS. f. 227.

1804.—"P.S. Tell Mrs. Waring that notwithstanding the debate at dinner, and her recommendation, we propose to go to Bombay, by Panwell, and in the balloon!"—Wellington, from "Candolla," March 5.

PAPAYA, PAPAW, s. This word seems to be from America like the insipid, not to say nasty, fruit which it denotes (Carica papaya, L.). A quotation below indicates that it came by way of the Philippines and Malacca. [The Malay name, according to Mr. Skeat, is betik, which comes from the same Ar. form as pateca, though papaya and kapaya have been introduced by Europeans.] Though of little esteem, and though the tree's peculiar quality of rendering fresh meat tender which is familiar in the W. Indies, is little known or taken advantage of, the tree is found in gardens and compounds all over India, as far north as Delhi. In the N.W. Provinces it is called by the native gardeners arand-kharb √a, 'castor-oil-tree-melon,' no doubt from the superficial resemblance of its foliage to that of the Palma Christi. According to Moodeen Sheriff it has a Perso-Arabic name 'anbah-i-Hindi; in Canarese it is called Parangi-kawu or -mara ('Frank or Portuguese fruit, tree'). The name papaya according to Oviedo as quoted by Littré (“Oviedo, t. 1. p. 333, Madrid, 1851,—we cannot find it in Raimundio) was that used in Cuba, whilst the Carib name was ababai.*

[Mr. J. Platt, referring to his article in 9th Ser. Notes & Queries, iv. 515, writes:]

“Malay popaya, like the Accra term kpaka, is a European loan word. The evidence for Carib origin is, firstly, Oviedo’s Historia, 1553 (in the ed. of 1851, vol. i. 323): ‘Del arbol que en esta isla Española llaman popaya, y en la tierra firme los llaman los Españoles los bigos del mastnereo, y en la provincia de Nicaragua llamан a tal arbol olocoton.’ Secondly, Breton, Dictionnaire Caraibe, has: ‘Ababai, papayer.’ Gilij, Saggio, 1782, iii. 146 (quoted in N. de Q., u.s.), says the Otamic word is papuai.] Strange liberties are taken with the spelling. Mr. Robinson (below) calls it popeya; Sir L. Pelly (J.R.G.S. xxxv. 232), popon (ὀ πόπον!). Papaya is applied in the Philippines to Europeans who, by long residence, have fallen into native ways and ideas.

c. 1550.—“There is also a sort of fruit resembling figs, called by the natives Papai e . . . peculiar to this kingdom” (Pera).—Giov. Bentzon, 242.

1598.—“There is also a fruit that came out of the Spanish Indies, brought from beyond ye Philipinas or Lissons to Molucca, and frō thence to India, it is called Papaios, and is very like a Melon . . . and will not grow, but always two together, that is male and female . . . and when they are diuided and set apart one from the other, then they yield no fruit at all . . . This fruit at the first for the strangeness thereof was much esteemed, but now they account not of it.”—Linschoten, 97; [Hak. Soc. ii. 35].

c. 1635.—

“The Palma Christi and the fair Papaw
Now but a seed (preventing Nature’s Law)
In half the circle of the hasty year, Project a shade, and lovely fruits do wear.”

Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands.

1673.—“Here the flourishing Papaw (in Taste like our Melons, and as big, but growing on a Tree’leaf’like our Fig-tree . . .”—Fryer, 19.

1705.—“Il y a aussi des ananas, des Papées . . .”—Lutillier, 33.

1764.—“Thy temples shaded by the tumultuous palm
Or quick papaw, whose top is necklaced round
With numerous rows of particoloured fruit.”—Graining, Sugar Case, iv.

[1773.—“Paw Paw. This tree rises to 20 feet, sometimes single, at other times it is divided into several bodies.”—Ives, 480.]

1878.—“. . . the rank popeyas clustering beneath their coronal of stately leaves.”—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 50.

PAPUA, n.p. This name, which is now applied generically to the chief race of the island of New Guinea and resembling tribes, and sometimes (improperly) to the great island itself, is a Malay word papuwas, or sometimes puwah-puwah, meaning ‘frizzle-haired,’ and was applied by the Malays to the people in question.

1528.—“And as the wind fell at night the vessel was carried in among the islands, where there are strong currents, and got into the Sea of the Strait of Magalhães,* where he encountered a great storm, so that but for God’s mercy they had all been lost, and so they were driven on till they made the land of the Papuas, and then the east winds began to blow so that they could not sail to the Moluccas till May 1527. And with their stay in these lands much people got ill and many died, so that they came to Molucca much shattered.”—Correa, iii. 173-174.

1553.—(Referring to the same history.) “Thence he went off to make the islands of a certain people called Papuas, whom many on account of this visit of Don Jorge (de Menezes) call the Islands of Don Jorge, which lie east of the Moluccas some 200 leagues. . . .”—Barros, IV. 1. 6.

PARABYE, s. Burmese pāra-beik; the name given to a species of writing book which is commonly used in Burma. It consists of paper made from the bark of a spec. of daphne, which is agglutinated into a kind of pasteboard and blackened with a paste of charcoal. It is then folded, screened, into a note-book and written on with a steelie pencil. The same mode of writing has long been used in Canara; and from La Loubère we see PARANGHEE. s. An obstinate chronic disease endemic in Ceylon. It has a superficial resemblance to syphilis; the whole body being covered with ulcers, while the sufferer rapidly declines in strength. It seems to arise from insufficient diet, and to be analogous to the pellagra which causes havoc among the peasants of S. Europe. The word is apparently of Phoenician origin, and is usually written "PARANGHEE," 'European,' or (in S. India) 'Portuguese'; and this would point perhaps to association with syphilis.

PARBUTTY, s. This is a name in parts of the Madras Presidency for a subordinate village officer, a writer under the name of the patel, sometimes the village-crier, &c., also in some places a superintendant or manager. It is a corruption of Telug. and Canarese parapatti, parapattu, Mahr. and Konkani, parputya, from Skt. pravritti, 'employment.' The term frequently occurs in old Port. documents in such forms as perpotin, &c. We presume that the Great Duke (audax omnia perpeti!) has used it in the Anglicised form at the head of this article; for though we cannot find it in his Despatches, Gurwood's Explanation of Indian Terms gives "Parbutty, writer to the Patell." [See below.]

Port. Orient, fasc. 4.

1800.—"In case of failure in the payment of these instalments, the crops are seized, and sold by the Parputty or accountant of the division."—Buchanan's Mysore, ii. 151-2. The word is elsewhere explained by Buchanan, as "the head person of a Hobly in Mysore." A Hobly [Canarese and Malayal. hobbi] is a sub-division of a talook (i. 270). [1803.—"Neither has any one a right to compel any of the inhabitants, much less the particular servants of the government, to attend him about the country, as the sorbahadar (see SOUBADAR) obliged the parputty and pateel (see PATEL) to do, running before his horse."—Wellington, Desp. i. 323. PARDAO, s. This was the popular name among the Portuguese of a gold coin from the native mints of Western...
PARDAO.

India, which entered largely into the early currency of Goa, and the name of which afterwards attached to a silver money of their own coinage, of constantly degenerating value.

There could hardly be a better word with which to associate some connected account of the coinage of Portuguese India, as the pardao runs through its whole history, and I give some space to the subject, not with any idea of weaving such a history, but in order to furnish a few connected notes on the subject, and to correct some flagrant errors of writers to whose works I naturally turned for help in such a special matter, with little result except that of being puzzled and misled, and having time occupied in satisfying myself regarding the errors alluded to. The subject is in itself a very difficult one, perplexed as it is by the rarity or inaccessibility of books dealing with it, by the excessive rarity (it would seem) of specimens, by the large use in the Portuguese settlements of a variety of native coins in addition to those from the Goa mint,* by the frequent shifting of nomenclature in the higher coins and constant degeneration of value in the coins that retained old names. I welcomed as a hopeful aid the appearance of Dr. Gerson D'Acunha's Contributions to the Study of Indo-Chinese Numismatics. But though these contributions afford some useful facts and references, on the whole, from the rarity with which they give data for the intrinsic value of the gold and silver coins, and from other defects, they seem to me to leave the subject in utter chaos. Nor are the notes which Mr. W. de G. Birch appends, in regard to monetary values, to his translation of Albuquerque, more to be commended. Indeed Dr. D'Acunha, when he goes astray, seems sometimes to have followed Mr. Birch.

The word pardao is a Portuguese (or perhaps an indigenous) corruption of Skt. pratapya, 'splendour, majesty,' &c., and was no doubt taken, as Dr. D'Acunha says, from the legend on some of the coins to which the name was applied, e.g. that of the Raja of Ikkeri in Canara: Sri Fratápa krishna-rāya.

A little doubt arises at first in determining to what coin the name pardao was originally attached. For in the two earliest occurrences of the word that we can quote—on the one hand Abdurrazzāk, the Envoy of Shāh Rukh, makes the partāb (or pardāo) half of the Varāhā ('boar,' so called from the Boar of Vishnu figured on some issues), hūna, or what we call pagoda;—whilst on the other hand, Ludovico Varthema's account seems to identify the pardao with the pagoda itself. And there can be no doubt that it was to the pagoda that the Portuguese, from the beginning of the 16th century, applied the name of pardao d'ouro. The money-tables which can be directly formed from the statements of Abdurrazzāk and Varthema respectively are as follows: *

<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>3 Jitals (copper) = 1 Tar (silver).</td>
<td>3 Cas (see CASH) = 1 Tare (silver).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6 Tars . . . = 1 Fanam (gold).</td>
<td>16 Tare . . . = 1 Fanam (gold).</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10 Fanams . . = 1 Partāb.</td>
<td>20 Fanams . . = 1 Pardao.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 Partābs . . = 1 Varāhā.</td>
<td>And the Pardao was a gold ducat, smaller than the seraphim (see XERAFINE) of Cairo (gold dinār), but thicker.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>

And the Varāhā weighed about 1 Mūṭkāl (see MISCELL), equivalent to 2 dinārs Köpek.

The question arises whether the varāhā of Abdurrazzāk was the double pagoda, of which there are some examples in the S. Indian coinage, and his partāb therefore the same as Varthema's, i.e. the pagoda itself; or whether his varāhā was the pagoda, and his partāb a half-pagoda. The weight which he assigns to the varāhā, "about one mūṭkāl," a weight which may be taken at 73 grs., does not well suit either one or the other. I find the mean weight of 27 different issues of the (single) hūna or pagoda, given in Prinsep's Tables, to be 43 grs., the maximum being 45 grs. And the fact that both the Envoy's varāha and the Italian traveller's pardao contain 20 fanams is a strong argument for their identity.*

* Antonio Nunez, "Contador da Casa del Rey novo Señor," who in 1554 compiled the Livro dos Pescos da Índia e asy Medidas e Monedas, says of Dias in particular: "The money here exhibit such variations and such differences, that it is impossible to write any thing certain about them; for every month, every 8 days indeed, they rise and fall in value, according to the money that enters the place" (p. 29).

* I invert the similar table given by Dr. Badger in his notes to Varthema.
PARDAO.

In further illustration that the pardao was recognised as a half hān or pagoda, we quote in a foot-note
"the old arithmetical tables in which accounts are still kept." in the south, which Sir Walter Elliot contributed to Mr. E. Thomas's excellent Chronicles of the Pathan Kings of Delhi, illustrated,
&c.†

Moreover, Dr. D'Acunha states that in the "New Conquests," or provinces annexed to Goa only about 100 years ago, "the accounts were kept until lately in sanvov and mizane pagodas, each of them being divided into 2 pratāps . . . ." &c. (p. 46, note).

As regards the value of the pardao d'ouro, when adopted into the Goa cur-currency by Alboquerque, Dr. D'Acunha tells us that it "was equivalent to 370 reis, or 1s. 6d.,† English." Yet he accepts the identity of this pardao d'ouro with the hān current in Western India, of which the Madras pagoda was till 1818 a living and unchanging representative, a coin which was, at the time of its abolition, the recognised equivalent of 3½ rupees, or 7 shillings.
And doubtless this, or a few pence more, was the intrinsic value of the pardao. Dr. D'Acunha in fact has made his calculation from the present value of the (imaginary) rei. Seeing that a milrei is now reckoned equal to a dollar, or 50d., we have a single rei = ½d., and 370 reis = 1s. 6d.
It seems not to have occurred to the author that the rei might have degenerated in value as well as every other denomination of money with which he has to do, every other in fact of which we can at this moment remember anything, except the pagoda,

From the Venetian sequin (content of pure gold 52·27 grs.
value 11l½d.) the value of the rei at 1½d. will be . . . . 264d.
From the Muzaffar Shahī mothr (weight 185 grs. value, if pure gold, 692·52d.) value of rei at 140 . . . . . 0·272d.
Mean value of rei in 1513 . . . 0·283d.
i.e. more than five times its present value.

Dr. D'Acunha himself informs us
(p. 56) that at the beginning of the 17th century the Venetian was worth 690 to 720 reis (mean 705 reis), whilst

* The issues of fanams, q.v., have been infinite; but they have not varied much in weight, though very greatly in alloy, and therefore in the number reckoned to a pagoda.
† 2 emílas = 1 dugla
2 duglas = 1 chavula (= the fanam or fanam), 2 chavulas = 1 hōna (= the pratapa, mādā,

India, p. 50.
‡ 360 reis is the equivalent in the authorities, so far as I know.

the Venetian sequin, and the dollar.*
Yet the fact of this degeneration everywhere strikes him in the face. Correa tells us that the cruzado which Albo-querque struck in 1510 was the just equivalent of 420 reis. It was in-dubitably the same as the cruzado of the mother country, and indeed A.
Nunez (1554) gives the same 420 reis as the equivalent of the cruzado d'ouro de Portugal, and that amount also for the Venetian sequin, and for the sultani or Egyptian gold dinār. Nunez adds that a gold coin of Cambay, which he calls Madrafaxao (q.v.), was worth 1260 to 1440 reis, according to variations in weight and exchange.
We have seen that this must have been the gold-mohr of Muzaffar-Shāh II. of Guzerat (1511-1526), the weight of which we learn from E. Thomas's book.

Even the pound sterling, since it represented a pound of silver sterlings, has come down to one-third of that value; but if the value of silver goes on dwindling as it has done lately, our pound might yet justify its name again!
I have remarked elsewhere:
"Everybody seems to be tickled at the notion that the Scotch Pound or Livre was only 20 pence.
Nobody finds it funny that the French or Italian Livre or Pound is only 20 halfpence or less!* I have not been able to trace how high the rei began, but the mohr entered life as a gold piece, equivalent to the Saracen mithkāl, and ended—† I calculate all gold values in this paper at those of the present English coinage.

Besides the gradual depreciation of the Portuguese rei, so prominently noticed in this paper, there was introduced in Goa a reduction of the rei locally below the rei of Portugal in the ratio of 15 to 8.
I do not know the history or understanding of the object of such a chafar, nor do I see that it affects the calculations in this article. In a table of values of coins current in Portuguese India, given in the Annales Meridionis of 1844, each coin is valued both in Reis of Goa and in Reis of Portugal, bearing the above ratio. My kind correspondent, Dr. J. N.
Fonseca, author of the capital History of Goa, tells me that this was introduced in the beginning of the 17th century, but that he has not found any document throwing light upon it. It is a matter quite apart from the secular depreciation of the rei.
the pagoda was worth 570 to 600 reis (mean 585 reis).

These statements, as we know the intrinsic value of the sequin, and the approximate value of the pagoda, enable us to calculate the value of the rei of about 1600 at ... 0.16d. Values of the medrei given in Milburn's Oriental Commerce, and in Kelly's Cambist, enable us to estimate it for the early years of the last century. We have then the progressive deterioration as follows:

- Value of rei in the beginning of the 16th century: ... 0.268d.
- Value of rei in the beginning of the 17th century: ... 0.16d.
- Value of rei in the beginning of the 18th century: ... 0.06 to 0.066d.
- Value of rei at present: ... 0.06d.

Yet Dr. D'Acunha has valued the coins of 1510, estimated in reis, at the rate of 1880. And Mr. Birch has done the same.*

The Portuguese themselves do not seem ever to have struck gold pardao or pagodas. The gold coin of Alboquerque's coinage (1510) was, we have seen, a cruzado (or manuel), and the next coinage in gold was by Garcia de Sá in 1548-9, who issued coins called San Thomé, worth 1000 reis, say about £1, 2s. 4d.; with halves and quarters of the same. Neither, according to D'Acunha, was there silver money of any importance coined at Goa from 1510 to 1550, and the coins then issued were silver San Thomés, called also pardoes (see PATACA). Nunez in his Tables (1554) does not mention these by either name, but mentions repeatedly pardao, which represented 5 silver tangas, or 300 reis, and these D'Acunha speaks of as silver coins. Nunez, as far as I can make out, does not speak of them as coins, but rather implies that in account so many tangas of silver were reckoned as a pardao. Later in the century, however, we learn from Babli (1580), Barrett * (1584), and Linschoten (1583-89), the principal currency of Goa consisted of a silver coin called xerafin (see XERA-FINE) and pardao-xerafin, which was worth 5 tangas, each of 60 reis. (So these had been from the beginning, and so they continued, as is usual in such cases. The scale of sub-multiples remains the same, whilst the value of the divisible coin diminishes. Eventually the lower denominations become infinitesimal, like the maravedis and the reis, and either vanish from memory, or survive only as denominations of account). The data, such as they are, allow us to calculate the pardao or xerafin at this time as worth 4s. 2d. to 4s. 6d.

A century later, Fryer's statement of equivalents (1676) enables us to use the stability of the Venetian sequin as a gauge; we then find the tanga gone down to 6d. and the pardao or xerafin to 2s. 6d. Thirty years later Lockyer (1711) tells us that one rupee was reckoned equal to 1½ perdo. Calculated by Firishita to have been paid by the Bábaunil King, about A.D. 1470, as the annual cost of a body of 500 horse, with the cost of a British corps of irregular horse of the same strength in Briggs's time (say about 1815). The Bábaunil charge was 350,000 Rs.; the British charge 219,000 Rs. A corps of the same strength would now cost the British Government, as near as I can calculate, 287,300 Rs.

The price of an Arab horse imported into India (then a great traffic) was in Marco Polo's time about three times what it was in our own, up to 1850.

The salary of the Governor at Goa, c. 1550, was 8000 cruzados, or nearly £1000 a year; and the salaries of the commandants of the fortresses of Goa, of Malacca, of Dio, and of Bassam, 600,000 reis, or about £600.

The salary of Ibn Batuta, when Judge of Delhi, about 1340, was 1000 silver tankas or dinars as he calls them (practically 1000 rupees) a month, which was in addition to an assignment of villages bringing in 5000 tankas a year. And yet he got into debt in a very few years to the tune of 55,000 tankas—say £5,500.

* Dr. D'Acunha has set this English traveller down to 1650, and introduces a quotation from him in illustration of the coinage of the latter period, in his quasi-historical notes, a new element in the confusion of his readers.

* Thus Alboquerque, returning to Europe in 1594, gives a "Moorish" pilot, who carried him by a new route, height from Cannanore to Mozambique, a buckishell of 50 cruzados; this is explained as £2— a mild munificence for such a feat. In truth it was nearly £24, the cruzado being about the same as the sequin (see l. p. 17).

The mint at Goa was farmed out by the same great man, after the conquest, for 600,000 reis, amounting, we are told, to £125. It was really £670 (iii. 41).

Alboquerque demands as ransom to spare Muscat, "10,000 xerafins of gold." And we are told by the translator that this ransom of a wealthy trading city like Muscat amounted to £25. The coin in question is the ashraf, or gold dinar, as much as, or more than the sequin in value, and the sum more than £5000 (l. p. 82).

In the note to the first of these cases it is said that the sequin is "a silver coin (formerly gold), now equivalent to 480 reis, or about 2s. English money, but probably worth much more relatively in the time of Alboquerque." "Much more relatively" means of course that the 2s. had much more purchasing power. This is a very common way of speaking, but it is often very fallaciously applied. The change in purchasing power in India generally till the beginning of last century was probably not great. There is a curious note by Gen. Briggs in his translation of Firishita, comparing the amount... ing the Surat Rupee, which may have been probably his standard, still by help of the Venetian (p. 262) at about 2s. 3d., the pardao would at this time be worth 1s. 6d. It must have depreciated still further by 1728, when the Goa mint began to strike rupees, with the effigy of Dom João V., and the half-rupee appropriated the denomination of pardao. And the half-rupee, till our own time, has continued to be so styled. I have found no later valuation of the Goa Rupee than that in Princeps's Tables (Thomas's ed. p. 55), the indications of which, taking the Company's Rupee at 2s., would make it 21d. The pardao therefore would represent a value of 10½d., and there we leave it.

[On this Mr. Whiteway writes: "Should it be intended to add a note to this, I would suggest that the remarks on coinage commencing at page 67 of my Rise of the Portuguese Power in India be examined, as although I have gone to Sir H. Yule for much, some papers are now accessible which he does not appear to have seen. There were two pardaos, the pardao d'ouro and the pardao de tanga, the former of 360 reis, the latter of 300. This is clear from the Foral of Goa of Dec. 18, 1758 (India Office MSS. Consellho Ultramarino), which passage is again quoted in a note to Fasc. 5 of the Archiv. Port. Orient. p. 326. Apparently patecoons were originally coined in value equal to the pardao d'ouro, though I say (p. 71) their value is not recorded. The patecoon was a silver coin, and when it was tampered with, it still remained of the nominal value of the pardao d'ouro, and this was the cause of the outcry and of the injury the people of Goa suffered. There were monies in Goa which I have not shown on p. 69. There was the tanga branca used in revenue accounts (see Nunez, p. 31), nearly but not quite double the ordinary tanga. This money of account was of 4 barganims (see BARGANY) each of 24 bazarucos (see BUDGROOK), that is rather over 111 reals. The whole question of coinage is difficult, because the coins were continually being tampered with. Every rular, and they were numerous in those days, stamped a piece of metal at his pleasure, and the trader had to calculate its value, unless as a subject of the ruler he was under compulsion."

144.—"In this country (Vijayanagar) they have three kinds of money, made of gold mixed with alloys: one called varakat, which about one mithkal, equivalent to two dinars kopkik; the second, which is called pertab, is the half of the first; the third, called junom, is equivalent in value to the tenth part of the last-mentioned coin. Of these different coins the junom is the most useful. . . ."—Abdurrazzak, in India in the XVth Cent. p. 26.

c. 1504-5; pubd. 1510.—"I departed from the city of Dabuli aforesaid, and went to another island, which . . . is called Goa (Goa) and which pays annually to the King of Dacan 19,000 gold ducats, called by them pardai. These pardai are smaller than the saraphim of Cairo, but thicker, and have two devils stamped on one side, and certain letters on the other."—Vartkema, pp. 115-116.

". . . . his money consists of a pardao, as I have said. He also coins a silver money called tare (see TARA), and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of these small ones of silver, there go sixteen to a fanom. . . ."—Ibid. p. 130.

1510.—"Meanwhile the Governor (Alboquerque) talked with certain of our people who were goldsmiths, and understood the alligation of gold and silver, and also with goldsmiths and money-changers of the country who were well acquainted with that business. There were in the country pardaos of gold, worth in gold 360 reis, and also a money of good silver which they call bapaynaa (see BARGANT) of the value of 2 vintens, and a money of copper which they call bazarucos (see BUDGROOK), of the value of 2 reis. Now all these the Governor sent to have weighed and assayed. And he caused to be made cruzados of their proper weight of 420 reis, on which he figured on one side the cross of Christ, and on the other a sphere, which was the device of the King Dom Manuel; and he ordered that this cruzado should pass in the place (Goa) for 480 reis, to prevent their being exported . . . and he ordered silver money to be struck which was of the value of a bargany; on this money he caused to be figured on one side a Greek A, and on the other side a sphere, and gave the coin the name of Espera; it was worth 2 vintens; also there were half esperas worth one vinten; and he made bazarucos of copper of the weight belonging to that coin, with the A and the sphere; and each bazaruc he divided into 4 coins which they called cepayquas (see SAPECA), and gave the bazarucos the name of loes. And in changing the cruzado into these smaller coins it was reckoned at 480 reis."—Correa, ii. 76-77.

1516.—"There are current here (in Batalca—see BATCUL) the pardaos, which are a gold coin of the kingdom, and it is worth here 360 reis, and there is another coin of silver, called dama, which is worth 20 reis. . . ."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. p. 293.

they are called horados."—Barboes, Lisbon ed.

mean the old pardao d'oro or golden pagoda, a sense which apparently had now become obsolete, but that in dealing in jewels, &c., it was usual to settle the price in pardaoes of 6 good tangas instead of 5 (as we give doctors guineas instead of pounds).
The actual pagodas of gold are also mentioned by Balbi, but these were worth, new ones 7½ and old ones 6 tangas of good money.

English, but I am sorry to say that I find it is a mere translation of the notes of Gasparo Balbi, who was at Goa in 1580. We learn from Balbi that there were at Goa tangas not only of good money worth 75 basaruchi, and of bad money worth 80 basaruchi, but also of another kind of bad money used in buying wood, worth only 50 basaruchi!

coyned in Goa. They have Saint Sebastian on the one side, and three or four arrows in a bundle on the other side, which is as much as three Testones, or three hundred Reias Portingall money, and riseth or falleth little lesse or more, according to the exchange.
There is a kind of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coined, but are so named only in telling, five Tangas is one Pardaw or Xeraphin, badde money, for you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde. . . . Wherefore when they buy and sell, they bargain for good or badde money," &c.—Linschoten, ch. 35; [Hak.
Soc. i. 211, and for another version see XERAPHINE].

"They have a kind of money called Pagodes which is of Gold, of two or three sortes, and are above 8 tangas in value. They are Indian and Heathenish money, with the feature of a Devil upon them, and therefore they are called Pagodes.
There is another kind of gold money, which is called Ventianers; some of Venice, and some of Turkish coin, and are commonly (worth) 2 Pardawe Xeraphins. There is yet another kind of golde called S. Thomas, because Saint Thomas is figure on them, and is worth about 7 and 8 Tangas: There are likewise Rialles of 8 which are brought from Portingall, and are Pardawes de Real.
. . . They are worth at their first coming out 436 Reyes of Portingall; and after are rayed by exchange, as they are sought for when men travell for China. . . .
They use in Goa in their buying and selling a certaine maner of reckoning or telling.
There are Pardawes Xeraphins, and those are silver. They name likewise Pardawes of Gold, and those are not in kinde or in coynye, but only so named in telling and reckoning:
for when they buy and sell Pearles, stones, gold, silver and horses, they name but so many Pardawes, and then you must understand that one Pardaw is sixe Tangas: but in other ware, when you make not your bargaine before hand, but plainly name Pardawes, they are Pardawes Xeraphins of 5 Tangas the peece. They use also to say a Pardaw of Lorins (see LARIN), and are five Lorins for every Pardaw. . . ."—Ibid.; [Hak. Soc. i. 187].

This extract is long, but it is the complete picture we know of the Goa currency.
We gather from the passage (including a part that we have omitted that in the latter part of the 16th century there were really no national coins there used intermediate between the basarueho, worth at this time 0·133d., and the pardao xerafin

worth 50d.* The vintons and tangas that were nominally interposed were mere names for certain quantities of basaruccos, or rather of reis represented by basaruccos. And our interpretation of the statement about paroas of gold in a note above is here expressly confirmed. [1599.—‘Perdaw.’ See under TAEI.]

c. 1620.—‘The gold coin, struck by the rūās of Bijanagar and Tiling, is called hān and partāb.’—Firishta, quoted by Quatrevivre, in Notices & Extra., xiv. 509.

1643.—‘. . . estant convenu de prix auec luy à sept perdos et demy par mois tant pour mon viure que pour le logis. . . .’—Moquet, 284.

PARELL, n.p. The name of a northern suburb of Bombay where stands the residence of the Governor. The statement in the Imperial Gazetteer that Mr. W. Hornby (1776) was the first Governor who took up his residence at Parell requires examination, as it appears to have been so occupied in Grose’s time. The 2nd edition of Grose, which we use, is dated 1772, but he appears to have left India about 1760. It seems probable that in the following passage Niebuhr speaks of 1763-4, the date of his stay at Bombay, but as the book was not published till 1774, this is not absolutely certain. Evidently Parell was occupied by the Governor long before 1776.

‘Les Jesuites avoient autrefois un beau couvent aupres du Village de Parell au milieu de l’isle, mais il y a deja plusieurs annees, qu’elle est devenue la maison de campagne du Gouverneur, et l’Eglise est actuellement une magnifique salle a manger et de danse, qu’on n’en trouve point de pareille en toutes les Indes.’—Niebuhr, Voyage, ii. 12.

[Mr. Douglas (Bombay and W. India. ii. 7, note) writes: ‘High up and outside the dining-room, and which was the chapel when Parell belonged to the Jesuits, is a plaque on which is printed: — ‘Built by Honourable Hornby, 1771.’’]

1554.—Parell is mentioned as one of 4 aldeas, ‘Parell, Varella, Varell, and Siva, attached to the Kasbath (Capabe)—see CUSBAH of Maim.’—Botelho, Tombo, 157, in Subsidios.

c. 1750-60. — ‘A place called Parell, where the Governor has a very agreeable country-house, which was originally a Romish chapel belonging to the Jesuits, but confiscated about the year 1719, for some foul practices against the English interest.’—Grose, i. 46; [1st ed. 1757, p. 72].

PARIAH, PARRIAR, &c., s.
a. The name of a low caste of Hindus in Southern India, constituting one of the most numerous castes, if not the most numerous, in the Tamil country. The word in its present shape means properly ‘a drummer.’ Tamil paraṉi is the large drum, beaten at certain festivals, and the hereditary beaters of it are called (sing.) paraṉiyar, (pl.) paraṉiyar. [Dr. Oppert’s theory (Oryg. Inhabitants, 32 seq.) that the word is a form of Phakarinya, ‘a mountaineer’ is not probable.] In the city of Madras this caste forms one fifth of the whole population, and from it come (unfortunately) most of the domestics in European service in that part of India. As with other castes low in caste-rank they are also low in habits, frequently eating carrion and other objectionable food, and addicted to drink. From their coming into contact with and under observation of Europeans, more habitually than any similar caste, the name Paria has come to be regarded as applicable to the whole body of the lowest castes, or even to denote out-castes or people without any caste. But this is hardly a correct use. There are several castes in the Tamil country considered to be lower than the Pariahs, e.g. the caste of shoemakers, and the lowest caste of washermen. And the Pariah deals out the same disparaging treatment to these that he himself receives from higher castes. The Pariahs ‘constitute a well-defined, distinct, ancient caste, which has ‘subdivisions’ of its own, its own peculiar usages, its own traditions, and its own jealousy of the encroachments of the castes which are above it and below it. They constitute, perhaps, the most numerous caste in the Tamil country. In the city of Madras they number 21 per cent. of the Hindu people.’—Bp. Caldwell, u. i., p. 545. Sir Walter Elliot, however, in the paper referred to further on includes under the term Paraṉiyar all the servile class not recognised by Hindus of caste as belonging to their community.

A very interesting, though not conclusive, discussion of the ethnological position of this class will be found in Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar (pp. 540-554). That scholar's deduction is, on the whole, that they are probably Dravidians, but he states, and recognises force in, arguments for believing that they may have descended from a race older in the country than the proper Dravidian, and reduced to slavery by the first Dravidians. This last is the view of Sir Walter Elliot, who adds a variety of interesting facts in its favour, in his paper on the Characteristics of the Population of South India.*

Thus, in the celebration of the Festival of the Village Goddess, prevalent all over Southern India, and of which a remarkable account is given in that paper, there occurs a sort of Saturnalia in which the Pariahs are the officiating priests, and there are several other customs which are most easily intelligible on the supposition that the Pariahs are the representatives of the earliest inhabitants and original masters of the soil. In a recent communication from this venerable man he writes: 'My brother (Col. C. Elliot, C.B.) found them at Raipur, to be an important and respectable class of cultivators. The Pariahs have a sacerdotal order amongst themselves.' [The view taken in the Madras Gloss. is that "they are distinctly Dravidian without fusion, as the Hinduized castes are Dravidian with fusion."]

The mistaken use of pariah, as synonymous with out-caste, has spread in English parlance over all India. Thus the lamented Prof. Blochmann, in his School Geography of India: "Outcasts are called pariahs." The name first became generally known in Europe through Sommervai's Travels (pub. in 1782, and soon after translated into English). In this work the Pariahs figure as the lowest of castes. The common use of the term is however probably due, in both France and England, to the appearance in the Abbé Raynal's famous Hist. Philosophique des Établissements dans les Indes, formerly read very widely in both countries, and yet more perhaps to its use in Bernardin de St. Pierre's preposterous though once popular tale, La Chevaîrière Indienne, whence too the misplaced halo of sentiment which reached its acme in the drama of Casimir Delavigne, and which still in some degree adheres to the name. It should be added that Mr. C. P. Brown says expressly: "The word Paria is unknown" (in our sense) "to all natives, unless as learned from us."

b. See PARIAH-DOG.

1516.—"There is another low sort of Gentiles, who live in desert places, called Parees. These likewise have no dealings with anybody, and are reckoned worse than the devils, and avoided by everybody; a man becomes contaminated by only looking at them, and is excommunicated. ... They live on the iume (iune, i.e. yams), which are like the root of invea or betate found in the West Indies, and on other roots and wild fruits."—Barbosa, in Ramiro, i. f. 310. The word in the Spanish version transl. by Lord Stanley of Alderley is Parent, in the Portuguese of the Lisbon Academy, Parees. So we are not quite sure that Parees is the proper reading, though this is probable.

1626.—"... The Parees are of worse estate."—(W. Methold, in) Pursha, Pilgrimage, 553.

... the worst wherof are the abhorred Piriaues ... they are in publike Justice the hateful executioners, and are the basest, most stinking, ill-favored people that I have seen."—Ibid. 998-9.

1648.—"... the servants of the factory even will not touch it (beef) when they put it on the table, nevertheless there is a caste called Pareyaes (they are the most contemned of all, so that if another Gentoo touches them, he is compelled to be dip't in the water) who eat it freely."—Van de Broecke, 82.

1672.—"The Parreers are the basest and vilest race (accustomed to remove dung and all uncleanness, and to eat all unclean meat, in a word a contemned and stinking vile people)."—Baldesius (Germ. ed.), 410.

1711.—"The Company allow two or three Peons to attend the Gate, and a Parrear Fellow to keep all clean."—Lockyer, 20.

... and there ... is such a resort of basket-makers, Scavengers, people that look after the buffaloes, and other Parrians, to drink Toddy, that all the Punch-houses in Madras have not half the noise in them." —Wheeler, ii. 125.

1717.—"... Barrier, or a sort of poor people that eat all sort of Flesh and other things, which others deem unclean." —Phillips, Account, &c., 127.

1726.—"As for the separate generations and sorts of people who embrace this religion, there are, according to what some folks say, only 4; but in our opinion they are 5 in number, viz.:

a. The Bramins.

b. The Settreas.

c. The Weynys or Veynysas.

d. The Sudras.

e. The Perias, whom the High-Dutch and Danes call Barriars." —Valentijn, Chron. 73.

1745.—"Les Parées... are regarded as gens de la plus vile condition, exclus de tous les honneurs et prérogatives. Jusqueslà qu'on ne saurait les souffrir, ni dans les Pagodes des Gentils, ni dans les Eglises des Desuites." —Norbert, i. 71.

1770.—"The fate of these unhappy wretches who are known on the coast of Coromandel by the name of Parias, is the same even in those countries where a foreign dominion has contributed to produce some little change in the ideas of the people." —Ragyal, Hist. &c., see ed. 1783, i. 63.

..." —An idol is placed in the centre of the building, so that the Parias who are not admitted into the temple may have a sight of it through the gates." —Ragyal (tr. 1777), i. p. 57.

1780.—"If you should ask a common cooly, or porter, what cast he is of, he will answer, 'the same as master, pariar-cast.' " —Munro's Narrative, 28-9.

1787.—"... I cannot persuade myself that it is judicious to admit Parias into battalions with men of respectable casts. ..." —Col. Fullarton's View of English Interests in India, 222.

1791.—"Le masalchi y courut pour allumer un flambeau; mais il revient un peu après, pris d'haleine, criant: 'N'approchez pas d'ici; il y a un Paria!' Aussitôt la troupe effrayée cria: 'Un Paria! Un Paria!' Le docteur, croyant que s'était quelque animal féroce, mit la main sur ses pistolets. 'Qu'est ce que qu'un Paria?' demanda-t-il à son porte-flambeau." —B. de St. Pierre, La Chauvière Indienne, 48.

1800.—"The Pariah, and other impure tribes, comprising what are called the Punchum Brandum, would be beaten, were they to attempt joining in a Procession of any of the gods of the Brahmins, or entering any of their temples." —Buchanan's Mysore, i. 20.

c. 1805-6. —"The Dubashes, then all powerful at Madras, threatened loss of cast and absolute destruction to any Brahmin who should dare to unveil the mysteries of their language to a Pariah Frengi. This reproach of Pariar is what we have tamely and strangely submitted to for a long time, when we might with a great facility have assumed the respectable character of Chatriya." —Letter of Legden, in Morton's Memoir, ed. 1819, p. lxvi.

1809. —"Another great obstacle to the reception of Christianity by the Hindoos, is the admission of the Parias in our Churches. ..." —Ed. Valentia, i. 246.

1821.—"It is on ce rivage une race flétire, Une race étrangère au sein de sa patrie. Sans abri protecteur, sans temple hospitalier, Abominable, impie, horrible au peuple entier.

Les Parias; le jour à regret les éclaire, La terre sur son sein porte acolère. Eh bien! mais je frémis; tu vas me fuir peut-être; Je suis un Paria. ..." —Casimir Delavigne, Le Paria, Acte 1. Sc. 1.

1843. —"The Christian Pariah, whom both sects curse, Does all the good he can and loves his brother." —Forster's Life of Dickens, ii. 31.

1873.—"The Tamils hire a Pariya (i.e. drummer) to perform the decapitation at their Badra Kali sacrifices." —Kittel, in Ind. Ant. ii. 170.

1878.—"L'hypothèse la plus vraisemblable, in tout cas la plus heureuse, est celle qui suppose que le nom propre et spécial de cette race [i.e. of the original race inhabiting the Deccan before contact with northern invaders] était le mot 'paria'; ce mot dont l'orthographe correcte est parieya, derivé de parēi, 'bruît, tambour, et à très-bien, pu avoir le sens de 'parleur, doux de la parole' (†) —Hoveseque and Vinson, Études de Linguistique, &c., Paris, 67.

1872.—"Fifiine, ordained from first to last, In body and in soul For one life-long debauch, The Pariah of the north, The European wantch." —Browning, Fifiine at the Fair.

Very good rhyme, but no reason. See under NAUTH.

The word seems also to have been adopted in Java, e.g.:

1860.—"We Europeans... often... stand far behind compared with the poor pariah." —Max Havelaar, ch. vii.
PARIAH-ARRACK, s. In the 17th and 18th centuries this was a name commonly given to the poisonous native spirit commonly sold to European soldiers and sailors. [See FOOL'S RACK.]

1871-72.—"The unwholesome liquor called Parrier-arrack. . . ."—Sir W. Langhorne, in Wheeler, iii. 422.

1711.—"The Tobacco, Beetle, and Pariar Arrack, on which such great profit arises, are all expended by the Inhabitants."—Lockyer, 13.

1754.—"I should be very glad to have your order to bring the ship up to Calcutta . . . as . . . the people cannot here have the opportunity of intoxicating and killing themselves with Pariar Arrack."—In Long, 51.

PARIAH-DOG, s. The common ownerless yellow dog, that frequents all inhabited places in the East, is universally so called by Europeans, no doubt from being a low-bred caste-less animal; often elliptically 'pariah' only.

1780.—". . . A species of the common cat, called a pariah-dog."—Munro, N. 1. p. 36.

1810.—"The nuisance may be kept circling for days, until forcibly removed, or until the pariah dogs swim in, and draw the carcase to the shore."—Williamson, 1. M. ii. 261.

1824.—"The other beggar was a Pariah dog, who sneaked down in much bodily fear to our bivouac."—Heber, ed. 1844. i. 79.

1875.—"Le Musulman qui va prier à la mosquée, maudit les parias hommes."—Rev. des Deux Mondes, April, 539.

[1883.—'Paraya Dogs are found in every street.'—T. V. Row, Man. of Tanjore Dist. 104.]

PARIAH-KITE, s. The commonest Indian kite, Milvus Govinda, Sykes, notable for its great numbers, and its impudence. "They are excessively bold and fearless, often snatching morsels off a dish en route from kitchen to hall, and even, according to Adams, seizing a fragment from a man's very mouth" (Jerdon). Compare quotation under BRAHMINY KITE.

[1880.—"I had often supposed that the scavenger or Pariah Kites (Milvus Govinda), which though generally to be seen about the tents, are not common in the jungles, must follow the camp for long distances, and today I had evidence that such was the case. . . ."—Ball, Jungle Life, 655.]

PARSEES, n.p. This name, which distinguishes the descendants of those emigrants of the old Persian stock, who left their native country, and retaining their Zoroastrian religion, settled in India to avoid Mahomedan persecution, is only the old form of the word for a Persian, viz., Parsi, which Arabic influences have in more modern times converted into Farsi. The Portuguese have used both Parse and Parsee. From the latter some of our old travellers have taken the form Perse; from the former doubtless we got Parsee. It is a curious example of the way in which different accidental mouldings of the same word come to denote entirely different ideas, that Persian, in this form, in Western India, means a Zoroastrian fire-worshipper, whilst Pathi (see PAN-THAY), a Burmese corruption of the same word, in Burma means a Mahomedan.

c. 1328.—"There be also other pagans, folk in this India who worship fire; they bury not their dead, neither do they burn them, but cast them into the midst of a certain roofless tower, and there expose them totally uncovered to the fowls of heaven. These believe in two First Principles, to wit, of Evil and of Good, of Darkness and of Light."—Friar Jordanus, 21.

1552.—"In any case he dismissed them with favour and hospitality, showing himself glad of the coming of such personages, and granting them protection for their ships as being (Parseos) Persians of the Kingdom of Ormuz."—Barros, i. viii. 9.

". . . especially after these were induced by the Persian and Guzerati Moors (Mouros, Parseos e Guzaretes) to be converted from heathen (Gentios) to the sect of Mahamed."—Ibid. ii. vi. 1.

[1563. — "There are other herb-sellers (mercedos de bolichas) called Cauris, and in the Kingdom of Cambay they call them Esparci, and we Portuguese call them Jews, but they are not, only Hindus who came from Persia, and have their own writing."—Garcia, p. 213.]

1616. — "There is one sect among the Gentiles, which neither burn nor interre their dead (they are called Parcees) who incirele pieces of ground with high stone walls, remote from houses or Road-ways, and therein lay their Carcasses, wrapped in Sheetes, thus having no other Tombes but the gorges of raunous Fowles."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1479.

1630. — "Whilst my observation was bestowed on such inquiry, I observed in the town of Surrat, the place where I resided, another Sect called the Persees. . . ."—Lord, Two Fornouique Sets.

1648. — "They (the Persians of India, i.e., Parsees) are in general a fast-gripping and avaricious nation (not unlike the Benjays and the Chinese), and very fraudulent in buying and selling." — Van Twist, 48.

1673. — "On this side of the Water are people of another Offspring than those we have yet mentioned, these be called Parseys . . . these are somewhat white, and I think nastier than the Gentuys. . ." — Fryer, 117.

"The Parsis, as they are called, are of the old Stock of the Persians, worship the Sun and Adore the Elements; are known only about Surat." — Ibid. p. 197.

1813. — "These writers at Bombay are generally called Purvoes; a faithful diligent class." — Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 156-157; [2nd ed. i. 100].

1833. — "Every native of India on the Bombay Establishment, who can write English, and is employed in any office, whether he be a Brahman, Goldsmith, Parwary, Portuguese, or of English descent, is styled a Purvoe, from several persons of a caste of Hindos termed Prabhae having been among the first employed as English writers at Bombay." — Macintosh on the Tribe of Rumootes, p. 77.

PASADOR. s. A marlin-spike. Sea-Hind., from Port. passador.— Roebuck.

PASEI, PACEM, n.p. The name of a Malay State near the N.E. point of Sumatra, at one time predominant in those regions, and reckoned, with Malacca and Majapahit (the capital of the Empire of Java), the three greatest cities of the Archipelago. It is apparently the Basma of Marco Polo, who visited the coast before Islam had gained a footing.

c. 1292. — "When you quit the kingdom of Ferlee you enter upon that of Basma. This also is an independent kingdom, and the people have a language of their own; but they are just like beasts, without laws or religion." — Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 9.

1511. — "Next day we departed with the plunder of the captured vessel, which also we had with us; we took our course forward until we reached another port in the same island Trapopana (Sumatra), which was called Pazzz; and anchoring in the said port we found at anchor there several junks and ships from divers parts." — Empe, p. 53.

1553. — "In the same manner he (Diogo Lopes) was received in the kingdom of Pacem . . . and as the King of Pedir had given him a cargo of pepper . . . he did not think well to go further . . . in case . . . they should give news of his coming at Malaca, those two ports of Pedir and Pacem being much frequented by a multitude of ships that go there for cargoes." — Barros, ii. 31.
1726.—"Next to this and close to the East-point of Sumatra is the once especially famous city Pasi (or Pacem), which in old times, next to Magapahit and Malakka, was one of the three greatest cities of the East . . . but now is only a poor open village with not more than 4 or 500 families, dwelling in poor bamboo cottages."—Valentijn, (v.) Sumatra, 10.

1727.—"And at Pissang, about 10 Leagues to the Westward of Diamond Point, there is a fine deep River, but not frequented, because of the treachery and bloody disposition of the Natives."—A. Hamilton, ii. 125; [ed. 1744].

PĀΤ, s. A can or pot. Sea-Hind, from English.—Ikebuck.

PATACA, PATACOON, s. Ital. pataco; Provenc. patuc; Port. pataca and patacão; also used in Malayalam. A. term, formerly much diffused, for a dollar or piece of eight. Littre connects it with an old French word pottard, a kind of coin, "du reste, origine incon nue." But he appears to have overlooked the explanation indicated by Volney (Voyage en Egypte, &c., ch. ix. note) that the name abāṭaka (or corruptly bāṭaka, see also Dozy & Eng, s.v.) was given by the Arabs to certain coins of this kind with a scutcheon on the reverse, the term meaning "father of the window, or niche"; the scutcheon being taken for such an object. Similarly, the pillar-dollars are called in modern Egypt abā medja', 'father of a cannon'; and the Maria Theresa dollar abā tēra, 'father of the bird.' But on the Red Sea, where only the coinage of one particular year (or the modern imitation thereof, still struck at Trieste from the old die), is accepted, it is abā nukāt, 'father of dots,' from certain little points which mark the right issue.

[1528.—"Each of the men engaged in the attack on Purakat received no less than 800 gold Pattaks (ducats) as his share."—Logan, Malabar, i. 329.

PATCH, s. "Thin pieces of cloth at Madras" (Indian Vocabulary, 1788). Wilson gives patch as a vulgar abbreviation for Telug. pachčhadamu, 'a particular kind of cotton cloth, generally 24 cubits long and 2 broad; two cloths joined together.'

[1667.—"Pray if can procure a good Pallenkeen bambo and 2 patch of ye finest with what colours you think handsome for my own wear, chockoles and susaes (see SōSIE)."—In Yale, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cdxi.]

PATCHARÉE, PATCHERRY, PARCHERRY, s. In the Bengal Presidency, before the general construction of 'married quarters' by Government, patcharée was the name applied in European corps to the cottages which used to form the quarters of married soldiers. The origin of the word is obscure, and it has been suggested that it was a corruption of Hind. pichchʰärɪ, 'the rear,' because these cottages were in rear of the barracks. But we think it most likely that the word was brought, with many other terms peculiar to the British soldier in India, from Madras, and is identical with a term in use there, parcherry or patcherry, which represents the Tam. pārachšírї, paraipeřɪ, 'a Pariah village,' or rather the quarter or outskirts of a town or village where the Pariahs reside. Mr. Whitworth (s.v. Patcherry) says that "in some native regiments the term denotes the married sepoys' quarters, possibly because Pariah sepoys had their families with them, while the higher castes left them at home." He does not say whether Bombay or Madras sepoys are in question. But in any case what he states confirm the origin ascribed to the Bengal Presidency term Patcharée.

1878.—"During the greater portion of the year extra working gangs of scavengers were kept for the sole purpose of going from Parcherry to Parcherry and cleaning them."—Report of Madras Municipality, p. 24.

1880.—"Experience obtained in Madras some years ago with reconstructed parcherries, and their effect on health, might be imitated possibly with advantage in Calcutta."—Report by Army Sanitary Commission.

PATCHOULI, PATCH-LEAF, also PUTCH and PUTFCHA-LEAF, s. In Beng. pachapāt; Deccani Hind, pacholi. The latter are trade names of the dried leaves of a labiate plant allied to mint (Pogostemon patchouly, Pelletier). It is supposed to be a cultivated variety of Pogostemon Heyneanus, Bentham, a native of the Deccan. It is grown in native gardens throughout India, Ceylon, and the Malay Islands, and the dried flowering spikes and leaves of the plant, which are used, are sold in every bazaar in Hindustan. The pacha-pât is used as an ingredient in tobacco for smoking, as hair-scent by women, and especially for stuffing mattresses and laying among clothes as we use lavender. In a fluid form patchouli was introduced into England in 1844, and soon became very fashionable as a perfume.

The origin of the word is a difficulty. The name is alleged in Drury, and in Forbes Watson's Nomenclature to be Bengali. Littre says the word patchouli is patchey-ely, 'feuille de patchey'; in what language we know not; perhaps it is from Tamil pachcha, 'green,' and ḣël, hūm, an aromatic perfume for the hair. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tamil parçiil, paṟṟi, 'green,' ḣël, 'leaf.']

Pateca, s. This word is used by the Portuguese in India for a water-melon (Citrullus vulgaris, Schrader; Cucurbita Citrullus, L.). It is from the Ar. al-battākh or al-bītākh. E. Johnson gives this 'a melon,' musk-melon. A pumpkin; a cucurbitaceous plant.' We presume that this is not merely the too common dictionary looseness, for the chaos of cucurbitaceous nomenclature, both vulgar and scientific, is universal (see A. de Candolle, Origine des Plantes cultivées). In Lane's Modern Egyptians (ed. 1837, i. 200) the word buttekh is rendered explicitly 'water-melon.' We have also in Spanish alhadeca, which is given by Dozy and Eng. as 'espèce de melon'; and we have French pâstèque, which we believe always means a water-melon. De Candolle seems to have no doubt that the water-melon was cultivated in ancient Egypt, and believes it to have been introduced into the Graeco-Roman world about the beginning of our era; whilst Heln carries it to Persia from India, 'whether at the time of the Arabian or of the Mongol domination, (and then) to Greece, through the medium of the Turks, and to Russia, through that of the Tartar States of Astrakan and Kazan.'

The name pateca, looking to the existence of the same word in Spanish, we should have supposed to have been Portuguese long before the Portuguese establishment in India; yet the whole of what is said by Garcia de Orta is inconsistent with this. In his Colloquio XXXVI the gist of the dialogue is that his visitor from Europe, Ruano, tells how he had seen what seemed a most beautiful melon, and how Garcia's housekeeper recommended it, but on trying it, it tasted only of mud instead of melon! Garcia then tells him that at Diu, and in the Bālāghāt, &c., he would find excellent melons with the flavour of the melons of Portugal but "those others which the Portuguese here in India call patecas are quite another thing—huge round or oval fruits, with black seeds—not sweet (doce) like the Portugal melons, but bland (suave), most juicy and cooling, excellent in bilious fevers, and congestions of the liver and kidneys, &c." Both name and thing are represented as novelties to Ruano. Garcia tells him also that the Arabs and Persians call it battie indi, i.e. melon of India (F. Johnson gives bītīṣh-i-kindi, the citrus); whilst in Persian hinduwāina is also a word for water-melon) but that the real Indian country name was (calangari Mahr. kālingar; [perhaps that known in the N.W.P. as kuliinda, 'a water-melon']). Ruano then refers to the budīcas of Castile of which he had heard, and queries if these were not the same as these Indian patecas, but Garcia says they are quite different. All this is curious as implying that the water-melon was strange to the Portuguese at that time (1563; see Colloquios, f. 141v. seqq.).

[A friend who has Burnell's copy of Garcia De Orta tells me that he finds a note in the writing of the former on batecc: "i.e. the Arabic term. As this is used all over India, water-melons must have been imported by the Mahomedans." I believe it to be a mistake that the word is in use... all over India. I do not think the word is ever used in Upper India, nor is it (in that same) in either Shakespeare or Fallon. [Platts gives: A. battikh, s.m. The melon (kharbaza); the water-melon, Cucurbita citrullus.] The most common word in the N.W.P. for a water-melon is Pers. tarbuz, whilst the musk-melon is Pers. kharbaza. And these words are so rendered from the Ain respectively by Blochmann (see his E.T. i. 60, "melons . . . water-melons," and the original i. 67, "kharbuz, . . . tarbuz"). But with the usual chaos already alluded to, we find both these words interpreted in F. Johnson as "water-melon." And according to Hehn the latter is called in the Slav tongues arbuza and in Mod. Greek καρπωτα, the first as well as the last probably from the Turkish karpuz, which has the same meaning, for this hard k is constantly dropped in modern pronunciation.—H. Y.]

We append a valuable note on this from Prof. Robertson-Smith:—

"(1) The classical form of the Ar. word is buttik. Battikh is a widely-spread vulgarism, indeed now, I fancy, universal, for I don't think I ever heard the first syllable pronounced with an  resemblant.

"(2) The term, according to the law-books, includes all kinds of melons (Lane); but practically it is applied (certainly at least in Syria and Egypt) almost exclusively to the water-melon, unless it has a limiting adjective. Thus "the wild buttik" is the colo-cynth, and with other adjectives it may be used of various cincinnitious fruits (see examples in Dozy's Suppl.).

"(6) The biblical form is ubahattik (e.g. Numbers xi. 5, where the E.V. has 'melons'). But this is only the 'water-melon'; for in the Mishna it is distinguished from the sweet melon, the latter being named by a mere transcription in Hebrew letters of the Greek μηλοτήτων. Löw justly concludes that the Palestinians (and the Syrians, for their name only differs slightly) got the sweet melon from the Greeks, whilst for the water-melon they have an old and probably true Semitic word. For buttik Syriac has pattik, indicating that in literary Arabic the a has been changed to i, only to agree with rules of grammar. Thus popular pronunciation seems always to have kept the old form, as popular usage seems always to have used the word mainly in its old specific meaning. The Bible and the Mishna suffice to refute Hehn's view (of the introduction of the water-melon from India). Old Kimhi, in his Nchief Mikkol, illustrates the Hebrew word by the Spanish budicas."

1598.—". . . ther is an other sort like Melons, called Patecas or Angurius, or Melons of India, which are outwardlie of a darke greene colour; inwardlie white with blacke kernels; they are verie waterish and hard to byte, and so moyst, that as a man eateth them his mouth is full of water, but yet verie sweet and verie cold and fresh meat, whereforone of them are eaten after dinner to coole men."—Linschoten, 97; [Hak. Soc. ii. 35].

c. 1610.—"Toute la campagne est couverte d'arbres fruitiers ... et d'arbres de coton, de quantité de melons et de pateques, qui sont espèce de citrouilles de prodigieuse grosseur. . . ."—Pyrard de Laval, ed. 1673, f. 286; [Hak. Soc. i. 399, and see i. 33].

A few pages later the word is written Pastiques.—Ibid. 301; [Hak. Soc. i. 417].

[1663.—"Pateques, or water-melons, are in great abundance nearly the whole year round: but those of Delhi are soft, without colour or sweetness. If this fruit be ever found good, it is among the wealthy people, who import the seed and cultivate it with much care and expense."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 250.]

1673.—"From hence (Elephanta) we sailed to the Patachoes, a Garden of Melons (Putacho being a Melon) were there not wild Rats that hinder their growth, and so to Bambain."—Fryer, 76.

PATEL, POTAIL. s. The headman of a village, having general control of village affairs, and forming the medium of communication with the officers of Government. In Mahr. pāṭil, Hind. patel. The most probable etym. seems to be from pat, Mahr. 'a roll or register,' Skt.—Hind. patta. The title is more particularly current in territories that are or have been subject to the Mahrattas, "and appears to be an essentially Marathi word, being used as a respectful title in addressing one of that nation, or a Sūdra in general" (Wilson). The office is hereditary, and is often held under a Government grant. The title is not used in the Gangetic Provinces, but besides its use in Central and W. India it has been commonly employed in S. India, probably as a Hindustani word, though Monigar (see MONEGAR) (Maniyakaram), adhiyakari (see ADIGAR), &c., are appropriate synonyms in Tamil and Malabar districts.

[1535.—“The Tanadara began to come in and give in their submission, bringing with them all the patels (patels) and renters with their payments, which they paid to the Governor, who ordered fresh records to be prepared.”—Conto, Doc. IV. Bk. ix. ch. 2 (description of the commencement of Portuguese rule in Bassein).

[1614.—“I perceive that you are troubled with a bad commodity, wherein the desert of Patell and the rest appear.”—Foster, Letters, ii. 281.]

1804.—“The Patel of Beitculgaum, in the usual style of a Mahratta patel, keeps a band of plunderers for his own profit and advantage. You will inform him that if he does not pay for the horses, bullocks, and articles plundered, he shall be hanged also.”—Wellington, March 27.

1809.—“... Patells, or headmen.”—Lord Valentia, i. 415.

1814.—“At the settling of the jumma-bunder, they pay their proportion of the village assessment to government, and then dispose of their grain, cotton, and fruit, without being accountable to the patell.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 418; [2nd ed. ii. 44].

1819.—“The present system of Police, as far as relates to the villagers may easily be kept up; but I doubt whether it is enough that the village establishment be maintained, and the whole put under the Mandlutdar. The Potail’s representability and influence in the village must be kept up.”—Elphinstone, in Life, ii. 81.

1820.—“The Patal holds his office direct of Government, under a written obligation ... which specifies his duties, his rank, and the ceremonies of respect he is entitled to; and his perquisites, and the quantity of freehold land allotted to him as wages.”—T. Coats, in Tr. Bo. Lit. Soc. iii. 189.

1823.—“The head of the family ... have purchased the office of Patail, or headman.”—McAulfo, Central India, i. 99.

1828.—“The potail offered me a room in his own house, and I very thankfully accepted it.”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1877, p. 241; [ed. 1879, ii. 45].

1831.—“This affected humility was in fact one great means of effecting his elevation. When at Poona he (Madhajee Sindeo) ... instead of arrogating any exalted title, would only suffer himself to be called Pateil. ...”—Fraser, Ill. Mem. of Skinner, i. 33.

1870.—“The Patail accounted for the revenue collections, receiving the perquisites and percentages, which were the accustomed dues of the office.”—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 163.

PATNA, n.p. The chief city of Bahar; and the representative of the Paliobhuga (Pataliputra) of the Greeks. Hind. Pattana, “the city.” [See quotation from D’Anville under ALLAHABAD.]

1586.—“From Bannaras I went to Patenaw down the river of Ganges. Patenaw is a very long and a great town. In times past it was a kingdom, but now it is vnder Zelabidim Echebar, the great Mogor. ... In this town there is a trade of cotton, and cloth of cotton, much sugar, which they carry from hence to Bengal and India, very much Opium, and other commodities.”—R. Fich, in Hakl. ii. 388.

1616.—“Bengalo, a most spacious and fruitful Province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large Provinces within it, Purub (see POORUB) and Patan, the one lying on the east, and the other on the west side of the River Ganges.”—Terry, ed. 1605, p. 357.

[1650.—“Patna is one of the largest towns in India, on the margin of the Ganges, on its western side, and it is not less than two coss in length.”—Taucerter, ed. Boll. i. 121 seq.]

1673.—“Sir William Langham ... is Superintendent over all the Factories on the coast of Coronadul, as far as the Bay of Bengal, and up Hugly River ... viz. Fort St. George, alias Madura, Petipooles, Mechtpataun, Gundore, Medapollon, Balasore, Bengalo, Hugly, Castle Bazar, Pattanaw.”—Fryer, 38.

1726.—“If you go higher up the Ganges to the N. W. you come to the great and famous trading city of Pattena, capital of the Kingdom of Bahar, and the residence of the Vice-roy.”—Valentinij, v. 164.

1727.—“Patana is the next Town frequented by Europeans ... for Saltpetre and raw Silk. It produces also so much Opium, that it serves all the Countries in India with that commodity.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 21; [ed. 1744].

PATOLA, s. Canarese and Malayal. pattula, ‘a silk-cloth.’ In the fourth quotation it is rather misapplied to the Ceylon dress (see COMBOY).

1516.—“Coloured cottons and silks which the Indians call patola.”—Barbosa, 184.

1552.—“... Patolos of silk, which are cloths made at Cambaya that are highly prized at Malaca.”—Correa, Ledas, ii. 2, 714.

1545.—“... homens ... enhachados com patolas de seda.”—Pinto, ch. clx. (Cogan, p. 219).

1552.—“They go naked from the waist upwards, and below it they are clothed with silk and cotton which they call patolas.”—Castanheira, ii. 78.

[1605.—“Pattala.”—Birdwood, Letter Book, 74.]

1614.—“... Patollas. ...”—Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.
PATTAMAR, PATIMAR, &c.
This word has two senses:

a. A foot-runner, a courier. In this use the word occurs only in the older writers, especially Portuguese.

b. A kind of lateen-rigged ship, with one, two, or three masts, common on the west coast. This sense seems to be comparatively modern. In both senses the word is perhaps the Konkani pathmar, 'a courier.' C. P. Brown, however, says that patta-mar, applied to a vessel, is Malayal. signifying "goose-wing." Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. gives both patemarī and pheate-marī for "a sort of swift-sailing vessel, a pattamar," with the etym. "tidings-bringer." Patta is 'tidings,' but the second part of the word so derived is not clear. Sir. J. M. Campbell, who is very accurate, in the Bo. Gazetteer writes of the vessel as pathmarā, though identifying, as we have done, both uses with pathmarē, 'courier.' The Moslem, he says, write pheatemarī quasi fath-marā, 'snake of victory' (†).

1552.—"... But Lorenzo de Brito, seeing things come to such a pass that certain Captains of the King (of Cannanor) with troops chased him to the gates, he wrote to the Viceroy of the position in which he was by Pattamares, who are men that make great journeys by land."—De Barros, II. i. 5.

The word occurs repeatedly in Correos, Lendas, e.g. III. i. 108, 149, &c.

1598.—"... There are others that are called Pattamares, which servie onlie for Messengers or Posts, to carie letters from place to place by land in winter-time when men cannot travaile by sea."—Linschoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 260, and see ii. 165.]

1606.—"The sight and twentieth, a Pattamar told that the Governor was a friend to us only in shew, wishing the Portugalls in our roome; for we did no good in the Country, but brought Wares which they were forced to buy. . . ."—Roger Haves, in Purchas, i. 605.

1616.—"The Pattamar (for so in this country they call poor footmen that are letter-bearers). . . ."—Foster, Letters, iv. 227.

1666.—"Tranquebar, qui est elogné de Saint Thome de cinq journées d'un Courier à pie, qu'on appelle Pattamar."—Thevenot, v. 275.

1673.—"After a month's Stay here a Pattamar (a Foot Post) from Fort St. George made us sensible of the Dutch being gone from thence to Ceylon."—Fryer, 36.

1684.—"The Pattamars that went to Codaloor by reason of the deepness of the Rivers were forced to Return. . . ."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 133.

1705.—"Un Patemare qui est un homme du Pays; c'est ce que nous appelons un expre's . . ."—Laullier, 43.

1758.—"Yesterday returned a Pattamar or express to our Jew merchant from Aleppo, by the way of the Desert. . . ."—Ives, 287.

1760.—"... Between Bombay and Surat there is a constant intercourse preserved, not only by sea . . . but by Pattamars, or foot-messengers overland."—Grose, i. 119. This is the last instance we have met of the word in this sense, which is now quite unknown to Englishmen.

b.—

1600.—"... Escrevia que hum barco pequeno, dos que chamam pattamares, so meteria. . . ."—Luvena, Vida do P. F. Xavier, 185.

1822.—"About 12 o'clock on the same night they embarked in Paddimars for Cochin."—Wallace, Fifteen Years, 296.

1831.—A description of the Patamars, with a plate, is given in Mr. John Edye's paper on Indian coasting vessels, in vol. i. of the R. As. Soc. Journal.

1860.—"Among the vessels at anchor lie the dows (see DHOW) of the Arabs, the patemares of Mahbar, and the dhoneys (see DONEY) of Coromandel."—Tennent's Ceylon, ii. 103.

PATTELLO, PATELLEE. s. A large flat-bottomed boat on the Ganges; Hind. pattaī, also called in Sāran katārā, on which the boards forming the sides overlap and are not joined edge to edge, with an illustration (Bihar Peasant Life, 43.)
[1680.—“The Patella; the boats that come down from Patonnia with Saltpeeter or other goods, built of an Exceeding Strength and are very flat and burthensome.”—Yule, Hodges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 15.]

1685.—“We came to a great Godowne, where . . . this Nabob’s Son has laid in a vast quantity of Salt, here we found divers great Patellis taking in their lading for Patonnia.”—Ibid. Jan 6; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1860.—“The Putelee (or Kutorn), or Baggage-boat of Hindostan, is a very large, flat-bottomed, clinker-built, awkward-looking piece of rusticity of probably . . . about 35 toms burthen; but occasionally they may be met with double this size.”—Colesworthy Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 6.

PAULIST, n.p. The Jesuits were commonly so called in India because their houses in that country were formerly always dedicated to St. Paul, the great Missionary to the Heathen. They have given up this practice since their modern re-establishment in India. They are still called Paolotti in Italy, especially by those who don’t like them.

c. 1567.—“. . . e vi sono assai Chiiese dei padri di San Paulo i quali fanno in quei luoghi gran profitto in connettere quei popoli.”—Federici, in Rerum, iii. 390.

1623.—“I then went to the College of the Jesuit Fathers, the Church of which, like that at Daman, at Bassaim, and at almost all the other cities of the Portuguese in India, is called San Paolo; whence it happens that in India the said Fathers are known more commonly by the name of Paolisti than by that of Jesuits.”—P. della Valle, April 27; [iii. 135].

c. 1650.—“The Jesuits at Goa are known by the name of Paolisti; by reason that their great Church is dedicated to St. Paul. Nor do they wear Hats, or Corner-Caps, as in Europe, but only a certain Bonnet, resembling the Skull of a Hat without the Brims.”—Tavernier, E.T. 77; [ed. Ball, i. 197].

1672.—“There was found in the fortress of Cranganor a handsome convent, and Church of the Paolists, or disciples and followers of Ignatius Loyola. . . .”—Baldaeus, Germ., p. 110. In another passage this author says they were called Paolists because they were first sent to India by Pope Paul III. But this is not the correct reason.

1673.—“St. Paul’s was the first Monastery of the Jesuits in Goa, from whence they receive the name Paulistina.”—Fryer, 150.

[1710.—See quotation under COBRA DE CAPELLO.]

1760.—“The Jesuits, who are better known in India by the appellation of Paolists, from their head church and convent of St. Paul’s in Goa.”—Grose, i. 50.

PAUNCHWAY, s. A light kind of boat used on the rivers of Bengal; like a large dingy (q.v.), with a tilted roof of matting or thatch, a mast and four oars. Beng. pansi, and pansoi. [Mr. Grierson (Peasant Life, 43) describes the pansahi as a boat with a round bottom, but which goes in shallow water, and gives an illustration.]

[1757.—“He was then beckoning to his servant that stood in a Pansey above the Gait.”—A. Grant, Account of the Loss of Calcutta, ed. by Col. Temple, p. 7.]

c. 1760.—“Ponsways, Guard-boats.”—Grose (Glossary).

1780.—“The Paunchways are nearly of the same general construction (as budge-rows), with this difference, that the greatest breadth is somewhat further aft, and the stern lower.”—Hodges, 39-40.

1790.—“Mr. Bridgewater was driven out to sea in a common paunchaw, and when every hope forsook him the boat floated into the harbour of Masulipatam.”—Calcutta Monthly Review, i. 40.

1823.—“. . . A paunchway, or passage-boat . . . was a very characteristic and interesting vessel, large and broad, shaped like a snuffer-dish; a deck fore-and-aft, and the middle covered with a roof of palm-branches . . .”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 21.

1869.—“. . . You may suppose that I engage neither pinnae nor bujra (see BUDGEROW), but that comfort and economy are sufficiently obtained by hiring a small bholiya (see BOLIAH) . . . what is more likely at a fine weather season like this, a small native punsee, which, with a double set of hands, or four cars, is a lighter and much quicker boat.”—C. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 10 [with illustration].

PAWL, s. Hind. pal, [Skt. patala, ‘a root’]. A small tent with two light poles, and steep sloping sides; no walls, or ridge-pole. I believe the statement ‘no ridge-pole,’ is erroneous. It is difficult to derive from memory an exact definition of tents, and especially of the difference between pawl and shooldarry. A reference to India failed in getting a reply. The shooldarry is not essentially different from the pawl, but is trimmer, tauter, better closed, and sometimes has two flies. [The names of tents are used in various senses in different parts. The Madras Gloss. defines a pawl as “a small tent with two light poles, a ridge-bar, and steep sloping sides; the walls, if any, are very short, often not more than 6 inches high. Sometimes a second
It is a North Indian term, and is generally used for the combination of betel, areca-nut, lime, &c., which is politely offered (along with Otto of roses) to visitors, and which intimates the termination of the visit. This is more fully termed pawn-sooparie (supari, [Skt. supriya, 'pleasant,'] is Hind. for areca). "These leaves are not used to bee eaten alone, but because of their bitterness they are eaten with a certain kind of fruit, which the Malabars and Portugalls call Areeca, the Gusurates and Decavianis Suparijs..." (In Purchas, i. 1781).

1616.—"The King giving mee many good words, and two pieces of his Pawne out of his Dish, to eat of the same he was eating...

1673.—"...it is the only Indian entertainment, commonly called Pawn."—Fryer, p. 140.

1809.—"On our departure pawne and roses were presented, but we were spared the attar, which is every way detestable."—La. Valentia, i. 101.

PAWN, s. Hind. pāṁi, 'water.' The word is used extensively in Anglo-Indian compound names, such as bilayutee pawnee, 'soda-water,' brandy-pawnee, Klush-bo pawnee (for European scents), &c., &c. An old friend, Gen. J. T. Boileau, R.E. (Bengal), contributes from memory the following Hindi ode to Water, on the Pindaric theme ἀργος μὲν ὕδωρ, or the Thaletic one ἀρχη δὲ τῶν πάντων ὕδωρ!

"Pāṁi kūā, pāṁi tāl;
Pāṁi āṭā, pāṁi dāl;
Pāṁi bāgh, pāṁi ramāṇ;
Pāṁi Gāṅgā, pāṁi Jumāṇa; Pāṁi haṁstā, pāṁi rotā;
Pāṁi jagāṭ, pāṁi sotā;
Pāṁi bāp, pāṁi mā;
Barā nām Pāṁi kā!"

Thus rudely done into English:

"Thou, Water, stor'st our Wells and Tanks, Thou fillest Gunga's, Jumna's banks;
Thou Water, sendest daily food,
And fruit and flowers and needful wood;
Thou, Water, laugh'st, thou, Water, weepest;
Thou, Water, wak'st, thou, Water, sleepest;
—Father, Mother, in thee blent,— Hail, O glorious element!"
PAWNEE, KALLA. 690  PEDIR.

PAWNEE, KALLA. s. Hind. kālā pānī, i.e. 'Black Water'; the name of dread by which natives of the interior of India designate the Sea, with especial reference to a voyage across it, and to transportation to penal settlements beyond it. "Hindu servants and sepoys used to object to cross the Indus, and called that the kālā pānī. I think they used to assert that they lost caste by crossing it, which might have induced them to call it by the same name as the ocean,—or possibly they believed it to be part of the river that flows round the world, or the country beyond it to be outside the limits of Aryavarta" (Note by Lt.-Col. J. M. Trotter).

1823.—"An agent of mine, who was for some days with Cheetoo" (a famous Pindāri leader), "told me he raved continually about Kala Panee, and that one of his followers assured him when the Pindarry chief slept, he used in his dreams to repeat these dreaded words aloud."—Sir J. Malcolm, Central Indic (2nd ed.), i. 446.

1838.—"Kala Pany, dark water, in allusion to the Ocean, is the term used by the Natives to express transportation. Those in the interior picture the place to be an island of a very dreadful description, and full of malevolent beings, and covered with snakes and other vile and dangerous nondescript animals."—Mackintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoosees, 44.

PAYEN-GHAUT, n.p. The country on the coast below the Ghauts or passes leading up to the table-land of the Deccan. It was applied usually on the west coast, but the expression Carnatic Payen-ghait is also pretty frequent, as applied to the low country of Madras on the east side of the Peninsula, from Hind. and Mahr. ghait, combined with Pers. pāānī, 'below.' [It is generally used as equivalent to Talaghāt, "but some Musalmans seem to draw the distinction that the Payinghāt is nearer to the foot of the Ghāts than the Talaghāt" (Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 388).]

1629-30.—"But (Azam Khān) found that the enemy having placed their elephants and baggage in the fort of Dharūr, had the design of descending the Payinghāt."—Abdūl Hamid Lahori, in Elliot, vii. 17.

1784.—"Peace and friendship ... between the said Company and the Nabob Tippo Sultan Bahaudor, and their friends and allies, particularly including therein the Rajahs of Tanjore and Travencore, who are friends and allies to the English and the Carnatic Payen Ghaut."—Treaty of Mangalore, in Munro's Navv., 252.

1785.—"You write that the European taken prisoner in the Payen-ghait ... being skilled in the mortar practice, you propose converting him to the faith ... It is known (or understood)."—Letters of Tipoo, p. 12.

PAZEND, s. See for meaning of this term s.v. Pahlavi, in connection with Zend. (See also quotation from Maš'ūdī under latter.)

PECUL, PIKOL, s. Malay and Javanese pikul, 'a man's load.' It is applied as the Malay name of the Chinese weight of 100 katis (see CATTY), called by the Chinese themselves shík, and =133½ lb. approx. Another authority states that the shík is =412 kān or katis, whilst the 100 kān weight is called in Chinese tan.

1554.—"In China 1 tael weighs 7½ tanga; 1 tanga weighs 7½ tanga in silver, and 16 tael = 1 catē (see CATTY); 100 catēs = 1 pico = 45 tanga of silver weigh 1 mark, and therefore 1 pico = 133½ arratales (see BOTTLER)."—A. Nunes, 41.

And in China anything is sold and bought by cakes and picos and tael, provisions as well as all other things."—Ibid. 42.

[1616.—"The wood we have sold at divers prices from 24 to 28 mas per Picoll."—Foster, Letters, iv. 259.]

PEDIR, n.p. The name of a port and State of the north coast of Sumatra. Barros says that, before the establishment of Malacca, Pedir was the greatest and most famous of the States on that island. It is now a place of no consequence.

1498.—It is named as Pater in the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, but with very incorrect information. See p. 113.

1510.—"We took a junk and went towards Sumatra, to a city called Pider. ... In this city there grows a great quantity of pepper, and of long pepper which is called Mulaga ... in this port there are laden with it every year 18 or 20 ships, all of which go to Cathai."—Varthema, 233.

1511.—"And having anchored before the said Pedir, the Captain General (Albuquerque) sent for me, and told me that I should go ashore to learn the disposition of the people ... and so I went ashore in the evening, the General thus sending me into a country of enemies,—people too whose vessels and goods we had seized, whose fathers, sons, and brothers we had killed; —into a country where even among themselves there is little justice, and treachery in plenty, still more as regards strangers; truly he acted as caring little what became of me! . . . The answer given me was this: that I should tell the Captain Major General that the city of Pedir had been held for a long time noble and great in trade . . . that its port was always free for every man to come and go in security . . . that they were men and not women, and that they could hold for no friend one who seized the ships visiting their harbours; and that if the General desired the King's friendship let him give back what he had seized, and then his people might come ashore to buy and sell."—Letter of Gio. da Empoli, in Archiv. Stor. Ital. 54.

1516.—"The Moors live in the seaports, and the Gentiles in the interior (of Sumatra). The principal kingdom of the Moors is called Pedir. Much very good pepper grows in it, which is not so strong or so fine as that of Malabar. Much silk is also grown there, but not so good as the silk of China."—Barbosa, 196.

1538.—"Furthermore I told him what course we usually held for the fishing of seed-pearl between Pello Tripho and Pello Quenina, which in time past were carried by the Balao to Pazem (see PASEI) and Pedir, and exchanged with the Turks of the Straights of Mozza, and the Ships of Judea (see JUDEA) for such Merchandise as they brought from Grand Cairo."—Pinto (in Cogan), 25.

1555.—"After the foundation of Malaca, and especially after our entrance to the Indies, the Kingdom of Pazem began to increase, and that of Pedir to wane. And its neighbour of Achem, which was then insignificant, is now the greatest of all, so vast are the vicissitudes in States of which men make so great account."—Burros, iii. v. 1.

1615.—"Articles exhibited against John Oxwicke. That since his being in Pededere 'he did not entreate' anything for Priaman and Tecoee, but only an answer to King James's letter. . . ."—Sainbury, i. 411.

PEENUS, s. Hind. pippala; a corruption of Eng. pinnace. A name applied to a class of budgerow rigged like a brig or brigantine, on the rivers of Bengal, for European use. Roebeck gives as the marine Hind. for pinnace, p'heenez. [The word has been adopted by natives in N. India as the name for a sort of palankin, such as that used by a bride.]

1784.—"For sale . . . a very handsome Pinnace Budgerow."—In Seton-Kerr, i. 45.

[1860.—"The Pinnace, the largest and handsomest, is perhaps more frequently a private than a hired boat—the property of the planter or merchant."—G. Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 4 (with an illustration).]

PEEPUL, s. Hind. pippala, Skt. pippala, Ficus religiosa, L.; one of the great fig-trees of India, which often occupies a prominent place in a village, or near a temple. The Pipal has a strong resemblance, in wood and foliage, to some common species of poplar, especially the aspen, and its leaves with their long footstalks quaver like those of that tree. This trembling is popularly attributed to spirits agitating each leaf. And hence probably the name of 'Devil's tree' given to it, according to Rheedee (Hort. Mal. i. 48), by Christians in Malabar. It is possible therefore that the name is identical with that of the poplar. Nothing would be more natural than that the Aryan immigrants, on first seeing this Indian tree, should give it the name of the poplar which they had known in more northern latitudes (popul-us, poppul, &c.). Indeed, in Kumão, a true sp. of poplar (Populus ciliata) is called by the people gar-pipal (qu. qhar, or 'house'-peepul? [or rather perhaps as another name for it is yahhari, from gir, girī, 'a mountain']).

Dr. Stewart also says of this Populus: "This tree grows to a large size, occasionally reaching 10 feet in girth, and from its leaves resembling those of the pipal . . . is frequently called by that name by plainmen" (Punjab Plants, p. 204). A young peepul was shown to one of the present writers in a garden at Palermo as populo della Indie. And the recognised name of the peepul in French books appears to be peuplier d'Inde. Col. Tod notices the resemblance (Rajasthan, i. 80), and it appears that Vahl called it Ficus populifolia. (See also Geograph. Magazine, ii. 50). In Balfour's Indian Cyclopaedia it is called by the same name in translation, 'the poplar-leaved Fig-tree.' We adduce these facts the more copiously perhaps because the suggestion of the identity of the names pippala and populus was somewhat scornfully rejected by a very learned scholar. The tree is peculiarly destructive to buildings, as birds drop the seeds in the joints of the masonry, which becomes thus penetrated by the spreading roots of the tree. This is alluded to in a quotation below. "I remember noticing among many Hindus, and especially among Hindutized Sikhs, that they often say Pipal ko jatā kūh (I am going to the Peepul Tree), to express 'I am going to say my prayers.'" (Lt.-Col. John Trotter.) (See BO-TREE.)

1806. — "Au sortir du village un pipal éleve sa tête majestueuse. . . . Sa nombreuse couronne étale l'entourage d'un loin sur la plaine, telle qu'une armée de géants qui entrelacent fraternellement leurs bras iniformes." — Hauthier, i. 149. This writer seems to mean a banyan. The peepul does not drop roots in that fashion.

1817. — "In the second ordeal, an excavation in the ground . . . is filled with a fire of pipal wood, into which the party must walk barefoot, proving his guilt if he is burned; his innocence, if he escapes unhurt." — Mill (quoting from Halhed), ed. 1830, i. 280.

1826. — "A little while after this he arose, and went to a Peepul-tree, a short way off, where he appeared busy about something, I could not well make out what." — Panduranga Hari, 26; [ed. 1873, i. 36, reading Peepal].

1836. — "It is not proper to allow the English, after they have made made war, and peace has been settled, to remain in the city. They are accustomed to act like the Peepul tree. Let not Younger Brother therefore allow the English to remain in his country." — Letter from Court of China to Court of Ava. See Yule, Mission to Ava, p. 265.

1834. — "Je ne puis passer sous silence deux beaux arbres . . . ce sont le peuplier d'Inde à larges feuilles, arbre repute sacré. . . ."—Pulloeoia, Siam, i. 140.

1861. —

". . . Yonder crown of umbrage hoar Shall shield her well; the Peepul whisper a dirge And Caryota drop her tearlike store Of beads; whilst over all slim Casuarine Points upwards, with her branchlets ever green, To that remaining Rest where Night and Tears are o'er." Barrackpore Park, 18th Nov. 1861.

PEER, s. Pers. pǐr, a Mahommedan Saint or Beatus. But the word is used elliptically for the tombs of such personages, the circumstance pertaining to them which chiefly creates notoriety or fame of sanctity; and it may be remarked that wali (or Wely as it is often written), Imámzada, Shāhīk, and Marabout (see ADJUTANT), are often used in the same elliptical way in Syria, Persia, Egypt, and Barbary respectively. We may add that Nābī (Prophet) is used in the same fashion.

[1623. — "Within the Mesquita (see MOSQUE) . . . is a kind of little Pyramid of Marble, and this they call Pir, that is old, which they say is equivalent to Holy; I imagine it the Sepulchre of some one of their Sect accounted such." — P. della Valle, Hâk. Soc. i. 68.]

1665. — "On the other side was the Garden and the chambers of the Mullahs, who with great convenience and delight spend their lives there under the shadow of the miraculous Sanctity of this Pire, which they are not wanting to celebrate: But as I am always very unhappy on such occasions, he did no Miracle that day upon any of the sick." — Bernier, 133; [ed. Constable, 415].

1673. — "Hard by this is a Poir, or Burying place of one of the Prophets, being a goodly monument." — Fryer, 240.

1869. — "Certains pirs sont tellement renommés, qu'ainsi qu'on le verra plus loin, le peuple a donné leurs noms aux mois lunaires où se trouvent placées les fêtes qu'on célèbre en leur honneur." — Garacln de Tassy, Rel. Musulm., p. 18.

The following are examples of the parallel use of the words named:

Wali:

1841. — "The highest part (of Hermon) crowned by the Wely, is towards the western end." — Robinson, Biblical Researches, iii. 173.

"In many of the villages of Syria the Traveller will observe small dome-covered buildings, with grated windows and surmounted by the crescent. These are the so-called Welis, mausoleum of saints, or tombs of sheikhs." — Baedeker's Egypt, Eng. ed. Pt. i. 150.

Imamzada:

1864. — "We rode on for three farsaks, or fourteen miles, more to another Imámzādah, called Kafsh-girā . . ." — Eastwick, Three Years' Residence in Persia, ii. 46.

1883. — "The few villages . . . have numerous walled gardens, with rows of poplar and willow-trees and stunted mulberries, and the inevitable Imamzadehs." — Col. Beresford Lovett's Itinerary Notes of Route Surveys in N. Persia in 1881 and 1882, Proc. R.O.S. (N.S.) v. 73.
Shaik:
1817.—"Near the ford (on Jordan), half a mile to the south, is a tomb called 'Sheik Daoud,' standing on an apparent round hill like a barrow."—Ibiny and Mangles, Travels in Egypt, &c., 304.

Nabi:
1556. — "Of all the points of interest about Jerusalem, none perhaps gains so much from an actual visit to Palestine as the lofty-peaked eminence which fills up the north-west corner of the table-land.... At present it bears the name of Nabi-Samuel, which is derived from the Mussulman tradition—now perpetuated by a mosque and tomb—that here lies buried the prophet Samuel."—Stanley's Palestine, 165.

PEGU, n.p. The name which we give to the Kingdom which formerly existed in the Delta of the Irrawaddi, to the city which was its capital, and to the British province which occupies its place. The Burmese name is Bayó. This name belongs to the Talaiag language, and is popularly alleged to mean 'conquered by stratagem,' to explain which a legend is given; but no doubt this is mere fancy. The form Pegu, as in many other cases of our geographical nomenclature, appears to come through the Malays, who call it Paigá. The first European mention that we know of is in Conti's narrative (c. 1440) where Poggio has Latinized it as Payuenia; but Fra Mauro, who probably derived this name, with much other new knowledge, from Conti, has in his great map (c. 1459) the exact Malay form Paigu. Nikitin (c. 1475) has, if we may depend on his translator into English, Pegu, as has Hieronymo de S. Stefano (1499). The Roteiro of Vasco da Gama (1498) has Pegio, and describes the land as Christian, a mistake arising no doubt from the use of the ambiguous term Kêfîr by his Mahomedan informants (see under CAFFER). Varthema (1510) has Pego, and Giov. da Empoli (1514) Pegu; Barbosa (1516) again Pegu; but Pegu is the usual Portuguese form, as in Barros, and so passed to us.

1514.—"Then there is Pegú, which is a populous and noble city, abounding in men and in horses, where are the true mines of línioni ('di línioni e perfetti rubini,' perhaps should be 'di buoni e perfetti') and perfect rubies, and these in great plenty; and they are fine men, tall and well limbed and stout; as of a race of giants. ..."—Empoli, 80.

[1516.—"Pegiu." (See under BURMA.)]
1541.—"Bagou." (See under PEKING.)
1542.—"... and for all the goods which came from any other ports and places, viz. from Peguu to the said Port of Malaqua, from the Island of Camatra and from within the Straits. ..."—Titolo of the Fortress and City of Malaqua, in Tombo, p. 105 in Subsidio.

1568.—"Concluido che non è in terra Re di possaia maggiore del Re di Peguá, per ciocie ha sotto di se venti Re di corona."

Ces. Federici, in Rauensio, iii. 394.

1572. — "Olha o reino Arracão, olha o assento De Pegú, que já monstros povoaram, Monstros filhos do teo ajuntamento D'huma mulher e hum cão, que sos se acharam."—Cámões, x. 122.

By Burton:

"Arracan-realm behold, behold the seat of Pegú peopled by a monster-breed; monsters that gendered meeting most unmeet of whelp and woman in the lonely wood. ..."

1597.—"... I recommend you to be very watchful not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegú nor yet from that of Achin (do Dachem); and with this view you should give orders that this be the subject of treatment with the King of Dachem since he shows so great a desire for our friendship, and is treating in that sense."—Despatch from the King to Gaw, 5th Feb. In Archiv. Port. Orient. Fasc. iii.

PEGU PONIES. These are in Madras sometimes termed elliptically Pegus, as Arab horses are universally termed Arabs. The ponies were much valued, and before the annexation of Pegu commonly imported into India; less commonly since, for the local demand absorbs them.
1880.—"For sale... also Bubble and Squeak, buy Pegues."—Madras Mail, Feb. 19.

[1890.—"Ponies, sometimes very good ones, were reared in a few districts in Upper Burma, but, even in Burmese times, the supply was from the Shan States. The so-called Pegu Pony, of which a good deal is heard, is, in fact, not a Pegu pony at all for the justly celebrated animals called by that name were imported from the Shan States."—Report of Capt. Evans, in Times, Oct. 17.]

PEKING.  u.p. This name means 'North-Court,' and in its present application dates from the early reigns of the Ming Dynasty in China. When they dethroned the Mongol descendants of Chinghiz and Kublai (1268) they removed the capital or Tartary, or Khanbaligh (Cambaluc) of Polo to the great city on the Yangtsze which has since been known as Nan-King or 'South-Court.' But before many years the Mongol capital was rehabilitated as the imperial residence, and became Pe-King accordingly. Its preparation for reoccupation began in 1409. The first English mention that we have met with is that quoted by Sainsbury, in which we have the subjects of more than one allusion in Milton.

1520.—"Thomè Pires, quitting this pass, arrived at the Province of Nanqui, at its chief city called by the same name, where the king dwelt, and spent in coming thither always travelling north, four months; by which you may take note how vast a matter is the empire of this gentle prince. He sent word to Thomè Pires that he was to wait for him at Pequi, where he would despatch his affair. This city is in another province so called, much further north, in which the King used to dwell for the most part, because it was on the frontier of the Tartars..."—Burros, Ill. vi. 1.

1541.—"This City of Pequin... is so prodigious, and the things therein so remarkable, as I do almost repent me for undertaking to discourse of it... For one must not imagine it to be, either as the City of Rome, or Constantinople, or Venice, or Paris, or London, or Seville, or Lisbon. Nay I will say further, that one must not think it to be like to Grand Cairo in Egypt, Tauris in Persia, Amadaba (Amabada, Avadaya) in Cambaluc, Einaugary in Mogao, Goura (Gouro) in Bengala, Ava in Chalen, Timplen in Cambodia, Martaban (Martavão) and Bagou in Pegu, Guimpel and Tinlen in Sammon, Odia in the Kingdom of Sornau, Passawan and Dema in the Island of Java, Pangor in the Country of the Lequins (no Lequiu) Usangoa (Uzâgni) in the Grand Cauchin, Laneama (Laçame) in Tartary, and Meaco (Mioco) in Japen..."—Pelicanus, s. This word, in its proper application to the Pelicanus onocrotalus, L., is in no respect peculiar to Anglo-India, though we may here observe that the bird is called in Hindi by the poetical name gayan-bher, i.e. 'Sheep of the Sky,' which we have heard natives with their strong propensity to metathesis convert into the equally appropriate Ganga-bheri or 'Sheep of the Ganges.' The name may be illustrated by the old term 'Cape-sheep' applied to the albatross. But Pelican is habitually misapplied by the British soldier in India to the bird usually called Adjudant (q.v.).

We may remember how Prof. Max Müller, in his Lectures on Language, tells us that the Tahitians show respect to their sovereign by ceasing to employ in common language those words which form part or the whole of his name, and invent new terms to supply their place. "The object was clearly to guard against the name of the sovereign being ever used, even by accident, in ordinary conversation."—2nd ser. 1864, p. 35. [Frazer, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 421 seqq.]. Now, by an analogous process, it is possible that

* "... great diversion is found... in firing balls at birds, particularly the albatross, a large species of the swan, commonly seen within two or three hundred miles around the Cape of Good Hope, and which the French call Montons (Montons) du Cap."—Munro's Narrative, 13. The confusion of genera here equals that mentioned in our articles above.
PENGUIN.

It is the stem of a miniature palm (Licuala acutifida, Griffith). The sticks are prepared by scraping the young stem with glass, so as to remove the epidermis and no more. The sticks are then straightened by fire and polished (Balfour). The name is popularly thought to have originated in a jocular supposition that law-suits in Penang were decided by the lex baculina. But there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of some native term, and pinang layor, 'wild area,' [or pinang layor, 'fire-dried areca,' which is suggested in N.E.D.], may almost be assumed to be the real name. [Dennys (Descr. Dict. s.v.) says from "Layor, a species of cane furnishing the sticks so named." But this is almost certainly wrong.]

1883.—(But the book—an excellent one—is without date—more shame to the Religious Tract Society which publishes it).—Next morning, taking my 'Penang lawyer' to defend myself from dogs . . .". The following note is added: "A Penang lawyer is a heavy walking-stick, supposed to be so called from its usefulness in settling disputes in Penang."—Gilmour, Among the Mongols, 14.

PENGUIN, s. Popular name of several species of birds belonging to the genera Aptenodytes and Spheniscus. We have not been able to ascertain the etymology of this name. It may be from the Port. pingue, 'fat.' See Littre. He quotes Clausius as picturing it, who says they were called a pinguedine. It is surely not that given by Sir Thomas Herbert in proof of the truth of the legend of Madoc's settlement in America; and which is indeed implied 60 years before by the narrator of Drake's voyage; though probably borrowed by Herbert direct from Selden.

1578.—"In these Islands we found greate relief and plenty of good victuals, for infinite were the number of fowle which the Welsh men named Penuin, and Magilanus tearmed them geese. . ."—Drake's Voyage, by F. Fletcher, Hak. Soc. p. 72.

1583.—"The pengwin described."—Hawkins, V. to S. Sea, p. 111, Hak. Soc.

1606.—"The Pengwines bee as bigge as our greatest Capons we have in England, they have no winges nor cannot flye . . . they bee exceeding fatte, but their flesh is very ranke. . ."—Middleton, f. B. 4.

1609.—"Nous trouvâmes beaucoup de Chîs de Mer, et Oyseaux qu'on appelle Penguyns, dont l'Escuell en estait quasi couvert."—Houtman, p. 4.

PENANG, n.p. This is the proper name of the Island adjoining the Peninsula of Malacca (Pulo, properly Pulo, Pinang), which on its cession to the English (1786) was named 'Prince of Wales's Island.' But this official style has again given way to the old name. Pinang in Malay signifies an areca-nut or areca-tree, and, according to Crawford, the name was given on account of the island's resemblance in form to the fruit of the tree (udu, 'the betel-nut').

1592.—"Now the winter coming ypon vs with much contagious weather, we directed our course from hence with the Islands of Pulo Pinang (where by the way is to be noted that Pulo in the Malayan tongue signifieth an Island) . . . where we came to an anker in a very good harborhood between three Islands. . . This place is in 6 degrees and a halfe to the Northward, and some fine leagues from the same between Malacca and Pegu."—Barker, in Hakl. ii. 589-590.

PENANG LAWYER, s. The popular name of a handsome and hard (but sometimes brittle) walking-stick, exported from Penang and Singapore.

some martinet, holding the office of adjutant, at an early date in the Anglo-Indian history, may have resented the ludicrously appropriate employment of the usual name of the bird, and so may have introduced the entirely inappropriate name of pelican in its place. It is in the recollection of one of the present writers that a worthy northern matron, who with her husband had risen from the ranks in the —th Light Dragoons, on being challenged for speaking of "the pelicans in the barrack-yard," maintained her correctness, conceding only that "some ca'd them paylicans, some ca'd them audjutants."

1529.—"This officer . . . on going round the yard (of the military prison) . . . discovered a large beef-bone recently dropped. The sergeant was called to account for this ominous appearance. This sergeant was a shrewd fellow, and he immediately said,—'Oh Sir, the pelicans have dropped it.' This was very plausible, for these birds will carry enormous bones; and frequently when fighting for them they drop them, so that this might very probably have been the case. The moment the dinner-trumpet sounds, whole flocks of these birds are in attendance at the barrack-doors, waiting for bones, or anything that the soldiers may be pleased to throw to them."—Mem. of John Shipp, ii. 25.
c. 1610.—"... le reste est tout couvert ... d' une quantité d'Oyseaux nommés pingui, qui font là leurs œufs et leurs petits, et il y en a une si prodigieuse qu'on ne saurait mettre ... le pied en quelque endroit que ce soit sans toucher."
—Pyrard de Laval, i. 73; [Hak. Soc. i. 97, also see i. 16].

1612.—"About the year C.I. C.LXX. Madoc brother to David ap Owen, prince of Wales, made this sea voyage (to Floride); and by probability these names of Capo de Briton in Normandy, and Pengwin an part of the Northern America, for a white rock, and a white-headed bird, according to the British, were relics of this discovery."—Selden, Notes on Drayton's Polybition, in Works (ed. 1726), iii. col. 1802.

1616.—"The Island called Pen-guin Island, probably so named by some Welshman, in whose Language Pen-guin signifies a white head; and there are many great lazy fowls upon, and about, this Island, with great cole-black bodies, and very white heads, called Penguins."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 334.

1638.—"... that this people (of the Mexican traditions) were Welsh rather than Spaniards or others, the Records of this Voyage writ by many Bards and Genealogists confirm it ... made more ortho-doxall by Welsh names given there to birds, rivers, rocks, beasts, &c., as ... Pengwyn, refer'd by them to a bird that has a white head. ..."—Herbert, Some Yearnes Travels, &c., p. 360.

Unfortunately for this etymology the head is precisely that part which seems in all species of the bird to be black! But M. Roulin, quoted by Littré, maintains the Welsh (or Breton) etymology, thinking the name was first given to some short-winged sea-bird with a white head, and then transferred to the penguin. And Terry, if to be depended on, supports this view. So Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict., s.v.): "In that case, it must first have been given to another bird, such as the auk (the puffin is common in Anglesey), since the penguin's head is black."

1674.—"So Horses they affirm to be Mere Engines made by Geometry, And were invented first from Engins, As Indian Britons were from Penguins."—Hudibras, Pt. I. Canto ii. 57.

[1689.—In Lombeck ducks "are very cheap and are largely consumed by the crews of the rice ships, by whom they are called Baly-soldiers, but are more generally known elsewhere as pengun-ducks."—Wallace, Malay Archip. ed. 1890, p. 135.]

PEON. s. This is a Portuguese word peão (Span. peon); from pe, 'foot,' and meaning a 'footman' (also a pawn at chess), and is not therefore a corruption, as has been alleged, of Hind. peýda, meaning the same; though the words are, of course ultimately akin in root. It was originally used in the sense of 'a foot-soldier'; thence as 'orderly' or messenger. The word Sepoy was used within our recollection, and perhaps is still, in the same sense in the city of Bombay. The transition of meaning comes out plainly in the quotation from Ives. In the sense of 'orderly, peon is the word usual in S. India, whilst chuprassy (q.v.) is more common in N. India, though peon is also used there. The word is likewise very generally employed for men of police service (see BURKUNDAUZE). [Mr. Skeat notes that Piyun is used in the Malay States, and Tambi or Tanby at Singapore]. The word had probably become unusual in Portugal by 1600; for Manoel Correa, an early commentator on the Usiads (d. 1612), thinks it necessary to explain píões by 'gente de pé.'

1593.—"The Camorym ordered the soldier (piao) to take the letter away, and strictly forbade him to say anything about his having seen it."—Correç. Lendas, i. 421.

1510.—"So the Sabayo, putting much trust in this (Rumi), made him captain within the city (Goa), and outside of it put under him a captain of his with two thousand soldiers (piaes) from the Balagate. ..."—Ibid. ii. i. 51.

1563.—"The pawn (piao) they call Piado, which is as much as to say a man who travels on foot."—Garcia, f. 37.

1575.—"O Rey de Badajos era alto Mouro Con quatro mil cavallos furiosos, Innumerous píoes, darmas e de ouro, Guarnecidos, guerrerios, e lustrosos,"—Camões, iii. 66.

By Burton:

"The King of Badajos was a Moslem bold, with horse four thousand, fierce and furious knights, and countless Peons, armed and dight with gold, whose polisht surface glanceth lustrohs light."

1609.—"The first of February the Capitaine departed with fiftie Peons. ..."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 421.

c. 1610.—"Les Pions marchent après le prisonnier, lié avec des cordes qu'ils tiennent."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 11; [Hak. Soc. ii. 17; also i. 428; 440; ii. 18].

[1616.—"This Shawbunder (see SHA-BUNDER) imperiously by a couple of Pyons commanded him from me."—Foster, Letters, iv. 351.]

c. 1630.—"The first of December, with some Pe-unes (or black Foot-boys, who can prattle some English) we rode (from Swally) to Surat."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 35.
to my agents as faithful an account of the produce as he would have done to myself.

—Hon. R. Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsay's, III. 77.

1842.— "... he was put under arrest for striking, and throwing into the Indies, an inoffensive Peon, who gave him no provocation, but who was obeying the orders he received from Captain ——. The Major General has heard it said that the supremacy of the British over the native must be maintained in India, and he entirely concurs in that opinion, but it must be maintained by justice."—Gen. Orders, &c., of Sir Ch. Napier, p. 72.

1873.—"Pandurang is by turns a servant to a shopkeeper, a Peon, or orderly, a groom to an English officer ... and eventually a pleader before an English Judge in a populous city."—Saturday Review, May 31, p. 728.

PEPPER, s. The original of this word, Skt. pippali, means not the ordinary pepper of commerce (‘black pepper’) but long pepper, and the Sanskrit name is still so applied in Bengal, where one of the long-pepper plants, which have been classed sometimes in a different genus (Chavica) from the black pepper, was at one time much cultivated. There is still indeed a considerable export of long pepper from Calcutta; and a kindred species grows in the Archipelago. Long pepper is mentioned by Pliny, as well as white and black pepper; the three varieties still known in trade, though with the kind of error that has persisted on such subjects till quite recently, he misapprehends their relation. The proportion of their ancient prices will be found in a quotation below.

The name must have been transferred by foreign traders to black pepper, the staple of export, at an early date, as will be seen from the quotations. Pippalinula, the root of long pepper, still a stimulant medicine in the native pharmacopoeia, is probably the πεπρισεως μίκα of the ancients (Roule, p. 86).

We may say here that Black pepper is the fruit of a perennial climbing shrub, Piper nigrum, L., indigenous in the forests of Malabar and Travancore, and thence introduced into the Malay countries, particularly Sumatra.

White pepper is prepared from the black by removing the dark outer layer of pericarp, thereby depriving it of a part of its pungency. It comes chiefly via Singapore from the Dutch settlement of Batavia, but a small quantity of fine quality comes from Telli-cherry in Malabar.

Long pepper is derived from two shrubby plants, Piper officinarum, C.D.C., a native of the Archipelago, and Piper longum, L., indigenous in Malabar, Ceylon, E. Bengal, Timor, and the Philippines. Long pepper is the fruit-spike gathered and dried when not quite ripe (Hanbury and Plückeiger, Pharmacographia). All these kinds of pepper were, as has been said, known to the ancients.

c. 70 A.D.—"The cornes or graines . . . lie in certaine little huskes or cods. . . . If that be plucked from the tree before they gape and open of themselves, they make that spice which is called Long pepper; but if as they do ripen, they cleave and chawne by little and little, they shew within the white pepper: which afterwards being parched in the Sunne, chaungeth colour and groweth blacke, and therewith riveded also. . . Long pepper is some sophisticated, with the servie or mustard seed of Alexandria: and a pound of it is worth fiftyn Roman deniers. The white coesteth seven deniers a pound, and the black is sold after four deniers by the pound."—Pliny, tr. by Phil. Holland, Bk. xii. ch. 7.

c. 80-90.—"And there come to these marts great ships, on account of the bulk and quantity of pepper and malabathrum . . .
The pepper is brought (to market) here, bearing produced largely only in one district near these marts, that which is called Ktotonarikë."—Periplus, § 56.

c. A.D. 100.—"The Pepper-tree (πιπερ δέντρον) is related to grow in India; it is short, and the fruit as it first puts forth it is long, resembling pods; and this long pepper has within it (grains) like small millet, which are what grow to be the perfect (black) pepper. At the proper season it opens and puts forth a cluster bearing the berries such as we know them. But those that are like unripe grapes, which constitute the white pepper, serve the best for eye-remedies, and for antidotes, and for theriacal potencies."— Dioscorides, Mat. Med. ii. 188.

c. 545.—"This is the pepper-tree" (there is a drawing). "Every plant of it is twined round some lofty forest tree, for it is weak and slim like the slender stems of the vine.
And every bunch of fruit has a double leaf as a shield; and it is very green, like the green of rue."—Cosmas, Book xi.

c. 870.—"The mariners say every bunch of pepper has over it a leaf that shelters it from the rain. When the rain ceases the leaf turns aside; if rain recommences the leaf again covers the fruit."— Ibn Khwarizmiah, 1166.—"The trees which bear this fruit are planted in the fields which surround the towns, and every one knows his plantation. The trees are small, and the pepper is originally white, but when they collect it they put it into basons and pour hot water upon it; it is then exposed to the heat of the sun, and dried . . . in the course of which process it becomes of a black colour."—Rabbi Benjamin, in Wright, p. 114.

e. 1350.—"L'albore che fa il pepe è fatto come l'elena che nasce su per gli muri.
Questo pepe sale su per gli arbord che l'uo-mini piantano a modo de l'elena, e sale sopra tutti li arbord piu alti. Questo pepe fa rami a modo dell' uve . . . e maturo si lo vende miano a modo de l' uve e poi pongono il pepe al sole a seccare come uve passe, e nulla altra cosa si fa del pepe."—Odoric, in Cathay, App. xlvii.

PERGUNNAHS, s. Hind. purguna [Skt. pragunan, 'to reckon up'], a subdivision of a 'District' (see ZILLAH).

e. 1500.—"The divisions into sādas (see SOUBA) and purganas, which are maintained to the present day in the province of Tatta, were made by these people" (the Samma Dynasty).—Târikh-i-Tâhirî, in Elliot,
i. 273.

1353.—"Item, from the three pragunas, fedeas."—S. Botelho, Tombo, 139.

[1614.—"I wrote him to stay in the Fregonas near Agra."—Foster, Letters, ii.
106.]

[1617.—"For that Muckshud had also newly answered he had mist his prigany."]

—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 415.]

1753.—"Masulipatnam . . . est capitale de ce qu'on appelle dans l'Inde un Sercar (see SIRCAR), qui comprend plusieurs Ferganes, ou districtes particuliers."— D'Avritôt, 132.

1812.—"A certain number of villages with a society thus organised, formed a pergunnah."—Fifth Report, 16.

PERGUNNAHS, THE TWENTY-FOUR, n.p. The official name of the District immediately adjoining and including, though not administratively including, Calcutta. The name is one of a character very ancient in India and the East. It was the original 'Zemindary of Calcutta' granted to the English Company by a 'Subadar's Perwana' in 1757-58. This grant was subsequently confirmed by the Great Mogul as an unconditional and rent-free jagheer (q.v.). The quotation from Sir Richard Phillips' Million of Facts, illustrates the development of 'facts' out of the moral consciousness. The book contains many of equal value. An approximate parallel to this statement would be that London is divided into Seven Dials.

1765.—"The lands of the twenty-four Purgunnahs, ceded to the Company by PERI, s. This Persian word for a class of imaginary sprites, rendered familiar in the verses of Moore and Southey, has no blood-relationship with the English Fairy, notwithstanding the exact compliance with Grimm’s Law in the change of initial consonant. The Persian word is pari, from ‘par, a feather, or wing;’ therefore ‘the winged one;’ [so F. Johnson, Pers. Dict.; but the derivation is very doubtful] whilst the genealogy of fairy is apparently Italian, fata, French fée, whence féerie (‘fay-dom’) and thence fairy.

[1500—"I am the only daughter of a Jinn chief of nolesten strain and my name is Peri-Banu."—Arab. Nights, Burton, x. 264.]

1800.—
"From cluster’d henna, and from orange groves,
That with such perfumes fill the breeze
As Peris to their Sister bear,
When from the summit of some lofty tree
She hangs encaged, the captive of the Dives."

Thalaba, xi. 24.

1817.—
"But nought can charm the luckless Peri;
Her soul is sad—her wings are weary."

Moore, Paradise and the Peri.

PERPET, PERPETUANO, s. The name of a cloth often mentioned in the 17th and first part of the 18th centuries, as an export from England to the East. It appears to have been a light and glossy twilled stuff of wool, [which like another stuff of the same kind called ‘Lasting,’ took its name from its durability. (See Draper’s Dict. s.v.)] In France it was called perpetanne or sempiterne, in Italian perpetuana.

[1609.—"Karsies, Perpetuano and other woolen Commodities."—Birdwood, Letter Book, 288.]

[1617.—"Perpetuano, 1 bale."—Cocks’s Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 295.]

[1630.—"... Devonshire kersies or perpetuities..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 4.]

[1680.—"Perpetuances."—Ibid. ii. 401.]

1711.—"Goods usually imported (to China) from Europe are Bullion Cloths, Clothrush Perpetuano’s, and Camblets of Scarlet, black, blew, sad and violet Colours, which are of late so lightly set by; that to bear the Dutys, and bring the prime Cost, is as much as can reasonably be hoped for."—Lockyer, 147.

[1717.—"...a Pavilion lined with Imboss’s Perpetas."—In Yule, Hedges’ Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccclx.]

1754.—"Being requested by the Trustees of the Charity Stock of this place to make an humble application to you for an order that the children upon the Foundation to the number of 12 or 14 may be supplied at the expense of the Honorable Company with a coat of blue Perpetas or some ordinary cloth...

1757.—Among the presents sent to the King of Ava with the mission of Ensign Robert Lester, we find:

"2 Pieces of ordinary Red Broad Cloth, 3 Do. of Perpetuaneos Poppingay."

In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 263.

PERSAIM, n.p. This is an old form of the name of Bassein (q.v.) in Pegu. It occurs (e.g.) in Milburn, ii. 281.

1759.—"The Country for 20 miles round Persaim is represented as capable of producing Rice, sufficient to supply the Coast of CHOROMANDEL from Pondicherry to Musulimpatam."—Letter in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 119. Also in a Chart by Capt. G. Baker, 1754.

1795.—"Having ordered presents of a trivial nature to be presented, in return for those brought from Negrais, he referred the deputy... to the Birman Governor of Persaim for a ratification and final adjustment of the treaty."—Symes, p. 40. But this author also uses Bassien (e.g. 32), and "Persaim or Bassien" (39), which alternatives are also in the chart by Ensign Wood.

PERSIMMON, n. This American name is applied to a fruit common in China and Japan, which in a dried state is imported largely from China into Tibet. The tree is the Diospyros kaki, L. fil., a species of the same genus which produces ebony. The word is properly the name of an American fruit and tree of the same genus (D. virginiana), also called date-plum, and, according to the Dictionary of Worcester, belonged to the Indian language of Virginia. [The word became familiar in 1896 as the name of the winner of the Derby.]

1878.—"The finest fruit of Japan is the Kaki or persimmon (Diospyros Kaki), a large PERUMBAUCUM. n.p. A town 14 m. N.W. of Conjevaram, in the district of Madras [Chingleput]. The name is perhaps perum-PAKKAM, Tam., 'big village.'

PESCARIA, n.p. The coast of Tinnevelly was so called by the Portuguese, from the great pearl 'fishery' there.

[cf. 1566. —See under BAZAAR.]

1600.—'There are in the Seas of the East three principal mines where they fish pearls. . . . The third is between the Isle of Ceilon and Cape Comory, and on this account the Coast which runs from the said Cape to the shoals of Ramanancon and Manâr is called, in part, Pescaria. . . . —Lucena, 80.

[1616. —'PESQUERIA.' —See under CHI-LAW.]

1615.—'Iam nonnihil de orà Piscariâ dicamus quae iam inde a promontorio Commorino in Orientem ad usque breuia Ramananconis extenditur, quod haud procul inde celeberrimus, maximus, et copiosissimus toto Oriente Margaritarem piscatus instituitur. . . . —Jurrîc, Thes. i. 445.

1710.—'The Coast of the Pescaria of the mother of pearl which runs from the Cape of Camorin to the Isle of Manar, for the space of seventy leagues, with a breadth of six inland, was the first debarkation of this second conquest.' —Sousa, Orient. Conqusti. i. 122.

PESHAWUR, n.p. Peshâvar. This name of what is now the frontier city and garrison of India towards Kâbul, is sometimes alleged to have been given by Akbar. But in substance the name is of great antiquity, and all that can be alleged as to Akbar is that he is said to have modified the old name, and that since his time the present form has been in use. A notice of the change is quoted below from Gen. Cunningham; we cannot give the authority on which the statement rests. Peshâwar could hardly be called a frontier town in the time of Akbar, standing as it did according to the administrative division of the Ain, about the middle of the Sâha of Kâbul, which included Kashmir and all west of it. We do not find that the modern form occurs in the text of the Ain as published by Prof. Blochmann. In the translation of the Tabakût-ê-Akbarî of Nizâmû-d-din Ahmad (died 1594-95), in Elliot, we find the name transliter-ated variously as Peshâwar (v. 448), Pâshâvar (293), Parshor (423), Pershor (424). We cannot doubt that the Chinese form Fo-lausha in Fah-hian already expresses the name Parashâvar, or Parshâvar.

c. 400.—'From Gandhâra, going south days' journey, we arrive at the country of Fo-lausha. In old times Buddha, in company with all his disciples, travelled through this country.' —Fah-hian, by Beal, p. 34.

c. 630.—'The Kingdom of Kien-to-lo (Gândhâra) extends about 1000 li from E. to W. and 800 li from S. to N. On the East it adjoins the river Šin (Indus). The capital of this country is called Pu-lu-sha-PU-lo (Parushapura). . . . The towns and villages are almost deserted. . . . There are about a thousand convents, ruined and abandoned; full of wild plants, and presenting only a melancholy solitude. . . . —Huen TNANG, Pil. Bond. ii. 104-105.

c. 1001.—'On his (Mahmûd's) reaching Purshaur, he pitched his tent outside the city. There he received intelligence of the bold resolve of Jaïpal, the enemy of God, and the King of Hind, to offer opposition.' —At-Ulbî, in Elliot, ii. 25.

c. 1020.—'The aggregate of these waters forms a large river opposite the city of Parshâwar.' —At-Birânî, in Elliot, i. 47. See also 63.

1058.—'The Amir ordered a letter to be despatched to the minister, telling him 'I have determined to go to Hindustân, and pass the winter in Wâhînînd, and Marmûrâ, and Barshur. . . . —Bâihâki, in Elliot, ii. 150.

c. 1220.—'Parshâbûr. The vulgar pronunciation is Barshâwûr. A large tract between Ghazma and Lahor, famous in the history of the Musalmân conquest.' —Yâkût, in Barbier de Maynard, Dict. de la Perse, 418.

1519.—'We held a consultation, in which it was resolved to plunder the country of the Aferidî Afghanîs, as had been proposed by Sultan Bayezâd, to fit up the fort of Purshâwar for the reception of their effects and corn, and to leave a garrison in it.' —Baber, 276.

c. 1555.—'We came to the city of Purshawar, and having thus fortunately passed the Kotal we reached the town of Jôshiyâ. On the Kotal we saw rhinoceroses, the size of a small elephant.' —Sûdî 'Alî, in J. A.S. Ser. i. tom. ix. 201.

c. 1590.—'Tumân Bagrâm, which they call Parshâwar; the spring here is a source of delight. There is in this place a great place of worship which they call Gorkhâtâr, to which people, especially 'ogirs, resort from great distances.' —Ais (orig. i. 592; ed. Jarrett, i. 404. In iii. 69, Parashâwar).

1754.—'On the news that Peishor was taken, and that Nadîr Shah was preparing to pass the Indus, the Moghol's court, already in great disorder, was struck with terror.' —H. of Nadîr Shah, in Hawâwîy, ii. 363.
1783.—"The heat of Peshour seemed to me more intense, than that of any country I have visited in the upper parts of India. Other places may be warm; hot winds blowing over tracts of sand may drive us under the shelter of a wetted skreen; but at Peshour, the atmosphere, in the summer solstice, becomes almost inflammable."—G. Forster, ed. 1806, ii. 57.

1783.—"Its present name we owe to Akbar, whose fondness for innovation led him to change the ancient Parashâwara, of which he did not know the meaning, to Peshâwar, or the 'frontier town.' Abul Fazl gives both names."—Cunningham, Arch. Reports, ii. 87. Gladwin does in his translation give both names; but see above.

PESH-CUBZ, s. A form of dagger, the blade of which has a straight thick back, while the edge curves inwardly from a broad base to a very sharp point. Pers. pesh-kabz, 'fore-grip.' The handle is usually made of shir-mâbâ, 'the white bone (tooth?) of a large cetacean'; probably narwhal-tooth, which is repeatedly mentioned in the early English trade with Persia as an article much in demand (e.g. see Swissbury, ii. 65, 159, 204, 305; iii. 89, 162, 268, 287, &c. [The peshkabz appears several times in Mr. Egerton's Catalogue of Indian Arms, and one is illustrated, Pl. xv. No. 760.]

1767.—"Received for sundry jewels &c. . . . (Rs.) 7326 0 0
Ditto for knife, or peschubz (misprinted pesheoz). . . . 3500 0 0.

PESH-CUSH, s. Pers. pesh-kash. Wilson interprets this as literally 'first-fruits.' It is used as an offering or tribute, but with many specific and technical senses which will be found in Wilson, e.g. a fine on appointment, renewal, or investiture; a quit-rent, a payment exacted on lands formerly rent-free, or in substitution for service no longer exacted; sometimes a present to a great man, or (loosely) for the ordinary Government demand on land. Peshcush, in the old English records, is most generally used in the sense of a present to a great man.

1653.—"Pesket est vn present en Turq."—De la Boulaye-le-Goy, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1657.—"As to the Piscash for the King of Golcundah, if it be not already done, we do hope with it you may obtayn our liberty to cowne silver Rapes and copper Pice at the Fort, which would be a great accommodation to our Trade. But in this and all other Piscashes be as sparing as you can."—Letter of Court to Pl. St. Geo., in Notes and Exts., No. i. p. 7.

1673.—"Sometimes sending Piscashes of considerable value."—Fryer, 166.

1675.—"Being informed that Mr. Mohun had sent a Piscash of Persian Wine, Cases of Stronge Water, &c. to ye Great Governour of this Country, that is 2d. or 3d. psion in ye kingdome, I went to his house to speake abt. it, when he kept me to dine with him."—Puckle's Diary, Ms. in India Office.

1683. —"Piscash." (See under FIR-MAUN.)

1689. —"But the Pishcushes or Presents expected by the Nabobs and Omraks retarded our Inlargement for some time notwithstanding."—Ovington, 415.

1754.—"After I have refreshed my army at DELIE, and received the subsidy (Note.—'This is called a Pischcush, or present from an inferior to a superior. The sum agreed for was 20 cronos') which must be paid, I will leave you in possession of his dominion."—Hist. of Nadir Shah, in Howry, ii. 371.

1761.—"I have obtained a promise from his Majesty of his royal confirmation of all your possessions and privileges, provided you pay him a proper pishcush. . . ."—Major卡通 to the Governor and Council, in Van Sittart, i. 119.

1811.—"By the fixed or regulated sum . . . the Sultan . . . means the Pashcush, or tribute, which he was bound by former treaties to pay to the Government of Poonah; but which he does not think proper to . . . designate by any term denotive of inferiority, which the word Pashcush certainly is."—Kirkpatrick, 'Note on Tipoo's Letters, p. g.

PESH-KHÅNA, PESH-KHID-MAT, ss. Pers. 'Fore-service.' The tents and accompanying retinue sent on over-night, during a march, to the new camping ground, to receive the master on his arrival. A great personage among the natives, or among ourselves, has a complete double establishment, one portion of which goes thus every night in advance. [Another term used is peshkhaima. Pers. 'advance tents,' as below.]

1665.—"When the King is in the field, he hath usually two Camps . . . to the end that when he breaketh up and leaveth one, the other may have passed before by a day and be found ready when he arriveth at the place design'd to encamp at; and 'tis therefore that they are called Peciche-Kanes, as you should say. Houses going before . . ."—Bernier, E.T. 115; [ed. Constable, 359.]

1788.—"Pech-khanna is the term given to the royal tents and their appendages in India."—Howry, iv. 158.
PHOOLKAREE.

[1862.—"The result of all this uproarious bustle has been the erection of the Sardar's peshkhaima, or advanced tent."—Bellev, Journal of Mission, 409.]

PESHWA. s. from Pers. 'a leader, a guide.' The chief minister of the Mahratta power, who afterwards, supplanting his master, the descendant of Sivaji, became practically the prince of an independent State and chief of the Mahrrattas. The Peshwa's power expired with the surrender to Sir John Malcolm of the last Peshwa, Baji Rao, in 1817. He lived in wealthy exile, and with a jeigar under his own jurisdiction, at Bhitar, near Cawnpoor, till January 1851. His adopted son, and the claimant of his honours and allowances, was the infamous Nana Sahib.

Mr C. P. Brown gives a feminine peshwain: "The princess Gangâ Bai was Peshwain of Purandhar." (MS. notes).

1673.—"He answered, it is well, and referred our Business to Moro Pundit his Peshua, or Chancellour, to examine our Articles, and give an account of what they were."—Fryer, 79.

1803.—"But how is it with the Peshwah? He has no minister; no person has influence over him, and he is only guided by his own caprices."—Wellington Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 177.

In the following passage (quando-quisdem dormitans) the Great Duke had forgotten that things were changed since he left India, whilst the editor perhaps did not know:

1841.—"If you should draw more troops from the Establishment of Fort St. George, you will have to place under arms the subsidiary force of the Nizam, the Peishwah, and the force in Mysore, and the districts ceded by the Nizam in 1800-1801."

—Letter from the D. of Wellington, in Ind. Adm. of Lord Ellenborough, 1874. (Dec. 29). The Duke was oblivious when he spoke of the Peshwa's Subsidiary Force in 1841.

PETTILLY. s. This is the name by which 'parsley' is generally called in N. India. We have heard it quoted there as an instance of the absurd corruption of English words in the mouths of natives. But this case at least might more justly be quoted as an example of accurate transfer. The word is simply the Dutch term for 'parsley,' viz. petterslie, from the Lat. petroselinum, of which parsley is itself a double corruption through the French pêrsil. In the Arabic of Avicenna the name is given as fatrasiliân.

PETTAAH. s. Tam. pêttâi. The extramural suburb of a fortress, or the town attached and adjacent to a fortress. The pêttah is itself often separately fortified; the fortress is then its citadel. The Mahrrati peth is used in like manner; it is Skt. petaka, and the word possibly came to the Tamil through the Mahr[J]. The word constantly occurs in the histories of war in Southern India.

1630.—"'Azam Khan, having ascended the Pass of Anjan-didhd, encamped 3 kos from Dhârur. He then directed Multaft Khan . . . to make an attack upon . . . Dhârur and its pêttah, where once a week people from all parts, far and near, were accustomed to meet for buying and selling."

1765.—"The pagoda served as a citadel to the large pêttah, by which name the people on the Coast of Coromandel call every town contiguous to a fortress."—Orme, ed. 1803, i. 147.

1791.—" . . . The pêttah or town (at Bangalore) of great extent to the north of the fort, was surrounded by an indifferent rampart and excellent ditch, with an intermediate berm . . . planted with impene-trable and well-grown thorns. . . . Neither the fort nor the pêttah had drawbridges."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, iii. 123.

1803.—"The pêttah wall was very lofty, and defended by towers, and had no rampart."—Wellington, ed. 1837, ii. 193.

1809.—"I passed through a country little cultivated . . . to Kingeri, which has a small mud-fort in good repair, and a pêttah apparently well filled with inhabitants."—Lt. Mathews, i. 412.

1839.—"The English ladies told me this Pêttah was 'a horrid place—quite native!' and advised me never to go into it; so I went next day, of course, and found it most curious—really quite native."—Letters from Madras, 289.

PHANSEEGAR. s. See under THUG.

[PHOOLKAREE. s. Hind. phâl-kârî, 'flowered embroidery.' The term applied in N. India to the cotton sheets embroidered in silk by village women, particularly Jats. Each girl is supposed to embroider one of these for her marriage. In recent years a considerable demand has arisen for specimens of this kind of needlework among English ladies, who use them for screens and other decorative purposes. Hence a considerable manufacture has sprung up of which an account will be found in a note by Mrs. F. A. Steel, appended to Mr.
7 [PHOORZA]. s. A custom-house; Gujārāti फुर्जा, from Ar. furżat 'a notch,' then 'a bight,' 'river-mouth,' 'harbour'; hence 'a tax' or 'custom-duty.'

1791.—The East India Calendar (p. 131) has "John Church, Phoorza-Master, Surat."

1797.—"And the Mogul's Furza or custom-house is at this place (Hughly)."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, ii. 19.

1772.—"But as they still insisted on their people sitting at the gates on the Phoozer Coosky ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 386, and see 392, "Phoorze Master." Coosky = P.—Mahr. Khāshkī, 'inland transit-duties.'

1813.—"... idols ... were annually imported to a considerable number at the Baroche Phoorza, when I was custom-master at that settlement."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 391.

PIAL, s. A raised platform on which people sit, usually under the verandah, or on either side of the door of the house. It is a purely S. Indian word, and partially corresponds to the N. Indian chabātra (see CHABOOTRA). Wilson conjectures the word to be Telugu, but it is in fact a form of the Portuguese poyo and poyal (Span. poyo), 'a seat or bench.' This is again, according to Diez (i. 326), from the Lat. podium, 'a projecting base, a balcony.' Bluteau explains poyal as 'steps for mounting on horseback' (Scoticè, a lumping-on stone) [see Dalboqueur, Hak. Soc. ii. 68]. The quotation from Mr. Gover describes the S. Indian thing in full.

1553.—"... paying him his courtesy in Moorish fashion, which was seating himself along with him on a poyal."—Custancheda, vi. 3.

1578.—"In the public square at Goa, as it was running furiously along, an infirm man came in its way, and could not escape; but the elephant took him up in its trunk, and without doing him any hurt deposited him on a poyo."—Acosta, Fractula, 432.

1602.—"The natives of this region who are called laos, are men so arrogant that they think no others their superiors ... insonmutch that if a lao in passing along the street becomes aware that any one of another nation is on a poyal, or any place above him, if the person does not immediately come down, ... until he is gone by, he will kill him."—Verelst, IV. iii. 1; [For numerous instances of this superstition, see Frasier, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. i. 360 seqq.]

1873.—"Built against the front wall of every Hindu house in southern India ... is a bench 3 feet high and as many broad. It extends along the whole frontage, except where the house-door stands. ... The posts of the veranda or pandal are fixed in the ground a few feet in front of the bench, enclosing a sort of platform; for the base of the house is generally 2 or 3 feet above the street level. The raised bench is called the Pyla, and is the lounging-place by day. It also forms the hot months as a couch for the night. ... There the visitor is received; there the bargaining is done; there the beggar plies his trade, and the Yogi (see JODEE) sounds his conch; there also the members of the household clean their teeth, amusing themselves the while with belches and other frightful noises. ..."—Pyia Schools in Madras, by E. C. Gover, in Ind. Antq. ii. 52.

8 PICAR, s. Hind. pākār, [which again is a corruption of Pers. pā'ē-kār, pā'e, 'a foot'], a retail-dealer, an intermediate dealer or broker.

1680.—"Picar." See under DUSTORR.

1683.—"Ye said Naylor has always corresponded with Mr. Charnock, having been always his intimate friend; and without question either provides him goods out of the Hon. Comp.'s Warehouse, or connives at the Weavers and Picars doing of it."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 133.

1772.—"Pykārs (Dellos) and Gomastahs are a chain of agents through whose hands the articles of merchantable pass from the loom of the manufacturer, or the store-house of the cultivator, to the public merchant, or exporter."—Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss, s.v.

PICE, s. Hind. pāsī, a small copper coin, which under the Anglo-Indian system of currency is \(\frac{1}{8}\) of an anna, \(\frac{1}{8}\) of a rupee, and somewhat less than \(\frac{1}{2}\) of a farthing. Pice is used slanguishly for money in general. By Act XXIII. of 1870 (cl. 8) the following copper coins are current:—1. Double Pice or Half-anna, 2. Pice or \(\frac{1}{2}\) anna. 3. Half-pice or \(\frac{1}{4}\) anna. 4. P'ce or \(\frac{1}{4}\) anna. No. 2 is the only one in very common use. As with most other coins, weights, and measures, there used to be pucka pice, and cutcha pice. The distinction was sometimes between the regularly minted copper of the Government and certain amorphous pieces of copper.
which did duty for small change (e.g. in the N.W. Provinces within memory), or between single and double pice, i.e. \( \frac{1}{2} \) Anna-pieces and \( \frac{3}{2} \) Anna-pieces. [Also see PICE.]

c. 1590.—"The dám . . . is the fortieth part of the rupee. At first this coin was called Paisah."—Ain, ed. Blockmann, i. 31.

[1614.—"Another coin there is of copper, called a Pice, whereof you have commonly 34 in the mamudo."—Foster, Letters, iii. 11.]

1615.—"Pice, which is a Copper Coyne; twelve Drammes make one Pice. The English Shilling, if weight, will yield thirtie three Pice and a halfe."—W. Peyton, in Purchas, i. 530.

1616.—"Brasse money, which they call Pices, whereof three or thereabouts counter-vail a Peny."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1171.

1648.—". . . de Peyseen zijn kooper gelt. . . ."—Van Twiet, 62.

1653.—"Peça est vne monnaye du Mogol de la valeur de 6 deniers."—De la Bontelaye-Gonz, ed. 1657, p. 553.

1673.—"Pice, a sort of Copper Money current among the Poorer sort of People ... the Company's Accounts are kept in Book-rate Pice, viz. 32 to the Mam. [i.e. Mamousse, see GOSEBECK], and 80 Pice to the Rupee."—Fryer, 205.

1676.—"The Indians have also a sort of small Copper-money; which is called Pecha. . . . In my last Travels, a Ropey went at Surat for nine and forty Pechas."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 22; [ed. Bail, i. 27].

1689.—"Lower than these (pice), bitter-Almonds here (at Surat) pass for Money, about Sixty of which make a Pice."—Ovington, 219.

1726.—"Ana makes 1 stuyvers or 2 peys."—Valentinj, v. 179. [Also see under MOHUR GOLD.]

1768.—"Shall I risk my cavalry, which cost 1000 rupees each horse, against your cannon balls that cost two pice?—No. I will march your troops until their legs become the size of their bodies."—Hyder Ali, Letter to Col. Wood, in Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 287; [2nd ed. ii. 300].

c. 1816.—"Here," said he, "is four pucker-pice for Mary to spend in the bazar; but I will thank you, Mrs. Browne, not to let her have any fruit. . . ."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 18, ed. 1803.

PICOTA, s. An additional allowance or percentage, added as a handicap to the weight of goods, which varied with every description, —and which the editor of the Subsidios supposes to have lead to the varieties of bahar (q.v.). Thus at Ormuz the bahar was of 20 farazolas (see FRAZALA), to which was added, as picota, for cloves and mace 3 maunds (of Ormuz), or about \( \frac{1}{2} \) additional; for cinnamon \( \frac{1}{2} \) additional; for benzoin \( \frac{1}{2} \) additional, &c. See the Pesos, &c. of A. Nunes (1554) passim. We have not been able to trace the origin of this term, nor any modern use.

[1554.—"Picota." (See under BRAZIL-WOOD, DOOCAUN.)]

PICOTTAH, s. This is the term applied in S. India to that ancient machine for raising water, which consists of a long lever or yard, pivotted on an upright post, weighted on the short arm and bearing a line and bucket on the long arm. It is the dhentki of Upper India, the shadaf of the Nile, and the old English sweep, sewape, or sewy-pole. The machine is we believe still used in the Terra Incognita of market-gardens S.E. of London. The name is Portuguese, picota, a marine term now applied to the handle of a ship's pump and post in which it works—a 'pump-brake.' The picota at sea was also used as a pillow, whence the employment of the word as quoted from Correa. The word is given in the Glossary attached to the "Fifth Report" (1812), but with no indication of its source. Fryer (1673, pub. 1698) describes the thing without giving it a name. In the following the word is used in the marine sense:

1524.—"He (V. da Gama) ordered notice to be given that no seaman should wear a cloak, except on Sunday . . . and if he did, that it should be taken from him by the constables (les serra tomada polos meirinhos), and the man put in the picota in disgrace, for one day. He found great fault with men of military service wearing cloaks, for in that guise they did not look like soldiers."—Correç, Lendas, ii. ii. 922.

1782.—"Pour cet effet (aroser les terres) on emploie une machine appelée Picotte. C'est une bascule dressée sur le bord d'un puits ou d'un réservoir d'eaux pluviales, pour en tirer l'eau, et la conduire ensuite où l'on veut."—Sonnerat, Voyage, i. 188.

1790.—"Partout les pakotési, ou puits à bassine, étoient en mouvement pour fournir l'eau nécessaire aux plantes, et partout on entendait les jardiniers égayer leurs travaux par des chansons."—Houfner, ii. 217.

1807.—"In one place I saw people employed in watering a rice-field with the Yatam, or Pacota, as it is called by the English."—Buchanan, Journey through Mysore, &c., i. 15. [Here Yatam, is Can. yada Tel. ëtamu, Mal. ëtam.]

[1857.—"Aye, e'en picotta-work would gain By using such bamboos."—Goor, Folk Songs of S. India, 184.]
PIE. s. Hind. paṭṭ\textsuperscript{a}, the smallest copper coin of the Anglo-Indian currency, being \(\frac{1}{16}\) of an anna, \(\frac{1}{16}\) of a rupee,\textsuperscript{=} about \(\frac{1}{8}\) a farthing. This is now the authorised meaning of pie. But paṭṭ\textsuperscript{a} was originally, it would seem, the fourth part of an anna, and in fact identical with pice (q.v.). It is the H. -Mahr. paṭṭ\textsuperscript{a}, "a quarter," from Skt. pad, pad\textsuperscript{a}ḍ\textsuperscript{a}ḍ in that sense.

PIECE-GOODS. This, which is now the technical term for Manchester cottons imported into India, was originally applied in trade to the Indian cottons exported to England, a trade which has been largely killed by the heavy duties which Lancashire procured to be imposed in its own interest, as in its own interest it has recently procured the abolition of the small import duty on English piece-goods in India.* [In 1898 a duty at the rate of 3 per cent. on cotton goods was reimposed.]

* It is an easy assumption that this export trade from India was killed by the development of machinery in England. We can hardly doubt that this cause would have killed it in time. But it was not left to any such lingering and natural death. Much time would be required to trace the whole of this episode of "ancient history." But it is clear that this Indian trade was not killed by natural causes: it was killed by prohibitory duties. These duties were not imposed in 1728 but they were declared to operate as a premium on smuggling, and were reduced to 18 per cent. ad valorem. In the year 1719-20 the value of piece-goods from India imported into England was £2,776,682, or one-third of the whole value of the imports from India, which was £8,292,800. And in the sixteen years between 1719-20 and 1825 (inclusive) the imports of Indian piece-goods amounted in value to £28,117,125.

In 1799 the duties were raised. I need not give details, but will come down to 1814, just before the close of the war, when they were, I believe, at a maximum. The duties then, on "plain white calicoes," were:—

Total 67 per cent.

There was an Excise duty upon British manufactured and printed goods of 3d. per square yard. And under that regulation foreign (Indian) calico and muslin printed in Great Britain, and the whole of both duty and excise upon such goods was recoverable as drawback upon re-exportation. But on the exportation of Indian white goods there was no drawback recoverable; and stuffs printed in India were at this time, so far as we can discern, not admitted through the English Customs-house at all until 1826, when they were admitted on a duty of 3d. per square yard.

Lists of the various kinds of Indian piece-goods will be found in Milburn (i. 44, 45, 46, and ii. 90, 221), and we assemble them below. It is not in our power to explain their peculiarities, except in very few cases, found under their proper heading. [In the present edition these lists have been arranged in alphabetical order. The figures before each indicate that they fall into the following classes: 1. Piece-goods formerly exported from Bombay and Surat; 2. Piece-goods exported from Madras and the Coast; 3. Piece-goods: the kinds imported into Great Britain from Bengal. Some notes and quotations have been added. But it must be understood that the classes of goods now known under these names may or may not exactly represent those made at the time when these lists were prepared. The names printed in capitals are discussed in separate articles.]

1665.—"I have sometimes stood amazed at the vast quantity of Cotton-Cloth of all sorts, fine and others, tinged and white, (See in the Statutes, 43 Geo. III. capp. 88, 89, 70; 54 Geo. III. esp. 36; 6 Geo. IV. esp. 3; also Macpherson's "Annals of Commerce," iv. 1665.)

In Sir A. Arbuthnot's publication of Sir T. Munro's Minutes (Memoir, p. xxix), he quotes a letter of Munro's to a friend in Scotland, written about 1825, which shows him surprisingly before his age in the matter of Free Trade, speaking with reference to certain measures of Mr. Huskisson's. The passage ends thus: "India is the country that has been worst used in the new arrangements. All her produce, a country under the exclusion and prohibition of all. Why should India be allowed to sell freely into England, upon paying the same duties, and no more, which English duties [manufactures] pay in India? When I see what is done in Parliament against India, I think that I am reading about Edward III. and the Flemings."

Sir A. Arbuthnot adds very appropriately a passage from a note by the late Prof. H. H. Wilson in his continuation of James Smith's History of India (1845, vol. i. pp. 388-389), a passage which we also gladly insert here:

"It was stated in evidence (in 1813) that the cotton and silk goods of India, up to this period, could be sold for a profit in the British market at a price from 50 to 60 per cent. lower than those fabricated in England. It consequently became necessary to protect the latter by duties of 70 or 80 per cent. on their value, or by positive prohibition. Had this not been the case, had not such prohibitory duties and decrees existed, the mills of Paisley and of Manchester would have been stopped in their outset, and could not have again set in motion, even by the powers of steam. They were created by the sacrifice of the Indian manufacturers. Had India been left alone, she would have imposed protective duties upon British goods, and would thus have preserved her own productive industry from annihilation. This act of self-defence was not permitted her; she was at the mercy of the stranger. British goods were forced upon her without paying any duty; and the foreign manufacturer employed the arm of political injustice to keep down and ultimately strangle a competitor with whom he could not contend on equal terms." which the Hollanders alone draw from thence and transport into many places, especially into Japan and Europe; not to mention what the English, Portingal and Indian merchants carry away from those parts."—Berrier, E.T. 141; [ed. Constable, 439].

1785.—(Res, of Court of Directors of the E.I.C. 8th October) "... that the Captains and Officers of all ships that shall sail from any part of India, after receiving notice hereof, shall be allowed to bring 8000 pieces of piece-goods and no more that 5000 pieces and no more, may consist of white Muslins and Callicoees, stitched or plain, or either of them, of which 5000 pieces only 2000 may consist of any of the following sorts, viz., Allibailles, Afrocks (I), Cossaes, Dorcas, Jamdunias, Malms, Nainsooks, Neckcloths, Tanjebels, and Terrindams, and that 3000 pieces and no more, may consist of coloured piece-goods..." &c., &c.—In Seton-Karr, i. 83.

[Abrawan, P. άου-ι-ραβούν, 'flowing water'; a very fine kind of Dacca muslin. 'Woven air' is the name applied in the Arabian Nights to the Patna gauzes, a term originally used for the produce of the Coa looms (Burton, x. 247.) ‘The Hindoos amuse us with two stories, as instances of the fineness of this muslin. One, that the Emperor Aurungzebe was angry with his daughter for exposing her skin through her clothes; whereupon the young princess renounced in her justification that she had seven jamals (see JAMMA) or suits on; and another, in the Nabob Allavered Khawn's time, who was chastised and turned out of the city for his neglect, in not preventing his cow from eating up a piece of abrocan, which he had spread and carelessly left on the grass."—Bolt, Considerations on Affairs of India, 206.

3. ADATIS.

3. ALLEJAS.

3. Allibailles. — "Alabailles (signifying according to the weavers' interpretation of the word 'very fine') is a muslin of fine texture."—(J. Taylor, Account of the Cotton Manufacture at Dacca, 45). According to this the word is perhaps from Ar.  الدی 'superior', H.  هاتل 'good'.

3. Allibaines.—Perhaps from  الدی 'superior', بان 'woof'.

1. Annabatches.

3. Arrahs. — Perhaps from the place of that name (see Shahabia, where, according to Buchanan and Hamilton (Eastern India, i. 548) there was a large cloth industry.

3. Aubrahs.

3. Aunekelettes.

3. BAFTAS.

3. BANDANNAS.

1. Bejutapanta.—H. بسارت 'without join,' PATCH, 'a piece.'

1. BETEELAS.

3. Blue cloth.

1. Bombay Stuffa.

1. Brawl.—The N.E.D. describes Brawl as a "blue and white striped cloth manufactured in India." In a letter of 1616 (Foster, iv. 306) we have "Loowee champell and Burral." The editor suggests H.  برل 'open in texture, fine.' But Roquefort (s.v.) gives: "Bare, Barel, grosse étoffe en laine de couleur rousse ou grisâtre, dont s'habillent ordinairement les ramoneurs; cette étoffe est faite de brebés noir et brune, sans aucune autre teinture." And see N.E.D. s.v. Borrel.

3. Byrpampats. (See BEIRAMEE.)

3. Callawapores.

3. CAMBAYS.

3. Cambrics.

3. Carpets.

3. Carridaries.

2. Cattaketchies.

1. Chalais. (See under SHALEE.)

3. Charconnaes.—H.  چرک 'chequered.' "The چرک, or chequered muslin, is, as regards manufacture, very similar to the Dooraa (see DOREAS below). They differ in the breadth of the stripes, the closeness of the threads, and the size of the squares." (Forbes Watson, Textile Man. 78). The same name is now applied to a silk cloth. "The word چرک کن 'simply means 'a check,' but the term is applied to certain silk or mixed fabrics containing small checks, usually about 8 or 10 checks in a line to an inch." (Yusef Al, Mon. on Silk, 93. Also see Journ. Ind. Art. iii. 6.)

1683.—"20 yards of charconnaes."—In Yale, Heddes' Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

2. Chavonis.

1. Chelloes. (See SHALEE.)

3. Chinechuras. — Probably cloth from Chinsura.

1. CHINTZ, of sorts.

1. Chittalbailles.

3. Chowtars. —This is almost certainly not identical with Chudder. In a list of cotton cloths in the Ait (i. 94) we have chautar, which may mean 'made with four threads or wires.' Chaukti, 'four-fold,' is a kind of cloth used in the Punjab for counterpanes (Francis, Man. Cotton, 7). This cloth is frequently mentioned in the early letters.

1610.—"Chautares are white and well requested."—Dawers, Letters, i. 75.

1614.—"The Chauters of Agra and fine baftas nny cloth do not here vend."—Foster, Letters, ii. 45.

1615.—"Four pieces fine white Cowter."—Ibid. iv. 51.

3. Chuclaes. —This may be H. چکلا, chakri, which Platts defines as 'a kind of cloth made of silk and cotton.'

3. Chunderbannies.—This is perhaps H.  چندر کن 'the moon,' ہان 'wool.'

3. Chunderaconas. —Forbes Watson has: "Chunderkana, second quality muslin for handkerchiefs"—Plain white bleached muslin called Chunderkana." The word is probably چندر کن, 'moon checks.'

3. Clouts, common coarse cloth, for which see N.E.D.

3. Coopées. —This is perhaps H.  لجو, kopin, 'the small lungooty worn by Fakirs.'

3. Corahs.—H.  کور 'plain, unbeleached, undayed. What is now known as Korka silk is woven in pieces for waist-cloths (see Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 76).

3. Cossaeas.—This perhaps represents Ar. khāsā ‘special.’ In the Aín we have khdgah in the list of cotton cloths (i. 94). Mr. Taylor describes it as a muslin of a close fine texture, and identifies it with the fine muslin which, according to the Aín (ii. 124), was produced at Sonārgón. The finest kind he says is “jungle-khāsā.” (Taylor, op. cit. 46.)

3. Cushaas.—These perhaps take their name from Kushía, a place of considerable trade in the Nadýya District.

3. Cuttannees. (See COTTON.)

1. Dhooties. (See DHOTY.)

3. Diapers.

3. Dimities.

3. Doreas.—H. doriáya, ‘striped cloth,’ dör, ‘thread.’ In the list in the Aín (i. 95), Doriyah appears among cotton stuffs. It is now also made in silk: “The simplest pattern in this stripe; when the stripes are longitudinal the fabric is a doriya . . . The doriya was originally a cotton fabric, but it is now manufactured in silk, silk-and-cotton, tusser, and other combinations.” (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 57, 91.)

1653.—“3 pieces Dooreás.” —Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 94.

3. DOSOOTIES.

3. DUNGAREES.

3. Dyucksoys.

3. Ellatches.—Platts gives H. ḍāchā, ‘a kind of cloth woven of silk and thread so as to present the appearance of cardamons (ḍāchā).’ But it is almost certainly identical with alieja. It was probably introduced to Agra, where now alone it is made, by the Moghuls. It differs from doriya (see DOREAS above) in having a substantial texture, whereas the doriya is generally flimsy. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 95.)

3. Emmerties.—This is H. amarrät, inarrät, ‘sweet as nectar.’

2. GINGHAM.

2. Gudeloor (dimities).—There is a place of the name in the Neglıgherry District, but it does not seem to have any cloth manufacture.

1. GUINEA STUFFS.

3. Gurras. —This is probably the H. gārgha: “unbleached fabrics which under names varying in different localities, constitute a large proportion of the clothing of the poor. They are used also for packing goods, and as a covering for the dead, for which last purpose a large quantity is employed both by Hindoos and Mahomedans. These fabrics in Bengal pass under the name of gearha and guze.” (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 83.)

3. Habassies.—Probably P. 'albāsī, used of clothes dyed in a sort of magenta colour. The recipe is given by Hadi, Mon. on Dyeing in the N. W. P. p. 16.

3. Herba Tafties. —These are cloth made of Grass-cloth.

3. Humhums, from Ar. āmmāmān, ‘a Turkish bath’ ‘(apparently so named from its having been originally used at the bath), is a cloth of a thick stout texture, and generally worn as a wrapper in the cold season.” (Taylor, op. cit. 63.)

3. Izarees.—P. İsār, ‘drawers, trousers.’ Watson (op. cit. 57) notes that in some places it is peculiar to men, the women’s drawers being Turvar. Herklots (Qeyoun-e-Qislam, App. xiv.) gives escar as equivalent to shulwaur, like the pyjama, but not so wide.

3. Jamdannies. —P.-H. jāmāndi, which is said to be properly jāmāndi, ‘a box for holding a suit.’ The jāmāndi is a loom-figured muslin, which Taylor (op. cit. 45) calls “the most expensive productions of the Daeça looms.”

3. Jamwaras. H. jāmāwār, ‘sufficient for a dress.’ It is not easy to say what stuff is intended by this name. In the Aín (ii. 240) we have jāmāwār, mentioned among Guzerat stuffs worked in gold thread, and again (i. 85) jāmāwār Farnāwar among woollen stuffs. Forbes Watson gives among Kashmiri shawls ‘Jamdees, or striped shawl pieces’; in the Punjab they are of a striped pattern made both in pashm and wool (Johnstone, Mon. on Wool 9), and Mr. Kipling says, “the stripes are broad, of alternate colours, red and blue, &c.” (Mukharji, Art Manufactures of India 374.)

3. Laccowries.

1. Lennamnees.

3. LONG CLOTHS.

3. LOONGHEES, HERBA. (See GRASS-CLOTH.)

1. LOONGHEE, MAGHRUB. Ar. maqhrūb, maqhrab, ‘the west.’

3. Mamoodeatis.

3. Mamoodiies. Platts gives Mahūmēti, ‘praised, fine muslin.’ The Aín (i. 94) classes the Mahūmēti among cotton cloths, and at a low price. A cloth under this name is made at Shāhābād in the Hardi District. (Oudh Gazetter, ii. 25.)

3. Monepore cloths. (See MUNNEPORE.)

3. Moorees.—“Moorëes’ are blue cloths, principally manufactured in the districts of Nellore and at Canatur in the Chingleput collectorate of Madras. . . . They are largely exported to the Straits of Malacca.” (Ball, Proc. Cyl. ii. 982.)

3. MULUMULS.

3. Mushreees.—P. mushrē, ‘lawful.’ It is usually applied to a kind of silk or satin with a cotton back. “Pure silk is not allowed to men, but women may wear the most sumptuous silk fabrics” (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 90, seq.). “All Mushrees wash well, especially the finer kinds, used for bodices, petticoats, and trousers of both sexes.” (Forbes Watson, op. cit. 97.)

1832.—“. . . Mussheroo (striped washing silks manufactured at Benares) . . .” —Mrs. Moore Hanson Ali, Observations, i. 106.

1. MUSTERS.

3. Naibabies.
3. Nainsooks.— H. nainsukh, 'pleasure of the eye.' A sort of fine white calico. Forbes Watson (op. cit. 76) says it is used for neckerchiefs, and Taylor (op. cit. 46) defines it as 'a thick muslin, apparently identical with an Indian cloth (samaath, Blockshaw, i. 94) of the Ayaen.' A cloth is made of the same name in silk, imitated from the cotton fabric. (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 95.)

1. Neganeaputs.
2. Nicannees.— Quoting from a paper of 1083, Orme (Fragments, 287) has '6000 Nicanneers, 13 years long.'
3. Nilaas.— Some kind of blue cloth, H. nilda, 'blue.'
4. Nunasarees.— There is a place called Nansari in the Bhandara District (Central Provinces Gazetteer, 346).

2. Palamore.
3. Peniasotes.— In a paper quoted by Birdwood (Report on Old Records, 40) we have Penashees, which he says are stuffs made of pine-apple fibre.

3. Percaula.— H. parkala, 'a spark, a piece of glass.' These were probably some kind of spangled robe, set with pieces of glass, as some of the modern Phoolkaris are. In the Madras Diaries of 1645-6 we have 'Peroollas,' and 'poreolies, fine' (Pringle, i. 53, iii. 119, iv. 41).

1. In a letter of 1815 we have 'Lunges (see LOONGHEE) and Footae of all sorts.' (Foster, Letters, iv. 306), where the editor suggests H. phaata, 'variegated.' But in the Ain we find 'Footaha (loinbands)' (i. 93), which is the P. folia, and this is from the connection the word probably meant.

2. Pulecat handkerchiefs. (See MADRAS handkerchiefs and BANDANNA.)
3. Punjam.— The Madras Gloss, gives Tel. punjam, Tam. punjam, 61. 'a collection.' 'In Tel. a collection of 60 threads and in Tam. of 120 threads skeined, ready for the formation of the warp for weaving. A cloth is denominated 10, 12, 14, up to 40 poonjam, according to the number of times 60, or else 120, is contained in the total number of threads in the warp. Poonjam thus also came to mean a cloth of the length of one poonjam as usually skeined; this usual length is 36 cubits, or 18 yards, and the width from 36 to 44 inches, 14 lbs. being the common weight; pieces of half length were formerly exported as Salempooriy.' Writing in 1814, Hayne (Tracts, 347) says: 'Here (in Salem) two punjums are designated by 'first call,' so that twelve punjums of cloth is called 'six call, and so on.'

2. Puttan Ketchies. —Cloths which possibly took their name from the city of Anhilwara Patan in Cutch.

1727.—'That country (Tegnapatam) produces Pepper, and coarse Cloth called catchas.' (A. Hamilton, i. 335.)*

3. Raings.— 'Rang is a muslin which resembles jhuna in its transparent gauze or net-like texture. It is made by passing a single thread of the warp through each division of the reed' (Taylor, op. cit. 44.)*

1. Saloppants. (See SHALEE.)
3. Sannoes.

2. Sassergates. Some kind of cloth called 'that of the 1000 knots,' H. saasaara granthi, 'Sassergantees' (Birdwood, Rep. on Old Records, 63).

1. Sazracundees. These cloths seem to take their name from a place called Sazraceunda, 'Pool of the Law.' This is probably the place named in the Ain (ed. Jarrett, ii. 124): 'In the township of Kiyara Sundar is a large reservoir which gives a peculiar whiteness to the cloths washed in it.' Gladwin reads the name Catarashkunda, or Catareshoonder (see Taylor, op. cit. 91).

2. Seerbands, Seerbetties. These are names for turbans, H. sirband, sirbati. (Taylor, op. cit. 47) names them as Dacca muslums under the names of sirband and surbute.

3. Seercauds.—This is perhaps P. sir-ched, 'head-delighting,' some kind of turban or veil.

3. Seersuckers. —Perhaps, sir, 'head, suck, 'pleasure.'

3. Shalbaft. —P. shalbaf, 'shawl-weaving.' (See SHAWL.)

3. Sickkutes.

3. SOOSIES.

3. Sub economically.—'Slubnam is a thin pellucid muslin to which the Persian figurative name of 'evening dew' (shabnam) is given, the fabric being, when spread over the bleeding-field, scarcely distinguishable from the dew on the grass.' (Taylor, op. cit. 45.)

3. Suclutes. (See SUCLAT.)

3. Taffettes of sorts. 'A name applied to plain woven silks, in more recent times signifying a light thin stuff with a considerable lustre or gloss' (Drapers' Diet. s.v.). The word comes from P. tafaan, 'to twist, spin.' The Ain (i. 94) has taffak in the list of silks.

3. Tainsooka.— H. tanesukk, 'taking ease.' (See above under NAINSOOKS.)

3. Tanjees.—P. tanzech, 'body-adorning.' —'A tolerably fine muslin' (Taylor, op. cit. 46; Forbes Watson, op. cit. 76). 'The silk tanzech seems to have gone out of fashion, but that in cotton is very commonly used for the chicken work in Lucknow.' (Yusuf Ali, op. cit. 96.)

1. Tapseels. (See under ALLEJA.) In the Ain (i. 94) we have: "Taffakith (a stuff from Mecca)."

1670.—'So that in your house are only left some Tapseels and cotton yarn.' —In Yusuf Ali, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cxxvi. Birdwood in Report on Old Records, 38, has Topssails.

2. Tarnatannes. —'There are various kinds of muslins brought from the East Indies, chiefly from Bengal, betelles (see BETTELELA) tarnattas ...' (Chambers' Cyc. of 1788, quoted in 3rd ser. N. & Q.
It is suggested (ibid, 3rd ser. iv. 135) that this is the origin of English tartletan, Fr. tartlante, which is defined in the Draper's Dick as "a fine open muslin, first imported from India and afterwards imitated here."

3. Tartorees.

3. Tepoys.

3. Terindams.—"Terindam (said by the weavers to mean 'a kind of cloth for the body,' the name being derived from the Arabic word turah (tary, tarah), 'a kind,' and the Persian one undam (andam) 'the body,' is a muslin which was formerly import, under the name of terindam, into this country." (Taylor, op. cit. 46.)

2. Ventepollams.

PIGDAUN. s. A spittoon; Hind. pikdān. Pik is properly the expectorated juice of chewed betel.

[c. 1665.—"... servants... to carry the Pioquedent or spittoon. . . ."]—Bernier, ed. Constable, 214. In 283 Piquedans.] 1673. —"The Rooms are spread with Carpets as in India, and they have Pigdans, or Spitting pots of the Earth of this Place, which is valued next to that of China, to vest their Spittle in."—Fryer, 223.

[1684.—Hedges speaks of purchasing a "Spitting Cup."—Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 145.]

PIGEBON ENGLISH. The vile jargon which forms the means of communication at the Chinese ports between Englishmen who do not speak Chinese, and those Chinese with whom they are in the habit of communicating. The word "business" appears in this kind of talk to be corrupted into "pigeon," and hence the name of the jargon is supposed to be taken. [For examples see Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. pp. 321 seqq.; Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 450 seqq. (See BUTLER ENGLISH.])

1880.—"... the English traders of the early days... instead of inducing the Chinese to make use of correct words rather than the misspoken syllables they had adopted, encouraged them by approbation and example, to establish Pigebon English—pigeon English—between the adjourned which would be laughable if it were not almost melancholy."

1883.—"The 'Pijjun English' is revolting, and the most dignified persons demean themselves by speaking it... How the whole English-speaking community, without distinction of rank, has come to communicate with the Chinese in this baby talk is extraordinary."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 57.

PIG-STICKING. This is Anglo-Indian hog-hunting, or what would be called among a people delighting more in lofty expression, 'the chase of the Wild Boar.' When, very many years since, one of the present writers, destined for the Bengal Presidency, first made acquaintance with an Indian mess-table, it was that of a Bombay regiment at Aden—in fact of that gallowant corps which is now known as the 103rd Foot, or Royal Bombay Fusiliers. Hospitable as they were, the opportunity of enlightening an aspirant Bengalee on the short-comings of his Presidency could not be foregone. The chief counts of indictment were three: 1st. The inferiority of the Bengal Horse Artillery system; 2nd. That the Bengalees were guilty of the base effeminacy of drinking beer out of champagne glasses; 3rd. That in pig-sticking they threw the spear at the boar. The two last charges were evidently ancient traditions, maintaining their ground as facts down to 1840 therefore; and showed how little communication practically existed between the Presidencies as late as that year. Both the allegations had long ceased to be true, but probably the second had been true in the 18th century, as the third certainly had been. This may be seen from the quotation from R. Lindsay, and by the text and illustrations of Williamson's Oriental Field Sports (1807), [and much later (see below)]. There is, or perhaps we should say more diffidently there was, still a difference between the Bengal practice in pig-sticking, and that of Bombay. The Bengal spear is about 6½ feet long, loaded with lead at the butt so that it can be grasped almost quite at the end and carried with the point down, inclining only slightly to the front; the boar's charge is received on the right flank, when the point, raised to 45° or 50° of inclination, if rightly guided, pierces him in the shoulder. The Bombay spear is a longer weapon, and is carried under the arm pit like a dragon's lance. Judging from Elphinstone's statement below we should suppose that the Bombay as well as the Bengal practice originally was to throw the spear, but that both independently discarded this, the Quinhis adopting the short overhand spear, the Ducks the long lance.

1679.—"In the morning we went a hunting of wild Hogs with Kisma Reddy, the chief man of the Islands" (at mouth of the Kishta) "and about 100 other men of the island (Do) with lances and Three score dogs, with whom we killed eight Hogg's great and small, one being a Bore very large and fatt, of great weight."—Consil. of Agent and Council of Fort St. Geo. on Tour. In Notes and Ext. No. II.

The party consisted of Streynsham Master "Agent of the Coast and Bay," with "Mr. Timothy Willes and Mr. Richard Mohun of the Councell, the Minister, the Chyrurgeon, the Schoolmaster, the Secretary, and two Writers, an English 6 mounted soldiers and a Trumpeter," in all 17 Persons in the Company's Service, and "Four Freemen, who went with the Agent's Company for their own pleasure, and at their own charges." It was a Tour of Visitation of the Factories.

1773.—The Hon. R. Lindsay does speak of the "Wild-boar chase"; but he wrote after 33 years in England, and rather eschews Anglo-Indianians:

"Our wager consisted only of a short heavy spear, three feet in length, and well poised; the boar being found and un- kennelled by the Spaniels, runs with great speed across the plain, is pursued on horse-back, and the first rider who approaches him throws the javelin...."—Lives of the Linclays, iii. 161.

1807.—"When (the hog) begins to slacken, the attack should be commenced by the horseman who may be nearest pushing on to his left side; into which the spear should be thrown, so as to lodge behind the shoulder blade, and about six inches from the backbone."—Williamson, Oriental Field Sports, p. 9. (Left must mean hog's right.) This author says that the bamboo shafts were 8 or 9 feet long, but that very short ones had formerly been in use; thus confirming Lindsay.

1816.—"We hog-hunt till two, then tiff, and hawk or course till dusk...we do not throw our spears in the old way, but poke with spears longer than the common ones, and never part with them."—Elphinstone's Life, i. 311.

[1828.—"...the boar who had made good the next cane with only a slight scratch from a spear thrown as he was charging the hedge."—Orient. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 116.]

1848.—"Swankey of the Body-Guard himself, that dangerous youth, and the greatest buck of all the Indian army now on leave, was one day discovered by Major Dobbin, tête-à-tête with Amelia, and describing the sport of pig-sticking to her with great humour and eloquence."—Vanity Fair, ii. 285.

1866.—"I may be a young pig-sticker, but I am too old a sportsman to make such a mistake as that."—Trephyna, The Duck Bungalore, in Fraser, lxxxiii. 387.

1873.—"Pig-sticking may be very good fun...."—A True Reformus, ch. i.

1876.—"You would perhaps like tiger-hunting or pig-sticking; I saw some of that for a season or two in the East. Everything here is poor stuff after that."—Daniel Debolda, ii. ch. xi.

1878.—"In the meantime there was a 'pig-sticking' meet in the neighbouring district."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 140.

PIG-TAIL, s. This term is often applied to the Chinaman's long plait of hair, by transfer from the queue of our grandfathers, to which the name was much more appropriate. Though now universal among the Chinese, this fashion was only introduced by their Manchu conquerors in the 17th century, and was "long resisted by the natives of the Amoy and SWATOW districts, who, when finally compelled to adopt the distasteful fashion, concealed the badge of slavery beneath cotton turbans, the use of which has survived to the present day" (Giles, Glossary of Reference, 32). Previously the Chinese wore their unshaven back hair gathered in a net, or knotted in a chignon. De Rhodes (Rome, 1615, p. 5) says of the people of Tongking, that "like the Chinese they have the custom of gathering the hair in fine nets under the hat."

1879.—"One sees a single Sikh driving four or five Chinamen in front of him, having knotted their pigtail together for reins."—Miss Bird, Golden Chersonese, 283.

PILAU, PILOW, PILÁF, &c., s. Pers. pulá, or piláv, Skt. pulaka, 'a ball of boiled rice.' A dish, in origin purely Mahomedan, consisting of meat, or fowl, boiled along with rice and spices. Recipes are given by Herklotz, ed. 1863, App. xxix.; and in the Ain-i-Akbâri (ed. Blochmann, i. 60), we have one for kimá pulá' (kíma= 'hash') with several others to which the name is not given. The name is almost as familiar in England as curry, but not the thing. It was an odd circumstance, some 45 years ago, that the two surgeons of a dragoon regiment in India were called Currie and Pilieau.

1630.—"Sometimes they boil pieces of flesh or hens, or other fowl, cut in pieces in their rice, which dish they call pilâw. As they order it they make it a very excellent and a very well tasted food."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

c. 1630.—"The feast begins: it was compounded of a hundred sorts of pelo and candied dried meats."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 138, [and for varieties, p. 310].
PINANG.

[c. 1660.—"... my elegant hosts were fully employed in cramming their mouths with as much Pelau as they could contain. ..."]—Bernier, ed. Constable, 121.]

1673.—"The most admired Dainty where-with they stuff themselves is Pullow, whereof they will fill themselves to the Throat and receive no hurt, it being so well prepared for the Stomach."—Freyer, 399. See also p. 93. At p. 404 he gives a recipe.

1687.—"They eat their pilaw and other spoone-meate without spoone, taking up their pottage in the hollow of their fingers."—Evelyn, Diary, June 19.

1689.—"Palau, that is Rice boil'd ... with Spices intermixt, and a boild Fowl in the middle, is the most common Indian Dish."—Oriental, 397.

1711.—"They cannot go to the Price of a Pilloe, or boild Fowl and Rice; but the better sort make that their principal Dish."—Locyker, 231.

1798.—"On a certain day all the Mussulman officers belonging to your department shall be entertained at the charge of the Sircor, with a public repast, to consist of Pulloa of the first sort."—Select Letters of Tippoo S., App. xili.

1820.—

"And nearer as they came, a genial savour Of certain stews, and roast-meats, and pilau, Things which in hungry mortals' eyes"—Don Juan, v. 47.

1848.—"'There's a pillau, Joseph, just as you like it, and Papa has brought home the best turbot in Billingsgate.'—Vanity Fair, i. 20.

PINANG, s. This is the Malay word for Areca, and it is almost always used by the Dutch to indicate that article, and after them by some Continental writers of other nations. The Chinese word for the same product—pin-lang—is probably, as Bretschneider says, a corruption of the Malay word. (See PENANG.)

[1603.—"They (the Javans) are very great eaters—and they have a certaine hearbe called bettaile (see BETEL) which they usually have carried with them wheresoever they goe, in boxes, or wrapped vp in a cloth like a sugar loafe: and also a nut called Pinange, which are both in operation very hott, and they eate them continually to warme them within, and keepe them from the fluxe. They do likewise take much tobacco, and also opium."—E. Scott, An Exact Discourse, &c., of the East Indies, 1606, Sig. N. 2.

1726.—"But Shah Sousa gave him (viz. Van der Broek, an envoy to Rajmahal in 1655) good words, and regaled him with Pinang (a great favour), and promised that he should be amply paid for everything."—Valentijn, v. 165.

PINDARRY, s. Hind. pindārī, pindārā, but of which the more original form appears to be Mahr. penḍārī, a member of a band of plunderers called in that language penḍhār and penḍhārā. The etymology of the word is very obscure. We may discard as a curious coincidence only, the circumstance observed by Mr. H. T. Prinsep, in the work quoted below (i. 37, note), that "Pindara seems to have the same reference to Pandour that Kwak has to Cossack." Sir John Malcolm observes that the most popular etymology among the natives ascribes the name to the dissolved habits of the class, leading them to frequent the shops dealing in an intoxicating drink called pindu. (One of the senses of pendhā, according to Molesworth's Mahr. Dict., is 'a drink for cattle and men, prepared from Holcus sordidus' (see JOWAUR) 'by steeping it and causing it to ferment.') Sir John adds: 'Kurreem Khan' (a famous Pandarry leader) 'told me he had never heard of any other reason for the name; and Major Henley had the etymology confirmed by the most intelligent of the Pandaries of whom he enquired' (Central India, 2nd ed. i. 433). Wilson again considers the most probable derivation to be from the Mahr. penḍhā, but in the sense of a 'bundle of rice-straw,' and hara, 'who takes,' because the name was originally applied to horsemen who hung on to an army, and were employed in collecting forage. We cannot think either of the etymologies very satisfactory. We venture another, as a plausible suggestion merely. Both pind-parṇā in Hindi, and pindās-bosnē in Mahr. signify 'to follow;' the latter being defined 'to stick closely to; to follow to the death; used of the adherence of a disagreeable fellow.' Such phrases would aptly apply to these hangers-on of an army in the field, looking out for prey. [The question has been discussed by Mr. W. Irvine in an elaborate note published in the Indian Antiq. of 1900. To the above three suggestions he adds two made by other authorities: 4. that the term was taken from the Bedar race; 5. from Pinddrā, pind, 'a lump of food,' ār, 'bringer,' a plunderer. As to the fourth suggestion, he remarks that there was a Bedar race dwelling in Mysore, Belary and the Nizam's territories. But the objection to this etymology is that as far back as 1743 both words, Bedar and Pindarī, are used by the native historian, Rām Singh Munshi, side by side, but applied to different bodies of men. Mr. Irvine's suggestion is that the word Pindarī, or more strictly Pandharī, comes from a place or region called Pāndhār or Pandhār. This place is referred to by native historians, and seems to have been situated between Burhānpur and Handīya on the Nerbudda. There is good evidence to prove that large numbers of Pindarīs were settled in this part of the country. Mr. Irvine sums up by saying: "If it were not for a passage in Grant Duff (H. of the Mahrattas, Bombay reprint, 157), I should have been ready to maintain that I had proved my case. My argument requires two things to make it irrefutable: (1) a very early connection between Pandhār and the Pindharīs; (2) that the Pindhāris had no early home or settlement outside Pandhār. As to the first point, the recorded evidence seems to go no further back than 1794, when Sendhīah granted them lands in Nimār; whereas before that time the name had become fixed, and had even crept into Anglo-Indian vocabularies. As to the second point, Grant Duff says, and he if anybody must have known, that "there were a number of Pindhāris about the borders of Mahārāṣṭra and the Carnatic. ..." Unless these men emigrated from Khandesh about 1736 (that is a hundred years before 1826, the date of Grant Duff's book), their presence in the South with the same name tends to disprove any special connection between their name, Pindhāri, and a place, Pandhār, several hundred miles from their country. On the other hand, it is a very singular coincidence that men known as Pindhāris should have been newly settled about 1794 in a country which had been known as Pandhār at least ninety years before they thus occupied it. Such a mere fortuitous connection between Pandhār and the Pindhāris is so extraordinary that we may call it an impossibility. A fair inference is that the region Pandhār was the original home of the Pindhāris, that they took their name from it, and that grants of land between Burhānpur and Handīya were made to them in what had always been their home-country, namely Pandhār."

The Pindāris seem to have grown up in the wars of the late Mahommedan dynasties in the Deccan, and in the latter part of the 17th century attached themselves to the Mahrattas in their revolt against Aurungzib; the first mention which we have seen of the name occurs at this time. For some particulars regarding them we refer to the extract from Prinsep below. During and after the Mahratta wars of Lord Wellesley's time many of the Pindāris leaders obtained grants of land in Central India from Sinda and Holkar, and in the chaos which reigned at that time outside the British territory their raids in all directions, attended by the most savage atrocities, became more and more intolerable; these outrages extended from Bundelkhand on the N.E., Kadapa on the S., and Orissa on the S.E., to Guzerat on the W., and at last repeatedly violated British territory. In a raid made upon the coast extending from Masulipatam northward, the Pindāris in ten days plundered 339 villages, burning many, killing and wounding 682 persons, torturing 3600, and carrying off or destroying property to the amount of £250,000. It was not, however, till 1817 that the Governor-General, the Marquis of Hastings, found himself armed with permission from home, and in a position to strike at them effectually, and with the most extensive strategic combinations ever brought into action in India. The Pindāris were completely crushed, and those of the native princes who supported them compelled to submit, whilst the British power for the first time was rendered truly paramount throughout India.
the imperial camp."—Narrative of a Bondela officer, app. to Scott's Tr. of Virishita's H. of Deccan, ii. 122. [On this see Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 426. Mr. Irvine in the paper quoted above shows that it is doubtful if the author really used the word.

"By a strange coincidence the very copy used by J. Scott is now in the British Museum. On turning to the passage I find 'Pined Badar,' a well-known man of the period, and not Pindari or Pindaree at all.'"

1762.—"Siwooe Madhoo Rao . . . began to collect troops, stores, and heavy artillery, so that he at length assembled near 100,000 horse, 60,000 Pindarees, and 50,000 matchlock foot. . . In reference to the Pindarees, it is not unknown that they are a low tribe of robbers entertained by some of the princes of the Dakhan, to plunder and lay waste the territories of their enemies, and to serve for guides."—H. of Hider Naik, by Meer Hassan Ali Khan, 149. [Mr. Irvine suspects that this may be based on a mixed-up mis-spelling in the former quotation. The earliest undoubted mention of the name in native historians is by Râm Singh (1748). There is a doubtful reference in the Târikh-i-Muhammadí (1722-23)].

1784.—"Bindaras, who receive no pay, but give a certain monthly sum to the commander-in-chief for permission to maraud, or plunder, under sanction of his banners."—Indian Vocabulary, s.v.

1803.—"Depend upon it that no Pindaries or struggling horse will venture to your rear, so long as you can keep the enemy in check, and your detachment well in advance."—Wellington, ii. 219.

1823.—"On asking an intelligent old Pindary, who came to me on the part of Kurreem Khan, the reason of this absence of high character, he gave me a short and shrewd answer: 'Our occupation' (said he) 'was incompatible with the fine virtues and qualities you state; and I suppose if any of our people ever had them, the first effect of such good feeling would be to make him leave our community.'—Sir John Malcolm, Central India, i. 496.

1. "He had ascended on horseback . . . being mounted on a Pindaree pony, an animal accustomed to climbing."—Hovel, Personal Narrative, 229."

1825.—"The name of Pindara is coeval with the earliest invasion of Hindoostan by the Mahattas. . . The designation was applied to a sort of sorry cavalry that accompanied the Peshâwa's armies in their expeditions, rendering them much the same service as the Cossacks perform for the armies of Russia. . . The several leaders went over with their bands from one chief to another, as best suited their private interests, or those of their followers. . . The rivers generally became fordable by the close of the Dussera. The horses then were shod, and a leader of tried courage and conduct having been chosen as Lukhuree, all that were inclined set forth on a foray or Lohbar, as it was called in the Pindaree nomenclature; all were mounted, though not equally well. Out of a thousand, the proportion of good cavalry might be 400: the favourite weapon was a bamboo spear . . . but . . . it was a rule that every 15th or 20th man of the fighting Pindarees should be armed with a matchlock. Of the remaining 600, 400 were usually common lootees (see LOOTY), indifferently mounted, and armed with every variety of weapon, and the rest, slaves, attendants, and camp-followers, mounted on tattoos, or wild ponies, and keeping up with the lohbar in the best manner they could."—Prinsep, Hist. of Pol. and Mil. Transactions (1813-1823), i. 37, note.

1829.—"The person of whom she asked this question said 'Brinjaree' (see BRINJARRY) . . . but the lady understood him Pindaree, and the name was quite sufficient. She jumped out of the palanquin and ran towards home, screaming, 'Pindarees, Pindarees.'"—Mem. of John Skipp, ii. 281.

1861.—"So I took to the hills of Malwa, and the free Pindaree life.'"—Sir A. Lyall, The Old Pindaree.

PINE-APPLE. (See ANANAS.) [The word has been corrupted by native weavers into pinphal or minpahal, as the name of a silk fabric, so called because of the pine-apple pattern on it. (See Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 99.)]

PINJRAPOLE, s. A hospital for animals, existing perhaps only in Guzerat, is so called. Guz. pinjrapor or pinjrapol, [properly a cage (pinjra) for the sacred bull (yaja) released in the name of Siva]. See Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 120, and Ovington, 300-301; [P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 67, 70. Forbes (Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 156) describes "the Banian hospital" at Surat; but they do not use this word, which Molesworth says is quite modern in Mahr.]

1808.—"Every marriage and mercantile transaction among them is taxed with a contribution for the Pinjrapole ostensibly."—R. Drummond.

PINTADO. From the Port.

a. A 'printed' (or 'spotted') cloth, i.e. chintz (q.v.). Though the word was applied, we believe, to all printed goods, some of the finer Indian chintzes were, at least in part, finished by hand-painting.

1579.—"With cloth of diverse colours, not much unlike our usual pentadoes."—Drake, World Encompassed, Hak. Soc. 143.

[1602.—". . . some fine pintadoes."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 34.]
1602-5.—“... about their loynes a fine Pintadoe.”—Scol's Discourse of Iaun, in Purchas, i. 164.

1606.—“Heare the Generall delivered a Letter from the KINGS MAILESTIE of ENGLAND, with a fayre standing Cuppe, and a cover double gilt, with divers of the choicest Pintadoes, which hee kindly accepted of.”—Middleton's Voyage, E. 3.

[1610.—“Pintadoes of divers sorts will sell. ... The names are Sarassa, Berumpury, large Chaudes, Selematt Cambaita, Selematt white and black, Cheat Betime and divers others.”—Dawners, Letters, i. 75.]

c. 1630.—“Also they stain Limmen cloth, which we call pantadoes.”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 304.]

1665.—“To Woodcott ... where was a roome hung with Pintado, full of figures greate and small, prettily representing sundry trades and occupations of the Indians.”—Evelyn's Diary, Dec. 30.

c. 1759.—“The chinta and other fine painted goods, will, if the market is not overstocked, find immediate vent, and sell for 100 p. cent.”—Letter from Pegu, in Dampynple, Or. Rep. i. 120.

b. A name (not Anglo-Indian) for the Guinea-fowl. This may have been given from the resemblance of the speckled feathers to a chinett. But in fact pinta in Portuguese is a 'spot,' or fleck, so that probably it only means speckled. This is the explanation of Bluteau. [The word is more commonly applied to the Cape Pigeon. See Mr. Gray's note on Pyrrh de Laveil, Hak. Soc. i. 21, who quotes from Fryer, p. 12.]

PISACHEE, Skt. piśācī, a she-demon, m. piśācā. In S. India some of the demons worshipped by the ancient tribes are so called. The spirits of the dead, and particularly of those who have met with violent deaths, are especially so entitled. They are called in Tamil pēy. Sir Walter Elliot considers that the Piśācās were (as in the case of Rākshasas) a branch of the aboriginal inhabitants. In a note he says: ‘The Piśācā dialect appears to have been a distinct Dravidian dialect, still to be recognised in the speech of the Paraiya, who cannot pronounce distinctly some of the pure Tamil letters.' There is, however, in the Hindu drama a Piśācā bhūta, a gibberish or corruption of Sanskrit, introduced. [This at the present day has been applied to English.] The term piśācā is also applied to the small circular storms commonly by Europeans called devils (q.v.). We do not know where Archdeacon Hare (see below) found the Piśācā to be a white demon.

1610.—“The fifth (mode of Hindu marriage) is the Piśācā-civaḥ, when the lover, without obtaining the sanction of the girl's parents, takes her home by means of talismans, incantations, and such like magical practices, and then marries her. Piśāc, in Sanskrit, is the name of a demon, which takes whatever person it fixes on, and as the above marriage takes place after the same manner, it has been called by this name.”—The Indians, ii. 72; [See Manu, iii. 34.]

c. 1780.—“Quo demandez-vous? leur criait-je d'un ton de voix rude. "Pourquoi restez-vous là à m'attendre et d'où vient que ces autres femmes so sont enfinies, comme si j'étois un Pēśchaseh (esprit malin), ou une bête sauvage qui vouloit vous devourer?"”—Haufler, ii. 287.

1801.—“They believe that such men as die accidental deaths become Piśācī, or evil spirits, and are exceedingly troublesome by making extraordinary noises, in families, and occasioning fits and other diseases, especially in women.”—F. Buchanan's Myosor, iii. 17.

1816.—“Whirlwinds ... at the end of March, and beginning of April, carry dust and light things along with them, and are called by the natives peshashes or devils.”—Asiatic Journal, ii. 397.

1819.—“These demons or peshashes are the usual attendants of Shiva.”—Eskine on Elephants, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 219.

1827.—“As a little girl was playing round me one day with her white frock over her head, I laughingly called her Pisahsee, the name which the Indians give to their white devil. The child was delighted with so fine a name, and ran about the house crying out to every one she met, I am the Pisahsee, I am the Pisahsee. Would she have done so, had she been wrapt in black, and called witch or devil instead? No: for, as usual, the reality was nothing, the sound and colour everything.”—J. C. Hare, in Games at Truth, by Two Brothers, 1st Series, ed. 1838, p. 7.

PISANG, s. This is the Malay word for plantain or banana (q.v.). It is never used by English people, but is the usual word among the Dutch, and common also among the Germans, [Norwegians and Swedes, who probably got it through the Dutch.]

1651.—“Les Cottanuins vendent des fruits, come du Pisang, &c.”—A. Roger, La Forse Ouvrere, p. 11.

c. 1785.—“Nous arrivâmes au grand village de Culla, où nous vimes de belles allées de bananiers ou pisang...”—Haufler, ii. 85.
[1875. — "Of the pisang or plantain . . . there are over thirty kinds, of which, the Pisang-mas, or golden plantain, so named from its colour, though one of the smallest, is nevertheless most deservedly prized." — Thomson, The Straits of Malacca, 8.]

PISPASH, s. Apparently a fictitious Anglo-Indian word, applied to a slop of rice-soup with small pieces of meat in it, much used in the Anglo-Indian nursery. [It is apparently F. pish.-pash, 'shivered or broken in pieces'; from Pers. pashidan.

1834.—"They found the Secretary disengaged, that is to say, if surrounded with huge volumes of Financial Reports on one side, and a small silver tray holding a mess of pispash on the other, can be called disengaged."—The Baboo, &c. i. 85.

PITARRAH, s. A coffer or box used in travelling by palankin, to carry the traveller's clothes, two such being slung to a banghy (q.v.). Hind. patdr, petdr, Skt. pitrdr, 'a basket.' The thing was properly a basket made of cane; but in later practice of tin sheet, with a light wooden frame.

[1833.—"... he sat in the palanquin, which was filled with water up to his neck, whilst everything he had in his bataras (or 'trunk') was soaked with wet. . . ."—Travels of Dr. Wolf, ii. 198.]

1839.—"The attention of the staff was called to the necessity of putting their pitarrahs and property in the Bungalow, as thieves abounded. 'My dear Sir,' was the reply, 'we are quite safe; we have nothing.'"—Delhi Gazette, Nov. 1.

1853.—"It was very soon settled that Oakfield was to send to the dak bungalow for his pitarrahs, and stay with Staunton for about three weeks."—W. D. Arnold, Oakfield, i. 226.

PLANTAIN, s. This is the name by which the Musa sapientum is universally known to Anglo-India. Books distinguish between the Musa sapientum or plantain, and the Musa paradisiaca or banana; but it is hard to understand where the line is supposed to be drawn. Variation is gradual and infinite.

The botanical name Musa represents the Ar. mawz, and that again is from the Skt. mocha. The specific name sapientum arises out of a misunderstanding of a passage in Pliny, which we have explained under the head Jack. The specific paradisiaca is derived from the old belief of Oriental Christians (entertained also, if not originated by the Mahomedans) that this was the tree from whose leaves Adam and Eve made themselves aprons. A further mystical interest attached also to the fruit, which some believed to be the forbidden apple of Eden. For in the pattern formed by the core or seeds, when the fruit was cut across, our forefathers discerned an image of the Cross, or even of the Crucifix.

Medieval travellers generally call the fruit either Musa or 'Fig of Paradise,' or sometimes 'Fig of India,' and to this day in the W. Indies the common small plantains are called 'figs.' The Portuguese also habitually called it 'Indian Fig.' And this perhaps originated some confusion in Milton's mind, leading him to make the Banyan (Ficus indica) of Pliny, as of modern botanists the Tree of the aprons, and greatly to exaggerate the size of the leaves of that ficus.

The name banana is never employed by the English in India, though it is the name universal in the London fruit-shops, where this fruit is now to be had at almost all seasons, and often of excellent quality, imported chiefly, we believe, from Madeira, and more recently from Jamaica. Mr. Skeat adds that in the Strait Settlements the name plantain seems to be reserved for those varieties which are only eatable when cooked, but the word banana is used indifferently with plantain, the latter being on the whole perhaps the rarer word.

The name plantain is no more originally Indian than is banana. It, or rather platano, appears to have been the name under which the fruit was first carried to the W. Indies, according to Oviedo, in 1516; the first edition of his book was published in 1526. That author is careful to explain that the plant was improperly so called, as it was quite another thing from the platano described by Pliny. Bluteau says the word is Spanish. We do not know how it came to be applied to the Musa. [Mr. Guppy (8 ser. Notes & Queries, viii. 87) suggests that "the Spaniards have obtained platano from the Carib and Gallbi words for banana, viz., balatana and palatana, by the process followed by the Australian colonists when they converted a native name for the casuarina trees into 'she-oak'; and that we can thus explain how platano came in Spanish.
to signify both the plane-tree and the banana.” Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives plantain from Lat. planta, ‘a plant’; properly ‘a spreading sucker or shoot’; and says that the plantain took its name from its spreading leaf.

The rapid spread of the plantain or banana in the West, whence both names were carried back to India, is a counterpart to the rapid diffusion of the ananas in the Old World of Asia.

It would seem from the translation of Mendoca that in his time (1585) the Spaniards had come to use the form plantano, which our Englishmen took up as plantan and plantain.

But even in the 1736 edition of Bailey’s Dict. the only explanation of plantain given is as the equivalent of the Latin plantago, the field-weed known by the former name. Platano and Plantano are used in the Philippine Islands by the Spanish population.

c. 1350.—“Sunt enim in orto illo Adae de Seyllano primo masse, quas incola ficas vocant ... et istud vidimus oculis nostris quod ubiquecumque incidit per transversum, in utraque parte inicisiam videtur ymago hominis crucifex ... et de istis folicis Adam et Eva fecerunt sibi perizomatam. ...” —John de Marignolli, in Cathay, &c. p. 352.

1384.—“And there is again a fruit which many people assert to be that regarding which our first father Adam sinned, and this fruit they call Mase ... in this fruit you see a very great miracle, for when you divide it anyway, whether lengthways or crosswise, or cut it as you will, you shall see inside, as it were, the image of the Crucifix; and of this we comraden many times made proof.” —Viaggio di Simone Sigoli (Firenze, 1882, p. 160).

1526 (tr. 1577).—“There are also certaine plantes whiche the Christians cal Platanis. In the myddest of the plant, in the highest part thereof, there groweth a cluster with fourtie or fiftie platanes about it. ... This cluster ought to be taken from the plant, when any one of the platanes begins to appeare yeowe, at which time they take it, and hang it in their houses, where all the cluster waxeth rype, with all his platanes.” —Oviedo, transl. in Eden’s Hist. of Travayle, f. 208.

1552 (tr. 1582).—“Moreover the Ilande (of Mombas) is very pleasant, having many orchards, wherein are planted and are growing. ... Figgess of the Indies.” —Castañeda, by N. L., f. 22.

1579.—“... a fruit which they call Figo (Magollane calls it a figge of a man long, but it is no other than that which the Spaniards and Portergalls have named Plantanes).” —Drake’s Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142.

1585 (tr. 1588).—“There are mountains very thick of orange trees, siders [i.e. cedrus, citrons], limes, plantanos, and palmes.” —Mendoca, by R. Parke, Hak. Soc. ii. 330.

1588.—“Our Generall made their wines to fetch vs Plantans, Lymmens, and Oranges, Pine-apples, and other fruits.” —Voyage of Master Thomas Candish, in Purchas, i. 64.

1588 (tr. 1604).—“... the first that shall bee needfull to treate of is the Plantain (Platano), or Plantan, as the vulgar call it. ... The reason why the Spaniards call it platano (for the Indians had no such name), was, as in other trees for that they have found some resemblance of the one with the other, even as they called some fruits prunes, pines, and cucumbers, being far different from those which are called by those names in Castile. The thing wherein was most resemblance, in my opinion, between the platanos at the Indies and those which the ancients did celebrate, is the greatness of the leaves. ... But, in truth, there is no more comparison nor resemblance of the one with the other than there is, as the Proverbs saith, betwixt an egge and a chesnut.” —Joseph de Acosta, transl. by E. G., Hak. Soc. i. 241.

1593.—“The plantane is a tree found in most parts of Africa and America of which two leaves are sufficient to cover a man from top to toe.” —Hawkins, Voyage into the South Sea, Hak. Soc. 49.

1610.—“... and every day failed not to send each man, being one and fiftie in number, two cakes of white bread, and a quantitie of Dates and Plantans ...” —Sir H. Middelton, in Purchas, i. 254.

1610.—“Cee Gentils ayant pitié de moy, il y eut vne femme qui me mit ... vne seruerie de feuilles de plantane accommode ensemble auec des espines, puis meletta dessus du rys cuit auec vne certaine sauce qu’ils appellent carri (see CURRY). ...” —Mocquot, Voyages, 292.

[...].—“They (elephants) require ... besides leaves of trees, chiefly of the Indian fig, which we call Bananas and the Turks plantenes.” —Pyrard de Laved, Hak. Soc. ii. 345.

1616.—“They have to these another fruit which they call Planten, of which many of them grow in clusters together ... very yellow when they are Ripe, and then they taste like unto a Norwich Pear, but much better.” —Terry, ed. 1665, p. 390.

1635.—“... with candy Plantains and the juicy Pine, On choicest Melons and sweet Grapes they dine, And with Potatoes eat their wanton Swine.” —Walter, Battle of the Summer Islands.

[1757.—Clive’s original report of the battle is dated on the “plain of Placis.”—Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 51.]

1705.—“General Clive, who should have been the leader of the English troops in this battle (Plassy), left the command to Colonel Coote, and remained hid in his palanquin during the combat, out of the reach of the shot, and did not make his appearance before the enemy were put to flight.” —Slavorinus, E.T. i. 486. This stupid and inaccurate writer says that several English officers who were present at the battle related this “anecdote” to him. This, it may be hoped, is as untrue as the rest of the story. Even to such a writer one would have supposed that Clive’s mettle would be familiar.

PODAR, s. Hind. poddar, corrn. of Pers. fotadar, from fora, ‘a bag of money.’ A cash-keeper, or especially an officer attached to a treasury, whose business it is to weigh money and bullion and appraise the value of coins.

[c. 1590.—“The Treasurer. Called in the language of the day Fotadar.”—Au, ed. Jarrett, ii. 49.]

1860.—“Podar.” (See under DUSTOOR.)

1683.—“The like losses in proportion were preferable to be proved by Ramchurne Podar, Benares bun Podar, and Mamoo-bhishwas who produced their several books for evidence.” —Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 84.

[1772. —“Podar, a money-changer or teller, under a shroff.” —Verelst, View of Bengal, Gloss. s. v.]

POGGLE, PUGGLY, &c., s. Properly Hind. pægal; ‘a madman, an idiot;’ often used colloquially by Anglo-Indians. A friend belonging to that body used to adduce a macaronic adage which we fear the non-Indian will fail to appreciate: “Pagal et pecunia jaldē separatūr!” [See NAUTCH.]

1829.—“It’s true the people call me, I know not why, the pugley.” —Mem. John Shipp, ii. 255.

POLEA, n.p. Mal. pulayan, [from Tam. pulam, ‘a field,’ because in Malabar they are occupied in rice cultivation]. A person of a low or impure tribe, who causes pollution (pula) to those of higher caste, if he approaches within a certain distance. [The rules which regulate their meeting with other people are given by Mr. Logan (Malabar, i. 118).] From pula the Portuguese formed also the verbs impollere-se, ‘to become polluted by the touch of a low-caste person,’ and desempoller-se, ‘to purify oneself after such pollution’ (Gouvea, f. 97, and Synod, f. 52v), superstitions which Menezes found prevailing among the Christians of Malabar: (See HÍRAVA.)

1510.—‘The fifth class are called Poliar, who collect pepper, wine, and nuts... the Poliar may not approach either the Naeri (see NAIR) or the Brahmins within 50 paces, unless they have been called by them...’—Varthema, 142.

1516.—‘There is another lower sort of gentiles called puler. They do not speak to the naers except for a long way off, as far as they can be heard speaking with a loud voice... And whatever man or woman should touch them, their relations immediately kill them like a contaminated thing...’—Barbosa, 143.

1572.—‘A ley, da gente toda, ricca e pobre, De fabulas composta se imagina: Andião nus, e somente hum pano cobre As partes que a cubrir natura ensina. Dous modos ha de gente; porque a nobre Nayros chamados são, e a menos dina Poleas tem por nome, a quem obriga A ley não misturar a casta antiga.”—Camões, vii. 37.

By Burton:

“The Law that holds the people high and low, is fraught with false phantastick tales long past; they go unclothed, but a wrap they throw for decent purpose round the loins and waist: Two modes of men are known: the nobles know the name of Nayrs, who call the lower caste Poleas, whom their haughty laws contain from intermingling with the higher strain...”

1598.—‘When the Portuguese came first into India, and made league and composition with the King of Cochin, the Nayros desired that men should give them place, and turn out of the Way, when they mete in the Streets, as the Polyas...’ (used to do).—Linachoten, 78; [Hak. Soc. i. 281; also see i. 279].

1606.—‘...he said by way of insult that he would order him to touch a Polea, which is one of the lowest castes of Malabar.’—Gouvea, f. 78.

1626.—‘These Puler are Theeves and Sorcerers.”—Porchas, Pilgrimage, 553.

[1727.—“Poulias.” (See under MUCOA.)

[1766.—“...Pologihees, a cast hardly suffered to breathe the common air, being driven into the forrests and mountains out of the commerce of mankind...”—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 161 seq.]

1770.—‘Their degradation is still more complete on the Malabar coast, which has not been subdued by the Mogul, and where they (the pariah) are called Pouliats.”—Raynal, E.T. 1798, i. 6.

1865.—‘...Further south in India we find polyandry among... Poleres of Malabar.”—McLeanen, Primitive Marriage, 179.

POLIGAR, s. This term is peculiar to the Madras Presidency. The persons so called were properly subordinate feudal chiefs, occupying tracts more or less wild, and generally of predatory habits in former days; they are now much the same as Zemindars in the highest use of that term (q.v.). The word is Tam. pâlaiyakkâran, ‘the holder of a pâlaiyam,’ or feudal estate; Tel. pâlegâdu; and thence Mahr. pâlegâ; the English form being no doubt taken from one of the two latter. The southern Poligars gave much trouble about 100 years ago, and the “Poligar wars” were somewhat serious affairs. In various assaults on Pânjâ lakurichî, one of their forts in Tinnevelly, between 1799 and 1801 there fell 15 British officers. Much regarding the Poligars of the south will be found in Nelson’s Madura, and in Bishop Caldwell’s very interesting History of Tinnevelly. Most of the quotations apply to those southern districts. But the term was used north to the Marhatta boundary.

1681.—‘...They pulled down the Poligar’s houses, who being conscious of his guilt, had fled and hid himself.”—Wheeler, i. 118.

1701.—‘Le lendemain je me rendis à Tailur, c’est une petite ville qui appartient à un autre Paleagaren.”—Let. Edif. x. 269.

1754. "A Polygar . . . undertook to conduct them through defiles and passes known to very few except himself."—Orme, i. 373.

1750."He (Hyder) now moved towards the pass of Changana, and encamped upon his side of it, and sent ten thousand Poligars to clear away the pass, and make a road sufficient to enable his artillery and stores to pass through."—Haw, James Lindsay, in Lives of the Lindsay, iii. 238.

"The matchlock men are generally accompanied by poligars, a set of fellows that are almost savage, and make use of no other weapon than a pointed bamboo spear, 18 or 20 feet long."—Munro's Narrative, 131.

1783."To Mahomet Ali they twice sold the Kingdom of Tanjore. To the same Mahomet Ali they sold at least twelve sovereign princes called the Polygars."—Burke's Speech on Fox's India Bill, in Works, iii. 458.

1800."I think Pournaya's mode of dealing with these rajahs . . . is excellent. He sets them up in palankins, elephants, &c., and a great sawarry, and makes them attend to his person. They are treated with great respect, which they like, but can do no mischief in the country. Old Hyder adopted this plan, and his operations were seldom impeded by polygar wars."—A. Wellesley to T. Midrardo, in Arbuthnot's Mem. xxi.

1801."The southern Poligars, a race of rude warriors habituated to arms of independence, had been but lately subdued."—Wilson, i. 57.

1809."Tondiman is an hereditary title. His subjects are Polygars, and since the late war . . . he is become the chief of those tribes, among whom the singular law exists of the female inheriting the sovereignty in preference to the male."—Ed. Valentina, i. 364.

1808."There are 72 bastions to the fort of Madura; and each of them was now formally placed in charge of a particular chief, who was bound for himself and his heirs to keep his post at all times, and under all circumstances. He was also bound to pay a fixed annual tribute; to supply and keep in readiness a quota of troops for the Governor's armies; to keep the Governor's peace over a particular tract of country. . . . A grant was made to him of a tract of a country . . . together with the title of Palleya Kâran (Polygar). . . ."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii. p. 99.

"Some of the Poligars were placed in authority over others, and in time of war were answerable for the good conduct of their subordinates. Thus the Sethupati was chief of them all; and the Polygar of Dindigul is constantly spoken of as being the chief of eighteen Poligars . . . when the levying of troops was required the Delavary (see DALAWAY) sent requisitions to such and such Poligars to furnish so many armed men within a certain time. . . ."—Nelson's Madura, Pt. iii. p. 157.

The word got transferred in English parlance to the people under such Chiefs (see quotations above, 1750-1809); and especially, it would seem, to those whose habits were predatory:

1869."There is a third well-defined race mixed with the general population, to which a common origin may probably be assigned. I mean the predatory classes. In the south they are called Poligars, and consist of the tribes of Marawars, Kallars (see COLLERY), Badars (see BYDE), Ramuses (see RAMOOSY): and in the North are represented by the Kolis (see COOLY) of Gazerat, and the Gajars (see GOOJUR) of the N.W. Provinces."—Sir Walter Elliot, in J. Ethn. Soc. L., N.S. i. 112.

[POLIGAR DOG, s. A large breed of dogs found in S. India. "The Polygar dog is large and powerful, and is peculiar in being without hair." (Balfour, Cyc. i. 568.)]

[1853."It was evident that the original breed had been crossed with the bull-dog, or the large Poligar dog of India."—Campbell, Old Forest Ranger, 3rd ed. p. 12.]

POLLAM, s. Tam. pâlaiyam; Tel. pâlemu; (see under POLIGAR).

1783."The principal reason which they assigned against the extirpation of the poligars (see POLIGAR) was that the weavers were protected in their fortresses. They might have added, that the Company itself which stung them to death, had been warred in the bosom of these unfortunate princes; for on the taking of Madras by the French, it was in their hospitable pollams that most of the inhabitants found refuge and protection."—Burke's Speech on Fox's E. I. Bill, in Works, iii. 488.

1795."Having submitted the general remarks on the Pollams I shall proceed to observe that in general the conduct of the Poligars is much better than could be expected from a race of men, who have hitherto been excluded from those advantages, which almost always attend conquered countries, an intercourse with their conquerors. With the exception of a very few, when I arrived they had never seen a European. . . ."—Report on Dindigul, by Mr. Wynch, quoted in Nelson's Madura, Pt. iv. p. 15.

POLO, s. The game of hockey on horseback, introduced of late years into England, under this name, which comes from Balti; polo being properly in the language of that region the ball used in the game. The game thus lately revived was once known and practised (though in various forms) from Provence to the borders of China (see CHICANE). It had continued to exist down to our own day, it would seem, only near the extreme East and the extreme West of the Himālaya, viz. at Manipur in the East (between Cachar and Burma), and on the West in the high valley of the Indus (in Lādāk, Balti, Astōr and Gilgit, and extending into Chitrāl). From the former it was first adopted by our countrymen at Calcutta, and a little later (about 1864) it was introduced into the Punjab, almost simultaneously from the Lower Provinces and from Kashmir, where the summer visitors had taken it up. It was first played in England, it would seem at Aldershot, in July 1871, and in August of the same year at Dublin in the Phœnix Park. The next year it was played in many places.* But the first mention we can find in the Times is a notice of a match at Lillie-Bridge, July 11, 1874, in the next day’s paper. There is mention of the game in the Illustrated London News of July 20, 1872, where it is treated as a new invention by British officers in India. [According to the author of the Badminton Library treatise on the game, it was adopted by Lieut. Sherer in 1854, and a club was formed in 1859. The same writer fixes its introduction into the Punjab and N.W.P. in 1861-62. See also an article in Bailey’s Magazine on “The Early History of Polo” (June 1890). The Central Asian form is described, under the name of Baiga or Kok-būra, “grey wolf,” by Schuyler (Turkistan, i. 268 seqq.) and that in Dardistan by Biddulph (Tribes of the Hindoo Koosh, 84 seqq.). In Lādāk it is not indigenous, but an introduction from Baltistan. See a careful and interesting account of the game of those parts in Mr. F. Drew’s excellent book, The Jummo and Kashmir Territories, 1875, pp. 380-392.

We learn from Professor Tylor that the game exists still in Japan, and a very curious circumstance is that the polo racket, just as that described by

Jo. Cinnamus in the extract under CHICANE has survived there. [See Chamberlain, Things Japanese, 3rd ed. 333 seqq.]

1835.—“The ponies of Muneepoor hold a very conspicuous rank in the estimation of the inhabitants. . . . The national game of Hockey, which is played by every male of the country capable of sitting a horse, renders them all expert equestrians; and it was by men and horses so trained, that the princes of Muneepoor were able for many years not only to repel the aggressions of the Burmahs, but to save the whole country . . . and plant their banners on the banks of the Irrawattee.”—Penberton’s Report on the E. Frontier of Br. India, 31-32.

1838.—“At Shigur I first saw the game of the Chaughtān, which was played the day after our arrival on the Mydan or plain laid out expressly for the purpose. . . . It is in fact hockey on horseback. The ball, which is larger than a cricket ball, is only a globe made of a kind of willow-wood, and is called in Tibet ‘Pulu’ . . . I can conceive that the Chaughtān requires only to be seen to be played. It is the fit sport of an equestrian nation. . . . The game is played at almost every valley in Little Tibet and the adjoining countries. . . . Ladakh, Yessen, Chitral, &c.; and I should recommend it to be tried on the Hippodrom at Bayswater.” . . .—Vigne, Travels in Kashmir, Ladakh, Iskardo, &c. (1842), ii. 289-392.

1848.—“An assembly of all the principal inhabitants took place at Iskardo, on some occasion of ceremony or festivity. . . . I was thus fortunate enough to be a witness of the chaugan, which is derived from Persia, and has been described by Mr. Vigne as hockey on horseback. . . . Large quadrangular enclosed meadows for this game may be seen in all the larger villages of Balti, often surrounded by rows of beautiful willow and poplar trees.” . . .—Dr. T. Thomson, Himalaya and Tibet, 290-291.

1875.—“Polo. Tent-pegging, Hurlingham, the Rink, I leave all these delights.”

Browning, Ivan Album, 23.

POLLOCK-SAUG, s. Hind. pālak, pālak-sāg; a poor vegetable, called also ‘country spinach’ (Beta vulgaris, or B. Bengalensis, Roxb.). [Riddell (Domest. Econ. 579) calls it ‘Bengal Beet.’]

POLONGA, TIC-POLONGA, s. A very poisonous snake, so called in Ceylon (Bungarus? or Daboia elegans?); Singh. poljānā. [The Madras Gloss. identifies it with the Daboia elegans, and calls it ‘Chain viper, ‘Necklace snake,’ ‘Russell’s viper,’ or cobra manilla. The Singh. name is said to be titapolanga, tit, 'spotted,' polu-ga, 'viper.'"

1681.—"There is another venomous snake called Polongo, the most venomous of all, that kills cattel. Two sorts of them I have seen, the one green, the other of reddish gray, full of white rings along the sides, and about five or six feet long."—Knox, 29.

1827.—"There are only four snakes ascertained to be poisonous; the cobra de capello is the most common, but its bite is not so certainly fatal as that of the tie polonga, which destroys life in a few minutes."—Mrs. Heber, in H.'s Journal, ed. 1844, ii. 167.

POMFRET, POMPHRET. s. A genus of sea-fish of broad compressed form, embracing several species, of good repute for the table on all the Indian coasts. According to Day they are all reducible to Sternopterus sinesis, 'the white Pomfret,' Str. cinereus, which is, when immature, 'the silver Pomfret,' and when mature, 'the gray Pomfret,' and Str. niger, 'the black P.' The French of Pondicherry call the fish palmpe. We cannot connect it with the πουπαμως of Aelian (xv. 23) and Athenaeus (Lib. VII. cap. xviii. segg.) which is identified with a very different fish, the 'pilot-fish' (Nau- crates duxor of Day). The name is probably from the Portuguese, and a corruption of pampano, 'a vine-leaf,' from supposed resemblance; this is the Portuguese name of a fish which occurs just where the pomfret should be mentioned. Thus:

[1698.—"The best fish is called Mordexiin, Pampano, and Tatitango."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. ii. 11.]

[1703.—". . . Albacosres, Daubhins, Paumphlets."—In Yute, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. ccxxxiv.]

1727.—"Between Guanao and Balasore Rivers . . . a very delicious Fish called the Pampilee, come in Sholes, and are sold for two Pence per Hundred. Two of them are sufficient to dine a moderate Man."—J. Hamilton, i. 396; [ed. 1744].

1810.—"Another face look'd broad and bland Like pamfret floundering on the sand; Whene'er she turned her piercing stare, She seemed alert to spring in air."—Malay verses, rendered by Dr. Leyden, in Maria Graham, 201.

1813.—"The pomfret is not unlike a small turbot, but of a more delicate flavour; and epicures esteem the black pomfret a great dainty."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 52-53; [2nd ed. i. 36].

[1822.—". . . the lad was brought up to catch pamphlets and bombaloes. . . ."—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 106.]

1874.—"The greatest pleasure in Bombay was eating a fish called 'pomfret.'"—Sat. Rev., 30th May, 690.

[1896.—"Another account of this sort of seine fishing, for catching pomfret fish, is given by Mr. Gueritz."—Ing Roth, Natives of Sarawak, i. 455.]

POMMELO, PAMPELMOOSE, &c., s. Citrus decumana, L, the largest of the orange-tribe. It is the same fruit as the shaddock of the West Indies; but to the larger varieties some form of the name Pommeleo seems also to be applied in the West. A small variety, with a fine skin, is sold in London shops as "the Forbidden fruit." The fruit, though grown in gardens over a great part of India, really comes to perfection only near the Equator, and especially in Java, whence it was probably brought to the continent. For it is called in Bengal Batavri nimoba (i.e. Citrus Bataviana). It probably did not come to India till the 17th century; it is not mentioned in the Ain. According to Bretschneider the Pommelo is mentioned in the ancient Chinese Book of the Shu-King. Its Chinese name is Yu.

The form of the name which we have put first is that now general in Anglo-Indian use. But it is probably only a modern result of 'striving after meaning' (quasi Pomomeleone?). Among older authors the name goes through many strange shapes. Traveller calls it pompone (Voy. des Indes, liv. iii. ch. 24; [ed. Ball, i. 360]), but the usual French name is pampele-mousse. Dampier has Pumpleonese (ii. 125); Lockyer, Pumplemuse (51); Forrest, Pummealose (32); Ives, 'pimple-ness, called in the West Indies Chaddocks' [19]. Maria Graham uses the French spelling (22). Pompoleon is a form unknown to us, but given in the Eng. Cyclopaedia. Molesworth's Marathi Dict. gives "papannas, papanas, or papanis (a word of S. America)." We are unable to give the true etymology, though Littre says boldly "Tamoul, bambalimos." Ainslie (Mat. Medica, 1813) gives Poomlimas as the Tamil, whilst Balfour (Cycl. of India) gives Pampalimas and Bambulimas as Tamil, Bombarimasa and Pampa-paranasa as Telugu, Bambali naringa as Malayalam. But if these are real words they appear to be corruptions of some foreign term. [Mr. F. Brandt points out that the above forms are merely various attempts to transliterate a word which is in Tamil pambalimansu, while the Malayalam is bambali-nadram ‘bambili’ tree." According to the Madras Gloss. all these, as well as the English forms, are ultimately derived from the Malay pungunulas. Mr. Skeat writes: "In an obsolete Malay dict., by Howison (1801) I find 'poonamplema, a fruit brought from India by Captain Shaddock, the seeds of which were planted at Barbadoes, and afterwards obtained his name; the affix moos appears to be the Dutch moes, 'vegetable.'" If this be so, the Malay is not the original form."

1661.—"The fruit called by the Netherlanders Pumpelmoos, by the Portuguese Jamboo, grows in superfluity outside the city of Batavia. ... This fruit is larger than any of the lemon-kind, for it grows as large as the head of a child of 10 years old. The core or inside is for the most part reddish, and has a kind of sourish sweetness, tasting like unripe grapes." —Walter Schulten, 236

PONDICHERY, n.p. This name of what is now the chief French settlement in India, is Pudu-chicheri, or Puthupezhi, 'New Town,' more correctly Pudu-vai, Puthuvai, meaning 'New Place.' C. P. Brown, however, says it is Pudicherry, 'New Tank.' The natives sometimes write it Puthcheri. [Mr. Garstine (Man. S. Arot. 452) says that Hindus call it Puthuva or Puthupezhi, while Musulmans call it Pulecheri, or as the Madras Gloss. writes the word, Pulcheri.]

1683.—"... Interlopers intend to settle at Verampatnam, a place near Pullicher. ..."—Prince, Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 41. In iv. 113 (1855) we have Pondicherry.

1711.—"The French and Danes likewise hire them (Portuguese) at Pond de Chere and Trincembar."—Lockyer, 280.

1718. —"The Fifth Day: we reached Badulsheri, a French Town, and the chief Seat of their Missionaries in India."—Prop. of the Gospel, p. 42.

1726. —"Poedecherry," in Valentijn, Chor. 11.

1727.—"Punchebery is the next Place of Note on this Coast, a colony settled by the French."—A. Hamilton, i. 326; [ed. 1744].

1753.—"L'établissement des Français à Pondichery remonte jusqu'en l'année 1674; mais par de si foibles commencements, qu'on n'aurait eu de la peine à imaginer, que les suites en fussent aussi considérables."—D'Anville, p. 121.

1780.—"An English officer of rank, General Coote, who was unequalled among his compœers in ability and experience in war, and who had frequently fought with the French of Phoolcheri in the Kurnatie and ... had as often gained the victory over them. ..."—H. of Hyder Naik, 413.

PONGOL, s. A festival of S. India, observed early in January. Tam. pongol, 'boiling'; i.e. of the rice, because the first act in the feast is the boiling of the new rice. It is a kind of harvest-home. There is an interesting account of it by the late Mr. C. E. Gover (J. R. As. Soc. N.S. v. 91), but the connection which he traces with the old Vedic religion is hardly to be admitted. [See the meaning of the rite discussed by Dr. Fraser, Golden Bough, 2nd ed. iii. 305 seq.]

1651.—"... nous parlerons maintenant du Pongol, qui se celebre le 9 de Janvier en l'honneur du Soleil. ... Ils cuisent du ris avec du lait. ... Ce ris se cuir hors la maison, afin que le Solei puisse luire dessus ... et quand ils voyent, qu'il semble le vouoir retirer, ils crient d'une voix inteligible, Pongol, Pongol, Pongol ..."—Abr. Roger, Fr. Tr. 1670, pp. 237-8.

1871.—"Nor does the gentle and kindly influence of the time cease here. The files of the Munsil's Court will have been examined with cases from litigious enemies or greedy money lenders. But as Pongol comes round many of them disappear. ... The creditor thinks of his debtor, the debtor of the creditor. The one relents, the other is ashamed, and both parties are saved by a compromise. Often it happens that a process is postponed 'till after Pongol!'"—Gover, as above, p. 96.

POOJA, s. Properly applied to the Hindu ceremonies in idol-worship; Skt. pûjā; and colloquially to any kind of rite. Thus jhanda kî pûjā, or 'Pooja of the flag,' is the sepyo term for what in St. James's Park is called 'Trooping of the colours.' [Used in the plural, as in the quotation of 1900, it means the holidays of the Durga Pûjā or Dussera.]

1776.—"... the occupation of the Bramin should be ... to cause the performance of the poojen, i.e. the worship to Deocah . . ."—Halhed, Code, ed. 1781, Pref. xcix.
[1813.—" . . . the Pundits in attendance commenced the pooja, or sacrifice, by pouring milk and curds upon the branches, and smearing over the leaves with wetted rice."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1852, p. 214.]

1826.—"The person whose steps I had been watching now approached the sacred tree, and having performed puja to a stone deity at its foot, proceeded to unmuffle himself from his shawls . . ."—Pandurang Harri, 26; [ed. 1873, i. 34].

1866.—"Yes, Sahib, I Christian boy.
Plenty poojah do. Sunday time never no work do."—Trevithian, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. 226.

1874.—"The mass of the ryots who form the population of the village are too poor to have a family deity. They are forced to content with . . . the annual pujahs performed . . . on behalf of the village community."—Col. Rev. No. exvii. 195.

1879.—"Among the curiosities of these lower galleries are little models of costumes and country scenes, among them a grand puja under a tree."—Sat. Rev. No. 1251,
p. 477.

[1900.—"Calcutta has been in the throes of the Pujahs since yesterday."—Pioneer Mail, 5 Oct.].

POOJAREE, s. Hind. pujārī. An officiating priest in an idol temple.

1702.—"L'office de poujari ou de Prë-tresse de la Reine mère était incompatible avec le titre de servante du Seigneur."— Lett. Édit. xi. 111.

[1891.—"Then the Pujari, or priest, takes the Bhuta sword and bell in his hands. . . .
—Monier-Williams, Brahmanism and Hinduism, 4th ed. 249].

POOL, s. P.—H. pul, 'a bridge.'
Used in two of the quotations under the next article for 'embankment.'

[1812.—"The bridge is thrown over the river . . . it is called the Pool Khan . . .
—Morier, Journey through Persia, 124].

POOLBUNDY, s. P.—H. pulbandi, 'Securing of bridges or embankments.'
A name formerly given in Bengal to a civil department in charge of the embankments. Also sometimes used improperly for the embankment itself.

[1765.—"Deduct Poolbundy advanced for repairs of dykes, roads, &c."—Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 213.

[c. 1781.—"Pay your constant devoirs to Marian Altpyre, or sell yourself soul and body to Poolbundy."—Ext. from Hicky's Gazetteer, in Busted, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. 178. This refers to Impye, who was called by this name in allusion to a lucrative contract given to his relative, a Mr. Fraser.]

1786.—"That the Superintendent of Poolbundy Repairs, after an accurate and diligent survey of the bunds and pools, and the provincial Council of Burdwan . . .
had delivered it as their opinion . . ."— Articles of Charge against Warren Hastings, in Burke, vii. 93.

1802.—"The Collector of Midnapore has directed his attention to the subject of poolbundy, and in a very ample report to the Board of Revenue, has described certain abuses and oppressions, consisting chiefly of pressing ryots to work on the pools, which fall alowd for a remedy."—Fifth Report, App. p. 558.

1810.—" . . . the whole is obliged to be preserved from inundation by an embankment called the pool bandy, maintained at a very great and regular expense."—
Williamson, V. M., ii. 365.

POON, PEON, &c., s. Can. ponne, [Mal. punna, Skt. punāgra]. A timber tree (Calophyllum inophyllum, L.) which grows in the forests of Canara, &c., and which was formerly used for masts, whence also called mast-wood. [Lin-schoten refers to this tree, but not by name (Hak. Soc. i. 67).]

[1727.—" . . . good Poon-masts, stronger but heavier than Fīrr."—A. Hamilton, ed.
1744, i. 267.

[1776.—" . . . Poooon-masts, chiefly from the Malabar coast."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 109.]

[1773.—"Poon tree . . . the wood light but tolerably strong; it is frequently used for masts, but unless great care be taken to keep the wet from the ends of it, it soon rots."—Isss, 480.]

[1855.—"Poon, or Puna . . . the largest sort is of a light, bright colour, and may be had at Mangalore, from the forests of Coromuel in Canara, where it grows to a length of 150 feet. At Mangalore I procured a tree of this sort that would have made a foremast for the Leander, 60-gun ship, in one piece, for 1300 Rupees."—Edge, in J. R. As. Soc. ii. 354.

POONAMALEE, n.p. A town, and formerly a military station, in the Chingleput Dist. of Madras Presidency, 13 miles west of Madras. The name is given in the Imp. Gazetteer as Pānā-mallu (I), and Ponda malāi, whilst Col. Branfill gives it as "Pāntha mallī dei Pāvinthalamallī," without further explanation. [The Madras Gloss. gives Tam. Pundamalli, 'town of the jasmine creeper,' which is largely grown there for the supply of the Madras markets.

[1876.—"The dog, a small piebald cur, with a short tail, not unlike the 'Poonamelle terrier,' which the British soldier is wont to manufacture from Pariah dogs for 'Griffins' with sporting proclivities, POONGERI, PHOOGY. s. The name most commonly given to the Buddhist religieux in British Burma. The word (p'gun-yyi) signifies 'great glory.'

1782.—"... leurs Prêtres ... sont moins instruits que les Brames, et portent le nom de Ponguis."—Sonnerat, ii. 301.

1795.—"From the many convents in the neighbourhood of Rangoon, the number of Bhahans and Phongis must be very considerable; I was told it exceeded 1500."—Symes, Embassy to Ava, 219.

1804.—The Talapoinis are called by the Burmese Phonghis, which term means great glory, or Bhahans, which means perfect."—Bp. Bigandet, in J. Ind. Archip. iv. 222-3.

1886.—"Every Burman has for some time during his life to be a Poonge, or monk."—Lady Dufferin, Viceregal Life, 177.

POORÁNA, s. Skt. purāṇa, 'old,' hence 'legendary,' and thus applied as a common name to 18 books which contain the legendary mythology of the Brahmans.

1612.—"... These books are divided into bodies, members, and joints (corticis, membros, e articulos) ... six which they call Xastra (see SHASTER), which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Purana, which are the members; twenty-eight called Ayamon, which are the joints."—Couto, Dec. V. liv. vi. cap. 3.

1651.—"As their Poranas, i.e. old histories, relate."—Rogerius, 153.

1667.—"When they have acquired a knowledge of Sanscrit ... they generally study the Purana, which is an abridgment and interpretation of the Bhats" (see VEDAS).—Berner, ed. Constable, p. 335.

c. 1760.—"Le puran comprend dix-huit livres qui renferment l'histoire sacrée, qui contient les dogmes de la religion des Brames."—Encyclopédie, xxvii. 507.

1806.—"Ceux-ci, calculent tout haut de mémorial tandis que d'autres, plus avancés, lissoient, d'un ton chantant, leurs Pourans."—Hafner, i. 190.

POORUB, and POORBEEM, s. Hind. pūrab, pārth, 'the East,' from Skt. pūrva or pārva, 'in front of,' as pachha (Hind. pachham) means 'behind' or 'westerly' and dakshina, 'right-hand' or southerly. In Upper India the term means usually Oudh, the Benares division, and Behar. Hence Poorbeea (pārbiya), a man of those countries, was, in the days of the old Bengal army, often used for a sepooy, the majority being recruited in those provinces.

1553.—"Omaum (Humāyūn) Patxiāh ... resolved to follow Xerchan (Sher Khān) and try his fortunes against him ... and they met close to the river Ganges before it unites with the river Jamouma, where on the West bank of the river there is a city called Canose (Canauj), one of the chief of the kingdom of Dely. Xerchan was beyond the river in the tract which the natives call Purba."—Barros, IV. ix. 9.

1611.—"Pierb is 400 coss long."—Jourdain, quoted in Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 538.

1616.—"Bengala, a most spacious and fruitful province, but more properly to be called a kingdom, which hath two very large provinces within it, Pur and Patan, the one lying on the east, the other on the west side of the river."—Terry, ed. 1695, p. 357.

1666.—"La Provinse de Halabas s'appelloit autrefois Puroup. ..."—Thevenot, v. 197.

[1773.—"Instead of marching with the great army he had raised into the Purbuanca country ... we were informed he had turned his arms against us. ..."—Ives, 91.]

1881.—"... My lands were taken away, And the Company gave me a pension of just eight annas a day; And the Poorbeacs swaggered about our streets if they had done it all. ..."—Attar Singh loquitur, by 'Sonar,' Sir M. Durand in an Indian paper, the name and date lost.

c. 1817.—"The day after tomorrow will be my lad James Dawson's birthday, and we are to have a puttully-nautch in the evening."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, 291.

POPPER-CAKE, in Bombay, and in Madras popadam, ss. These are apparently the same apparent word and thing, though to the former is attributed a Hind. and Mahr. origin pāpar, Skt. parpata, and to the latter a Tamil one, pappadam, as an abbreviation of parippu-adum, 'lentil cake.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tel. appadam, Tam. appalam (see HOPPER), and Mal. pappatam, from parippu, 'dhall,' ata, 'cake.'] It is a kind of thin scone or wafer, made of any kind of pulse or lentil flour, seasoned with asafetida, &c., fried in oil, and in W. India baked crisp, and often eaten at European tables as an accompaniment to curry. It is not bad, even to a novice.
1814.—"...They are very fond of a thin cake, or wafer, called pepper, made from the flour of oor or mash... highly seasoned with asa-foetida; a salt called popper-khor; and a very hot massala (see MSSALLA), compounded of turmeric, black pepper, ginger, garlic, several kinds of warm seeds, and a quantity of the hottest Chili pepper."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 50; [2nd ed. i. 347].

1820.—"Papadoms (fine cakes made of gram-flour and a fine species of alkali, which gives them an agreeable salt taste, and serves the purpose of yeast, making them rise, and become very crisp when fried...."—As. Researches, xiii. 315.

"Paper, the flour of oored (see OORD), salt, asa-foetida, and various spices, made into a paste, rolled as thin as a wafer, and dried in the sun, when wanted for the table baked crisp...."—T. Coates, in Tr. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 194.

PORCA, n.p. In Imp. Gazetteer Porakdt, also called Piracaca; properly Porakkdt, [or according to the Madras Gloss. Porakkdtu, Mal. pura, 'outside,' katu, 'jungle']. A town on the coast of Travancore, formerly a separate State. The Portuguese had a fort here, and the Dutch, in the 17th century, a factory. Fra Paolina (1796) speaks of it as a very populous city full of merchants, Mahomedans, Christian, and Hindu. It is now insignificant. [See Logan, Malabar, i. 338.]

[1863-4.—"Your factories of Carwar and Porquatt are continued but to very little purpose to you."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, f. 18.]

PORCELAIN, s. The history of this word for China-ware appears to be as follows. The family of univalve mollusks called Cypraeidae, or Cowries, (q.v.) were in medieval Italy called porcellana and porcellata, almost certainly from their strong resemblance to the body and back of a pig, and not from a grosser analogy suggested by Mahn (see in Littre sub voce). That this is so is strongly corroborated by the circumstance noted by Dr. J. E. Gray (see Eng. Cyc. Nat. Hist. s.v. Cypraeidae) that Pig is the common name of shells of this family on the English coast; whilst Sow also seems to be a name of one or more kinds. The enamel of this shell seems to have been used in the Middle Ages to form a coating for ornamental pottery, &c., whence the early application of the term porcellana to the fine ware brought from the far East. Both applications of the term, viz. to cowries and to China-ware, occur in Marco Polo (see below). The quasi-analogous application of pig in Scotland to earthen-ware, noticed in an imaginary quotation below, is probably quite an accident, for there appears to be a Gaelic pigg, 'an earthen jar,' &c. (see Skeat, s.v. piggin). We should not fail to recall Dr. Johnson's etymology of porcelaine from "pour cent années," because it was believed by Europeans that the materials were matured under ground 100 years! (see quotations below from Barbosa, and from Sir Thomas Brown).

c. 1250.—Capmany has the following passage in the work cited. Though the same writer published the Laws of the Consulado del Mar in 1691, he has changed the whole of the chapters, and this, which he has quoted, is omitted altogether!

"In the XLIVth chap. of the maritime laws of Barcelona, which are undoubtedly not later than the middle of the 13th century, there are regulations for the return cargoes of the ships trading with Alexandria. In this are enumerated among articles brought from Egypt... cotton in bales and spun wool de capells (for hats!), porcelainas, alum, elephants' teeth..."—Memorials, Hist. de Barcelona, f. Pt. ii. p. 44. 1298. —"Il ont monoié en tel maniere que je voz dirai, car il espendent porcelaine blance, celle que se trovent en la mer et que se metent au cuel des chien, et vailent les quatre-vingt porcelaines un saic d'arjent que sont deus venesians gros..."—Marco Polo, oldest French text, p. 132.

"Et encore voz di que en ceste provence, en une cite que est apollo Tinungi, se font escuelle de porcellaine grant et pitet les plus belles que l'en peust desvier."—Ibid. 180.

c. 1328.—"Audivi quod ducentas civitates habet sub se imperator ille (Magnus Tartarus) majores quiam Tholosa; et ego certe credo quod plures habebant homines... Alia non sunt quae ego sciam in isto imperio digna relatione, nisi vasa pulcherrima, et nobilissima, atque virtuosa porseleta."—Jordanis Mirabilia, p. 59.

In the next passage it seems probable that the shells, and not China dishes, are intended.

c. 1318.—"... ghomerabica, vernice, armionario, zaffiere, coloquinti, porcellane, mirra, mirabolani... si vendono a Vinegia a cento di peso sotilde" (i.e. by the cutcha hundredweight).—Pigolotti, Practica della Merceria, p. 134.

c. 1440.—"... this Cit and Macinn that I have before named arr ii verie great provinces, thinhabitants whereof arr idolaters, and there make them vessels and dishes of Porcellana."—Glosa Barbuto, Hak. Soc. 75.
In the next the shells are clearly intended:

1442.—"Gabella di Firenze ... Porcelaine marine, la libra ... soldi ... donari 4."—Uccano, Prat. della Mercatura, p. 23.

1461. "Porcellane pezzi 20, cioè 7 piattine, 5 scodelle, 4 grandi e una piccida, di rose 3 grandi, una piccida, una biava, due bianche."—List of Presents sent by the Soldan of Egypt to the Doge Pasquale Malepiero. In Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, xxi. col. 1170.

1475.—"The seaports of Cheen and Machiag are also large. Porcelain is made there, and sold by the weight and at a low price."—Nikitin, in India in the XVth Cent., 21.

1487.—"... le mando lo inventario del presente del Soldano dato a Lorenzo ... vasi grandi di Porcellana mai più veduti se ne meglio lavorati."—Letter of P. da Bibbiena to Clar. de' Medici, in Rosco's Lorenzo, ed. 1825, ii. 371.

1502.—"In questo tempo abbrusirono xxi nave sopra il porto di Calcheat; et de epse hebbe tâte drogario e speciarie che caricho le dicte sei nave. Praeterea me ha mandato sei vasi di porcellana excellitissimi et gradi; quatre bocchali de argento grandi cò certi altri vasi al modo loro per credentia."—Letter of K. Emanuel, 13.

1516.—"They make in this country a great quantity of porcelains of different sorts, very fine and good, which form for them a great article of trade for all parts, and they make them in this way. They take the shells of sea-anails (i. caracoli), and eggshells, and pound them, and with other ingredients make a paste, which they put underground to refine for the space of 80 or 100 years, and this mass of paste they leave as a fortune to their children. ..."—Barros, in Ramusio, i. 320.

1553.—(In China) "The service of their meals is the most elegant that can be, everything being of very fine procelana (although they also make use of silver and gold plate), and they eat everything with a fork made after their fashion, never putting a hand into their food, much or little."—Barros, III. ii. 7.

1554.—(After a suggestion of the identity of the vase murrhina of the ancients): "Ce nom de Porcelaine est donné à plusieurs coquilles de mer. Et pourcé qu'vn beau Vaisseau d'vnne coquelle de mer ne se pourrait rendre mieux à propos suyuyt le nom antique, que de l'appelle de Porcelaine l'ay peyné que les coquilles polies et luysantes, ressemblant à Nacre de perles, ont quelque affinité auec la manière des vases de Porcelaine antiques; ioinct aussi que le peuple Frontois nomme les pates-nostres facies de gros vignols, patenostres de Porcelaine. Les susdicts vases de Porcelaine sont transparents, et coustent bien cher au Caire, et disent messenement qu'ils les apportent des Indes. Mais cela ne me sembla vraisemblable: car on n'en voirroit pas si grande quantité, ne de si grādes pieces, s'il faillot apporter de si loing. Vne esquire, vn pot, ou vn autre vaisseau pour petite qu'elle soit, couste vn ducat: si c'est quelque grāde vasse, il coustera d'avantage."—P. Belon, Observations, i. 134.

c. 1560.—"And because there are many opinions among the Portugals which have not beene in China, about where this Porcelane is made, and touching the substance whereof it is made, some saying, that it is of oysters shell, others of dung rotten of a long time, because they were not enformd of the truth, I thought it convenient to tell here the substance. ..."—Gaspar da Cruz, in Purchas, iii. 177.

1612.—"Balanced one part with sandal wood, Porcelain and pepper."—Dawers, Letters, i. 197.

1615.—"If we had in England beds of porcelain such as they have in China,—which porcelain is a kind of plaster buried in the earth, and by length of time congealed and glazed into that substance; this were an artificial stone, and part of that substance. ..."—Bacon, Argument on Importation of Waste; Works, by Spedding, &c., 1859, vii. 528.

c. 1630.—"The Bannyans all along the sea-shore pitch their Booths ... for there they sell Callicosse, China-satten, Porcellainware, scrutories or Cabinets. ..."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1665, p. 45.

1650.—"We are not thoroughly resolved concerning Porcelain or China dishes, that according to common belief they are made of earth, which liyth in preparation about an hundred years underground; for the relations thereof are not only divers but contrary; and Authors agree not herein. ..."—Sir Thomas Browne, Vulp. Ervgr., ii. 5.

1652.—"Invited by Lady Gerrard I went to London, where we had a great supper; all the vessels, which were innumerable, were of Porcelain, she having the most ample and richest collection of that curiousitie in England."—Evelyn, Diary, March 19.

1726.—In a list of the treasures left by Akbar, which is given by Valentijn, we find:

"In Porcelyn, &c., Ropins 250747."—iv. (Suratte), 217.

PORGO, s. We know this word only from its occurrence in the passage quaes, Lam. (N.O. Malvaceae), a favourite ornamental tree, thriving best near the sea. The word is a corruption of Tamil Puarasu, 'Flower-king; [pu-varasu, from pu, 'flower, arassu, 'peepul tree']. In Ceylon it is called Suria gansuri, and also the Tulip-tree.

1742.—"Le bois sur lequel on les met (les toiles), et celui qu'on employe pour les bateau, sont ordinairement de tamarinier, ou d'un autre arbre nommé porchi."—Lett. Edif. xiv. 122.

1860.—"Another useful tree, very common in Ceylon, is the Suria, with flowers so like those of a tulip that Europeans know it as the tulip tree. It loves the sea air and saline soils. It is planted all along the avenues and streets in the towns near the coast, where it is equally valued for its shade and the beauty of its yellow flowers, whilst its tough wood is used for carriages and gun-stocks."—Tennent’s Ceylon, i. 117.

1861.—"It is usual to plant large branches of the portia and banyan trees in such a slovenly manner that there is little probability of the trees thriving or being ornamental."—Cleghorn, Forests and Gardens of S. India, 197.

PORTO NOVO, n.p. A town on the coast of South Arcot, 32 m. S. of Pondicherry. The first mention of it that we have found is in Bocarro, Decada, p. 42 (c. 1613). The name was perhaps intended to mean ‘New Oporto,’ rather than ‘New Haven,’ but we have not found any history of the name. [The Tamil name is Parangi-pi‘tai, ‘European town,’ and it is called by Mahommedans Mahmudbunder.]

1718.—"At Night we came to a Town called Porta Nova, and in Malabarish Pirenki Potei (Parangipetai).”—Propagation of the Gospel, &c., Pt. ii. 41.

1726.—"The name of this city (Porto Novo) signifies in Portuguese New Haven, but the Moors call it Mahoomed Bendar . . . and the Gentoes Perrigengoente."— Valentijn, Choromandel, 8.

PORTO PIQUENO. PORTO
GRANDE, n.n. pp. ‘The Little Haven and the Great Haven’; names by which the Bengal ports of Satigam (q.v.) and Chatigom (see CHITTAGONG) respectively were commonly known to the Portuguese in the 16th century.

1554.—"Porto Pequeno de Bengala . . . Cowries are current in the country; 80 cowries make 1 pone (see PUN); of these ponos 48 are equal to 1 larin more or less."—A. Nunes, 37.

PORTIA, s. In S. India the common name of the Thespesia popul-POSTEEN, s. An Afghan leathern pelisse, generally of sheep-skin with the fleece on. Pers. *postin, from *post, 'a hide.'

1080.—"Khwája Ahmad came on some Government business to Ghażnín, and it was reported to him that some merchants were going to Turkistán, who were returning to Ghażnín in the beginning of winter. The Khwája remembered that he required a certain number of *postins (great coats) every year for himself and sons." — *Nizám-ül-Mulk, in Elliot, ii. 497.

1442.—"His Majesty the Fortunate Khákán had sent for the Prince of Kákúk, horses, pelisses (*postin) and robes woven of gold. . . ." — *Abdurrázáq, in Nat. et Exot. xiv. Pt. i. 437.

[1590.—"In the winter season there is no need of *posthins (fur-lined coats). . . ." — *Atán, ed. Jarrett, ii. 337.]

1872.—"Otter skins from the Hills and Kashmir, worn as *Postins by the Yarkandis." — *Punjab Trade Report, p. 65.

POTTAH, s. Hind. and other vernaculars, pattá, &c. A document specifying the conditions on which lands are held; a lease or other document securing rights in land or house property.

1778.—"I am therefore hopeful you will be kindly pleased to excuse me the five lacs now demanded, and that nothing may be demanded of me beyond the amount expressed in the pottah." — The Raja of Tenares to Hastings, in Articles of Charge against H., Burke, vi. 591.

[1860.—"By the Zumeendar, then, or his under tenant, as the case may be, the land is farmed out to the Rynts by pottahs, or agreements. . . ." — *Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 67.

PRA, PHRA, PRAW, s. This is a term constantly used in Burma, familiar to all who have been in that country, in its constant application as a style of respect, addressed or applied to persons and things of especial sanctity or dignity. Thus it is addressed at Court to the King; it is the habitual designation of the Buddha and his images and dagobas; of superior ecclesiastics and sacred books; corresponding on the whole in use, pretty closely to the Skt. *Śrī. In Burmese the word is written *bhūrā, but pronounced (in Arakan) *phára, and in modern Burma Proper, with the usual slurring of the r, *Phyá or *Pyá. The use of the term is not confined to Burma; it is used in quite a similar way in Siam, as may be seen in the quotation below from Alabaster; the word is used in the same form *Phra among the Shans; and in the form *Prea, it would seem, in Camboja. Thus Garnier speaks of Indra and Vishnu under their Cambojan epithets as *Prea En and *Prea Noreai (Narāyaṇa); of the figure of Buddha entering *nirvāṇa, as *Prea Nippán; of the King who built the great temple of Angkor Wat as *Prea Kot Melea, of the King reigning at the time of the expedition as *Prea Ang Reachea Vodey, of various sites of temples as *Preacon, *Preacton, *Prea Pithu, &c. (Voyage d’Exploration, i. 26, 49, 388, 77, 85, 72).

The word *phrá appears in composition in various names of Burmese kings, as of the famous *Ałmophrā (1753-60), founder of the late dynasty, and of his son *Bodoah-phrá (1781-1819). In the former instance the name is, according to Sir A. Phayre, Alaung-phrá, i.e. the embryo Buddha, or Bodisatva. A familiar Siamese example of use is in the Phrá Bát, or sacred foot-mark of Buddha, a term which represents the Śrī Puḍa of Ceylon.

The late Prof. H. H. Wilson, as will be seen, supposed the word to be a corruption of Skt. prabhū (see PARVOE). But Mr. Alabaster points, under the guidance of the Siamese spelling, rather to Skt. vara, 'pre-eminent, excellent.' This is in Pali vara, "excellent, best, precious, noble" (Childers). A curious point is that, from the prevalence of the term phrá in all the Indo-Chinese kingdoms, we must conclude that it was, at the time of the introduction of Buddhism into those countries, in predominant use among the Indian or Ceylonese propagators of the new religion. Yet we do not find any evidence of such a use of either prabhū or vara. The former would in Pali be pābho. In a short paper in the Bijdragen of the Royal Institute of the Hague (Dl. X. 4de Stuk, 1885), Prof. Kern indicates that this term was also in use in Java, in the forms Bra and prā, with the sense of 'splendid' and the like; and he cites as an example Bra-Wijaya (the style of several of the medieval kings of Java), where Bra is exactly the representative of Skt. Śrī.

1885.—"I know that in the country of Laos the Dignities of Pha-ya and Menang, and the honourable Epithets of Prá are in use; it may be also that the other terms of Dignity are common to both Nations, as well as the Laws."—De la Loubère, Siam, E.T. 79.

"The Prá-Clang, or by a corruption of the Portuguese, the Bacalos, is the officer, who has the appointment of the Commerce, as well within as without the Kingdom. ... His name is composed of the Balic word Prá, which I have so often discovered of, and of the word Clang, which signifies Magazine."—Ibid. 93.

"Then Sommona-Celow (see GAUTAMA) they call Prá-Bante-Te-hao, which verbatin signifies the Great and Excellent Lord."—Ibid. 134.

1796.—"At noon we reached Meeaday, the personal estate of the Magwoon of Pugee, who is oftenener called, from this place, Meeeaday Práw, or Lord of Meeaday."—Synes, Embassy to Ava, 242.

1855.—"The epithet Phra, which occupies so prominent a place in the ceremonial and religious vocabulary of the Siamese and Burmese, has been the subject of a good deal of nonsense. It is unfortunate that our Burmese scholars have never (I believe) been Sanskrit scholar, nor vice versa, so that the Palee terms used in Burma have had little elucidation. On the word in question, Professor H. H. Wilson has kindly favoured me with a note: 'Phrá is no doubt a corruption of the Sanskrit Prabhā, a Lord or Master; the h of the aspirate bh is often retained alone, leaving Prā which becomes Phrá or Phra.'—Sir H. Yule, Mission to Ava, 61.

1855.—"All these readings (of documents at the Court) were intoned in a high recitative, strongly resembling that used in the English cathedral service. And the long-drawn Phyā-ā-ā-d! (My Lord), which terminated each reading, added to the resemblance, as it came in exactly like the Amen of the Liturgy."—Ibid. 88.

1859.—"The word Phra, which so frequently occurs in their work, here appears for the first time; I have to remark that it is probably derived from, or of common origin with, the Phraoh of antiquity. It is given in the Siamese dictionaries as synonymous with God, ruler, priest, and teacher. It is in fact the word by which sovereignty and sanctity are associated in the popular mind."—Boeving, Kingdom and People of Siam, [i. 35].

1863.—"The title of the First King (of Siam) is Phra-Chom-Khao-Ya-Hua and spoken as Phra Phom-Khao-Ya-Hua. ... His Majesty's nose is styled in the Pali form Phra-NaSa. ... The Siamese term the (Catholic) missionaries, the Preachers of the Phra-Chao Phu-Sang, i.e. of God the Creator, or the Divine Lord Builder. ... The Catholic missionaries express 'God' by Phra-Phomkhi-Chao ... and they explain the Eucharist as Phra-Phomkhi-Kaya (Kaya—Body)."—Beaumont, Reise, iii. 109, and 114-115.

1870.—"The most excellent Pará, brilliant in his glory, free from all ignorance, beholding Nibbāna the end of the migration of the soul, lighted the lamp of the law of the Word."—Rogers, Buddha-gosha's Parables, tr. from the Burmese, p. 1.

1871.—"Phra is a Siamese word applied to all that is worthy of the highest respect, that is, everything connected with religion and royalty. It may be translated as 'holy.' The Siamese letters p-h-r commonly represent the Sanskrit vr̥r. I therefore presume the word to be derived from the Sanskrit 'prá'—to choose, or to be chosen, and 'vara—better, best, excellent,' the root of ἀράτος."—Alabaster, The Wheel of the Law, 164.

PRAAG, sometimes PIAGG, n.p. Properly Prayága, 'the place of sacrifice,' the old Hindu name of Allahabad, and especially of the river confluence, since remote ages a place of pilgrimage.

c. A.D. 685.—"Le royaume de Polyo-ye-kia (Prayága) a environ 5000 li de tour. La PRACRIT, s. A term applied to the older vernacular dialects of India, such as were derived from, or kindred to, Sanskrit. Dialects of this nature are used by ladies, and by inferior characters, in the Sanskrit dramas. These dialects, and the modern vernaculars springing from them, bear the same relation to Sanskrit that the "Romance" languages of Europe bear to Latin, an analogy which is found in many particulars to hold with most surprising exactness. The most completely preserved of old Prakrits is that which was used in Magadha, and which has come down in the Buddhist books of Ceylon under the name of Pali (q.v.). The first European analysis of this language bears the title "Institutiones Linguae Pracriticæ. Scriptis Christianis Lassen, Bonnæ ad Rhenum, 1837." The term itself is Skt. prākrita, 'natural, unrefined, vulgar,' &c.

PRAYA, s. This is in Hong-Kong the name given to what in most foreign settlements in China is called the Bund; i.e. the promenade or drive along the sea. It is Port. praia, 'the shore.'

[1598.—"Another towne towards the North, called Villa de Praya, (for Praya is as much as to say, as strand)."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 275.]

PRESIDENCY (and PRESIDENT), s. The title 'President,' as applied to the Chief of a principal Factory, was in early popular use, though in the charters of the E.I.C. its first occurrence is in 1661 (see Letters Patent, below). In Sainsbury's Calendar we find letters headed "to Capt. Jourdain, president of the English at Bantam" in 1614 (i. 297-8); but it is to be doubted whether this wording is in the original. A little later we find a "proposal by Mr. Middleton concerning the appointment of two especial factors, at Surat and Bantam, to have authority over all other factors; Jourdain named." And later again he is styled "John Jourdain, Captain of the house" (at Bantam; see pp. 303, 325), and "Chief Merchant at Bantam" (p. 343).

1623.—"Speaking of the Dutch Commissioner, as well as of the English President, who often in this fashion came to take me for an airing, I should not omit to say that both of them in Surat live in great style, and like the grandees of the land. They go about with a great train, sometimes with people of their own mounted, but particularly with a great crowd of Indian servants on foot and armed, according to custom, with sword, target, bow and arrows."—P. della Valle, ii. 517.

"Our boat going ashore, the President of the English Merchants, who usually resides in Surat, and is chief of all their business in the E. Indies, Persia, and other places dependent thereon, and who is called Sign. Thomas Rastell* . . . came aboard in our said boat, with a minister of theirs (so they term those who do the priest's office among them)."—Ibid. ii. 501-2; [Hak. Soc. i. 19].

1638.—"As soon as the Commanders heard that the (English) President was come to Subhaly, they went ashore. . . . The two days following were spent in feasting, at which the Commanders of the two Ships treated the President, who afterwards returned to Surat. . . . During my abode at Suratt, I wanted for no amusement; for I . . . found company at the Dutch President's, who had his Farms there . . .

* Thomas Rastall or Rastell went apparently in 1615, in 1616 is mentioned as a "chief merchant of the fleet at Swally Road," and often later as chief at Surat (see Sainsbury, i. 476, and ii. passim).
PRICKLY-HEAT. 731

PRICKLY-HEAT, s. A troublesome cutaneous rash (Lichen tropicus) in the form of small red pimples, which itch intolerably. It affects many Europeans in the hot weather. Fryer (pub. 1698) alludes to these "fiery pimples," but gives the disease no specific name. Natives sometimes suffer from it, and (in the south) use a paste of sandal-wood to alleviate it. Sir Charles Napier in Sind used to suffer much from it, and we have heard him described as standing, when giving an interview during the hot weather, with his back against the edge of an open door, for the convenience of occasional friction against it. [See RED-DOG.]

1665. "The Sun is but just now rising, yet he is intolerable; there is not a Cloud in the Sky, not a breath of Wind; my horses are spent, they have not seen a green Herb since we came out of Lahore; my Indians, for all their black, dry, and hard skin, sink under it. My face, hands and feet are peeled off, and my body is covered all over with pimples that prick me, so as many needles."—Bernier, E.T. 125; [ed. Constable, 380].
PRICKLY-PEAR. s. The popular name, in both E. and W. Indies, of the Opuntia Dillenii, Haworth (Cactus Indica, Roxb.), a plant spread all over India, and to which Roxburgh gave the latter name, apparently in the belief of its being indigenous in that country. Undoubtedly, however, it came from America, wide as has been its spread over Southern Europe and Asia. On some parts of the Mediterranean shores (e.g. in Sicily) it has become so characteristic that it is hard to realize the fact that the plant had no existence there before the 16th century. Indeed at Palermo we have heard this scouted, and evidence quoted in the supposed circumstance that among the mosaics of the splendid Duomo of Monreale (12th century) the fig-leaf garments of Adam and Eve are represented as of this uncomprising material. The mosaic was examined by one of the present writers, with the impression that the belief has no good foundation. [See 8th ser., Notes and Queries, viii. 254.] The cactus fruit, yellow, purple, and red, which may be said to form an important article of diet in the Mediterranean, and which is now sometimes seen in London shops, is not, as far as we know, anywhere used in India, except in times of famine. No cactus is named in Drury’s Useful Plants of India. And whether the Mediterranean plants form a different species, or varieties merely, as compared with the Indian Opuntia, is a matter for inquiry. The fruit of the Indian plant is smaller and less succulent. There is a good description of the plant and fruit in Oviedo, with a good cut (see Ramusio’s Ital. version, bk. viii., ch. xxv.). That author gives an amusing story of his first making acquaintance with the fruit in S. Domingo, in the year 1515.

Some of the names by which the Opuntia is known in the Punjab seem to belong properly to species of Euphorbia. Thus the Euphorbia Royleana, Bois., is called tsāi, chā, &c.; and the Opuntia is called Kabuli tsāi, Gungi sho, Kanghi chā, &c. Gungi chā is also the name of an Euphorbia sp. which Dr. Stewart takes to be the E. Nerifolia, L. (Punjab Plants, pp. 101 and 194-5). [The common name in Upper India for the prickly pear is nāgphānī, ‘snake-hood,’ from its shape.] This is curious; for although certain cactuses are very like certain Euphorbias, there is no Euphorbia resembling the Opuntia in form.

The Zākān mentioned in the Āin (Gladwin, 1800, ii. 68; [Jarrett, ii. 293; Sādi Ḍū, ed. Vambery, p. 31] as used for hedges in Guzerat, is doubtless Euphorbia also. The Opuntia is very common as a hedge plant in cantonments, &c., and it was much used by Tippoo as an obstruction round his fortifications. Both the E. Rouleana and the Opuntia are used for fences in parts of the Punjab. The latter is objectionable, from harbouring dirt and reptiles; but it spreads rapidly both from birds eating the fruit, and from the facility with which the joints take root.

1685. — “The Prickly-Pear, Bush, or Shrub, of about 4 or 5 foot high ... the Fruit at first is green, like the Leaf. ... It is very pleasant in taste, cooling and refreshing; but if a Man eats 15 or 20 of them they will colour his water, making it look like Blood.”—Dampier, i. 228 (in W. Indies).

1764. — “On this lay cuttings of the prickly pear; They soon a formidable fence will shoot.”

Granger, Br. i. [1829. — “The castle of Bunai ... is covered with the cactus, or prickly pear, so abundant on the east side of the Aravali.”
—Tez. Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 826.]

1861. — “The use of the prickly pear” (for hedges) “I strongly deprecate; although impenetrable and inexpensive, it conveys an idea of sterility, and is rapidly becoming a nuisance in this country.”—Cleghorn, Forests and Gardens, 285.

PROME, n.p. An important place in Pegu above the Delta. The name is Talain, properly Brun. The Bur-mee call it Pye or (in the Aracanese form in which the r is pronounced) Prê and Prê-myo ("city").

1545.—"When he (the K. of Bramao) was arrived at the young King's palace, he caused himself to be crowned King of Prome, and during the Ceremony . . . made that poor Prince, whom he had deprived of his Kingdom, to continue kneeling before him, with his hands held up . . . This done he went into a Balcon, which looked on a great Market-place, whither he commanded all the dead children that lay up and down the streets, to be brought, and then causing them to be hacked very small, he gave them, mingled with Bran, Rice, and Herbs, to his Elephants to eat."—Pinto, E.T. 211-212 (orig. div.).

c. 1609.—". . . this quarrel was hardly ended when a great rumour of arms was heard from a quarter where the Portuguese were still fighting. The cause of this was the arrival of 12,000 men, whom the King of Pren sent in pursuit of the King of Arracan, knowing that he had fled that way. Our people hastening up had a stiff and well fought combat with them; for although they were fatigued with the fight which had been hardly ended, those of Pren were so disharneted at seeing the Portuguese, whose steel they had already felt, that they were fain to retire."—Bowd., 142. This author has Prome (p. 132) and Poro (p. 149).

1755.—"Prone . . . has the ruins of an old brick wall round it, and immediately without that, another with Teak Timber."—Capt. G. Baker, in Dalrymple, i. 173.

1795.—"In the evening, my boat being ahead, I reached the city of Pareye-mere, or Prome, . . . remonented in Birman history."—Smyth, pp. 388-9.

PROW, PARAO, &c., s. This word seems to have a double origin in European use; the Malayāl, pāry, a boat, and the Island word (common to Malay, Javanese, and most languages of the Archipelago) prātha or prath. This is often specifically applied to a peculiar kind of galley, "Malay Prow," but Crawfurd defines it as "a general term for any vessel, but generally for small craft." It is hard to distinguish between the words, as adopted in the earlier books, except by considering date and locality.

1499.—"The King despatched to them a large boat, which they call parao, well manned, on board which he sent a Naire of his with an errand to the Captains . . ."—Correa, Lendas, i. i. 115.

1510.—"The other Persian said: 'O Sir, what shall we do!' I replied: 'Let us go along this shore till we find a parao, that is, a small bark.'"—Ibid. 269.

1518.—"Item; that any one possessing a zambuco (see SAMBOOK) or a parao of his own and desiring to go in it may do so with all that belongs to him, first giving notice two days before to the Captain of the City."—Livro dos Privilegios da Cidade de Goa, in Arch. Port. Orient, Fascic. v. p. 7.

1523.—"When Dom Sancho (Dom Sancho Anriquez; see Correa, ii. 770) went into Muar to fight with the fleet of the King of Bintam which was inside the River, there arose a squall which upset all our paaras and lancharas at the bar mouth. . . ."—Lembrança, de Coimbra de India, p. 5.

1582.—"Next day after the Captain General with all his men being a land, working upon the ship called Berrio, there came in two little Paras."—Custăão (tr. by N. L.), ii. 328.

1586.—"The fifth and last festival, which is called Saparo Bounou, is one in which the King (of Pegu) is embarked in the most beautiful paro, or boat. . . ."—G. Bab, f. 122.

1606.—Gouvea (f. 27:) uses paro.

"An howre after this comming a board of the hollanders came a prawe or a canow from Bantam."—Middleton's Voyage, c. 3 (e).

[1611.—"The Portuguese call their own galiots Navires (marrús) and those of the Malabars, Paireaus.

Most of these vessels were Chettis (see CHETTY), that is to say merchants. Immediately on arrival the Malabars draw up their Pados or galliots on the beach."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 345.

[1623.—"In the Morning we discern'd four ships of Malabar Rovers near the shore (they called them Paroes and they goe with ours like our Galletes or Poists."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. li. 201.]

1666.—"Con secreto previno Lope de Soares veinte bateles, y gobernando y entrando por un rio, hallaron el peligro de cinco naves y ochenta paroas con mucha gente resuelta y de valor."—Paria y Sonda, Asia, i. 66.

1673.—"They are owners of several small Proooes, of the same make, and Canooses, cut out of one entire Piece of Wood."—Fryer, 20. Elsewhere (e.g. 57, 59) he has Poes.

1727.—"The Andemaneus had a yearly Custom to come to the Nicobar Islands, with a great number of small Praws, and kill or take Prisoners as many of the poor Nicobarans as they could overtake."—A. Hamilton, ii. 65 [ed. 1744].

1816.—4 . . . Prah, a term under which the Malays include every description of vessel."—Raffles, in Aes. Rés. xii. 132.

1817.—"The Chinese also have many brigs . . . as well as native-built prahus."—Raffles, Java, i. 203.
PUCKA, adj. Hind. pakkā, 'ripe, mature, cooked'; and hence substantial, permanent, with many specific applications, of which examples have been given under the habitually contrasted term cutcha (q.v.). One of the most common uses in which the word has become specific is that of a building of brick and mortar, in contradistinction to one of inferior material, as of mud, matting, or timber. Thus:

1781.—“The House, Cook-room, bottle-connah, godown, &c., are all pucca-built.”

—in Seton-Karr, i. 41.

1824.—“A little above this beautiful stream, some miserable pucca sheds pointed out the Company’s warehouses.”—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 259-60.

1842.—“I observe that there are in the town (Dehli) many buildings pucca-built, as it is called in India.”—Wellington to Ld. Ellenborough, in Indian Adm. of Ld. E., p. 306.

1857.—“Your Lahore men have done nobly. I should like to embrace them; Donald, Roberts, Mac, and Dick are all of them, pucca trumps.”—Lord Lawrence, in Life, ii. 11.

1869.—“... there is no surer test by which to measure the prosperity of the people than the number of pucca houses that are being built.”—Report of a Sub-Committee on Proposed Indian Census.

This application has given rise to a substantive pucca, for work of brick and mortar, or for the composition used as cement and plaster.

1727.—“Fort William was built on an irregular Tetragon of Brick and Mortar, called Puckah, which is a Composition of Brick-dust, Lime, Molasses, and cut Hemp, and when it comes to be dry, it is as hard and tougher than firm Stone or Brick.”—A. Hamilton, ii. 19; [ed. 1744, ii. 7].

The word was also sometimes used substantively for “pucka pice” (see CUTCHA).

c. 1817.—“I am sure I strive, and strive, and yet last month I could only lay by eight rupees and four puckers.”—Mrs. Sherwood’s Stories, 66.

In (Stockdale’s) Indian Vocabulary of 1788 we find another substantive use, but it was perhaps even then inaccurate.

1788.—“Pucka—A putrid fever, generally fatal in 24 hours.”

Another habitual application of pucka and cutcha distinguishes between two classes of weights and measures. The existence of twofold weight, the pucka ser and the cutcha, used to be very general in India. It was equally common in Medieval Europe. Almost every city in Italy had its libra grossa and libra sottile (e.g., see Pegolotti, 4, 34, 153, 228, &c.), and we ourselves still have them, under the names of pond avoirdupois and pound troy.

1673.—“The Maund Pucka at Agro is as double as much (as the Surat Maund).”—Fryer, 205.

1760.—“Les pucca cosses ... repondent à une liée de l’Isle de France.”—Letter. Edif. xv. 189.

1808.—“If the rice should be sent to Coraygann, it should be in sufficient quantities to give 72 pucca seers for each load.”—Wellington, Desp. (ed. 1837), ii. 43.

In the next quotation the terms apply to the temporary or permanent character of the appointments held.

1806.—“Susan. Well, Miss, I don’t wonder you’re so fond of him. He is such a sweet young man, though he is cutcha. Thank goodness, my young man is pucka, though he is only a subordinate Government Salt Chowkee.”—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, 222.

The remaining quotations are examples of miscellaneous use:

1853.—“Well, Jenkyns, any news? ‘Nothing pucka that I know of.’”—Oakfield, ii. 57.

1886.—“I cannot endure a swell, even though his whiskers are pucka.”—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, ixvi. 229.

The word has spread to China:

“Dis pucka sing-song make show
How smart man make mistake, galow.”

Leland, Pidgin English Sing-Song, 54.

13 PUCKAULY, s.; also PUCKAULY-Hind. pakhlá, ‘a water-carrier.’ In N. India the pakhlá [Skt. pada, ‘water,’ khalla, ‘skin’] is a large water-skin (an entire ox-hide) of some 20 gallons content, of which a pair are carried by a bullock, and the pakhlá is the man who fills the skins, and supplies the water thus. In the Madras Drill Regulations for 1785 (33), ten puckalies are allowed to a battalion. (See also Williamson’s V. M. (1810), i. 229.)
[1538.—Referring to the preparations for the siege of Diu, "which they brought from all the wells on the island by all the bullocks they could collect with their water-skins, which they call pacaals (Pacals)."—Conto, Dec. V. Bk. iii. ch. 2.]

1790.—There is another very necessary establishment to the European corps, which is two buccalies to each company: these are two large leathern bags for holding water, slung upon the back of a bullock. . . .—Menon's Narrative, 188.

1803.—"It (water) is brought by means of bullocks in leathern bags, called here puckally bags, a certain number of which is attached to every regiment and garrison in India. Black fellows called Puckaulyboys are employed to fill the bags, and drive the bullocks to the quarters of the different Europeans."—Perceval's Oeylon, 102.

1804.—"It would be a much better arrangement to give the adjutants of corps an allowance of 26 rupees per messman, to supply two puckalies men, and two bullocks with bags, for each company."—Wellington, iii. 509.

1813.—"In cities, in the armies, and with Europeans on country excursions, the water for drinking is usually carried in large leather bags called pacalies, formed by the entire skin of an ox."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 140; [2nd ed. i. 415.]

1842.—"I lost no time in confidentially communicating with Capt. Oliver on the subject of trying some experiments as to the possibility of conveying empty 'puckalls' and 'musacks' by sea to Suez."—Sir G. Arthur, in Ellenborough's Ind. Admin., 219.

PUCKEROW, v. This is properly the imperative of the Hind. verb pakran, 'to cause to be seized,' pakro, 'cause him to be seized'; or perhaps more correctly of a compound verb pakarao, 'seize and come,' or in our idiom, 'Go and seize.' But puckerow belongs essentially to the dialect of the European soldier, and in that becomes of itself a verb 'to puckerow,' i.e. to lay hold of (generally of a recalcitrant native). The conversion of the Hind. imperative into an Anglo-Indian verb infinitive, is not uncommon; compare bunow, dumbcow, gubbrow, lugow, &c.

1866.—"Fanny, I am etucha no longer. Surely you will allow a lover who is pucka to puckero!"—Trevelyan, The Dawk Bungalow, 390.

PUDIPATAN, n.p. The name of a very old seaport of Malabar, which has now ceased to have a place in the Maps. It lay between Cannanore and Calicut, and must have been near the Waddakar of K. Johnston's Royal Atlas, [It appears in the map in Logan's Malabar as Puttepatanum or Putappanum.] The name is Tamil, Pudippattana, 'New City.' Compare true form of Pondicherry.

c. 545.—'The most notable places of trade are these . . . and then five marts of Malé from which pepper is exported, to wit, Parti, Mangarch (see MANGALORE) Salopatana, Nalopatana, Pudopatana . . .'.—Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. (see in Calcut., &c. p. cxxxviii.).
c. 1342.—'Buddattana, which is a considerable city, situated upon a great estuary. . . . The haven of this city is one of the finest; the water is good, the betel-nut is abundant, and is exported thence to India and China.'—Itin Buitawa, iv. 87.
c. 1420.—'A quâ rursus se deditus viginti terrestri viâ contulit ad urbem portumque maritimum nomine Pudifetaneam.'—Conti, in Poggio, de Var. Fort.

PUG, s. Hind. peg, Skt. padaka, 'a foot'; in Anglo-Indian use the footmarks of an animal, such as a tiger.

[1831.—' . . . sanguine we were sometimes on the report of a bune pug from the shikaree.'—Orient. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873. ii. 178.

1882.—'Presently the large square 'pug' of the tiger we were in search of appeared.'—Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 30.]

PUGGRY, PUGGERIE, s. Hind. pugrī, 'a turban.' The term being often used in colloquial for a scarf of cotton or silk wound round the hat in turban-form, to protect the head from the sun, both the thing and name have of late years made their way to England, and may be seen in London shop-windows.

c. 1200.—'Prithirâja . . . wore a pagari ornamented with jewels, with a splendid toro. In his ears he wore pearls; on his neck a pearl necklace.'—Chand Bardai E.T. by Beames, Ind. Ant. i. 282.

[1627.—'I find it is the common mode of the Eastern People to shave the head all save a long lock which superstitionsly they leave at the very top, such especially as wear Turbans, Mandils, Dustars, and Puggarees."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 140.]

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the consignivity they claim with Mahometans, as a Sand is akin to that imposture, and therefore only assumes to himself a Green Vest and Puckery (or Turbat). . . ."—Fryer, 93; [comp. 113].

1689.—". . . with a Puggaree or Turbant upon their Heads."—Ovington, 314.

1781.—"They (the Negro Police in Demarama) used frequently to be turned out to parade in George Town streets, dressed in a neat uniform, with white puggreies framing in their ebony faces."—Jenkins, The Cookee.

PUGGY, s. Hind. pāgī (not in Shakespeare's Dict., nor in Platts), from pāg (see PUG), 'the foot.' A professional tracker; the name of a caste, or rather an occupation, whose business is to track thieves by footmarks and the like. On the system, see Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 180 seqq.

[1824.—"There are in some of the districts of Central India (as in Guzerat) puggrees, who have small fees on the village, and whose business it is to trace thieves by the print of their feet."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. ii. 19.]

1879.—"Good puggreys or trackers should be employed to follow the dacoits during the daytime."—Times of India, Overland Supply, May 12, p. 7.

PUHUR, PORE, PYRE, &c., s. Hind. *pahār, pahr, from Skt. prahara, 'A fourth part of the day and of the night, a watch' or space of 8 gharīs (see GHURRY).

c. 1526.—"The natives of Hindostan divide the night and day into 60 parts, each of which they denominate a Gheri; they likewise divide the night into 4 parts, and the day into the same number, each of which they call a Pahar or watch, which the Persians call a Pāz."—Baber, 331.

[c. 1590.—"The Hindu philosophers divide the day and night into four parts, each of which they call a pahr."—Babu, ed. Jarrett, i. 15.]

1633.—"Pah." See under GHURRY.

1673.—"Pore." See under GONG.

1803.—"I have some Jasoon selected by Col. C's brunfin for their stupidity, that they might not pry into state secrets, who go to Sindia's camp, remain there a paur in fear. . . ."—M. Elphinstone, in Life, i. 62.

PULÁ, s. In Tamil pillai, Malayāl. pilla, 'child'; the title of a superior class of (so-called) Śīdras, [especially curnums]. In Cochin and Travancore it corresponds with Nāyar (see NAIR). It is granted by the sovereign, and carries exemption from customary manual labour.

1553.—". . . pulas, who are the gentlemen" (fidalgo).—Castañeda, iv. 2.

[1726.—"O Saguate que o Comendador tinha remitido como gristnave anim e as Pulameres tomou por ca recebido."—Ratification, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 13.]

PULICAT, n.p. A town on the Madras coast, which was long the seat of a Dutch factory. Bp. Caldwell's native friend Seshagiri Sāstri gives the proper name as pula-Velkādu, 'old Velkādu or Verkādu,' the last a place-name mentioned in the Tamil Sivaithe Evāram (see also Valentijn below). [The Madras Gloss. gives Pazhaverkādu, 'old acacia forest,' which is corroborated by Dr. Hultzsch (Epigraphia Indica, i. 398).]

1519.—"And because he had it much in charge to obtain all the lace (alacre) that he could, the Governor learning from merchants that much of it was brought to the Coast of Charomandel by the vessels of Pug and Martaban which visited that coast to procure painted cloths and other coloured goods, such as are made in Pulacate, which is on the coast of Charomandel, whence the traders with whom the Governor spoke brought it to Cochin; he, having got good information on the whole matter, sent a certain Frolentine (sir, frolentium) called Peter Escocro, whom he knew, and who was good at trade, to be factor on the coast of Charomandel. . . ."—Correa, ii. 567.

1563.—"The said Armenian, having already been at the city of Pulackete, which is in the Province of Charomandel and the Kingdom of Bismaga, when on his way to Bengal, and having information of the place where the body of S. Thomas was said to be, and when they arrived at the port of Pulackete the wind was against their going on. . . ."—Barros, III. vii. 11.

1726.—"Then we came to Pulacoem Wedam Caddæe, called by us for shortness Pulacatta, which means in Malabars 'the Old Fortress,' though most commonly we call it Castel Goddvía;"—Valentijn, Charom. 13.

"The route I took was along the strip of country between Porto Novo and Pulacatta. This long journey I travelled on foot; and preached in more than a hundred places. . . ."—Letter of the Missionary Schultz, July 19, in Notices of Madras, &c., p. 20.

1727.—Policrat is the next Place of Note to the City and Colony of Fort St George.
... It is strengthened with two Forts, one contains a few Dutch soldiers for a Garrison, the other is commanded by an Officer belonging to the Mogul."—A. Hamilton, i. 372, [ed. 1744].

[1813. — "Pulecat handkerchiefs." See under PIECE-GOODS.]

PULTUN. s. Hind. pulton, a corruption of Battalion, possibly with some confusion of platoon or pulton. The S. India form is pataulam, pataiton. It is the usual native word for a regiment of native infantry; it is never applied to one of Europeans.

1800.—"All I can say is that I am ready primed, and that if all matters suit I shall go off with a dreadful explosion, and shall probably destroy some campoos and pultons which have been indiscreetly pushed across the Kisthm."—A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Mem. of Munro, by Arthuret, lxix.

[1858.—"I know lots of Sahibs in a pul- toon at Bareilly."—Mrs Croker, Village Tales and Jungle Tragedies, 60.]

PULWAH, PULWAR. s. One of the native boats used on the rivers of Bengal, carrying some 12 to 15 tons. Hind. puwar. [For a drawing see Grierson, Bihar Village Life, p. 42.]

1735.—"... We observed a boat which had came out of Stohoo river, making for Patna: the commandant detached two light pulwaars after her..."—Hotwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 69.

[1767. — "... a Peon came twice to Noon-golah, to apply for pulwaris..."—Verdes, View of Bengal, App. 197.]

1780.—"Besides this boat, a gentleman is generally attended by two others; a pul- wah for the accommodation of the kitchen, and a smaller boat, a paunchway" (q.v.).—Hodges, p. 39.

1782.—"To be sold, Three New Dacca Pulwars, 60 feet long, with Houses in the middle of each."—India Gazette, Aug. 31.

1824.—"The ghat offered a scene of bustle and vivacity which I by no means expected. There were so many budgerows and pul- wars, that we had considerable difficulty to find a mooring place."—Heber, ed. 1841, i. 131.

1860.—"The Pulwar is a smaller description of native travelling boat, of neater build, and less rusticity of character, sometimes used by a single traveller of humble means, and at others serves as cook-boat and accommodation for servants accompanying one of the large kind of boats..."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, p. 7, with an illustration.

PULWAUN, s. P.—H. pahlwān, [which properly means 'a native of ancient Persia'] (see PAHLAVI). Mr. Skewt notes that in Malay the word becomes pahlawan, probably from a confusion with Malay dawan (‘to fight’). A champion; a professed wrestler or man of strength.

[1753. — "... the fourth, and least numerous of these bodies, were choice men of the Pehlevans..."—Hawney, iii. 104.]

[1813. — "When his body has by these means imbibed an additional portion of vigour, he is dignified by the appellation of Puhlwan."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 165.]

1828.—"I added a pahlivan or prize-fighter, a negro whose teeth were filed into saws, of a temper as ferocious as his aspect, who could throw any man of his weight to the ground, carry a jackass, devour a sheep whole, eat fire, and make a fountain of his inside, so as to act as a spout."—Haji Baba in England, i. 15.

PUN, s. A certain number of cowries, generally 80; Hind. pūna. (See under COWRY). The Skt. puṇa is a ‘stake played for a price, a sum,’ and hence both a coin (whence fanam, q.v.) and a certain amount of cowries.

1554.—"Pone." (See under PORTO PIQUENO.)

1683.—"I was this day advised that Mr. Charnock putt off Mr. Ellis’s Cowries at 34 pund to ye Rupee in payment of all ye Peons and Servants of the Factory, whereas 38 punds are really bought by him for a Rupee..."—Hodges, Diary, Oct. 2; [Hak. Soc. i. 122].

1760.—"We now take into consideration the relief of the menial servants of this Settlement, respecting the exorbitant price of labor exacted from them by tailors, washermen, and barbers, which appear in near a quadruple (proportion compared with the prices paid in 1755. Agreed, that after the 1st of April they be regulated as follows:

"No tailor to demand for making:

1 Jamma, more than 3 annas.
4 * * * * * * * 1 pair of drawers, 7 pun of cowries.

No washerman:

1 corge of pieces, 7 pun of cowries.

No barber for shaving a single person, more than 7 gundas" (see COWRY).—Pt. William Conyns, March 27, in Long, 209.

PUNCH, s. This beverage, according to the received etymology, was named from the Pers. pānī, or Hind. and Mahr. pañch, both meaning ‘five’; because composed of five ingredients, viz. arrack, sugar, lime-juice, spice, and water. Fryer may be considered to give something like historical evidence of its origin; but there is also something of Indian idiom in the suggestion. Thus a famous horse-medicine in Upper India is known as battiś, because it is supposed to contain 32 ("battiś") ingredients. Schiller, in his Punschkslded, sacrificing truth to trope, omits the spice and makes the ingredients only 4: "*Vier Elemente innig gesellt, Bilden das Leben, Bauen die Welt."

The Greeks also had a "Punch," πεισπανδοα, as is shown in the quotation from Athenaeus. Their mixture does not sound inviting. Littré gives the etymology correctly from the Pers.
panj, but the 5 elements à la française, as tea, sugar, spirit, cinnamon, and lemon-peel,—no water therefore!

Some such compound appears to have been in use at the beginning of the 17th century under the name of Larkin (q.v.). Both Dutch and French travellers in the East during that century celebrate the beverage under a variety of names which amalgamate the drink curiously with the vessel in which it was brewed. And this combination in the form of Bole-ponjis was adopted as the title of a Miscellany published in 1851, by H. Meredith Parker, a Bengal civilian, of local repute for his literary and dramatic tastes. He had lost sight of the original authorities for the term, and his quotation is far astray. We give them correctly below.

c. 210.—"On the feast of the Scirrh at Athens he (Aristodemus on Pindar) says a race was run by the young men. They ran this race carrying each a vine-branch laden with grapes, such as is called ἁκούς; and they ran from the temple of Dionysus to that of Athena Sciras. And the winner receives a cup such as is called 'Five-fold,' and of this he partakes joyously with the band of his comrades. But the cup is called πεισπανδοα because it contains wine and honey and cheese and flour, and a little oil."—Athenaeus, XI. xci.

1638.—"This voyage (Gombroon to Surat)
. . . we accomplished in 19 days. . . We drank English beer, Spanish sack, French wine, Indian spirit, and good English water, and made good Palepunzen. "—Mandelsta, (Dutch ed. 1658), p. 21. The word Palepunzen seems to have puzzled the English translator (John Davis, 2nd ed. 1669), who has "excellent good sack, English beer, French wines, Arab, and other refreshments."
(p. 10).

1653.—"Boleponge est un mot Anglois, qui signifie vue boisson dont les Anglois sent aux Indes faite de sucre, suc de delimon, eau de vie, fleur de muscade, et biscuit roty."—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed.
1657, p. 534.

[1658.—"Arrived this place where found the Bezar almost Burnt and many of the People almost starued for want of Foode which caused much Sadnes in Mr. Charnock and my Selle, but not so much as the absence of your Company, which wee have often remembered in a bowle of the clearest Punch, having noe better Liquor."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. iii. exiv.]

1659.—"Fäs Dritte, Pale bunze getitutiliert, von halb Wasser, halb Branwein, dreyssig, vierzig Limonien, deren Körnlein ausgespeyet werden, und ein wenig Zucker eingeworfen; wie dem Geschmaack so angenehm nicht, also auch der Gesundheit nicht."—Naar, ed. 1672, 60.

[1662.—"Amongst other spirituous drinks, as Punch, &c., they gave us Canarie that had been carried to and fro from the Indies, which was indeed incomparably good."
—Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 16.]

c. 1666.—"Neamôins depuis qu'ils (les Anglois) ont donne ordre, aussi bien que les Hollandois, que leurs équipages ne boivent point tant de Bouleponges . . . il y a pas tant de maladies, et il ne leur meurt plus tant de monde. Bouleponge is a certain breuvage composé d'arac . . .
avec du sec de limons, de l'eau, et un peu de muscade rapée dessus: il est assez agréable au gout, mais c'est la peste du corps et de la santé."—Bernier, ed. 1723,
h. 335 (Eng. Tr. p. 141); [ed. Contabile, 441].

1670.—"Doch als men zekere andere drank, die zij Paleponts noemen, daar-tussen drinkt, so word het quaet enigens geweert."—Andriesz, 9. Also at p. 27,
"*Palepunts."

We find this blunder of the composed word transported again to England, and explained as a 'hard word.'

1672.—Padre Vincenzo Maria describes the thing, but without a name:
"There are many fruites to which the Hollander and the English add a certain beverage that they compound of lemon-juice, aqua-vitae, sugar, and nutmegs, to quench their thirst, and this, in my belief, argments not a little the evil influence."— Viaggio, p. 103.

1673.—"At Nerule is the best Arach or Nepa (see NIPA) de Goa, with which the English on this Coast make that enervating Liquor called Paunch (which is Indostan for Five), from Five Ingredients; as the Physicians name their Composition Diapente ; or from four things, *Diatessaron. —*Fryer, 157.

1674.—"Palaunzes, a kind of Indian drink, consisting of Aqua-vitae, Rose-water, juice of Citrons and Sugar."—Glossographia, &c., by T. E.

[1675.—"Drank part of their boules of Punch (a liquor very strange to me)."—*H.
Teongy*, Diary, June 1.]
1682.—"Some (of the Chinese in Batavia) also sell Sugar-beer, as well as cooked dishes and Sury [see SURA], arak or Indian brandy; wherefrom they make Mussak and Pollepons, as the Englishmen call it."—Nieuhoff, Zee en Lant-Reiz, ii. 217.

1683.—"... Our owne people and mariners who are now very numerous, and insolent among us, and (by reason of Punch) every day give disturbance."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 8; [Hak. Soc. i. 123].

1688.—"... the soldiers as merry as Punch could make them."—In Wheeler, i. 187.

1689.—"Bengal (Arak) is much stronger spirit than that of Goa, tho' both are made use of by the Europeans in making Punch."—Ovington, 237-8.

1684.—"If any man comes into a victualling house to drink punch, he may demand one quart good Goa arak, half a pound of sugar, and half a pint of good line water, and make his own punch..."—Order Book of Bombay Govt., quoted by Anderson, p. 251.

1705.—"Un bon repas chez les Anglais ne se fait point sans bonne ponde qu'on sert dans un grand vase."—Nieuw Laubier, Voy. aux Grandes Indes, 29.

1771.—"Hence every one (at Madras) has it in his Power to eat well, tho' he can afford no other Liquor at Meals than Punch, which is the common Drink among Europeans, and here made in the greatest Perfection."—Lockyer, 22.

1724.—"Next to Drans, no Liquor deserves more to be stigmatised and banished from the Repasts of the Tender, Valetudinary, and Studious, than Punch."—G. Cheyne, An Essay on Health and Longevity, p. 58.

1791.—"Dès que l'Anglais eut cessé de manger, le Paris... fit un signe à sa femme, qui apporta... une grande calebasse pleine de punch, qu'elle avoit préparé, pendant le souper, avec de l'eau, et du jus de citron, et du jus de canne de sucre."—B. de St. Pierre, Chamaître Indien, 56.

Punch-house, s. An Inn or Tavern; now the term is chiefly used by natives (sometimes in the hybrid form Punch-ghar, [which in Upper India is now transferred to the meeting-place of a Municipal Body]) at the Presidency towns, and applied to houses frequented by seamen. Formerly the word was in general Anglo-Indian use. [In the Straits the Malay Punch-house is, according to Mr. Skeat, still in use, though obsolescent.]

[1661.—"... the Commandore visiting us, wee delivering him another examination of a Persee (Parsee), who kept a Punch house, where the murder was committed."

...—Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 189.]

1671-2.—"It is likewise enquired and declared hereby that no Victuallar, Punch-house, or other house of Entertainment shall be permitted to make stoppage at the pay day of their wages..."—Rules, in Wheeler, iii. 423.

1676.—Major Puckle's "Proposals to the Agent about the young men at Metchelepatam.

"That some pecuniary mulct or fine be imposed... for misdemeanours.

—in Notes and Etsa, No. 1. p. 40.

1688.—"... at his return to Achen he constantly frequented an English Punch-house, spending his Gold very freely."—Dompier, ii. 134.

"Mrs. Francis, wife to the late Lieutenant Francis killed at Hoogly by the Moors, made it her petition that she might keep a Punch-house for her maintenance."—In Wheeler, i. 184.

1697.—"Monday, 1st April... Mr. Cheesely having in a Punch-house, upon a quarrel of words, drawn his Sword... and being taxed therewith, he both doth own and justify the drawing of the sword... it thereupon ordered not to wear a sword while here."—In Wheeler, i. 320.

1727.—"... Of late no small Pains and Charge have been bestowed on its Buildings (of the Fort at Tellichery); but for what Reason I know not... unless it be for small Vessels... or to protect the Company's Ware-house, and a small Punch-house that stands on the Sea-shore..."—A. Hamilton, i. 299 [ed. 1744].

1789.—"Many... are obliged to take up their residence in dirty punch-houses."—Munro's Narrative, 22.

1810.—"The best house of that description which admits boarders, and which are commonly called Punch-houses."—Williamson, V. M. i. 135.

Punchayet, s. Hind. punchayat, from pūndh, 'five.' A council (properly of 5 persons) assembled as a Court of Arbiters or Jury; or as a committee of the people of a village, of the members of a Caste, or whatnot, to decide on questions interesting the body generally.

1778.—"The Honourable William Hornby, Esq., President and Governor of His Majesty's Castle and Island of Bombay, &c.

"The humble Petition of the Managers of the Punchayet of Parsis at Bombay..."—Dossambat Frenji, ii. of the Parsis, 1854, ii. 218.

1810.—"The Parsees... are governed by their own punchait or village Council.
The word panchayt literally means a Council of five, but that of the Guébres in Bombay consists of thirteen of the principal merchants of the sect."—Maria Graham, 41.

1813.—"The carpet of justice was spread in the large open hall of the durbar, where the arbitrators assembled: there I always attended, and agreeably to ancient custom, referred the decision to a panchtaet or jury of five persons."—Forbes, Or. Mem., ii. 359; [in 2nd ed. (ii. 2) Panchaut].

1819.—"The panchayet itself, although in all but village causes it has the defects before ascribed to it, possesses many advantages. The intimate acquaintance of the members with the subject in dispute, and in many cases with the characters of the parties, must have made their decisions frequently correct, and ... the judges being drawn from the body of the people, could act on no principles that were not generally understood."—Elphinston, in Life, ii. 89.

1821.—"... when he returns assemble a panchayet, and give this cause patient attention, seeing that Hybatty has justice."—Pandurang Hari, 31; [ed. 1873, i. 42].

1822. — Bengal Regn. VI. of this year allows the judge of the Sessions Court to call in the alternative aid of a panchayet, in lieu of assessors, and so to dispense with the futwa. See LAW-OFFICER.

1853.—"From the death of Ranjeet Singh to the battle of Sobraon, the Sikh Army was governed by Punchayets or Punches—committees of the soldiery. These bodies sold the Government to the Sikh chief who paid the highest, letting him command until murdered by some one who paid higher."—Sir C. Napier, Defects of Indian Government, 69.

1873.—"The Council of an Indian Village Community most commonly consists of five persons ... the panchayet familiar to all who have the smallest knowledge of India."—Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, 221.

PUNDIT. s. Skt. panjita, 'a learned man.' Properly a man learned in Sanskrit lore. The Pundit of the Supreme Court was a Hindu Law-Officer, whose duty it was to advise the English Judges when needful on questions of Hindu Law. The office became extinct on the constitution of the 'High Court,' superseding the Supreme Court and Sudder Court, under the Queen's Letters Patent of May 14, 1862.

In the Mahratta and Telegu countries, the word Pundit is usually pronounced Pant (in English colloquial Punt); but in this form it has, as with many other Indian words in like case, lost its original significance, and become a mere personal title, familiar in Mahratta history, e.g. the Nana Dhundopant of evil fame.

Within the last 30 or 35 years the term has acquired in India a peculiar application to the natives trained in the use of instruments, who have been employed beyond the British Indian frontier in surveying regions inaccessible to Europeans. This application originated in the fact that two of the earliest men to be so employed, the explorations by one of whom acquired great celebrity, were masters of village schools in our Himalayan provinces. And the title Pundit is popularly employed there much as Dominie used to be in Scotland. The Pundit who brought so much fame on the title was the late Nain Singh, C.S.I. [See Markham, Memoir of Indian Surveys, 2nd ed. 148 seqq.]

1574.—"I hereby give notice that ... I hold it good, and it is my pleasure, and therefore I enjoin on all the pandits (panditos) and Gentoo physicians (physicos gentios) that they ride not through this City (of Goa) or the suburbs thereof on horseback, nor in andors and palanquins, on pain of paying, on the first offence 10 cruzados, and on the second 20, pero o sapal, with the forfeiture of such horses, andors, or palanquins, and on a third they shall become the galley-slaves of the King my Lord. ..."—Proe. of the Governor Antonio Moriz. Barreto, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fasc. 5, p. 899.

1604.—"... lamando tibien en su compania los Póditos, le presentaron al Naubo."—Guerrero, Relacion, 70.

1616.—"... Brachmanea una cum Pundita comparentes, simile quid iam inde ab orbis exercidio in Indostane visum negligent."—Jarric, Thesaurus, iii. 81-82.

* Pero o sapal, i.e. for the marsh. We cannot be certain of the meaning of this; but we may note that in 1548 the King, as a favour to the city of Goa, and for the commodity of its shipping and the landing of goods, &c., makes a grant* of the marsh inundated with sea-water (do sapal alegado dagos salgada) which extends along the river-side from the houses of Antonio Correa to the houses of Alfonso Pino, which grant is to be perpetual ... to serve for a landing-place and quay for the merchants to moor and repair their ships, and to erect their bankshalls (banqueiros), and never to be turned away to any other purpose." Possibly the lines went into a fund for the drainage of this sapal and formation of landing-places. See Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 2, pp. 180-181.

PUNJAUB.

1663.—"A Pandit Breachman or Heathen Doctor whom I had put to serve my Agah . . . would needs make his Panegyric . . . and at last concluded seriously with this: When you put your Foot into the Stirrup, My Lord, and when you march on Horseback in the front of the Cavalry, the Earth trembleth under your Feet, the eight Elephants that hold it up upon their Heads not being able to support it."—Berner, E.T., 86; [ed. Constable, 264].

1688.—"Je feignis donc être malade, et d'avoir la fève ou fit venir aussitôt un Pandite ou médecin Gentil."—Delton, Rel. de l'Ind. de Goa, 214.

1785.—"I can no longer bear to be at the mercy of our Pandits, who deal out Hindu law as they please; and make it at reasonable rates, when they cannot find it ready made."—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Mem. by Ed. Teignmouth, 1807, ii. 67.

1791.—"Il était au moment de s'embrasser pour l'Angleterre, plein de perplexité et d'énum, lorsque les brames de Bénarès lui apprirent que le brame supérieur de la fameuse pagode de Jagrenat . . . était seul capable de resoudre toutes les questions de la Société royale de Londres. C'était en effet le plus fameux pandect, ou docteur, dont on eût jamais oui parler."—B. de St. Pierre, La Chambre Indienne. The preceding exquisite passage shows that the blunder which drew forth Macaulay's flaming wrath, in the quotation lower down, was not a new one.

1798.—". . . the most learned of the Pandits or Bramin lawyers, were called up from different parts of Bengal."—Raynal, Hist. i. 42.

1856.—"Besides . . . being a Pandit of learning, he (Sir David Brewster) is a bundle of talents of various kinds."—Life and Letters of Sydney Dobell, i. 14.

1860.—"Mr. Vizetelly next makes me say that the principle of limitation is found amongst the Pandicts of the Benares. The Pandicts he probably supposes to be some Oriental nation. What he supposes their Pandects to be I shall not presume to guess . . . If Mr. Vizetelly had consulted the Unitarian Report, he would have seen that I spoke of the Pandits of Benares, and he might without any very long and costly research have learned where Benares is and what a Pandit is."—Macaulay, Preface to his Speeches.

1877.—"Colonel Y.—- Since Nain Singh's absence from this country precludes my having the pleasure of handing to him in person, this, the Victoria or Patron's Medal, which has been awarded to him, . . . I beg to place it in your charge for transmission to the Pandit."—Address by Sir R. A. Nook, Prest. R. Geog. Soc., May 28.

"Colonel Y.—- in reply, said: . . . Though I do not know Nain Singh personally, I know his work. . . . He is not a topographical automaton, or merely one of a great multitude of native employés with an average qualification. His observations have added a larger amount of important knowledge to the map of Asia than those of any other living man, and his journals form an exceedingly interesting book of travels. It will afford me great pleasure to take steps for the transmission of the Medal through an official channel to the Pandit."—Reply to the President, same date.

PUNJAUB, n.p. The name of the country between the Indus and the Sutlej. The modern Anglo-Indian province so-called, now extends on one side up beyond the Indus, including Peshawar, the Derajat, &c., and on the other side up to the Jumna, including Delhi. [In 1901 the Frontier Districts were placed under separate administration.] The name is Pers. Panj-āb, 'Five Rivers.' These rivers, as reckoned, sometimes include the Indus, in which case the five are (1) Indus, (2) Jelam (see JELUM) or Behat, the ancient Vistasa which the Greeks made Teōsēs (Strabo) and Bāōsēs (Ptol.). (3) Chenāb, ancient Chandrabhāga and Askīnī. Ptolemy preserves a corruption of the former Sanskrit name in Śāndōbā, but it was rejected by the older Greeks because it was of ill omen, i.e. probably because Grecized it would be Śāndōrōbāgo, 'the devourer of Alexander.' The alternative Askīnī they rendered 'Askēnīs.' (4) Rāvī, the ancient Aiēdōvātī, Tārōsēs (Strabo), Tērōsēs (Arrian), 'Aōrēs or 'Pōnādēs (Ptol.). (5) Bīs, ancient Vērōsēs, 'Tēfōsēs (Arrian), Bēsōs (Ptol.). This excluded the Sutlej, Sātōdrā, Hevādrēs of Pliny, Zādōrōs or Zābādrēs (Ptol.), as Timur excludes it below. We may take in the Sutlej and exclude the Indus, but we can hardly exclude the Chenāb as Wassīf does below.

No corresponding term is used by the Greek geographers. "Putandum est nomen Panchanadae Graecos aut omnino latinitae, aut casu quodam non ad nostr: usque tempora pervenisse, quod in tanta monumentorum ruina facile accederet pontit" (Lassen, Pentapotamia, 3). Lassen however has termed the country Pentapotamia in a learned Latin dissertation on its ancient geography. Though the actual word Panjāb is Persian, and dates from Mahomedan times, the corresponding Skt. Panchavada is ancient and genuine, occurring in the Mahābhārata and Rāmāyana. The name Panjāb in older Mahomedan writers is applied to the Indus river, after receiving the rivers of the country which we call Punjaub. In that sense Panj-nad, of equivalent meaning, is still occasionally used. [In S. India the term is sometimes applied to the country watered by the Tumbhadora, Wardha, Malprabha, Ghatprabha and Kistna (Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 405).]

We remember in the newspapers, after the second Sikh war, the report of a speech by a clergyman in England, who spoke of the deposition of "the bloody Punjaub of Lahore."

B.C. 2.-"Having explored the land of the Pahlavi and the country adjoining, there had then to be searched Panchanada in every part; the monkeys then explore the region of Kashmir with its woods of acacias."
-Itānāq, Bk. iv. ch. 43.

c. 940. — Máš'údi details (with no correctness) the five rivers that form the Mihrán or Indus. He proceeds: "When the Five Rivers which we have named have past the House of Gold which is Máštán, they unite at place three days distant from that city, between it and Mánšúra at a place called Dosháb."—i. 377-8.

c. 1020.—"They all (Sind, Jhailam, Iriwa, Biah) combine with the Satlader (Sutlej) below Máštán, at a place called Panjnad, or 'the junction of the five rivers.' They form a very wide stream."—Al-Bīrānī, in Elliot, i. 48.

c. 1300.—"After crossing the Panj-áb, or five rivers, namely Sind, Jelam, the river of Loháwar (i.e. of Lahore, viz. the Ráí), Satlader, and Bıyah. . . ."—Wassáf, in Elliot, iii. 95.

c. 1333.—"By the grace of God our caravan arrived safe and sound at Banj-áb, i.e. at the River of the Sind. Panj (pañ) signifies five, and áná, 'water': so that the name signifies 'the Five Waters.' They flow into this great river, and water the country."—Ibn Batutta, iii. 91.

c. 1400.—"All these (united) rivers (Jelam, Chenál, Ráñ, Bıyán, Sind) are called the Sind or Panj-áb, and this river falls into the Persian Gulf near Thatta."—The Emp. Timur, in Elliot, iii. 476.

c. 1630.—"He also takes a Survey of Pang-ob . . ."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 63. He gives a list of the rivers in p. 70."

1648.—". . . Pang-áb, the chief city of which is Labor, is an excellent and fruitful province, for it is watered by the five rivers of which we have formerly spoken."—Van Twed, ed. 3.

"The River of the ancient Indus, is by the Persians and Magols called Pang-áb, i.e. the Five Waters."—Ibid. i.

1710.—"He found this ancient and famous city (Lahore) in the Province Panschaap, by the side of the broad and fish-abounding river Rári (for Ráñ)."—Valentijn, iv. (Surat), 282.

1790.—"Investigations of the religious ceremonies and customs of the Hindoos, written in the Carnatic, and in the Punjaub, would in many cases widely differ."—Forster, Preface to Journey.

1790.—"The Province, of which Lahore is the capital, is often named Panj-áb than Lahore."—Rennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. 52.

1804.—"I rather think . . . that he (Holkar) will go off to the Punjaub. And what gives me stronger reason to think so is, that on the seal of his letter to me he calls himself 'the Slave of Shah Mahmoud, the King of Kings.' Shah Mahmoud is the brother of Zemau Shah. He seized the musnad and government of Caubul, after having defeated Zemau Shah two or three years ago, and put out his eyes."—Wellington, Desp. under March 17.

1815.—"He (Subtagtageen) . . . overran the fine province of the Punjaub, in his first expedition."—Malcolm, Hist. of Persia, i. 316.

PUNKAH, s. Hind. punkáh.

a. In its original sense a portable fan, generally made from the leaf of the palmyra (Borassus flabelliformis, or 'fan-shaped'), the natural type and origin of the fan. Such punkáhs in India are not however formed, as Chinese fans are, like those of our ladies; they are generally, whether large or small, of a bean-shape, with a part of the dried leaf-stalk adhering, which forms the handle.

b. But the specific application in Anglo-Indian colloquial is to the large fixed and swinging fan, formed of cloth stretched on a rectangular frame, and suspended from the ceiling, which is used to agitate the air in hot weather. The date of the introduction of this machine into India is not known to us. The quotation from Linschoten shows that some such apparatus was known in the 16th century, though this comes out clearly in the French version alone; the original Dutch, and the old English translation are here unintelligible, and indicate that Linschoten (who apparently never was at Ormuz) was describing, from hearsay, something that he did not understand. More remarkable passages are those which we take from Dozy, and from El-Fakhri, which show that the true Anglo-Indian punkáh was known to the Arabs as early as the 8th century.

1710.—"Aloft in a Gallery the King sits in his chair of State, accompanied with his PUNKAH.

Children and chiefie Vizier... no other calling daring to goe vp to him, saue only two Punks to gather wind."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 439. The word seems here to be used improperly for the men who plied the fans. We find also in the same writer a verb to punkaw:

"...behind one punkawing, another holding his sword."—Ibid. 493.

Terry does not use the word:

1616.—"... the people of better quality, lying or sitting on their Carpets or Pallats, have servants standing among them, who continually beat the air upon them with Flabella's, or Fans, of stifled leather, which keeps off the flies from annoying them, and cool them as they lye."—Ed. 1665, p. 405.

1663.—"On such occasions they desire nothing but... to lie down in some cool and shady place all along, having a servant or two to fan one by turns, with their great Punkaws, or fans."—Berrier, E.T., p. 76; [ed. Constable, 241].

1787.—"Over her head was held a punker."—Sir C. Molet, in Parl. Papers, 1821, "Hindoo Windoes."

1809.—"He... presented me... two punkahs."—Lord Valentia, i. 428.

1881.—"The chair of state, the sella gestatoria, in which the Pope is borne aloft, is the ancient palanquin of the Roman nobles, and, of course, of the Roman Princes... the fans which go behind are the punkahs of the Eastern Emperors, borrowed from the Court of Persia."—Dean Stanley, Christian Institutions, 207.

c. 1150-60.—"Sous le nom de Khaich on entend des étoffes de mauvais toile de lin qui servent à différents usages. Dans ce passage de Rhazes (c. A.D. 900) ce sont des ventilateurs faits de cet étoffe. Ceci se pratique de cette manière : on en prend un morceau de la grandeur d’un tapis, un peu plus grand ou un peu plus petit selon les dimensions de la chambre, et on le rembourre avec des objets qui ont de la consistance et qui ne plient pas facilement, par exemple avec du sparre. L’ayant ensuite suspendu au milieu de la chambre, on le fait tirer et lacher doucement et continuellement par un homme placé dans le haut de l’appartement. De cette manière il fait beaucoup de vent et refraîchit l’air. Quelquefois on le trempé dans de l’eau de rose, et alors il parfume l’air en même temps qu’il le refraîchit."—Glosseire sur le Mancoor, quoted in Dozy et Engelmann, p. 312. See also Dozy, Suppt. aux Dict. Arabes, s.v. Khaich.

1166.—"He (Ibn Hamgun the Kitib) once recited to me the following piece of his composition, containing an enigmatical description of a linen fan: (1)

"Fast and loose, it cannot touch what it tries to reach; though tied up it moves swiftly, and though a prisoner it is free. Fixed in its place it drives before it the gentle breeze; though its path is closed up it moves on in its nocturnal journey."—Quoted by Ibn Khalilukan, E.T. iii. 91.

"(1) The linen fan (Mivraha-t al Khaish) is a large piece of linen, stretched on a frame, and suspended from the ceiling of the room. They make use of it in Irák. See de Saey’s Hariri, p. 474."—Note by MacGuckin de Slane, ibid. p. 92.

c. 1300.—"One of the innovations of the Caliph Mansûr (A.D. 755-774) was the Khaish of linen in summer, a thing which was not known before his time. But the Sásâniâm Kings used in summer to have an apartment freshly plastered (with clay) every day, which they inhabited, and on the morrow another apartment was plastered for them."—El-Fakhri, ed. Ahwardt, p. 188.

1596.—"And (they use) instruments like swings with fans, to rock the people in, and to make wind for cooling, which they call cattawentos."—Literal Transl. from Lin- schooten, ch. 6.

1598.—"And they use certain instruments like Waggins, with bellows, to bear all the people in, and to gather wind to cool them the better. All which they call Cattawentos."—Old English Translation, by W. P., p. 16; [Hak. Soc. i. 52].

The French version is really a brief description of the punka:

1610.—"Il sont aussi du Cattawentos qui sont certains instruments pendus en l’air es quels se faisant donner le branle ils font du vent qui les refraichit."—Ed. 1638, p. 17.

The next also perhaps refers to a suspended punka:

1662.—"... furnished also with good Cellars with great Flaps to stir the Air, for reposing in the fresh Air from 12 till 4 or 5 of the Clock, when the Air of these Cellars begins to be hot and stuffing."—Berrier, p. 79; [ed. Constable, 247].

1807.—"As one small concern succeeds another, the punkah vibrates gently over my eyes."—Lord Minto in India, 27.

1810.—"Were it not for the punka (a large frame of wood covered with cloth) which is suspended over every table, and kept swinging, in order to freshen the air, it would be scarcely possible to sit out the melancholy ceremony of an Indian dinner."—Maria Graham, 93.

Williamson mentions that punkahs "were suspended in most dining halls."—Vade Mecum, i. 281.

1823.—"Punkas, large frames of light wood covered with white cotton, and looking not unlike enormous fire-boards, hung from the ceilings of the principal apartments."—Heber, ed. 1844, i. 28.

1852.—"Holy stones with scrubs and slaps (Our Christmas waits !) prelude the day; For holy and festoons of bay Swing feble punkas,—or perhaps A windsail dangles in collapse. Christmas on board a T. and O., near the Equator.
1875.—"The punkah flapped to and fro lazily overhead."—Cheaney, The Dilemma, ch. xxxviii.

Mr. Busteed observes: "It is curious that in none of the lists of servants and their duties which are scattered through the old records in the last century (18th), is there any mention of the punka, nor in any narratives referring to domestic life in India then, that have come under our notice, do we remember any allusion to its use. . . . The swinging punka, as we see it to-day, was, as every one knows, an innovation of a later period. . . . This dates from an early year in the present century."—Echoes of Old Calcutta, p. 115. He does not seem, however, to have found any positive evidence of the date of its introduction. ["Hanging punkahs are said by one authority to have originated in Calcutta by accident towards the close of the last (18th) century. It is reported that a clerk in a Government office suspended the leaf of a table, which was accidentally waved to and fro by a visitor. A breath of cool air followed the movement, and suggested the idea which was worked out and resulted in the present machine" (Carey, Good Old Days of John Company, i. 81). Mr. Douglas says that punkahs were little used by Europeans in Bombay till 1810. They were not in use at Nuncomar's trial in Calcutta (1775), Bombay and W. India, ii. 253.]

PUNSAREE, s. A native drug-seller; Hind. pansârî. We place the word here partly because C. P. Brown says 'it is certainly a foreign word,' and assigns it to a corruption of dispensarium; which is much to be doubted. [The word is really derived from Skt. pânyaśāla, 'a market, warehouse.]

PURDAH, s. Hind. from Pers. pardâ, 'a curtain'; a portière; and especially a curtain screening women from the sight of men; whence a woman of position who observes such rules of seclusion is termed pardâništhin, 'one who sits behind a curtain.' (See GOSHA.)

1809.—"On the fourth (side) a purdah was stretched across."—ld. Valentinia, i. 100.

1810.—"If the disorder be obstinate, the doctor is permitted to approach the purdah (i.e. curtain, or screen) and to put the hand through a small aperture . . . in order to feel the patient's pulse."—Williamson, V. M. i. 130.

1813.—"My travelling palankeen formed my bed, its purdoo or chintz covering my curtains."—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. ii. 100.

1875.—"Native ladies look upon the confinement behind the purdah as a badge of rank, and also as a sign of chastity, and are exceedingly proud of it."—Life in the Mofussil, i. 113.

PURDESEE, s. Hind. paradeśi usually written pardëśi, 'one from a foreign country.' In the Bombay army the term is universally applied to a sepoy from N. India. [In the N.W.P. the name is applied to a wandering tribe of swindlers and coiners.]

PURWANNA, PERWAUNA, s. Hind. from Pers. parwâna, 'an order; a grant or letter under royal seal; a letter of authority from an official to his subordinate; a license or pass.'

1682.—". . . we being obliged at the end of two months to pay Custom for the said goods, if in that time we did not procure a Pherwanna for the Dwan of Decca to excuse us from it."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 10; [Hak. Soc. i. 34].

1699.—". . . Egmore and Pursewaukum were lately granted us by the Nabob's purwannas."—Wheeler, i. 281.

1759.—"Perwanna, under the Coocchuk (or the small seal) of the Nabob Vizier Ulma Maleck, Nizam ul Muluck Bahadour, to Mr. John Spenser."—In Cambridge's Act of the War, 280. (See also quotation under HOSBOLHOOKUM.)

1774.—"As the peace has been so lately concluded, it would be a satisfaction to the Rajah to receive your parwanna to this purpose before the departure of the caravan."—Bogle's Diary, in Markham's Tibet, p. 50. But Mr. Markham changes the spelling of his originals.

PUTCHOCK, s. This is the trade-name for a fragrant root, a product of the Himalaya in the vicinity of Kashmîr, and forming an article of export from both Bombay and Calcutta to the Malay countries and to China, where it is used as a chief ingredient of the Chinese pastille-rods commonly called jostick. This root was recognised by the famous Garcia de Orta as
The trade-name is, according to Wilson, the Telugu pučh'chaktu, "green leaf," but one does not see how this applies. (Is there, perhaps, some confusion with Patch? see PATCHOULI). De Orta speaks as if the word, which he writes pucho, were Malay. Though neither Crawford nor Favve gives the word, in this sense, it is in Marsden's earlier Malay Dict.: "Puchok, a plant, the aromatic leaves of which are an article of trade; said by some to be Costus indicus, and by others the Melissa, or *Laurus." [On this Mr. Skeat writes: "Puchok is the Malay word for a young sprout, or the growing shoot of a plant. Puchok in the special sense here used is also a Malay word, but it may be separate from the other. Klinkert gives puchok as a sprout or shoot and also as a radish-like root (indigenous in China sic), used in medicine for fumigation, &c. Apparently it is always the root and not the leaves of the plant that are used, in which case Marsden may have confused the two senses of the word."] In the year 1857-38 about 250 tons of this article, valued at £1,000, were exported from Calcutta alone. The annual import into China at a later date, according to Wells Williams, was 2,000 peculs or 120 tons (Middle Kingdom, ed. 1857, ii. 308). In 1865-66, the last year for which the details of such minor exports are found in print, the quantity exported from Calcutta was only 492½ cwt., or 24½ tons. In 1875 the value of the imports at Hankow and Chefoo was £6,421. [Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. ii. p. 482, Bombay Gazetteer, xi. 470.]

PUTTÁN, PATHÁN. n.p. Hind. Pathán. A name commonly applied to Afghans, and especially to people in India of Afghan descent. The derivation is obscure. Elphinstone derives it from Pushtán and Pukhtánn, pl. Pukhtána, the name the Afghans give to their own race, with which Dr. Trumpp (and Dr. Bellew (Races of Afghanistan, 25) agree. This again has been connected with the Pāchtika of Herodotus (iii. 102, iv. 44).] The Afghans have for the name one of the usual fantastic etymologies which is quoted below (see quotation, c. 1611). The Mahommedans in India are sometimes divided into four classes, viz. Patháns; Magháls (see MOGUL), i.e. those of Turkı origin; Sheikhs, claiming Arab descent; and Saiyáds, claiming also to be descendants of Mahommed.

a. Hind. and Beng. pataná, or patná, from v. patá-ná, 'to be agreed or closed' (i.e. a bargain). Goods commissioned or manufactured to order.

1755.—"A letter from Cossimbazar mentions they had directed Mr. Warren Hastings to proceed to the Putney aurung (q.v.) in order to purchase putney on our Honour. Masters' account, and to make all necessary enquiries."—Fort William Cons., Nov. 16. In Long, 61.

b. A kind of sub-tenure existing in the Lower Provinces of Bengal, the patnádár, or occupant of which "holds of a Zemindar a portion of the Zemindari in perpetuity, with the right of hereditary succession, and of selling or letting the whole, or part, so long as a stipulated amount of rent is paid to the Zemindar, who retains the power of sale for arrears, and is entitled to a regulated fee or fine upon transfer." (Wilson, q.v.). Probably both a and b are etymologically the same, and connected with patá (see POTTÁH).

(1560.—"A perpetual lease of land held under a Zumeendar is called a putnee,—and the holder is called a putneedar, who not only pays an advanced rent to the Zumeendar, but a handsome price for the same."—Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 64.)
of Pathan* also."—Hist. of the Afghans, E.T., by D'Orsay, i. 38.

[1638.—"... Ozmachan a Puttanian..."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1677, p. 76.]

1648.—"In general the Moors are a haughty and arrogant and proud people, and among them the Patans stand out superior to the others in dress and manners."—Van Teest, 58.

1666.—"Martin Affonso and the other Portuguese delivered them from the Patans that were making on them."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Portugueza, i. 343.

1673.—"They are distinguished, some according to the Consanguinity they claim with Mahomet; as a Siad is a kin to that Imposture. ... A Shiek is a Cousin too, at a distance, into which Relation they admit all new made Proselytes. Meer is somewhat allied also. ... The rest are divided under the Name of the Province: ... as Mogul, the Race of the Tartars... Puttan, Ducoan."—Fryer, 93.

1681.—"En estas regiones ay una cuyas gentes se dizen los Patanes."—Martinez de la Puenta, Compendio, 21.

1726.—"... The Patans (Patanders) are very different in garb, and surpass in valour and stout-heartedness in war."—Valentijn, Chorro, 109.

1757.—"The Colonel (Clive) complained bitterly of so many insults put upon him, and reminded the Soubahdar how different his own conduct was, when called upon to assist him against the Pytans."—Ires, 149.

1763.—"The northern nations of India, although idolaters... were easily induced to embrace Mahomedanism, and are at this day the Afghans or Pitas."—Orme, i. 24, ed. 1800.

1759.—"Moormen are, for the most part, soldiers by profession, particularly in the cavalry, as are also... Pitas."—Moors, Narr. 49.

1708.—"... Afghans, or as they are called in India, Patans."—G. Forster, Travels, ii. 47.

[PUTTEE, PUTTY, s. Hind. patti.

a. A piece or strip of cloth, bandage; especially used in the sense of a ligature round the lower part of the leg used in lieu of a gaiter, originally introduced from the Himalaya, and now commonly used by sportsmen and soldiers. A special kind of cloth appears in the old trade-lists under the name of puteahs (see PIECE GOODS).

* We do not know what word is intended, unless it be a special use of Ar. bātan, 'the interior or middle of a thing.' Dorn refers to a note, which does not exist in his book. Bellows gives the title conferred by the Prophet as "Piktān or Pāthān, a term which in the Syrian language signifies rudder." Somebody else interprets it as 'a mast.

b. In the N.W.P., "an original share in a joint or coparcenary village or estate comprising many villages; it is sometimes defined as the smaller subdivision of a nahal or estate" (Wilson). Hence Putteedaree, patti-dāri used for a tenure of this kind.

1852.—"Their names were forthwith scratched off the collector's books, and those of their eldest sons were entered, who became forthwith, in village and cutcherry parlance, lumberdars of the shares of their fathers, or in other words, of puttee Shere Singh and puttea Baz Singh."—Raffles, Notes on the N.W.P. 94.

c. In S. India, soldiers' pay.

1810.—"... hence in ordinary acceptance, the pay itself was called puttea, a Canarese word which properly signifies a written statement of any kind."—Wilks, Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 415.]

PUTTYWALLA, s. Hind. puttā-nilā, patti-nilā (see PUTTEE), 'one with a belt.' This is the usual Bombay term for a messenger or orderly attached to an office, and bearing a belt and brass badge, called in Bengal chupressy or peon (qq.v.), in Madras usually by the latter name.

1878.—"... Here and there a belted Government servant, called a Puttiwallā, or Patta-wallā, because distinguished by a belt..."—Monier Williams, Modern India, 34.

PUTWA, s. Hind. patta. The Hibiscus sabdariffa, L., from the succentant acid flowers of which very fair jelly is made in Anglo-Indian households. [It is also known as the Roseelle or Red Sorrel (Watt, Econ. Dict. iv. 243). Riddell (Domest. Econ. 337) calls it "Oseille or Roselle jam and jelly."]

PYE, s. A familiar designation among British soldiers and young officers for a Pariah-dog (q.v.); a contraction, no doubt, of the former word.
PYJAMMAS. 748

[1892.—"We English call him a pariah, but this word, belonging to a low, yet by no means degraded class of people in Madras, is never heard on native lips as applied to a dog, any more than our other word 'pie.'"]

—L. Kipling, Beast and Man, 266.

PYJAMMAS, s. Hind. pāē-jāma (see JAMMA), lit. 'leg-clothing.' A pair of loose drawers or trousers, tied round the waist. Such a garment is used by various persons in India, e.g., by women of various classes, by Sikh men, and by most Mahommedans of both sexes. It was adopted from the Mahommedans by Europeans as an article of dishabille and of night attire, and is synonymous with Long Drawers, Shulwāurs, and Mogul-breeches. [For some distinctions between these various articles of dress see Forbes-Watson, (Textile Manufactures, 57.)] It is probable that we English took the habit like a good many others from the Portuguese. Thus Pyrard (c. 1610) says, in speaking of Goa Hospital: "Il's ont force calsons sans quoy ne coutez jamais les Portugais des Indes" (ii. p. 11; [Hak. Soc. ii. 9]). The word is now used in London shops. A friend furnishes the following reminiscence: "The late Mr. B—, tailor in Jermyn Street, some 40 years ago, in reply to a question why pyjamas had feet sewn on to them (as was sometimes the case with those furnished by London outfitters) answered: 'I believe, Sir, it is because of the White Ants.'"

[1828.—"His chief joy smoking a cigar
In loose Pāē-jams and native slippers."

Orient, Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, i. 64.]

1881.—"The rest of our attire consisted of that particularly light and airy white flannel garment, known throughout India as a pajama suit."—Hacket, Ceylon, 329.

PYKE, PAIK, s. Wilson gives only one original of the term so expressed in Anglo-Indian speech. He writes: "Pāik or Pāyik, corruptly Pyke, Hind. &c. (from S. padātika), Pāik or Pāyik, Mar. A footman, an armed attendant, an inferior police and revenue officer, a messenger, a courier, a village watchman; in Cutch the Pāiks formerly constituted a local militia, holding land of the Zaminars or Rājās by the tenure of military service," &c., quoting Bengal Regulations. [Platts also treats the two words as identical.] But it seems clear to us that there are here two terms rolled together:

a. Pers. Paik, 'a foot-runner or courier.' We do not know whether this is an old Persian word or a Mongol introduction. According to Hammer Purgstall it was the term in use at the Court of the Mongol princes, as quoted below. Both the words occur in the Ain, but differently spelt, and that with which we now deal is spelt paik (with the fathū point).

c. 1590.—"The Jilawdār (see under JULIDAR) and the Paik (a runner). Their monthly pay varies from 1200 to 12000 (dāms), according to their speed and manner of service. Some of them will run from 50 to 100 kroh (Coss) per day."—Ain, E.T. by Blockmann, i. 183 (see orig. i. 144).

1673.—At the Court of Constantinople: "Les Paiks venaient ensuite, avec leurs bonnets d'argent doré ornés d'un petit plumez de héron, un arc et un carquois chargé de flèches."—Journal d'A. Galland, i. 98.

1687.—"... the under officers and servants called Ajmān-Optans, who are designed to the meaner uses of the Seraglio ... most commonly the sons of Christians taken from their Parents at the age of 10 or 12 years. ... These are: 1. Porters, 2. Bastogies or Gardiners ... 5. Paiks and Solacks ..."—Sir Paul Rycaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, 19.

1761.—"Ahmad Sultān then commissioned Shīth Pasand Khān ... the harkūsas (see HURCARA) and the Paiks, to go and procure information as to the state and strength of the Mahrrat army."—Muhammad Jāfar Shāmhū, in Elliot, viii. 151-2.

1840.—"The express riders (Eilbothen) accomplished 50 farangs a-day, so that an express came in 4 days from Khurasan to Tebris (Tabriz). ... The Foot-runners carrying letters (Peik), whose name at least is maintained to this day at both the Persian and Osmunli Courts, accomplished 30 farangs a-day."—Hammer Purgstall, Gesch. der Goldenen Horde, 243.

[1868.—"The Payel is entwined with the tchilīn (see CHILLUM) (pipe), which at court (Khiva) is made of gold or silver, and must be replenished with fresh water every time it is filled with tobacco."—Vanberg, Sketches, 89.]

b. Hind pāik and pāyik (also Mahr.) from Skt. padātika, and padika, 'a foot-soldier,' with the other specific application given by Wilson, exclusive of 'courier.' In some narratives the word seems to answer exactly to peon.
PYKE, PAIK.

In the first quotation, which is from the Ain, the word, it will be seen, is different from that quoted under (a) from the same source.

c. 1590.—"It was the custom in those times, for the palace (of the King of Bengal) to be guarded by several thousand pykes (pāshā), who are a kind of infantry. An eunuch entered into a confederacy with these guards, who one night killed the King, Futteh Shah, when the Eunuch ascended the throne, under the title of Barbuck Shah."—Gladwin's Tr., ed. 1800, ii. 19 (orig. i. 145; [Jarrett (ii. 149) gives the word as Pāyikes].

In the next quotation the word seems to be the same, though used for 'a seaman.' Compare uses of Lascar.

c. 1615.—"(His fleet) consisted of 20 beaked vessels, all well manned with the sailors whom they call pāiagues, as well as with Portuguese soldiers and topazes who were excellent musketeers; 50 hired jatras (LEVAT) of like sort and his own (Sebastian Gonçalves's) galliot (see GALLEVAT), which was about the size of a patecho, with 14 demi-falcons on each broadside, two pieces of 18 to 20 lbs. calibre in the forecastle, and 60 Portuguese soldiers, with more than 40 topazes and Cafres (see Caffer)."—Bozorou, Decoda, 452.

1792.—Among a detail of charges at this period in the Zemindârry of Râjsâhâi appears:

The following quotation from an Indian Regulation of Ld. Cornwallis's time is a good example of the extraordinary multiplication of terms, even in one Province in India, denoting approximately the same thing:

1792.—"All Pykes, Chokeydars (see CHOKIDAR), Pashans, Dunaads, Nigabans, Harœes (see HARRY), and other descriptions of village watchmen are declared subject to the orders of the Darogah (see DAROGA)."—Reg. for the Police . . . passed by the G.-G. in C. Dec. 7.

"The army of Assam was a militia organised as follows. The whole male population was bound to serve either as soldiers or labourers, and was accordingly divided into sets of four men each, called gôtes, the individuals comprising the gôtes being termed pykes."—Johnstone's Act. of Welsh Expedition to Assam, 1792-93-94 (comm. by Gen. Keatinge).

Pyse! interjection. The use of this is illustrated in the quotations. Notwithstanding the writer's remark (below) it is really Hindustani, viz. pois, 'look out!' or make way!' apparently from Skt. pāśa, 'look out!' (see Molesworth's Mahr. Dict. p. 529, col. c; Fallon's Hind. Dict., p. 376, col. a; [Platts, 2826].

[1815.—". . . three men came running up behind them, as if they were clearing the road for some one, by calling out 'pice! pice!' (make way, make way) . . ."—Elphinstone's Report on Murder of Guzgudhar Shastry, in Papers relating to E.I. Affairs, p. 11.]

1883.—"Does your correspondent Col. Prideaux know the origin of the warning called out by buggy drivers to pedestrians in Bombay, 'Pyse'? It is not Hindustani."—Letter in N. & Q., Ser. VI. viii. p. 388.

[Other expressions of the same kind are Malayâl, po, 'Get out of the way!' and Hind. Mahr, khis, khis, from khânâ, 'to drop off.'

1598. —"As these hayros goe in the streetes, they crie po, po, which is to say, take heed."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 280.

1826.—"I was awoke from disturbed rest by cries of kis! kis! (clear the way)."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 46.]

QUAMOCLIT.

8. The Ipomœa quamoclitis, the name given by Linnaeus to the Red Jasmine. The word is a corruption of Skt. Kâma-latâ, 'the creeper of Kâma, god of love.'

1834.—"This climber, the most beautiful and luxuriant imaginable, bears also the name of Kamalâta 'Love's Creeper.' Some have flowers of snowy hue, with a delicate fragrance. . . .”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 310-11."

QUEDDA. n.p. A city, port, and small kingdom on the west coast of the Malay Peninsula, tributary to Siam. The name according to Crawford is Malay kedah, ‘an elephant-trap’ (see KEDDAH). [Mr. Skeat writes: “I do not know what Crawford’s authority may be, but kedah does not appear in Klinkert’s Dict. . . In any case the form taken by the name of the country is Kedah. The coralling of elephants is probably a Siamese custom, the method adopted on the E. coast, where the Malays are left to themselves, being to place a decoy female elephant near a powerful noose.”] It has been supposed sometimes that Kedah is the Kow or Kowas of Ptolemy’s sea-route to China, and likewise the Kedah of the early Arab voyagers, as in the Fourth Voyage of Sindbad the Seaman (see Proc. R. Geog. Soc. 1882, p. 655; Burton, Arabian Nights, iv. 386). It is possible that these old names however represent Kavala, ‘a river mouth,’ a denomination of many small ports in Malay regions. Thus the port that we call Queda is called by the Malays Kavala Bullan.

1516.—“Having left this town of Tanassary, further along the coast towards Malaca, there is another seaport of the Kingdom of Ansiam, which is called Queda, in which also there is much shipping, and great interchange of merchandise.”—Barros, 158-189.

1558.—“. . . . The settlements from Tay to Malaca are these; Tanassary, a notable city, Langur, Torrão, Queda, producing the best pepper on all that coast, Pedío, Perá, Solungor, and our City of Malaca . . .”—Barros, i. ix. 1.

1572.—“Olha Tayá cidade, onde começa De Sião largo o imperio tão comprido; Tenassari, Quedá, que he so cabeça Das que pimenta allí tem produzido.”—Quemos, x. 123.

By Barros:

“Behold Tayá City, whence begin Siam’s dominions, Reign of vast extent; Tenassari, Queda of towns the Queen that bear the burthen of the hot piment.”

1598.—“. . . . to the town and Kingdom of Queda . . . which lyeth under 6 degrees and a half; this is also a Kingdom like Tanassaria, it hath also some wine, as Tanassaria hath, and some small quantitie of Pepper.”—Linschoten, p. 31; [Hak. Soc. i. 103].

1614.—“And so . . . Diogo de Mendonça . . . sending the gallots (see GALLEVAT) on before, embarked in the jato (see GALLEVAT) of João Rodrigues de Paiva, and coming to Queda, and making an attack at daybreak, and finding them unprepared, he burnt the town, and carried off a quantity of provisions and some tin” (caldam, see CALAY).—Bocarro, Decada, 187.

1838.—“Leaving Penang in September, we first proceeded to the town of Quedah lying at the mouth of a river of the same name.”—Quedah, &c., by Capt. Sherard Osborne, ed. 1865.

QUEMOY. n.p. An island at the east opening of the Harbour of Amoy. It is a corruption of Kin-mun, in Chang-chau dialect Kin-maui”, meaning ‘Golden-door.’

QUI-HI, s. The popular distinctive nickname of the Bengal Anglo-Indian, from the usual manner of calling servants in that Presidency, viz. ‘Koi hai?’ ‘Is any one there?’ The Anglo-Indian of Madras was known as a Mull, and he of Bombay as a Duck (q.v.).

1816.—“The Grand Master, or Adventures of Qui Hi in Hindostan, a Hudibrisite Poem; with illustrations by Rowlandson.”

1825.—“Most of the household servants are Parsees, the greater part of whom speak English . . . Instead of ‘Koe hue,’ Who’s there! the way of calling a servant is ‘boy,’ a corruption. I believe, of ‘bhrs, brother’”—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 98. [But see under BOY.]

c. 1830.—“J’ai vu dans vos gazettes de Calcutta les clameurs des quiohaed (sobriquet des Européens Bengalis de ce côté) sur la chaleur.”—J-agemont, Corresp. ii. 308.

QUILOA. n.p. i.e. Kilwa, in lat. 9° O’S, next in remoteness to Sofala, which for a long time was the ne plus ultra of Arab navigation on the East Coast of Africa, as Capt. Boyados was that of Portuguese navigation on the West Coast. Kilwa does not occur in the Geographies of Edrisi or Abulfeda, though Sofala is in both. It is mentioned in the Roteiro, and in Barros’s account of Da Gama’s voyage. Barros had access to a native chronicle of Quilao, and says it was founded about A.H. 400, and a little more than 70 years after Magadoxo and Brava, by a Persian Prince from Shiraz.

1220.—“Kilwa, a place in the country of Zenj, a city.”—Yákat, (orig.), iv. 302.

c. 1330.—“I embarked at the town of Malbudson (Magadoxo), making for the country of the Sawañhil, and the town of Kaulam in the country of the Zenj. . . ."— Ibn Batuta, ii. 191. [See under SOFALA.]

1498. "Here we learned that the island of which they told us in Moçambique as being peopled by Christians is an island at which dwells the King of Moçambique himself, and that the half is of Moors, and the half of Christians, and in this island is much seed-pearl, and the name of the island is Quylyuee. . . ."—Roteiro da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, 48.

1501. "Quiloa è caitade in Arabia in sua insuleta giunta a terra firma, ben popolata de homini negri et mercadanti: edificata al modo n°c: Quiui hanno abun-

1553. "The Moor, in addition to his natural hatred, bore this increased resentment on account of the chastisement inflicted on him, and determined to bring the ships into port at the city of Quiloa, that being a populous place, where they might get the better of our ships by force of arms. To wreak this mischief with greater safety to himself he told Vasco da Gama, as if wishing to gratify him, that in front of them was a city called Quiloa, half peopled by Christians of Abyssinia and of India, and that if he gave the order the ships should be steered thither."—Barros, I. iv. 5.

1572. "Esta ilha pequena, que habitamos, He em toda esta terra certa escala De todos os que as ondas navegamos De Quilloa, de Mombaça, a de Sofala."—Camões, i. 54.

By Burton:

"This little island, where we now abide, of all this seaboard is the one sure place for ev'ry merchantman that stems the tide from Quiloa, or Sofala, or Mombas. . . ."

Quilon, n.p. A form which we have adopted from the Portuguese for the name of a town now belonging to Travancore; once a very famous and much frequented port of Malabar, and known to the Arabs as Kaulam. The proper name is Tamil, Kollam, of doubtful sense in this use. Bishop Caldwell thinks it may be best explained as 'Palace' or 'royal residence,' from Kol, 'the royal Presence,' or Hall of Audience. [Mr. Logan says: 'Kollam is only an abbreviated form of Koniyagam or Kovilagam, "King's house"] (Malabar, i. 231, note.) For ages Kaulam was known as one of the greatest ports of Indian trade with Western Asia, especially trade in pepper and brazil-wood. It was possibly the Malé of Cosmas in the 6th century (see MALABAR), but the first mention of it by the present name is about three centuries later, in the Relation translated by Reinard. The 'Kollam era' in general use in Malabar dates from A.D. 824; but it does not follow that the city had no earlier existence. In a Syriac extract (which is, however, modern) in Land's Anecdoty Syriaca (Latin, i. 125; Syriac, p. 27) it is stated that three Syrian missionaries came to Kaulam in A.D. 823, and got leave from King Shakir-birti to build a church and city at Kaulam. It would seem that there is some connection between the date assigned to this event, and the 'Kollam era'; but what it is we cannot say. Shakir-birti is evidently a form of Chakrivarti Raija (see under Chucker-Butty). Quilon, as we now call it, is now the 3rd town of Travancore, pop. (in 1891) 23,380; there is little trade. It had a European garrison up to 1830, but now only one Sepoy regiment.

In ecclesiastical narratives of the Middle Ages the name occurs in the form Columbana, and by this name it was constituted a See of the Roman Church in 1328, suffragan of the Archbishop of Sultaniva in Persia; but it is doubtful if it ever had more than one bishop, viz. Jordanus of Severac, author of the Mirabilia often quoted in this volume. Indeed we have no knowledge that he ever took up his bishopric, as his book was written, and his nomination occurred, both during a visit to Europe. The Latin Church however which he had founded, or obtained the use of, existed 20 years later, as we know from John de' Marignolli, so it is probable that he had reached his See. The form Columbun is accounted for by an inscription (see Ind. Antiq. ii. 360) which shows that the city was called Kolambu, [other forms being Kalammapattana, or Kalammapattana (Bombay Gazetteer, vol. i. pt. i. 183)]. The form Palumbbum also occurs in most of the MSS. of Friar Odorici's Journey; this is the more difficult to account for, unless it was a mere play (or a trick of memory) on the kindred meanings of columb and pulumbes. A passage in a letter from the Nestorian Patriarch Yeshuyab (c. 650-60) quoted in Assemant (iii. pl. i. 131), appears at that date to mention Colun. But this is an arbitrary and erroneous rendering in Assenani's Latin. The Syriac has Kadah, and probably therefore refers to the port of the Malay regions noticed under Calay and Quedda.

854.—"De ce lien (Mascate) les navires mettent la voile pour l'Inde, et se dirigent vers Koulam-Malay ; la distance entre Mascate et Koulam-Malay est d'un mois de marche, avec un vent modéré."—Relation, &c., tr. by Reinward, i. 15.

1166.—"Seven days from thence is Chu-lam, on the confines of the country of the sun-worshippers, who are descendants of Kush ... and are all black. This nation is very trustworthy in matters of trade. ... Pepper grows in this country. ... Cinnamon, ginger, and many other kinds of spices also grow in this country."—Benjamin of Tudela, in Early Travels in Palestine, 114-115.

c. 1280-90.—"Royannes de Ma-pa'rh. Parmi tous les royaumes étrangers d'onde là des mers, il n'y eut que Ma-pa'rh et Kid-lan (Maabar and Quilon) sur lesquels on ait pu parvenir à établir une certaine suture ; mais surtout Kid-lan ... (André 1282). Cette année ... Kid-lan a envoyé un ambassadeur à la cour (mongole) pour présenter en tribut des marchandises précieuses et un singe noir."—Chinese Annals, quoted by Panthier, Marc Pol, ii. 603, 643.

c. 1285.—"When you quit Maabar and go 500 miles towards the S.W. you come to the Kingdom of Colun. The people are idolators, but there are also some Christians and some Jews," &c.—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 22.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Kankan and Tan ; beyond them the country of Malibar, which from the boundary of Karoha to Ku-lam, is 300 parasangs in length. ... The people are all Samanis, and worship idols. ..."—Rashdialdin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1310.—"Ma'bar extends in length from Ku-lam to Vildvar (Netlere) nearly 300 parasangs along the sea-coast."—Wasif, in Elliot, iii. 32.

c. 1322.—"... as I went by the sea ... towards a certain city called Polumbunum (where growth the pepper in great store). ..."—Friar Odoric, in Cathay, p. 71.

c. 1322.—"Poi venni a Colombo, ch'è la migliore terra d'India per mercatanti. Quivi è il gengajo in grande copia e del buono del mondo. Quivi vennero tutti ignudi salvo che portano un panno innanzi alla vergogna, ... e legalosi di dietro."—Polatine MS. of Odoric, in Cathay, App. p. xlvii.

c. 1328.—"In India, whilst I was at Columbun, were found two cats having wings like the wings of bats."—Friar Jordanus, p. 29.

1330.—"Joannes, &c., nobili vico dominio Nascaernorum et universis sub eo Christianis Nascaernis de Columbo gratian in praesenti, quae ducat ad gloriam in futuro ... quatenus venerabilis Fratrem nostrum Jordanum Cataluni episcopum Columensem ... quem nuper ad episcopalis dignitatis apicem auctoritatem apostolica diximus promovendum, ..."—Letter of Pope John XXII. to the Christians of Colun, in Odorici Raynoldi Ann. Eccles. v. 495.

c. 1341.—"The 10th day (from Calicut) we arrived at the city of Kaulam, which is one of the finest of Malibar. Its markets are splendid, and its merchants are known under the name of Sali (see CHOLUL. They are rich; one of them will buy a ship with all its fittings and load it with goods from his own store."—Bon Battuta, iv. 10.

c. 1348.—"And sailing on the feast of St. Stephen, we navigated the Indian Sea until Palm Sunday, and then arrived at a very noble city of India called Columbun, where the whole world's pepper is produced. ... There is a church of St. George there, of the Latin communion, at which I dwelt. And I adorned it with fine paintings, and taught there the holy Law."—John Marioliti, in Cathay, &c., pp. 342-344.

c. 1420.—"... Colone, civitatem nobilissimam venit, cujus ambitus duodecim millia passuum amplectitur. Gingiber qui colobi (columbi) dicitur, piper, verzinum, cannelleae quae crosse appellantur, hae in provincia, quam vocant Melibaram, leguntur."—Conti, in Poggia de Var. Fortunan.

c. 1469-9.—"In the year Bhaavati (644) of the Kolamba era, King Adityavarma the ruler of Vanchi ... who has attained the sovereignty of Chera-baya Mandalam, hung up the bell."—Inscr. in Tumnaday, see Ind. Antiq., ii. 360.

1510.—"... we departed ... and went to another city called Colon. ... The King of this city is a Pagan, and extremely powerful, and he has 20,000 horsemen, and many archers. This country has a good port near to the sea-coast. No grain grows here, but fruits as at Calicut, and pepper in great quantities."—Varchema, 182-3.

1516.—"Further on along the same coast towards the south is a great city and good sea-port which is named Colum, in which dwell many Moors and Gentiles and Christians. They are great merchants and very rich, and own many ships with which they trade to Cholmendel, the Island of Ceylon, Bengal, Malaca, Samatara, and Pegu. ... There is also in this city much pepper."—Barbosa, 157-8.

1572.—"A hum Cochim, e a outro Canamar A qual Chalé, a qual a ilha da Fimenta, A qual Colão, a qual da Cranganor E os mais, a quem o mais servir a contenta."—Casting, vii. 35.
RAIS.

"To this Cochin, to that falls Cananor, one hath Chalé, another th' Isle Piment, a third Coulam, a fourth takes Oranganor, the rest is theirs with whom he rests content."

1726.—"...Coylang."—Valentijn, Chor., 115.

1727.—"...Coloan is another small principality. It has the Benefit of a River, which is the southernmost Outlet of the Cochinch Islands; and the Dutch have a small Fort, within a Mile of it on the Sea-shore. ... It keeps a Garrison of 30 Men, and its trade is inconsiderable."—A. Hamilton, i. 333 [ed. 1744].

QUIRPELE, s. This Tamil name of the mongoose (q.v.) occurs in the quotation which follows: properly Kirippillai, ["little squeaker"].

1601.—"...bestioha quaedam Quil sive Quirpele vocata, quae aspectu primo vi-nerae. ..."—De Bry, iv. 63.

RADAREE, s. P.—H. rah-darì, from rah-darì, 'road-keeper.' A transit duty; sometimes 'black-mail.' [Rah-darì is very commonly employed in the sense of sending prisoners, &c., by escort from one police post to another, as along the Grand Trunk road].

1620.—"Fra Nicolo Ruigliata Francesco genoveso, il quale, passaggiere, che d'Italia andava in Italia, partito alcuni giorni prima da Ispahan ... poco di qua lontano era stato trattenuto dal rahdari, o custodi delle strade. ..."—P. della Valle, i. 99.

1622.—"At the garden Pelengon we found a rahdar or guardian of the road, who was also the chief over certain other rahdari, who are usually posted in another place 2 leagues further on."—Ibid. ii. 285.

1623.—"For Rahdars, the Khan has given them a firman to free them, also firmans for a house. ..."—Steinshury, iii. p. 163.

[1667.—"...that the goods ... may not be stopped ... on pretence of taking Rhadaryes, or other duties. ..."—Phir- man of Shew Orung Zeeb, in Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, i. 213.]

1673.—"This great officer, or Farmer of the Emperor's Custom (the Shawbunder [see SHABUNDER]), is obliged on the Roads to provide for the safe travelling for Merchants by a constant Watch ... for which Rhadorage, or high Imposts, are allowed by the Merchants, both at Landing and in their passage inland."—Fryer, 222.

1685.—"...Here we were forced to compound with the Rattaree men, for ye Dutys on our goods."—Hedges, Diary, Dec. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 213. In i. 100, Rawdarrie].

c. 1731.—"...Nizâm-ul Mulk ... thus got rid of ... the rahdari from which latter impost great annoyance had fallen upon travellers and traders."—Khâfi Khan, in Elliot, vii. 531.

[1744.—"Passing the river Kizilawan we ascended the mountains by the Rahdars (a Persian toll) of Noglabar. ..."—Hanvey, i. 226.]

RAGGY, s. Râgi (the word seems to be Dec. Hindustani, [and is derived from Skt. râga, 'red,' on account of the colour of the grain). A kind of grain, Eleusine Coracana, Gaertn.; Cynarurus Coracanus, Linn.; largely cultivated, as a staple of food, in Southern India.

1792.—"The season for sowing raggy, rice, and bajera from the end of June to the end of August."—Life of T. Munro, iii. 92.

1793.—"The Mahratta supplies consisting chiefly of Raggy, a coarse grain, which grows in more abundance than any other in the Mysore Country, it became necessary to serve it out to the troops, giving rice only to the sick."—Drown, 10.

[1800.—"...The Deccany Mussulmans call it Raggy. In the Tamil language it is called Kevir (kêthavargy)."—Buchanan, Mysore, i. 100.]

RAINS, THE, s. The common Anglo-Indian colloquial for the Indian rainy season. The same idiom, as chuvus, had been already in use by the Portuguese. (See WINTER).

c. 1666.—"...Lastly, I have imagined that if in Delhi; for example, the Rains come from the East, it may yet be that the Seas which are Southerly to it are the origin of them, but that they are forced by reason of some Mountains ... to turn aside and discharge themselves another way. ..."—Bernier, E.T., 138; [ed. Constable, 433].

1707.—"We are heartily sorry that the Rains have been so very unhealthy with you."—Letter in Orme's Fragments.

1750.—"The Rains ... setting in with great violence, overwhelmed the whole country."—Orme, Hist., ed. 1803, i. 153.

1868.—"...The place is pretty, and although it is the Rains, there is scarcely any day when we cannot get out."—Bp. Milman, in Memoir, p. 67.

[RAIS, s. Ar. ra'is, from ra's, 'the head,' in Ar. meaning 'the captain, or master, not the owner of a ship;'} India it generally means 'a native gentleman of respectable position.'

1610.—"... Reyses of all our Nauyes."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 435.

1785.—"... their chief (more worthless in truth than a horsekeeper)." In note—"In the original the word syse is introduced for the sake of a jingle with the word Reys (a chief or leader)."—Tippoo's Letters, 18.

1870.—"Raees." See under RYOT.

1900.—"The petition was signed by representative landlords, raiseda."—Pioneer Mail, April 13.

RAJA, RAJAH, s. Skt. ῥάγ, 'king.' The word is still used in this sense, but titles have a tendency to degenerate, and this one is applied to many humbler dignitaries, petty chiefs, or large Zemindars. It is also now a title of nobility conferred by the British Government, as it was by their Mahommedan predecessors, on Hindus, as Nawib is upon Moslem. Ῥά, Ῥά抵御, Ῥά, Ῥά, (in S. India), are other forms which the word has taken in vernacular dialects or particular applications. The word spread with Hindu civilisation to the eastward, and survives in the titles of Indo-Chinese sovereigns, and in those of Malay and Javanese chiefs and princes.

It is curious that the term Ῥά cannot be traced, so far as we know, in any of the Greek or Latin references to India, unless the very questionable instance of Pliny's Ῥᾶκiłas be an exception. In early Mahommedan writers the now less usual, but still Indian, forms Ῥά抵御 and Ῥά抵御, are those which we find. ( Ibn Batuta, it will be seen, regards the words for king in India and in Spain as identical, in which he is fundamentally right.) Among the English vulgarisms of the 18th century again we sometimes find the word barbarised into Roger.

c. 1383.—"... Bahü-uddin fled to one of the heathen Kings called the Ῥά抵御 Kanblah. The word Ῥά抵御 among those people, just as among the people of Rüm, signifies 'King.'"— Ibn Batuta, iii. 318. The traveller here refers, as appears by another passage, to the Spanish Ῥϊγ.

[1609.—"Raiaw." See under GOONT.]

1612.—"In all this part of the East there are 4 castes. ... The first caste is that of the Rayas, and this is a most noble race from which spring all the Kings of Canara. ..."—Cunlo, V. vi. 4.

[1623.—"A Ragia, that is an Indian Prince."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 84.]

1683.—"I went a hunting with ye Raeea, who was attended with 2 or 300 men, armed with bows and arrows, swords and targets."—Hedges, Diary, March 1 ; [Hak. Soc. i. 66].

1786.—Tippoo with gross impropriety addresses Louis XVI. as "the Rajah of the French."—Select Letters, 369.

RAJAMUNDEY, n.p. A town, formerly head-place of a district, on the lower Godavery R. The name is in Telegu Rājamahendravaramu, 'King-chief's-Town,' [and takes its name from Mahendradeva of the Orissa dynasty; see Morris, Godavery Man. 25].

RAJPOOT, s. Hind. Rājput, from Skt. Rājputra, 'King's Son.' The name of a great race in India, the hereditary profession of which is that of arms. The name was probably only a honorific assumption; but no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. According to Chand, the great medieval bard of the Rajpūts, there were 36 clans of the race, issued from four Kshatriyas (Parihār, Pramār, Solankhī, and Chāhūn) who sprang into existence from the sacred Agni-kundā or Firepit on the summit of Mount Abū. Later bards give five eponyms from the firepit, and 99 clans. The Rājpūt thus claim to be true Kshatriyas, or representatives of the second of the four fundamental castes, the Warriors; but the Brahmans do not acknowledge the claim, and deny that the true Kshatriya is extant. Possibly the story of the fireborn ancestry hides a consciousness that the claim is fictitious. "The Rajpoots," says Forbes, "use animal food and spirituous liquors, both unclean in the last degree to their puritanic neighbours, and are scrupulous in the observance of only two rules,—those which prohibit the slaughter of cows, and the remarriage of widows. The clans are not forbidden to eat together, or to intermarry, and cannot be said in these respects to form separate castes" (Rās-mālā, reprint 1878, p. 537). An odd illustration of the fact that to partake of animal food, and especially of the heroic repast of the flesh of the wild boar killed in the chase-(see Terry’s representation of this below), is a Rajput characteristic, occurs to the memory of one of the present writers. In Lord Canning’s time the young Rajput Rajja of Alwar had betaken himself to degrading courses, insomuch that the Viceroy felt constrained, in open durbar at Agra, to admonish him. A veteran political officer, who was present, inquired of the agent at the Alwar Court what had been the nature of the conduct thus rebuked. The reply was that the young prince had become the habitual associate of low and profane Mahomedans, who had so influenced his conduct that among other indications, he would not eat wild pig. The old Political, hearing this, shook his head very gravely, saying, ‘Would not eat Wild Pig! Dear! Dear! Dear!’ It seemed the ne plus ultra of Rajput degradation! The older travellers give the name in the quaint form Rashbho, but this is not confined to Europeans, as the quotation from Sidi ‘Ali shows; though the aspect in which the old English travellers regarded the tribe, as mainly a pack of banditti, might have made us think the name to be shaped by a certain sense of aptness. The Portuguese again frequently call them Reys Butos, a form in which the true etymology, at least partially, emerges.

1516.—“There are three qualities of these Gentiles, that is to say, some are called Razbutes, and they, in the time that their King was a Gentile, were Knights, the defenders of the Kingdom, and governors of the Country.”—Barbosa, 50.

1553.—“Insomuch that whilst the battle went on, Saladim placed all his women in a large house, with all that he possessed, whilst below the house were combustibles for use in the fight; and Saladim ordered them to set fire to, whilst he was in it. Thus the house suddenly blew up with great explosion and loud cries from the unhappy women; whereupon all the people from within and without rushed to the spot, but the Resbutos fought in such a way that they drove the Guzarat troops out of the gates, and others in their hasty flight cast themselves from the walls and perished.”—Correa, iii. 327.

“And with the stipulation that the 200 pardoos, which are paid as allowance to the larovins of the two small forts which stand between the lands of Baoqm and the Reys butos, shall be paid out of the revenues of Baoqm as they have been paid hitherto.”—Treaty of Nuno da Cunha with the K. of Cambaya, in Subsidios, 137.

c. 1554.—“But if the caravan is attacked, and the Bôts (see BHAT) kill themselves, the Rashbuts, according to the law of the Bôts, are adjudged to have committed a crime worthy of death.”—Sidi ‘Ali Kapudân, in J. As., Ser. i., tom. ix. 95.

1614.—“The next day they embarked, leaving in the city, what of those killed in fight and those killed by fire, more than 800 persons, the most of them being Regibutos, Moors of great value; and of ours fell eighteen. . . .”—Bocarro, Decada, 210.

1614.—“. . . in great danger of thieves called Rashbouts . . .”—Foster, Letters, ii. 260.

1616.—“. . . it were fitter he were in the Company of his brother . . . and his saferie more regarded, then in the hands of a Rashboute Gentille . . .”—Sir T. Roe, i. 553–4; [Hak. Soc, ii. 292].

“... The Rashbouts eate Swines-flesh most hatefull to the Mahometans.”—Terry, in Purchas, i. 1479.

1638.—“These Rashbouts are a sort of Highway men, or Tories.”—Mandetio, Eng. by Davies, 1669, p. 19.

1648.—“These Resbouts (Resboutes) are hold for the best soldiers of Gusuratta.”—Van Twist, 39.

[c. 1660.—“The word Ragipous signifies Sons of Rajas.”—Bennier, ed. Constable, 39.]

1673.—“Next in esteem were the Rashwors, Rashpoots, or Souldiers.”—Fryer, 27.

1689.—“... the place where they went ashore was at Town of the Moors, which name our Seamen give to all the Subjects of the Great Mogul, but especially his Mahometan Subjects; calling the Idolaters Gramutos or Rashbouts.”—Dampier, i. 507.

RAMASAMMY, s. This corruption of Rîmaswâmi (‘Lord Râma’), a common Hindû proper name in the South, is there used colloquially in two ways:

(a). As a generic name for Hindus, like ‘Tommy Atkins’ for a British soldier. Especially applied to Indian coolies in Ceylon, &c.

a.—

[1843.—“I have seen him almost swallow it, by Jove, like Ramo Samee, the Indian juggler.”—Thackeray, Book of Snobs, ch. i.] 1880.—"... if you want a clerk to do your work or a servant to attend on you,
... you would take on a saponaceous
Bengali Baboo, or a servile abject Madrasi Ramasammy... A Madrasi, even if wrongly abused, would simply call you his father, and his mother, and his aunt, de-defender of the poor, and epitome of wisdom, and would take his change out of you in the bazaar accounts."—Cornhill Mag., Nov., pp. 582-3.

RAMBOTANG, s. Malay, rambatán (Flét, No. 6750, p. 256). The name of a fruit (Nephelium lappaceum, L.), common in the Straits, having a thin luscious pulp, closely adhering to a hard stone, and covered externally with bristles like those of the external envelope of a chestnut. From rambat,
'hair.'

1613.—"And other native fruits, such as bæches (perhaps barching, the Magipera foetida) rambotans, rainbes,* buasælos,* and pomegranates, and innumerable others.
..."—Goudiño de Ereadi, 16.

1726.—"... the ramboetan-tree (the fruit of which the Portuguese call fruita dos cañaros or Caffer's fruit)."—Valentijn (v.)
Sumatra, 3.

1727.—"... The Rambostan is a Fruit about the Bigness of a Walnut, with a tough Skin, beset with Capillaments; within the Skin is a very savoury Pulp."—A. Hamilton, ii. 81; [ed. 1744, ii. 80].

1783.—"Mangustines, rambustines, &c."
—Forrest, Merquis, 40.

[1812.—"... mangustan, rambudan, and dorian..."—Heyue, Tracts, 411.]

RAMDAM, s. Hind. from Ar.
ramadān (ramaghān). The ninth Mahommedan lunar month, viz. the month of the Fast.

1615.—"... at this time, being the preparation to the Ramdam or Lent."— Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 537; [Hak. Soc.
i. 21; also 55, 72, ii. 274].

1623.—"The 29th June: I think that (to-day?) the Moors have commenced their ramadān, according to the rule by which I calculate."—P. della Valle, ii. 807; [Hak.
Soc. i. 179].

1686.—"They are not... very curious or strict in observing any Days or Times of particular Devotions, or except it be Ramdam time, we call it... In this time they fast all Day..."—Dampier, i. 343.

* Favre gives (Diet. Malay-Français): "Duku" (buea is=fruit). "Nom d'un fruit de la grosseur d'un œuf de poule; il parait être une grosse espèce de Laurus."
(11 is L. domestica.) The Bombe is figured by Mursden in Atlas to Hist. of Sumatra, 3rd ed. pl. vi. and pl. ix. It seems to be Buccovara dulcis, Mull. (Hierardia dulcis, Jack.)

RAMOOSY, u.p. The name of a very distinct caste in W. India, Mahr. Ramōsī, [said to be from Mahr. ramūvas, 'jungle-dweller'] originally one of the theiving castes. Hence they came to be employed as hereditary watchmen in villages, paid by cash or by rent-free lands, and by various petty dues. They were supposed to be responsible for thefts till the criminals were caught; and were often themselves concerned. They appear to be still commonly employed as hired chokidars by Anglo-Indian households in the west. They come chiefly from the country between Poona and Kolhapūr. The surviving traces of a Ramoosy dialect contain Telegu words, and have been used in more recent days as a secret slang.
[See an early account of the tribe in:
"An Account of the Origin and Present condition of the tribe of Ramoosies, including the Life of the Chief Oomiah Naik, by Capt. Alexander Mackintosh of the Twenty-seventh Regiment, Madras Army," Bombay 1833.]

[1817.—"His Highness must long have been aware of Ramooese near the Mahadeo pagoda."—Elphinstone's Letter to Peshwa, in Papers relating to E.I. Affairs, 23.]

1833.—"There are instances of the Ramoosy Naiks, who are of a bold and daring spirit, having a great ascendancy over the village Patell (Patel) and Kool-kurnies (Coolurnee), but which the latter do not like to acknowledge openly... and it sometimes happens that the village officers participate in the profits which the Ramoosies derive from committing such irregularities."—Macintosh, Acc. of the Tribe of Ramoosies, p. 19.

1883.—"Till a late hour in the morning he (the chameleon) sleeps sounder than a ramoosey or a chowkeydar; nothing will wake him."—Trades on My Frontier.

R A M - R A M! The commonest salutation between two Hindus meeting on the road; an invocation of the divinity.

1652.—"... then they approach the devil waving them (their hands) and repeating many times (the words) Ram, Ram, i.e. God, God..."—Tavernier, ed. Bull, i. 203.]

1673.—"Those whose zeal transports them no further than to die at home, are immediately Washed by the next of Kin, and bound up in a Sheet; and as many as go with him carry them by turns on a Colt-staff; and the rest run almost naked and shaved, crying after him Ram, Ram."— Fryer, 101.
1726.—"The wives of Bramines (when about to burn) first give away their jewels and ornaments, or perhaps a pinang, (q.v.), which is under such circumstances a great present, to this or that one of their male or female friends, who draws it round him. —Linschoten, [Hak. 1828.—See under SUTTEE.] c. 1885.—Sir G. Birdwood writes: "In 1869-70 I saw a green parrot in the Crystal Palace aviary very doeful, dull, and miserable to behold. I called it 'pretty poll,' and coaxed it in every way, but no notice of me would it take. Then I bethought me of its being a Mahatta popot, and hailed it Ram Ram! and spoke in Maharati to it; when at once it roused up out of its lethargy, and hopped and swung about, and answered me back, and cuddled up close to me against the bars, and laid its head against my knuckles. And every day thereafter, when I visited it, it was always in an eager flurry to salute me as I drew near to it."

RANEE, s. A Hindu queen; rānī, fem. of rājā, from Skt. rājā (= regina).

1673. —"Bedmore (Bednur) is the Capital City, the Residence of the Ranna, the Relief of Sham Shankur Naig."—Fryer, 162.

1809.—"The young Rannie may marry whomsoever she pleases."—Lord Valentia, i. 364.

1579.—"There were once a Raja and a Rāné who had an only daughter."—Miss Stokes, Indian Fairy Tales, 1.

RANGOON, n.p. Burm. Ranno, said to mean 'War-end'; the chief town and port of Pegu. The great Pagoda in its immediate neighbourhood had long been famous under the name of Dagon (q.v.), but there was no town in modern times till Rangoon was founded by Alompra during his conquest of Pegu, in 1755. The name probably had some kind of intentional allusion to Da-gun, whilst it "proclaimed his forecast of the immediate destruction of his enemies." Occupied by the British forces in May 1824, and again, taken by storm, in 1852, Rangoon has since the latter date been the capital, first of the British province of Pegu, and latterly of British Burma. It is now a flourishing port with a population of 134,176 (1881); [in 1891, 180,324].

RANJOW, s. A Malay term, ran-jau. Sharp-pointed stakes of bamboo of varying lengths stuck in the ground to penetrate the naked feet or body of an enemy. See Maraden, H. of Swattra, 2nd ed., 276. [The same thing on the Assam frontier is called a poe (Levin, Wild Races, 306), or panjī (Sanderson, Thirteen Years, 233).]

RASEED, s. Hind. rasid. A native corruption of the English 'receipt,' shaped, probably, by the Pers. rasida, 'arrived'; viz. an acknowledgment that a thing has 'come to hand.'

1577.—"There is no Sindi, however wild, that cannot now understand 'Rasid' (receipt), and 'Apāl' (appeal)."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 282.

RAT-BIRD, s. The striated bush-babbler (Chatterhaoe canadata, Dumeril); see Tribes on My Frontier, 1883, p. 3.

RATTAN, s. The long stem of various species of Asiatic climbing palms, belonging to the genus Calamus and its allies, of which canes are made (not 'bamboo-canes,' improperly so called), and which, when split, are used to form the seats of cane-bottomed chairs and the like. From Malay rotan, [which Crawford derives from rovat, 'to pare or trim'], applied to various species of Calamus and Daemonorops (see Fédet, No. 696 et seq.). Some of these attain a length of several hundred feet, and are used in the Himalaya and the Kāsia Hills for making suspension bridges, &c., rivalling rope in strength.

1511. —"The Governor set out from Malaca in the beginning of December, of this year, and sailed along the coast of Pedir... He met with such a contrary gale that he was obliged to anchor, which he did with a great anchor, and a cable of rotas, which are slender but tough canes, which they twist and make into strong cables."—Corner, Lendas, ii. 269.

1563.—"They took thick ropes of rotas (which are made of certain twigs which are very flexible) and cast them round the feet, and others round the tucks."—Garcia, f. 90.

1598.—"There is another sort of the same reeds which they call Rota: these are thine like twigges of Willow for baskets...."—Linschoten, 28; [Hak. Soc. i. 97].

e. 1610.—"Il y a vne autre sorte de canne qui ne m'est jamais plus grosse que le petit doit... et il ploye comme osier. Ils l'appellent Rotan. Ils en font des cables de nauire, et quantité de sortes de paniers sentiment entre lasse."—Pygard de Laval, ii. 237; [Hak. Soc. i. 331, and see i. 207].
RAVINE DEER. 758 REGULATION.

1673.—"... The Materials Wood and Plaister, beautified without with folding windows, made of Wood and latticed with Rattans. ..."—Fryer, 27.

1845.—"In the deep valleys of the south the vegetation is most abundant and various. Amongst the most conspicuous species are ... the rattan winding from trunk to trunk and shooting his pointed head above all his neighbours."—Notes on the Kasia Hills and People, in J.A.S.B. vol. xiii. pt. ii. 615.

RAVINE DEER. The sportsman's name, at least in Upper India, for the Indian gazelle (Gazella Bemnettii, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 526 seqq.]).

RAZZIA, s. This is Algerine-French, not Anglo-Indian, meaning a sudden raid or destructive attack. It is in fact the Ar. ghadiya, 'an attack upon infidels,' from ghadi, 'a hero.'

REAPER, s. The small laths, laid across the rafters of a sloping roof to bear the tiles, are so called in Anglo-Indian house-building. We find no such word in any Hind. Dictionary; but in the Mahrati Dict. we find rip in this sense.

[1734-5.—See under BANKSHALL.]

REAS, REES, s. Small money of account, formerly in use at Bombay, the 25th part of an anna, and 400th of a rupee. Port. real, pl. réis. Accounts were kept at Bombay in rupees, quarters, and rees, down at least to November 1834, as we have seen in accounts of that date at the India Office.

1673.—(In Goa) "The i’nten . . . 15 Basrooks (see BUDGROOK), whereof 75 make a Tango (see TANGA), and 60 Rees make a Tango."—Fryer, 207.

1727.—"Their Accounts (Bombay) are kept by Rayes and Rupees. 1 Rupee is ... 400 Rayes."—A. Hamilton, ii. App. 6; [ed. 1744, ii. 315].

RED CLIFFS, n.p. The nautical name of the steep coast below Quilon. This presents the only bluffs on the shore from Mt. Dely to Cape Comorin, and is thus identified, by character and name, with the Ηυφόβος of the Periplus.

c. 80-90.—"Another village, Bakarè, lies by the mouth of the river, to which the ships about to depart descend from Nel-kynda. ... From Bakarè extends the Red-Hill (πιττόβος τον) and then a long stretch of country called Paralia."—Periplus, §§ 55-58.

1727.—"I wonder why the English built their Fort in that place (Anjengo), when they might as well have built it near the Red Cliffs to the Northward, from whence they have their Water for drinking."—A. Hamilton, i. 392; [ed. 1744, i. 334].

1813.—"Water is scarce and very indifferent; but at the red cliffs, a few miles to the north of Anjengo, it is said to be very good, but difficult to be shipped."—Milburn, Or. Comm. i. 335. See also Dunn's New Directory, 6th ed. 1789, p. 161.

1814.—"From thence (Quilone) to Anjengo the coast is hilly and romantic; especially about the red cliffs at Boccoli (qu. Bakaçy as above); where the women of Anjengo daily repair for water, from a very fine spring."—Forbes, Or. Mem., i. 394; [2nd ed. i. 219].

1841.—"There is said to be fresh water at the Red Cliffs to the northward of Anjengo, but it cannot be got conveniently; a considerable surf generally prevailing on the coast, particularly to the southward, renders it unsafe for ships' boats to land."—Horsburgh's Direc. ed. 1841, i. 515.

RED-DOG, s. An old name for Prickly-heat (q.v.).

c. 1752.—"The red-dog is a disease which affects almost all foreigners in hot countries, especially if they reside near the shore, at the time when it is hottest."—Oberck's Voyage, i. 190.

REGULATION, s. A law passed by the Governor-General in Council, or by a Governor (of Madras or Bombay) in Council. This term became obsolete in 1833, when legislative authority was conferred by the Charter Act (3 & 4 Will. IV. cap. 85) on those authorities; and thenceforward the term used is Act. By 13 Geo. III. cap. 63, § xxxv., it is enacted that it shall be lawful for the G. & Council of Fort William in Bengal to issue Rules or Decrees and Regulations for the good order and civil government of the Company's settlements, &c. This was the same Charter Act that established the Supreme Court. But the authorised compilation of "Regulations of the Govt. of Fort William in force at the end of 1853," begins only with the Regulations of 1793, and makes no allusion to the earlier Regulations. No more does Regulation XL1. of 1793, which prescribes the form, numbering, and codifying of the Regulations to be issued. The fact seems to be that prior to 1798, when the enactment of Regulations was systematized, and the Regulations began to be regularly numbered, those that were issued partook rather of the character of resolutions of Government and circular orders than of Laws.

1888.—"The new Commissioner ... could discover nothing prejudicial to me, except, perhaps, that the Regulations were not sufficiently observed. The sacred Regulations how was it possible to fit them on such very irregular subjects as I had to deal with?"—Lt.-Col. Lewin, A Fly on the Wheel,
p. 376.

1880.—"The laws promulgated under this system were called Regulations, owing to a lawyer's doubts as to the competence of the Indian authorities to infringe on the legislative powers of the English Parliament, or to modify the 'laws and customs' by which it had been decreed that the various nationalities of India were to be governed."—Suty, Review, March 13, p. 335.

REGULATION PROVINCES.

See this explained under NON-REGU-LATION.

RECUR, s. Dakh. Hind. regar, also lejar. The peculiar black loamy soil, commonly called by English people in India 'black cotton soil.'
The word may possibly be connected with H.—P. reg, 'sand'; but regada and regadi is given by Wilson as Telugu. [Platts connects it with Skt. rekha, 'a furrow.'] This soil is not found in Bengal, with some restricted exception in the Rajmahal Hills. It is found everywhere on the plains of the Deccan trap-country, except near the coast. Tracts of it are scattered through the valley of the Krishna, and it occupies the flats of Coimbatore, Madura, Salem, Tanjore, Ramnâd, and Timevelly. It occurs north of the Nerbudda in Saugor, and occasionally on the plain of the eastern side of the Peninsula, and comprises the great flat of Surat and Broach in Guzerat.
It is also found in Pegu. The origin of regar has been much debated. We can only give the conclusion as stated in the Manual of the Geology of India, from which some preceding particulars are drawn: "Regur has been shown on fairly trustworthy evidence to result from the impregnation of certain argillaceous formations with organic matter, but ... the process which has taken place is imperfectly understood, and ... some peculiarities in distribution yet require explanation."

RENL. s. [Hind. reh, Skt. rej, 'to shine, shake, quiver.'] A saline efflo-rescence which comes to the surface in extensive tracts of Upper India, rendering the soil sterile. The salts (chiefly sulphate of soda mixed with more or less of common salt and carbonate of soda) are superficial in the soil, for in the worst reh tracts sweet water is obtainable at depths below 60 or 80 feet. [Plains infested with these salts are very commonly known in N. India as Oosur Plains (Hind. 'osar, Skt. osbora, 'impregnated with salt.')] The phenomenon seems due to the climate of Upper India, where the ground is rendered hard and impervious to water by the scorching sun, the parching winds, and the treeless character of the country, so that there is little or no water-circulation in the subsoil. The salts in question, which appear to be such of the substances resulting from the decomposition of rock, or of the detritus derived from rock, and from the formation of the soil, are not assimilated by plants, accumulate under such circumstances, not being diluted and removed by the natural purifying process of percolation of the rain-water. This accumulation of salts is brought to the surface by capillary action after the rains, and evaporated, leaving the salts as an efflorescence on the surface. From time to time the process culminates on considerable tracts of land, which are thus rendered barren. The canal-irrigation of the Upper Provinces has led to some aggravation of the evil. The level of the canal-waters being generally high, they raise the level of the reh-polluted water in the soil, and produce in the lower tracts a great increase of the efflorescence. A partial remedy for this lies in the provision of drainage for the subsoil water, but this has only to a small extent been yet carried out. [See a full account in Watt, Econ. Dict. VI. pt. i. 400 seqq.]

REINOL, s. A term formerly in use among the Portuguese at Goa, and applied apparently to 'Johnny New-comes' or Griffins (q.v.). It is from reino, 'the Kingdom' (viz. of Portugal). The word was also sometimes used to distinguish the European Portuguese from the country-born.

1598.—"... they take great pleasure and laugh at him, calling him Reynol, which is a name given in jest to such as newly come from Portugal, and know not how to behave themselves in such grave manner, and with such ceremonies as the Portuguese use there in India."—Linschoten, ch. xxxix.; [Hak. Soc. i. 208].

c. 1610.—"... quanad ces soldats Portugais arriuent de nouveau aux Indes portans encor leurs habits du pays, ceux qui sont là de long tês quand ils les voyant par les rues les appellent Renol, chargez de poux, et melle autres inmes et mocqueries."—Mosquet, 304.

[", "When they are newly arrived in the Indies, they are called Ragnolles, that is to say, men of the Kingdom,' and the older hands mock them until they have made one or two voyages with them, and have learned the manners and customs of the Indies; this name sticks to them until the fleet arrives the year following."—Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 123.

[1727.—"The Reynolds or European fidalgos."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 251.]

At a later date the word seems to have been applied to Portuguese deserters who took service with the E.I. Co. Thus:

c. 1760.—"With respect to the military, the common men are chiefly such as the Company sends out in their ships, or deserters from the several nations settled in India, Dutch, French, or Portuguese, which last are commonly known by the name of Reynolds."—Grose, i. 38.

RESHIRE, n.p. Rishibr. A place on the north coast of the Persian Gulf, some 5 or 6 miles east of the modern port of Bushire (q.v.). The present village is insignificant, but it is on the site of a very ancient city, which continued to be a port of some consequence down to the end of the 16th century. I do not doubt that this is the place intended by Reyzel in the quotation from A. Nunes under Dubber. The spelling Raxet in Barros below is no doubt a clerical error for Raxel.

c. 1340.—"Rishibr... This city built by Lohrassp, was rebuilt by Shapir son of Ardeeshir Babegàn; it is of medium size, on the shore of the sea. The climate is very hot and unhealthy... The inhabitants generally devote themselves to sea-trade, but poor and feeble that they are, they live chiefly in dependence on the merchants of other countries. Dates and the cloths called Rishibr are the chief productions."—Hamb. datta Mástiñ, quoted in Barbier de Meynard, Dict. de la Perse.

1514.—"And thereupon Pero Dalboqueque sailed away... and entered through the straits of the Persian sea, and explored all the harbours, islands, and villages which are contained in it... and when he was as far advanced as Bàrem, the winds being now westerly—he tacked about, and stood along in the tack for a two days voyage, and reached Raxel, where he found Mirbuzaae, Captain of the Xeque Ismaïl, (Shâh Ismaiûl, of Persia,) who had captured 20 tarradas from a Captain of the King of Ormuz."—Alboquerque, Hak. Soc. iv. 114-115.

"On the Persian side (of the Gulf) is the Province of Raxel, which contains many villages and fortresses along the sea, engaged in a flourishing trade."—Ibid. 186-7.

1354.—"And at this time insurrection was made by the King of Raxel, (which is a city on the coast of Persia); who was a vassal of the King of Ormuz, so the latter King sought help from the Captain of the Castle, Antonio da Silveira. And he sent down Jorge de Crasto with a galliot and two feists and 100 men, all well equipt, and good musketeers; and bade him tell the King of Raxel that he must give up the fleet which he kept at sea for the purpose of plundering, and must return to his allegiance to the K. of Ormuz."—Correa, iii. 557.

1555.—"... And Francisco de Gouvea arrived at the port of the city of Raxel, and having anchored, was forthwith visited by a Moor on the King's part, with refreshments and compliments, and a message that... he would make peace with us, and submit to the King of Ormuz."—Barros, iv. iv. 26.

1554.—"Reyzel." See under Dubber, as above.

1856.—"48 hours sufficed to put the troops in motion northwards, the ships of war, led by the Admiral, advancing along the coast to their support. This was on the morning of the 9th, and by noon the enemy was observed to be in force in the village of Reshire. Here amidst the ruins of old houses, garden-walls, and steep ravines, they occupied a formidable position; but notwithstanding their firmness, wall after wall was surmounted, and finally they were driven from their last defence (the old fort of Reshire) bordering on the cliffs at the margin of the sea."—Despatch in Lowe's H. of the Indian Navy, ii. 346.
RESIDENT. s. This term has been used in two ways which require distinction. Thus (a) up to the organization of the Civil Service in Warren Hastings's time, the chiefs of the Company's commercial establishments in the provinces, and for a short time the European chiefs of districts, were termed Residents. But later the word was applied (b) also to the representative of the Governor-General at an important native Court, e.g. at Lucknow, Delhi, Hyderabad, and Baroda. And this is the only meaning that the term now has in British India. In Dutch India the term is applied to the chief European officer of a province (corresponding to an Indian Zillah) as well as to the Dutch representative at a native Court, as at Solo and Djokjocarta.

1748.—"We received a letter from Mr. Henry Kelsall, Resident at Ballasore."—Pt. William Conm. in, Long. 3.

1760.—"Agreed, Mr. Howitt the present Resident in Rajah Tillack Chund's country (i.e. Burdwan) for the collection of the tunca (see TUNCA), be wrote to. . . ."—Ibid. March 29, ibid. 244.

c. 1778.—"My pay as Resident (at Sylhet) did not exceed 500l. per annum, so that fortune could only be acquired by my own industry."—Horn. W. Lindsay, in Lives of the L. s. iii. 174.

b.—

1798.—"Having received overtures of a very friendly nature from the Rajah of Borr, who has requested the presence of a British Resident at his Court, I have despatched an ambassador to Nagpore with full powers to ascertain the precise nature of the Rajah's views."—Maryv. Wellesley, Despatches, i. 89.

RESPONDENTIA. s. An old trade technicality, thus explained: "Money which is borrowed, not upon the vessel as in bottomry, but upon the goods and merchandise contained in it, which must necessarily be sold or exchanged in the course of the voyage, in which case the borrower personally is bound to answer the contract" (Wharton's Law Lexicon, 6th ed., 1876; and see N.E.D. under Bottomry). What is now a part of the Calcutta Course, along the bank of the Hooghly, was known down to the first quarter of the last century, as Respondentia Walk. We have heard this name explained by the supposition that it was a usual scene of proposals and contingent jawabubs, (q.v.); but the name was no doubt, in reality, given because this walk by the river served as a sort of Change, where bargains in Respondentia and the like were made.

1720.—"I am concerned with Mr. Thomas Theobalds in a respondentia Bond in the 'George' Brigantine."—Testament of Ch. Invers, Merchant. In Wheeler, ii. 310.

1727.—"There was one Captain Perrin Master of a Ship, who took up about 500 L. on respondentia from Mr. Ralph Sheldon . . . payable at his Return to Bengal."—J. Hamilton, Letter, ii. 14; [ed. 1744, ii. 12].

. . . which they are enabled to do by the Money taken up here on Respondentia Bonds. . . ."—In Wheeler, ii. 427.

1776.—"I have desired my Calcutta Attorney to insure some Money lent on Respondentia on Ships in India. . . . I have also subscribed £500 towards a China Voyage."—M.S. Letter of James Russel, Feb. 20.

1794.—"I assure you, Sir, Europe articles, especially good wine, are not to be had for love, money, or respondentia."—The Indian Observer, by Hugh Boyd, &c., p. 206.

[1840.—"A Grecian ghat has been built at the north end of the old Respondentia Walk. . . ."—Davidson, Diary of Travels, ii. 200.]

RESSAIDAR. s. P.—H. Rasā'idār. A native subaltern of irregular cavalry, under the RESSAIDAR (q.v.). It is not clear what sense rāsā'id has in the formation of this title (which appears to be of modern devising). The meaning of that word is 'quickness of apprehension; fitness, perfection.'

RESSALA. s. Hind. from Ar. risāla. A troop in one of our regiments of native (so-called) Irregular Cavalry. The word was in India applied more loosely to a native corps of horse, apart from English regimental technicalities. The Arabic word properly means the charge or commission of a rāsā'id, i.e. of a civil officer employed to make arrests (Dāzy), [and in the passage from the Ā'in, quoted under RESSAALDR, the original text has Risālab]. The transition of meaning, as with many other words of Arabic origin, is very obscure.

1758.—"Presently after Shokum Sing and Harroon Cawn (formerly of Roy Dullab's Rissalla) came in and discovered to him the whole affair."—Letter of W. Hastings, in Glyn, i. 70.

[1781.—"The enemy's troops before the place are five Rosollars of infantry ..."—Sir Eyre Coote, letter of July 6, in Progs. of Council, September 7, Forrest, Letters, vol. iii.]

RESSALDAR. Ar.—P.—H. Rishaladār (Ressala). Originally in Upper India the commander of a corps of Hindustani horse, though the second quotation shows it, in the south, applied to officers of infantry. Now applied to the native officer who commands a ressala in one of our regiments of "Irregular Horse." This title is applied honorifically to overseers of post-horses or stables. (See Panjab Notes & Queries, ii. 84.)

c. 1590.—"Besides, there are several constables who write a good hand and a lucid style. They receive the yaddaskh (memorandum) when completed, keep it with themselves, and make a proper abridgment of it. After signing it, they return this instead of the yaddaskh, when the abridgment is signed and sealed by the Wāqf'ah-na'īs, and the Rissaladār (in origin rissalāh). ..."—Ābān, i. 259.]

1773.—"The Nawab now gave orders to the Rissaladdārs of the regular and irregular infantry, to encircle the fort, and then commence the attack with their artillery and musketry."—H. of Hyder Nâk, 327.

1803.—"The rissaladdārs finding so much money in their hands, began to quarrel about the division of it, while Perron crossed in the evening with the bodyguard."—Mil. Mem. of James Skinner, i. 274.

c. 1831.—"Le lieutenant de ma troupe a bonne chance d'être fait Capitaine (resseldar)."—Jacquesmont, Corresp. ii. 8.

REST HOUSE, s. Much the same as Dawk Bungalow (q.v.). Used in Ceylon only. [But the word is in common use in Northern India for the chokies along roads and canals.]

[1894.—"'Rest-Houses' or 'staging bungalows' are erected at intervals of twelve or fifteen miles along the roads."—G. W. MacGeorge, Ways and Works in India, p. 78.]

RESUM, s. Lascar's Hind. for ration (Roebuck).

RHINOCEROS, s. We introduce this word for the sake of the quotations, showing that even in the 16th century this animal was familiar not only in the Western Himalaya, but in the forests near Peshāwar. It is probable that the nearest rhinoceros to be found at the present time would be not less than 800 miles, as the crow flies, from Peshāwar. See also GANDA, [and for references to the animal in Greek accounts of India, McGrindle, Ancient India, its Invasion by Alexander, 186].

C. 1387.—"In the month of Zi-l Ka'da of the same year he (Prince Mūhammed Khan) went to the mountains of Sīrmor (W. of the Jumna) and spent two months in abounding the rhinoceros and the elk."—Tārikh-i-Mubdrak-Shāhī, in Elliot, iv. 16.

1398.—(On the frontier of Kashmīr). "Comme il y avoit dans ces Pays un lieu qui par sa vaste étendue, et la grande quantité de gibiers, sembloit inviter les passans a chasser ... Timur s'en donno le divertissement ... ils prirent une infinité de gibiers, et l'on tua plusieurs rhinoceros a coups de sabre et de lances, quoiquc cet animal ... a la peau si ferme, qu'on ne peut la percer que par des efforts extraordinaires."—Pélot de la Croix, H. de Timar-Bec, iii. 139.

1519.—"After sending on the army towards the river (Indus), I myself set off for Sawātī, which they likewise call Karak-Khanche (kārk-khanāh, 'therhinoceros-haunt'), to hunt the rhinoceros. We started many rhinoceroses, but as the country was thickly covered with bushwood, we could not get at them. A she rhinoceros, that had whelped, came out, and fled along the plain; many arrows were shot at her, but ... she gained cover. We set fire to the bushwood, but the rhinoceroses was not to be found. We got sight of another, that, having been scorched in the fire, was lamed and unable to run. We killed it, and every one cut off a bit as a trophy of the chase."—Buber, 253.

1554.—"Nous venmes à la ville de Pourschever (Peshawur), et ayant heurteusement passe le Koutel (Kotul), nous gagnâmes la ville de Djouschayeh. Sur le Kotul nous aperçûmes des rhinoceros, dont la grosseur approchait celle d'un elephante. ..."—Sidi 'Ali, in J. As., 1st ser. tom. ix. 201-202.

RHOTASS, n.p. This (Rohtās) is the name of two famous fortresses in India, viz. a. a very ancient rock-fort in the Shāhābād district of Behar, occupying part of a tabular hill which rises on the north bank of the Sōn river to a height of 1490 feet. It was an important stronghold of Sher Shāh, the successful rival of the Mogul Humâyūn: b. A fort at the north end of the Salt-range in the Jhelum District, Punjab, which was built by the same king, named by him after the ancient Rohtās. The ruins are very picturesque.

c. 1560.—"Sher Shāh was occupied night and day with the business of his kingdom, and never allowed himself to be idle. . . . He kept money (khażdaā) and revenue (tharās) in all parts of his territories, so that, if necessity required, soldiers and money were ready. The chief treasury was in Rohtās under the care of Ikhtiyār Kān."—Wakāt-i-Mushakā, in Elliot, iv. 551.

c. 1590.—"Rohtas is a stronghold on the summit of a lofty mountain, difficult of access. It has a circumference of 14 kos and the land is cultivated. It contains many springs, and whenever the soil is excavated to the depth of 3 or 4 yards, water is visible. In the rainy season many lakes are formed, and more than 200 waterfalls gladden the eye and ear."—In, ed. Jarrett, ii. 152 seq.

1665.—". . . You must leave the great road to Patna, and bend to the South through Esberborough (?) [Akbarpur] and the famous Fortress of Rhodes."—Tucquenier, E.T. ii. 53; [ed. Bull, i. 121].

[1764.—"From Shaw Mull, Kelladar of Rotus to Major Munro."—In Long, 359.]

c. 1540.—"Sher Shāh . . . marched with all his forces and retinue through all the hills of Padmān and Gārghā, in order that he might choose a fitting site, and build a fort there to keep down the Ghakkars . . . Having selected Rohtās, he built there the fort which now exists."—Tārīkh-i-Sher Shāh, in Elliot, iv. 390.

1809.—"Before we reached the Hydaspes we had a view of the famous fortress of Rotus; but it was at a great distance. . . . Rotus we understood to be an extensive but strong fort on a low hill."—Elphinstone, Cisbad, ed. 1839, i. 108.

RICE, s. The well-known cereal, Orzga sativa, L. There is a strong temptation to derive the Greek ὀργία, which is the source of our word through It. riso, Fr. riz, etc., from the Tamil orisī, 'rice deprived of husk,' ascribed to a root orī, 'to separate,' It is quite possible that Southern India was the original seat of rice cultivation. Roxburgh (Flora Indica, ii. 200) says that a wild rice, known as Nasirarr [Skt. nīvāra, Tel. nīvār] by the Telinga people, grows abundantly about the lakes in the Northern Circars, and he considers this to be the original plant.

It is possible that the Arabic al-ruzz (arruz) from which the Spaniards directly take their word arròz, may have been taken also directly from the Dravidian term. But it is hardly possible that ὀρίζα can have had that origin. The knowledge of rice apparently came to Greece from the expedition of Alexander, and the mention of ὀρίζα by Theophrastus, which appears to be the oldest, probably dates almost from the lifetime of Alexander (d. B.C. 323). Aristobulus, whose accurate account is quoted by Strabo (see below), was a companion of Alexander's expedition, but seems to have written later than Theophrastus. The term was probably acquired on the Oxus, or in the Punjab. And though no Skt. word for rice is nearer ὀρίζα than vihā, the very common exchange of aspirant and sibilant might easily give a form like viṣī or viśī (comp. hindā, sīndā, &c.) in the dialects west of India. Though no such exact form seems to have been produced from old Persian, we have further indications of it in the Pushtu, which Raverty writes, sing.: 'a grain of rice' viṣīḍāḥ, pl. 'rice' viṣīzey, the former close to oryza. The same writer gives in Barakai (one of the uncultivated languages of the Kabul country, spoken by a 'Tajik' tribe settled in Logar, south of Kabul, and also at Kanigoram in the Waziri country) the word for rice as viṣīzā, a very close approximation again to oryza. The same word is indeed given by Leech, in an earlier vocabulary, largely coincident with the former, as riṣa. The modern Persian word for husked rice is birīnj, and the Armenian brīnz. A nasal form, deviating further from the hypothetical brīsī or viṣī, but still probably the same in origin, is found among other languages of the Hindī Kūsh tribes, e.g. Burishki (Khajuna of Leitner) brōy; Shina (of Gilgit), briṣy; Khowar of the Chitral Valley (Arnivah of Leitner), qrinj (Biddulph, Tribes of Hindoo Koosh, App., pp. xxix, lix, cxxix.).

of Madagascar (Urania speciosa), cooked to pass as a bird's quill. Mr. Sibree, in his excellent book on Madagascar (The Great African Island, 1880), noticed this, but pointed out that the object was more probably the immensely long midrib of the rofia palm (Sequis Raphia). Sir John Kirk, when in England in 1882, expressed entire confidence in this identification, and on his return to Zanzibar in 1883 sent four of these midribs to England. These must have been originally from 36 to 40 feet in length. The leaflets were all stripped, but when entire the object must have strongly resembled a Brodellinganagian feather. These roc's quills were shown at the Forestry Exhibition in Edinburgh, 1884. Sir John Kirk wrote:

"I send to-day per S.S. Arcot ... four fronds of the Raphia palm, called here Moode. They are just as sold and shipped up and down the coast. No doubt they were sent in Marco Polo's time in exactly the same state — i.e., stripped of their leaflets and with the tip broken off. They are used for making stages and ladders, and last long if kept dry. They are also made into doors, by being cut into lengths, and pinned through."

Some other object has recently been shown at Zanzibar as part of the wings of a great bird. Sir John Kirk writes that this (which he does not describe particularly) was in the possession of the R. C. priests at Bagemoyo, to whom it had been given by natives of the interior, and these declared that they had brought it from Tanganyika, and that it was part of the wing of a gigantic bird. On another occasion they repeated this statement, alleging that this bird was known in the Udoe (?) country, near the coast. The priests were able to communicate directly with their informants, and certainly believed the story. Dr. Hildebrand also, a competent German naturalist, believed in it. But Sir John Kirk himself says that 'what the priests had to show was most undoubtedly the whalebone of a comparatively small whale' (see letter of the present writer in Athenaeum, March 22nd, 1884).

ROC.
ROGUE'S RIVER.

ROGUE'S RIVER, n.p. The name given by Europeans in the 17th and 18th centuries to one of the Sunder-bund channels joining the Lower Hoogly R. from the eastward. It was so called from being frequented by the Arakan Rovers, sometimes Portuguese vagabonds, sometimes native Muggs, whose vessels lay in this creek watching their opportunity to plunder craft going up and down the Hoogly.

Mr. R. Barlow, who has partially annotated Hedges' Diary for the Hak-luyt Society, identifies Rogue's River with Channel Creek, which is the channel between Saugor Island and the Delta. Mr. Barlow was, I believe, a member of the Bengal Pilot service, and this, therefore, must have been the application of the name in recent tradition. But I cannot reconcile this with the sailing directions in the English Pilot (1711), or the indications in Hamilton, quoted below.

The English Pilot has a sketch chart of the river, which shows, just opposite Buffalo Point, "R. Theeser," then, as we descend, the R. Rangafula, and, close below that, "Rogues" (without the word River), and still further below, Channell Creek or R. Jessore. Rangafula R. and Channel Creek we still have in the charts.
ROGUES RIVER. 766 ROHILLA.

After a careful comparison of all the notices, and of the old and modern charts, I come to the conclusion that the R. of Rogues must have been either what is now called Chingri Khal, entering immediately below Diamond Harbour, or Kutpy Creek, about 6 m. further down, but the preponderance of argument is in favour of Chingri Khal. The position of this quite corresponds with the R. Theoves of the old English chart; it corresponds in distance from Sagar (the Ganga Sagar of those days, which forms the extreme S. of what is styled Sagar Island now) with that stated by Hamilton, and also in being close to the "first safe anchoring place in the River," viz. Diamond Harbour. The Rogue's River was apparently a little 'above the head of the Grand Middle Ground,' or great shoals of the Hoogly, whose upper termination is now some 7 1/2 m. below Chingri Khal. One of the extracts from the English Pilot speaks of the "R. of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegum." Now there is a town on the Chingri Khal, a few miles from its entrance into the Hoogly, which is called in Rennell's Map Ottogung, and in the Atlas of India Sheet Huttoqun. Further, in the tracing of an old Dutch chart of the 17th century, in the India Office, I find in a position corresponding with Chingri Khal, D'Roevers Spruit, which I take to be 'Robber's (or Rogue's) River.'

1683,—"And so we parted for this night, before which time it was resolved by ye Councill that if I should not prevail to go this way to Decc, I should attempt to do it with ye Sloops by way of the River of Rogues, which goes through to the great River of Deccan."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 36.

1711.—"Directions to go up along the Western Shore. . . . The nearer the Shore the better the Ground until past the River of Tygers.* You may begin to edge over towards the River of Rogues about the head of the Grand Middle Ground; and when the Buffalo Point bears from you 3/4 N. 2 of a Mile, steer directly over for the East Shore E.N.E."—The English Pilot, Pt. iii. p. 54.

"Mr. Herring, the Pilot's Directions for bringing of Ships down the River of Hoogly. . . . From the lower point of the Narrows on the Starboard side . . . the Eastern Shore is to be kept close aboard until past the said Creek, afterwards allowing only a small Birth for the Point off the River of Rogues, commonly called by the Country People, Adegum . . . From the River Rogues, the Starboard (qu. larboard!) shore with a great ship ought to be kept close aboard all along down to Channel Trees, for in the offing lies the Grand Middle Ground."—Ibid. p. 57.

1727.—"The first safe anchoring Place in the River, is off the Mouth of a River about 12 Leagues above Sagar," commonly known by the Name of Rogues River, which had that Appellation from some Banditti Portuguese, who were followers of Shah Sejah . . . for those Portuguese . . . after their Master's Flight to the Kingdom of Arakan, betook themselves to Piracy among the Islands at the Mouth of the Ganges, and this River having communication with all the Channels from Xaitapam (see CHITTAGONG) to the Westward, from this River they used to sally out."—A. Hamilton, ii. 3 [ed. 1744].

1752.—". . . 'On the receipt of your Honours' orders per Dunnington, we sent for Capt. Pinson, the Master Attendant, and directed him to issue out fresh orders to the Pilots not to bring up any of your Honours' Ships higher than Rogues River.'"—Letter to Court, in Long, p. 32.

ROHILLA, n.p. A name by which Afghans, or more particularly Afghans settled in Hindustan, are sometimes known, and which gave a title to the province Rohilkand, and now, through that, to a Division of the N.W. Provinces embracing a large part of the old province. The word appears to be Pushtu, rōhēlāh or rōhelā, adj., formed from rōhū, 'mountain,' thus signifying 'mountaineer of Afghānistān.' But a large part of E. Afghānistān specifically bore the name of Roh. Keene (Fall of the Mogul Monarchy, 41) puts the rise of the Rohillas of India in 1744, when 'Ali Mahomed revolted, and made the territory since called Rohilkhand independent. A very comprehensive application is given to the term Roh in the quotation from Firishta. A friend (Major J. M. Trotter) notes here: "The word Rohilla is little, if at all, used now in Pushtu, but I remember a line of an ode in that language, 'Sādēk Rohilai yam pa Hindūbār gad,' meaning, 'I am a simple mountaineer, compelled to live in Hindustan'; i.e. 'an honest man among knaves.'"

* This is shown by a 17th century Dutch chart in L.O. to be a creek on the west side, very little below Diamond Point. It is also shown in Tassini's Maps of the E. Hoogly, 1835; not later.
c. 1542.—"The King . . . issued faramins to the chiefs of the various Afghan Tribes. On receipt of the faramins, the Afghans of Roh came as is their wont, like ants and locusts, to enter the King’s service. . . . The King (Bahol Lodi) commanded his mounted troops, saying, ‘Every Afghan who comes to Hind from the country of Roh to enter my service, bring him to me. I will give him a jadgar more than proportional to his deserts.’"—Tārīkhi-i-Shir-Shāhī, in Elliot, iv. 307.

c. 1542.—"Actuated by the pride of power, he took no account of clanship, which is much considered among the Afghans, and especially among the Rohilla men."—Ibid. 428.

c. 1612.—"Roh is the name of a particular mountain [-country], which extends in length from Swáid and Bajaur to the town of Siwí belonging to Bhakar. In breadth it stretches from Hasan Abdül to Kábul. Kandahár is situated in this territory."—Firsišt’s Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 585.

1726.—". . . 1000 other horsemen called Rohelahs."—Valentijn, iv. (Suratte), 277.

1745.—"This year the Emperor, at the request of Suflid Jung, marched to reduce Ali Mahummad Khan, a Rohilla adventurer, who had, from the negligence of the Government, possessed himself of the district of Kutteer (Kutheer), and assumed independence of the royal authority."—In VoI. II. of Scott’s E.T. of Hist. of the Deccan, &c., p. 218.

1763.—"After all the Rohillas are but the best of a race of men, in whose blood it would be difficult to find one or two single individuals endowed with good nature and with sentiments of equity; in a word they are Afghans."—Seir Mutaghertin, iii. 240.

1786.—"That the said Warren Hastings . . . did in September, 1773, enter into a private engagement with the said Nabob of Oude . . . to furnish them, for a stipulated sum of money to be paid to the E. I. Company, with a body of troops for the declared purpose of ‘thoroughly extirpating the nation of the Rohillas’; a nation from whom the Company had never received, or pretended to receive, or apprehend, any injury whatever."—Art. of Charge against Hastings, in Burke, vi. 585.

[b. An ancient coin in S. India; Tel. rokkan, rokkanu, Skt. roka, ‘buying with ready money,’ from ruch, ‘to shine.’

1875.—"The old native coins seem to have consisted of Varaghans, rookas and Doodoos. The Varaghan is what is now generally called a pagoda. . . . The rookas have now entirely disappeared, and have probably been melted into rupees. They varied in value from 1 to 2 Rupees. Though the coins have disappeared, the name still survives, and the ordinary name for silver money generally is rookaloo."—Gribble, Man. of Cuddapah, 286 sqf.]

ROOK, s. In chess the rook comes to us from Span. roque, and that from Ar. and Pers. rukh, which is properly the name of the famous gryphon, the roc of Marco Polo and the Arabian Nights. According to Marcel Devic, it meant ‘warrior.’ It is however generally believed that this form was a mistake in transferring the Indian rath (see RUT) or ‘chariot,’ the name of the piece in India.

ROOM, n.p. ‘Turkey’ (Rūm); ROOMEE, n.p. (Rūmī); ‘an Ottoman Turk.’ Properly ‘a Roman.’ In older Oriental books it is used for an European, and was probably the word which Marco Polo renders as ‘a Latin’—represented in later times by firinne (e.g. see quotation from Ibn Batuta under RAJA). But Rūm, for the Roman Empire, continued to be applied to what had been part of the Roman Empire after it had fallen into the hands of the Turks, first to the Seljukian Kingdom in Anatolia, and afterwards to the Ottoman Empire seated at Constantinople. Garcia ROOLONG, s. Used in S. India, and formerly in W. India, for fine flour; semolina, or what is called in Bengal soojee (q.v.). The word is a corruption of Port. rolão or rolāo. But this is explained by Bluteau as farīna seconda. It is, he says (in Portuguese), that substance which is extracted between the best flour and the bran.

1813.—"Some of the greatest delicacies in India are now made from the Rolong flour, which is called the heart or kidney of the wheat."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 47; [2nd ed. i. 32].
de Orta and Jarric deny the name of Rūmī, as used in India, to the Turks of Asia, but they are apparently wrong in their expressions. What they seem to mean is that Turks of the Ottoman Empire were called Rūmī; whereas those others in Asia of Turkish race (whom we sometimes call Toorks), as of Persia and Turkestan, were excluded from the name.

1508.—"Ad haec, trans euriump, seu fretum, quo insignem factum, in orientali continenis plagas oppidum condidit, receptaculum advenis militibus, maximo Tureci; ut ab Diensibus freto divisi, rixand iun tiss causas procer habuerat. Id oppidum primo Gogola (see GOGOLLA), dein Rumeopolis vocatum ab ipsa re. . . ."—Maffei, p. 77.

1510.—"When we had sailed about 12 days we arrived at a city which is called Dvoweludterumi, that is 'Diu, the port of the Turks.' This city is subject to the Sultan of Combeia . . . 400 Turkish merchants reside here constantly."—Varthema, 91-92.

Bandar-i-Rūmī, as, the traveller explains, the 'Port of the Turks.' Gogola, a suburb of Diu on the mainland, was known to the Portuguese some years later, as Villa dos Rumes (see GOGOLLA, and quotation from Maffei above). The quotation below from Damian a Goes alludes apparently to Gogola.

1513.—". . . Vnde Ruminu Turchorumque sex millia nostros continue infestabat."—Emmanuel Regis Epistola, p. 21.

1514.—"They were ships belonging to Moors, or to Romi (there they give the name of Romi to a white people who are, some of them, from Armenia the Greater, and the Less, others from Cicatnus and Tartary and Rossia, Turks and Persians of Shaesmal called the Soffi, and other renegades from all countries)."—Giov. da Empoli, 38.

1525.—In the expenditure of Malik Aiaz we find 30 Rumes at the pay (monthly) of 100 fedea each. The Arabes are in the same statement paid 40 and 50 fedea, the Corangones (Khourisâns) the same; Guzerates and Cymdes (Sindus) 25 and 30 fedea; Farlagus, 50 fedea. —Lembrança, 37.

1553.—"The Moors of India not understanding the distinctions of those Provinces of Europe, call the whole of Thrace, Greece, Slavonia, and the adjacent islands of the Mediterranean Rum, and the men thereof Rumi, a name which properly belongs to that part of Thrace in which lies Constantinople: from the name of New Rome belonging to the latter, Thrace taking that of Romania."—Barros, IV. iv. 16.

1554.—"Also the said ambassador promised in the name of Idalshaa (see DALCAN) his lord, that if a fleet of Rumes should invade these parts, Idalshaa should be bound to help and succour us with provisions and mariners at our expense. . . ."—S. Bodelho, Tambol, 42.

1555.—"One day (the Emp. Humâyûn) asked me: 'Which of the two countries is greatest, that of Rūm or of Hindustan?' I replied: . . . 'If by Rūm you mean all the countries subject to the Emperor of Constantinople, then India would not form even a sixth part thereof.' . . ."—Sidi 'Ali, in J. As., ser. I. tom. ix. 148.

ROSAUL. s. Hind. from Pers. rámad (lit. 'face-rubber') a towel, a handkerchief. ["In modern native use it may be carried in the hand by a high-born purdah lady attached to her baba or tiny silk handbag; and ornamented with all sorts of gold and silver trinkets; then it is a handkerchief in the true sense of the word. It may be carried by men, hanging on the left shoulder, and used to wipe the hands or face; then, too, it is a handkerchief. It may be as big as a towel, and thrown over both shoulders by men, the ends either hanging loose or tied in a knot in front; it then serves the purpose of a gullaband or muffler. In the case of children it is tied round the neck as a neckkerchief, or round the waist for mere show. It may be used by women much as the 18th century tucker was used in England in Addison's time"] (Yusuf Ali, Mon. on Silk, 79; for its use to mark a kind of shawl, see Forbes Watson, Textile Manufactures, 123.) In ordinary Anglo-Indian Hind. it is the word for a 'pocket handkerchief.' In modern trade it is applied to thin silk piece-goods with handkerchief patterns. We are not certain of its meaning in the old trade of piece-goods, e.g.:

[1615. — "2 handkerchiefs Rumal cottony."—Cocke's Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 179.
1704. — "Price Current (Malacca) . . . Romals, Bengal ordinary, per Corge, 26 Rix Dils."—Lockyer, 71.
1726. — "Romala, 80 pieces in a pack, 45 ells long, 1½ broad."—Valentijn, v. 178.

Rámad was also the name technically used by the Thugs for the handkerchief with which they strangled their victims.

1533. — "From Curia Muria to Cape Rosalgate, which is in 22°, an extent of coast of 120 leagues, all the land is barren and desert. At this Cape commences the Kingdom of Ormus."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

ROSE-APPLE. See JAMBOO.

ROSELLE. The Indian Hibiscus or Hib. subdariffa, L. The fleshy calyx makes an excellent sub-acid jelly, and is used also for tarts; also called 'Red Sorrel.' The French call it 'Guinea Sorrel,' Oseille de Guinée, and Roselle is probably a corruption of Oseille. [See PUTWA.]

[ROSE-MALLOWS, s. A semi-fluid resin, the product of the Liquidambar altinqua, which grows in Tenasserim; also known as Liquid Storax, and used for various medicinal purposes. (See Hanbury and Flückiger, Pharmacog. 271, Watt, Econ. Dict. V. 78 seqq.). The Burmese name of the tree is nan-ta-yoke (Mason, Burmah, 778). The word is a corruption of the Malay-Javanese rasamalla, Skt. rasa-mālā, 'Perfume garland,' the gum being used as incense (Encycl. Britann. 9th ed. xii. 718).

1598.—"Rosamallia."—Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 150.

ROTTLE, RATTLE, s. Arab. ratl, the Arabian pound, becoming in S. Ital. rotolo; in Port. arratel; in Span. arrelde; supposed to be originally a transposition of the Greek Mirpa, which went all over the Semitic East. It is in Syriac as * térā*; and is also found as litrim (pl.) in a Phoenician inscription of Sardina, dating c. b.c. 180 (see Corpus Inscrip. Semitt. i. 188-189.)

c. 1340.—"The ritol of India which is called sīr (see SEER) weighs 70 mitkhāl ... 40 śīra form a mān (see MAUND)."—Skhābuddin Dimiškī, in Notes and Ecta. xiii. 189.

[c. 1590.—"Kafīz is a measure, called also sdū weighing 8 ratl, and, some say, more."—Aīn, ed. Jarrett, ii. 55.]

[1612.—"The bahar is 360 rottolas of Mohna."—Dawners, Letters, i. 189.]

1673.—"... Weights in Goa: 1 Baharr is ... 3½ Kintal. 1 Kintal is ... 4 Arabel or Roved. 1 Arabel is ... 32 Rotolas. 1 Rotola is ... 16 Ounc. or 11. Averd."—Fryer, 207.

1803.—"At Juda the weights are: 15 Vakeens = 1 Rattle. 2 Rattles = 1 maund."—Milburn, i. 88.

ROUND, s. This is used as a Hind. word, rourd, or corruptly raun gasht, a transfer of the English, in the sense of patrolling, or 'going the rounds.' [And we find in the Madras Records the grade of 'Rounder,' or 'Gentlemen of the Round,' officers whose duty it was to visit the sentries.]

[1683.—"... itt is order'd that 18 Souldiers, 1 Corporall & 1 Rouder goe upon the Sloop Conimer for Hugly. ..."—Pringle, Diary Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. ii. 33.]

ROUNDERDEL. An obsolete word for an umbrella, formerly in use in Anglo-India. [In 1676 the use of the Roundell was prohibited, except in the case of "the Councell and Chaplaine" (Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cccxxii.)] In old English the name roundel is applied to a variety of circular objects, as a mat under a dish, a target, &c. And probably this is the origin of the present application, in spite of the circumstance that the word is sometimes found in the form arundel. In this form the word also seems to have been employed for the conical hand-guard on a lance, as we learn from Bluteau's great Port. Dictionary: "Arun dela, or Arandella, is a guard for the right hand, in the form of a funnel. It is fixed to the thick part of the lance or mace borne by men at arms. The Licentiate Covarrubias, who piques himself on finding etymologies for every kind of word, derives Arandella from Arundel, a city (so he says) of the Kingdom of England." Cobarruvias (1611) gives the above explanation; adding that it also was applied to a kind of smooth collar worn by women, from its resemblance to the other thing. Unless historical proof of this last etymology can be traced, we should suppose that Arundel is, even in this sense, probably a corruption of roundel. [The N.E.D. gives arrondell, arundell as forms of hirondelle, 'a swallow.'] 1673.—"Lusty Fellows running by their Sides with Arundels (which are broad Umbrelloes held over their Heads)."—Fryer, 30.

1676.—"Proposals to the Agent, &c., about the young men in Metchipatam. "General I.—Whereas each hath his peon and some more with their Rondells.

1677-78.—“. . . That except by the Members of this Councell, those that have formerly been in that quality, Cheesefs of Factories, Commanders of Ships out of England, and the Chaplains, Rundellls shall not be borne by any Men in this Towne, and by no Woman below the Degree of Factors' Wives and Ensigns' Wives, except by such as the Governour shall permit.”—Madras Standing Orders, in Wheeler, ii. 498.

1680.—“To Verona (the Company's Chief Merchant)'s adopted son was given the name of Muddoo Verona, and a Rundell to be carried over him, in respect to the memory of Verona, eleven cannon being fired, that the Towne and Country might take notice of the honour done them.”—Pt. St. Geo. Cons. In Notes and Extts. No. II. p. 15.

1716.—“All such as serve under the Honourable Company and the English Inhabitants, deserted their Employ; such as Cooks, Water bearers, Cookles; Palankeen-boys, Roundel men. . .”—In Wheeler, ii. 230.

1726.—“Whenever the magnates go on a journey they go not without a considerable train, being attended by their pipers, horn-blowers, and Rondel bearers, who keep them from the Sun with a Rondel (which is a kind of little round sunshade).”—Valentijn, Chor. 54.

“Their Priests go like the rest clothed in yellow, but with the right arm and breast remaining uncovered. They also carry a rondel, or parasol, of a Tallipot (see Talipot) leaf. . .”—Ibid. v. (Ceylon), 408.

1754.—“Some years before our arrival in the country, they (the E. I. Co.) found such sumptuary laws so absolutely necessary, that they gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to hire a Roundel-boy, whose business it is to walk by his master, and defend him with his Roundel or Umbrella from the heat of the sun. A young fellow of humour, upon this last order coming over, altered the form of his Umbrella from a round to a square, called it a Squaredel instead of a Roundel, and insisted that no order yet in force forbid him the use of it.”—Ives, 21.

1785.—“He (Clive) enforced the Sumptuary laws by severe penalties, and gave the strictest orders that none of these young gentlemen should be allowed even to have a roundel-boy, whose business is to walk by his master, and defend him with his roundel or umbrella from the heat of the sun.”—Carraccioli, i. 283. This ignoble writer has evidently copied from Ives, and applied the passage (untruly, no doubt) to Clive.

ROWANAH, s. Hind. from Pers. rauwânah, from rauwâ, ‘going.’ A pass or permit.

[1764.—“. . . that the English shall carry on their trade . . . free from all duties . . . excepting the article of salt, . . . on which a duty is to be levied on the Rowana or Houghly market-price. . . .”—Letter from Court, in Veredst, View of Bengal, App. 127.]

ROWCE, s. Hind. raus, roaï, rauws. A Himalayan tree which supplies excellent straight and strong alpenstocks and walking-sticks, Cotoneaster bacillaris, Wall., also C. acuminata (N.O. Rosaceae). [See Watt, Econ. Dict. i. 581.]

1838.—“We descended into the Khud, and I was amusing myself jumping from rock to rock, and thus passing up the centre of the brawling mountain stream, aided by my long palâri pole of rous wood.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 241 ; also i. 112.

ROWNEE, s.

a. A fausse-braye, i.e. a subsidiary enceinte surrounding a fortified place on the outside of the proper wall and on the edge of the ditch; Hind. rauwni. The word is not in Shakespeare, Wilson, Platts or Fallon. But it occurs often in the narratives of Anglo-Indian siege operations. The origin of the word is obscure. [Mr. Irvine suggests Hind. rundhna, ‘to enclose as with a hedge,’ and says: “Fallon evidently knew nothing of the word rauwni, for in his E. H. Dict. he translates fausse-braye by dhus, matti kâ pushthah; which also shows that he had no definite idea of what a fausse-braye was, dhus meaning simply an earthen or mud fort.” Dr. Grierson suggests Hind. ramvantî, ‘a park,’ of which the fem., i.e. diminutive, would be ramanti or râonî; or possibly the word may come from Hind. ren, Skt. rehu, ‘sand,’ meaning “an entrenchment of sand.”]

1799.—“On the 20th I ordered a mine to be carried under (the glaci) because the guns could not bear on the ronnew.”—Jas. Skinner's Mil. Memoirs, i. 172. J. B. Fraser, the editor of Skinner, parenthetically interprets ronnew here as ‘counteresarp’; but that is nonsense, as well as incorrect.

[1803.—Writing of Hathras, the Renny wall, with a deep, broad, dry ditch behind it surrounds the fort.”—W. Thorn, Mem. of the War in India, p. 400.]

1805.—In a work by Major L. F. Smith (Sketch of the Rise, etc., of the Regular Corps in the Service of the Native Princes of India) we find a plan of the attack of Aligarh, in which is marked “Lower Fort or Renny, well supplied with grape,” and again, “Lower Fort, Renny or Faussebraye.”] [1819.—"... they saw the necessity of covering the foot of the wall from an enemy's fire, and formed a defence, similar to our fausse-braye, which they call Rainee."
—Fitzclarence, Journal of a Route to England, p. 245; also see 110.]

b. This word also occurs as representative of the Burmese yo-vet-ni, or (in Arakan pron.) ro-vet-ni, 'red-leaf,' the technical name of the standard silver of the Burmese ingot currency, commonly rendered Flowered-silver.

1796.—"Rouni or fine silver, Ummerapoora currency."—Notification in Seton-Karr, ii. 179.

1800.—"The quantity of alloy varies in the silver current in different parts of the empire; at Rangoon it is adulterated 25 per cent.; at Ummerapoora, pure, or what is called flowered silver, is most common; in the latter all duties are paid. The modifications are as follows:

"Rouni, or pure silver.
Rouniku, 5 per cent. of alloy."

Rowtee, s. A kind of small tent with pyramidal roof, and no projection of fly, or eaves. Hind. rādīṭī.

[1813.—"... the military men, and others attached to the camp, generally possess a dwelling of somewhat more comfortable description, regularly made of two or three folds of cloth in thickness, closed at one end, and having a flap to keep out the wind and rain at the opposite one: these are dignified with the name of ruotees, and come nearer (than the pawl) to our ideas of a tent."—Broughton, Letters, ed. Constable, p. 20.]

[1875.—"For the servants I had a good rauti of thick lined cloth."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 90.]

Roy, s. A common mode of writing the title rātī (see RAJA); which sometimes occurs also as a family name, as in that of the famous Hindu Theist Rammohun Roy.

Roza, s. Ar. rauḍa, Hind. rauḍa. Properly a garden; among the Arabs especially the rauḍa of the great mosque at Medina. In India it is applied to such mausolea as the Taj (generally called by the natives the Tāj-ruaḍa); and the mausoleum built by Aurungzib near Aurungabad.

1813.—"... the roza, a name for the mausoleum, but implying something saintly or sanctified."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 41; [2nd ed. ii. 413].

Rozye, s. Hind. rauḍa and rauḍī; a coverlet quilted with cotton. The etymology is very obscure. It is spelt in Hind. with the Ar. letter ṭādi; and F. Johnson gives a Persian word so spelt as meaning 'a cover for the head in winter.' The kindred meaning of mirzādī is apt to suggest a connection between the two, but this may be accidental, or the latter word factitious. We can see no likelihood in Shakespear's suggestion that it is a corruption of an alleged Skt. raunika, 'cloth.' [Platts gives the same explanation, adding "probably through Pers. ra'ūdzī, from ra'ūzīdan, 'to dye.'"] The most probable suggestion perhaps is that ra'ūzī was a word taken from the name of some person called Ra'ūzī, who may have invented some variety of the name; as in the case of Spencer, Wellingtons, &c. A somewhat obscure quotation from the Pers. Dict. called Bahār-ī-Ajam, extracted by Vüllers (s.v.), seems to corroborate the suggestion of a personal origin of the word.

1784.—"I have this morning... received a letter from the Prince addressed to you, with a present of a resi and a shawl handkerchief."—Warren Hastings to his Wife, in Busteed, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 133.

1884.—"I arrived in a small open pavilion at the top of the building, in which there was a small Brahminy cow, clothed in a waddled resai, and lying upon a carpet."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 135.

1867.—"I had brought with me a soft quilted resai to sleep on, and with a rug wrapped round me, and sword and pistol under my head, I lay and thought long and deeply upon my line of action on the morrow."—Litb.-Col. Lewis, A Trip on the Wheel, 801.

Rubbee, s. Ar. rabi, 'the Spring.' In India applied to the crops, or harvest of the crops, which are sown after the rains and reaped in the following spring or early summer. Such crops are wheat, barley, gram, linseed, tobacco, onions, carrots and turnips, &c. (See Khureef.)

[1765.—"... we have granted them the Dewanee (see DEWAUN) of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, from the beginning of the Fussal Rubby of the Bengal year 1172..."—Firmans of Shah Aurum, in Verelst, View of Bengal, App. 167.]
RUBLE, s. Russ. The silver unit of Russian currency, when a coin (not paper) equivalent to 3s. 1½d.; [in 1901 about 2s. 1½d.]. It was originally a silver ingot; see first quotation and note below.

1591. — "This penalty or mulct is 20 dinges (see TANGA) or pence upon every rubble or mark, and so ten in the hundred. . . . Hee (the Emperor) hath besides for every name conteyned in the wrts that passe out of their courts, five alecnes, an alecen 5 pence stering or thereabouts." — Treatise of the Russian Commonwealth, by Dr. Giles Fletcher, Hak. Soc. 51.

c. 1654-6. — "Dog dollars they (the Russians) are not acquainted with, these being attended with loss . . . their own dairys they call Rubbles." — Macarionis, E.T. by Balfour, i. 280.

RUFFUGUR, s. P. — H. refugar, Pers. rafū, 'darning.' The modern raffāgar in Indian cities is a workman who repairs rents and holes in Kashmir shawls and other woollen fabrics. Such workmen were regularly employed in the cloth factories of the E.I. Co., to examine the manufactured cloths and remove petty defects in the weaving.

1750. — "On inspecting the Dacca goods, we found the Seerbetties (see PIECE-GOODS) very much frayed and very badly raffa-gurr'd or joined." — Bengal Letter to E.I. Co., Feb. 25, India Office MSS.

These ingots were called saum, Ibn Batuta says: "At one day’s journey from Ukak are the hills of the Rus, who are Christians; they have red hair and blue eyes, they are ugly in feature and crafty in character. They have silver mines, and they bring from their country saum, i.e. ingots of silver, with which they buy and sell in that country. The weight of each ingot is five ounces." — lii. 414. Pegolotti (c. 1340), speaking of the land-route to Cathay, says that on arriving at Casal (i.e. Kinsay of Marco Polo or Hang-chan-fu) "you can dispose of the somni of silver that you have with you . . . and you may reckun the somni to be worth 5 golden florins" (see in Cathay, &c., ii. 288-9, 292). It would appear from Wasmil, quoted by Hammer (Geschichte der Goldenen Horde, 224), that gold ingots also were called sum or saum. The ruble is still called šim in Turkestan.

1851. — "Rafu-gars are darners, who repair the cloths that have been damaged during bleaching. They join broken threads, remove knots from threads, &c." — Taylor, Cotton Manufacture of Dacca, 87.

RUM, s. This is not an Indian word. The etymology is given by Wedgwood as from a slang word of the 16th century, rome for 'good'; rome-booze, 'good drink'; and so, rum. The English word has always with us a note of vulgarity, but we may note here that Gorresio in his Italian version of the Rāmāyana, whilst describing the Palace of Rāvana, is bold enough to speak of its being pervaded by "an odoriferous breeze, perfumed with sandalwood, and bdellium, with rum and with sirop" (iii. 292). "Mr. N. Darnell Davis has put forth a derivation of the word rum, which gives the only probable history of it. It came from Barbados, where the planters first distilled it, somewhere between 1640 and 1645. A MS, 'Description of Barbados,' in Trinity College, Dublin, written about 1651, says: 'The chief fusling they make in the Island is Rambullion, alias Kill-Devil, and this is made of sugar-canes distilled, a hot, hellish, and terrible liquor.'" G. Warren's Description of Surinam, 1661, shows the word in its present short term; 'Rum is a spirit extracted from the juice of sugar-canes . . . called Kill-Devil in New England!' "Rambullion" is a Devonshire word, meaning 'a great tumult,' and may have been adopted from some of the Devonshire settlers in Barbados; at any rate, little doubt can exist that it has given rise to our word rum, and the longer name rumbowling, which sailors give to their grog." — Academy, Sept. 5, 1883.

RUM-JOHNNY, s. Two distinct meanings are ascribed to this vulgar word, both, we believe, obsolete.

a. It was applied, according to Williamson, (V.M., i. 167) to a low class of native servants who plied on the wharves of Calcutta in order to obtain employment from new-comers. That author explains it as a corruption of Rāmāţāni, which he alleges to be one of the commonest of Mahomedan names. [The Meery-jhony Gully, of Calcutta (Carey, Good Old Days,].
139) perhaps in the same way derived its name from one Mir Jân.]

1810.—“Generally speaking, the present bawians, who attach themselves to the captains of European ships, may without the least hazard of controversy, be considered as nothing more or less than Rum-johnnies of a larger growth.”—Williamson, V.M., i. 191.

b. Among soldiers and sailors, ‘a prostitute’; from Hind. rāmjānī, Skt. rāmā-janī, ‘a pleasing woman,’ ‘a dancing-girl.’

1814.—“I lived near four years within a few miles of the solemn groves where those voluptuous devotees pass their lives with the ramjannies or dancing-girls attached to the temples, in a sort of luxurious superstition and sanctified indolence unknown in colder climates.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 127].

[R1:1816.—“But we must except that class of females called ravjannees, or dancing-girls, who are attached to the temples.”—Aristic Journal, ii. 375, quoting Whaten, Tour to Madras and China.]}

RUMNA, s. Hind. rûmnā, Skt. rumaṇa, ‘causing pleasure,’ a chase, or reserved hunting-ground.

1760.—“Abdul Chab Cawn murdered at the Rumna in the month of March, 1769, by some of the Hacarans...” — Van Suttart, i. 83.

1792.—“The Peshwa having invited me to a novel spectacle at his rumna (read rumna), or park, about four miles from Poona...”—Sir C. Mulet, in Forbes, Or. Mem. [2nd ed. ii. 82]. (See also verses quoted under PAWNEE.)

RUNN (OF CUTC), n.p. Hind. rān. This name, applied to the singular extent of sand-flat and salt-waste, often covered by high tides, or by land-floods, which extends between the Peninsula of Cutch and the mainland, is a corruption of the Skt. ēriṇa or ērīna, ‘a salt-heap, a desert,’ for of aranya, ‘a wilderness’]. The Runn is first mentioned in the Periplo, in which a true indication is given of this tract and its dangers.

[R1:c. A.D. 80-90.—“... But after passing the Sinthus R. there is another gulph running to the north, not easily seen, which is called Irison, and is distinguished into the Great and the Little. And there is an expanse of shallow water on both sides, and swift con-

10:1. Mahommed Tughlak remodelled the currency, issuing gold pieces of 200 grs. and silver pieces of 140 grs.—an indication probably of a great "depreciation of gold" (to use our modern language) consequent on the enormous amount of gold bullion obtained from the plunder of Western and Southern India. Some years later (1230) Mahommed developed his notable scheme of a forced currency, consisting entirely of copper tokens. This threw everything into confusion, and it was not till six years later that any sustained issues of ordinary coin were recommenced. From about this time the old standard of 175 grs. was readopted for gold, and was maintained till the time of Sher Shah. But it does not appear that the old standard was then resumed for silver. In the reign of Mahommed's successor Feroz Shah, Mr. E. Thomas's examples show the gold coin of 175 grs. standard running parallel with continued issues of a silver (or professedly silver) coin of 140 grs.; and this, speaking briefly, continued to be the case to the end of the Lodi dynasty (i.e. 1526). The coinage seems to have sunk into one of great irregularity, not remedied by Baber (who struck ashrarfis (see ASHRAFEE) and dirhams, such as were used in Turkestan) or Humayun, but the reform of which was undertaken by Sher Shah, as above mentioned.

His silver coin of 175-178 grs. was that which popularly obtained the name of ṛaṇīya, which has continued to our day. The weight, indeed, of the coins so styled, never very accurate in native times, varied in different States, and the purity varied still more. The former never went very far on either side of 170 grs., but the quantity of pure silver contained in it sunk in some cases as low as 140 grs., and even, in exceptional cases, to 100 grs. Variation however was not confined to native States. Rupees were struck in Bombay at a very early date of the British occupation. Of these there are four specimens in the Br. Mus. The first bears obv. 'THE RUPEE OF BOMBAY. 1677. BY AUTHORITY OF CHARLES THE SECOND; rev. KING OF GREAT BRITAIN . FRANCE . AND . IRELAND.' Wt. 1678 gr. The fourth bears obv. 'HON . SOC . ANG . IND . ORI.' with a shield; rev. 'A . DEO . PAX . ET . INCREMENTUM :—MON . BOMBAY . ANGLIC . REGIM.' A° 78.' Weight 1778 gr. Different Rupees minted by the British Government were current in the three Presidencies, and in the Bengal Presidency several were current; viz. the Sikka (see SICCA) Rupee, which latterly weighed 192 grs., and contained 176 grs. of pure silver; the Farrukhabad, which latterly weighed 180 grs.,* containing 165-215 of pure silver; the Benares Rupee (up to 1819), which weighed 174-76 grs., and contained 168-885 of pure silver. Besides these there was the Chalâni or 'current' rupee of account, in which the Company's accounts were kept, of which 116 were equal to 100 sikkas. ["The bhari or Company's Arcot rupee was coined at Calcutta, and was in value 31/2 per cent. less than the Sikka rupee." (Beveridge, Bakorganj, 99.)] The Bombay Rupee was adopted from that of Surat, and from 1800 its weight was 178-32 grs.; its pure silver 164-94. The Rupee at Madras (where however the standard currency was of an entirely different character, see PAGODA) was originally that of the Nawâb of the Carnatic (or 'Nabob of Arcot') and was usually known as the Arcot Rupee. We find its issues varying from 171 to 177 grs. in weight, and from 160 to 170 of pure silver; whilst in 1811 there took place an abnormal coinage, from Spanish dollars, of rupees with a weight of 188 grs. and 169-20 of pure silver.

Also from some reason or other, perhaps from commerce between those places and the 'Coast,' the Chittagong and Dacca currency (i.e. in the extreme east of Bengal) "formerly consisted of Arcot rupees; and they were for some time coined expressly for those districts at the Calcutta and

* The term Sonaut rupees, which was of frequent occurrence down to the reformation and unification of the Indian coinage in 1833, is one very difficult to elucidate. The word is properly samud, pl. of Ar. sonat, a year. According to the old practice in Bengal, coins deteriorated in value, in comparison with the rupee of account, when they passed the third year of their currency, and these rupees were termed Samud or Sonaut. But in 1773, to put a stop to this inconvenience, Government determined that all rupees coined in future should bear the impression of the 19th son or year of Shah 'Alam (the Mogul then reigning). And in all later uses of the term Sonaut it appears to be equivalent in value to the Farrukhabad rupee, or the modern "Company's Rupees" (which was of the same standard).

Dacca Mints." (1) (Prinsep, Useful Tables, ed. by E. Thomas, 24.)

These examples will give some idea of the confusion that prevailed (with-out any reference to the vast variety besides of native coinages), but the subject is far too complex to be dealt with minutely in the space we can afford to it in such a work as this. The first step to reform and assimilation took place under Regulation VII. of 1833, but this still maintained the exceptional Sicca in Bengal, though assimilating the rupees over the rest of India. The Sicca was abolished as a coin by Act XII. of 1836; and the universal rupee of British territory has since been the "Company's Rupee," as it was long called, of 180 grs. weight, and 165 pure silver, representing therefore in fact the Farrukhabad Rupee.

1610.—"This armie consisted of 100,000 horse at the least, with infinite number of Camels and Elephants: so that with the whole baggage there could not bee lesse than five or sixe hundred thousand persons, insomuch that the waters were not sufficient for them; a Mussocke (see MUS-SUCK) of water being sold for a Rupia, and yet not enough to be had."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 427.

[1615.—"Roupies Jangers (Jahangir's) of 100 pias, which goeth four for five ordinary roupies of 80 pias called Cassanes (see KUZZANNA), and we value them at 2s. Ad. per piece: Cecass (see SICCA) of Amadavrs which goeth for 80 pias; Chavallees of Agra, which goeth for 50 pias,"—Foster, Letters, iii. 87.]

1616.—"Rupias monetae genus est, quorum singularis xxvi. asssibus gallicis aut circiter aequivalent."—Jarric, iii. 83.

... As for his Government of Patan onely, he gave the King eleven Leckes of Rupiases (the Rupia is two shillings, two-pence sterling) ... wherein he had Regall Authoritie to take what he list, which was esteemed at five thousand horse, the pay of every one at two hundred Rupias by the yeare."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 548; [Hak. Soc. i. 239, with some differences of reading].

"They call the pieces of money roopées, of which there are some of divers values, the meanest worth two shillings and threepence, and the best two shillings and ninpence sterling."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1471.

[ "This money, consisting of the two-shilling pieces of this country called Roopées."—Foster, Letters, iv. 229.]

1648.—"Reducing the Rupie to four and twenty Holland Stuyvers."—Van Twist, 26.

1653.—"Roupie est une monéoye des Indes de la valeur de 30s." (i.e. sous).—De la Bonl-laye-de-Gouv, ed. 1657, p. 355.

c. 1666.—"And for a Rouppy (in Bengal) which is about half a Crown, you may have 20 good Pullets and more; Geese and Ducks, in proportion."—Bernier, E. P. p. 140; [ed. Contable, 438].

1673.—"The other was a Goldsmith, who had coined copper Rupees."—Frery, 97.

1677.—"We do, by these Presents ... give and grant unto the said Governor and Company ... full and free Liberty, Power, and Authority ... to stamp and coin ... Monies, to be called and known by the Name or Names of Rupees, Pices, and Budgrooks, or by such other Name or Names ..."—Letters Patent of Charles II. In Charters of the E. I. Co., p. 111.

1771.—"We fear the worst however; that is, that the Government are about to interfere with the Company in the management of Affairs in India. Whenever that happens it will be high Time for us to decamp, I know the number of the King's Officers pretty well; and however they may decy our manner of acting they are ready enough to grasp at the Rupees whenever they fall within their Reach."—M.S. Letter of James Rennell, March 31.

RUSSUD, s. Pers. rasad. The provisions of grain, forage, and other necessaries got ready by the local officers at the camping ground of a military force or official cortège. The vernacular word has some other technical meanings (see Wilson), but this is its meaning in an Anglo-Indian mouth.

[c. 1640-50.—Rasad. (See under TANA.)

RUT, s. Hind. rath, 'a chariot.' Now applied to a native carriage drawn by a pony, or oxen, and used by women on a journey. Also applied to the car in which idols are carried forth on festival days. [See BOOK.]

[1810-17.—"Tippee's Aumil ... wanted iron, and determined to supply himself from the rut, (a temple of carved wood fixed on wheels, drawn in procession on public occasions, and requiring many thousand persons to effect its movement)."—Wilks, Sketches, Madras reprint, ii. 281.

[1813.—"In this camp hackeries and ruths, as they are called when they have four wheels, are always drawn by bullocks, and are used, almost exclusively, by the Bæcs, the Nach girls, and the bankers."—Broughton, Letters, ed. 1892, p. 117.]

1829.—"This being the case I took the liberty of taking the rut and horse to camp as prize property."—Mem. of John Shipps, ii. 183.

RUTTEE, RETTEE, s. Hind. ratti, râti, Skt. râktika, from rakka, 'red.' The seed of a leguminous creeper.
(Abrus precatorius, L.) sometimes called country liquorice—a pretty scarlet pea with a black spot—used from time immemorial in India as a goldsmith's weight, and known in England as 'Crab's eyes.' Mr. Thomas has shown that the ancient ratti may be taken as equal to 1-75 grs. Troy (Numismata Orientalia, New ed., Pt. I. pp. 12-14).

This work of Mr. Thomas contains interesting information regarding the old Indian custom of basing standard weights upon the weight of seeds, and we borrow from his paper the following extract from Manu (viii. 132): "The very small mote which may be discerned in a sunbeam passing through a lattice is the first of quantities, and men call it a trasarenu. 133. Eight of these trasarenu are supposed equal in weight to one minute poppy-seed (likhyā), three of those seeds are equal to one black mustard-seed (raja-sarshapa), and three of these last to a white mustard-seed (gaurasarshapa). 134. Six white mustard-seeds are equal to a middle-sized barley-corn (yava), three such barley-corns to one krishnala (or raktika), five krishnulas of gold are one másha, and sixteen such máshas one swarna." &c. (ibid. p. 13).

In the Ain, Abul Fazl calls the ratti surkh, which is a transliteration (Pers. for 'red'). In Persia the seed is called chashm-i-khurūs, 'Cock's eye' (see Blockmann's E.T., i. 16 n., and Jarrett, ii. 354). Further notices of the ratti used as a weight for precious stones will be found in Sir W. Elliot's Coins of Madras (p. 49). Sir Walter's experience is that the ratti of the gem-dealers is a double ratti, and an approximation to the mañjādi (see MANGELIN). This accounts for Tavernier's valuation at $\frac{1}{2}$ grs. [Mr. Ball gives the weight at 2-66 Troy grs. (Tavernier, ii. 448).]

c. 1676.—"At the mine of Sommelpeur in Bengal, they weigh by Ratti's, and the Rati is seven eighths of a Carat, or three grains and a half."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 140; [ed. Ball, ii. 89].

RYOT, s. Ar. ra'iyat, from ra'd, 'to pasture;' meaning originally, according to its etymology, 'a herd at pasture'; but then 'subjects' (collectively). It is by natives used for 'a subject' in India, but its specific Anglo-Indian application is to 'a tenant of the soil'; an individual occupying land as a farmer or cultivator. In Turkey the word, in the form raija, is applied to the Christian subjects of the Porte, who are not liable to the conscription, but pay a poll-tax in lieu, the Kharāj, or Jizya (see JEZYA).

[1609.—"Riats or clownes." (See under DOAI.)]

1778.—"For some period after the creation of the world there was neither Magistrate nor Punishment ... and the Ryots were nourished with piety and morality."—Halhed, Gentoo Code, 41.

1789.—"To him in a body the Ryots complain'd That their houses were burnt, and their cattle distrain'd." The Letters of Sinpkin the Second, &c. 11.

1790.—"A ra'iyat is rather a farmer than a husbandman."—Cobden, in Life, 42.

1808.—"The ryots were all at work in their fields."—Lord Valentia, ii. 127.

1813.—"And oft around the cavern fire On visionary schemes debate, To snatch the Rayahs from their fate." Byron, Bride of Abydos.

1820.—"An acquaintance with the customs of the inhabitants, but particularly of the rayets, the various tenures ... the agreements usual among them regarding cultivation, and between them and soucars (see SOWCAR) respecting loans and advances ... is essential to a judge."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, ii. 17.

1870.—"Ryot is a word which is much ... misused. It is Arabic, but no doubt comes through the Persian. It means 'protected one,' 'subject,' 'a commoner,' as distinguished from 'Rais' or 'noble.' In a native mouth, to the present day, it is used in this sense, and not in that of tenant."—Systems of Land Tenure (Cobden Club), 190.

The title of a newspaper, in English but of native editing, published for some years back in Calcutta, corresponds to what is here said; it is Raies and Raitat.

1877.—"The great financial distinction between the followers of Islam ... and the rayahs or infidel subjects of the Sultan, was the payment of karatch or capitation tax."—Finlay, II. of Greece, v. 22 (ed. 1877).

1884.—"Using the rights of conquest after the fashion of the Normans in England, the Turks had everywhere, except in the Cyclades ... seized on the greater part of the most fertile lands. Hence they formed the landlord class of Greece; whilst the Rayahs, as the Turks style their non-Musulman subjects, usually farmed the territories of their masters on the metayer system."—Murray's Handbook for Greece (by A. F. Yule), p. 54.
RYOTWARRY, adj. A technicality of modern coinage. Hind. from Pers. ṭuṛtawdr, formed from the preceding. The ryotwarry system is that under which the settlement for land revenue is made directly by the Government agency with each individual cultivator holding land, not with the village community, nor with any middleman or landlord, payment being also received directly from every such individual. It is the system which chiefly prevails in the Madras Presidency; and was elaborated there in its present form mainly by Sir T. Munro.

1824.—"It has been objected to the ryotwārī system that it produces unequal assessment and destroys ancient rights and privileges; but these opinions seem to originate in some misapprehension of its nature."—Minutes, &c., of Sir T. Munro, і. 265. We may observe that the spelling here is not Munro's. The Editor, Sir A. Arbuthnot, has followed a system (see Preface, p. x.); and we see in Gloig's Life (iii. 355) that Munro wrote 'Rayetwar.'

SABAIIO, ÇABAIO, &c., n.p. The name generally given by the Portuguese writers to the Mahomedan prince who was in possession of Goa when they arrived in India, and who had lived much there. He was in fact that one of the captains of the Bāhrāmānī kingdom of the Deccan who, in the division that took place on the decay of the dynasty towards the end of the 15th century, became the founder of the 'Adil Shāhī family which reigned in Bijapur from 1489 to the end of the following century (see IDALCAN). His real name was Abdul Muẓaffar Yūsuf, with the surname Sūbā or Savā. There does not seem any ground for rejecting the intelligent statement of De Barros (II. v. 2) that he had this name from being a native of Sūtār in Persia [see Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 404]. García de Orta does not seem to have been aware of this history, and he derives the name from Sahlīb (see below), apparently a mere guess, though not an unnatural one. Mr. Birch's surmise (Albouquerque, іі. 82), with these two old and obvious sources of suggestion before him, that "the word may possibly be connected with sipāhī, Arabic, a soldier," is quite inadmissible (nor is sipāhī Arabic). [On this word Mr. Whiteway writes: "In his explanation of this word Sir H. Yule has been misled by Barros. Conto (Dec. iv. Bk. 10 ch. 4) is conclusive, where he says: 'This Čufū extended the limits of his rule as far as he could till he went in person to conquer the island of Goa, which was a valuable possession for its income, and was in possession of a lord of Canara, called Savay, a vassal of the King of Canara, who then had his headquarters at what we call Old Goa. As there was much jungle here, Savay, the lord of Goa, had certain houses where he stayed for hunting. These houses still preserve the memory of the Hindu Savay, as they are called the Savayo's house, where for many years the Governors of India lived. As our João de Barros could not get true information of these things, he confounded the name of the Hindu Savay with that of Čufū (? 'Yūsuf) Adil Shāh, saying in the 5th Book of his 2nd Decade that when we went to India a Moor called Soay was lord of Goa, that we ordinarily called him Sabayo, and that he was a vassal of the King of the Deccan, a Persian, and native of the city of Savā. At this his sons laughed heartily when we read it to them, saying that their father was anything but a Turk, and his name anything but Čufū.' This passage makes it clear that the origin of the word is the Hindu title Sūtār, Hind. Savā, 'having the excess of a fourth,' 'a quarter better than other people,' which is one of the titles of the Maharājā of Jaypur. To show that it was more or less well known, I may point to the little State of Sūndā, which lay close to Goa on the S.E., of which the Rāja was of the Vijayanagar family. This little State became independent after the destruction of Vijayanagar, and remained in existence till absorbed by Tippoo Sultan. In this State Sūtār was a common honorific of the ruling family. At the same time Barros was not alone in calling Adil Shāh the Sabaio (see Albouquerque, Cartas, p. 24), where the name occurs. The mistake having been made, everyone accepted it."]
There is a story, related as unquestionable by Firishta, that the Sabaio was in reality a son of the Turkish Sultan Agá Murád (or 'Anurath') II., who was saved from murder at his father's death, and placed in the hands of 'Imád-ud-dín, a Persian merchant of Sívá, by whom he was brought up. In his youth he sought his fortune in India, and being sold as a slave, and going through a succession of adventures, reached his high position in the Deccan (Briggs, Firishta, iii. 7-8).

1510.—"But when Afonso Dalboquerque took Goa, it would be about 40 years more or less since the Cabaio had taken it from the Hindoos."—Dalboquerque, ii. 96.

"In this island (Goa called Goga) there is a fortress near the sea, walled round after our manner, in which there is sometimes a captain called Savaio, who has 400 Mamalukes, he himself being also a Mamaluke. . . ."—Varthema, 116.

1516.—"Going further along the coast there is a very beautiful river, which sends two arms into the sea, making between them an island, on which stands the city of Goa belonging to Deccan, and it was a principality of itself with other districts adjoining in the interior; and in it there was a great Lord, as vassal of the said King (of Deccan) called Sabayo, who being a good soldier, well mannered and experienced in war, this lordship of Goa was bestowed upon him, that he might continually make war on the King of Narsinga, as he did until his death. And then he left this city to his son Cabaym Hydalcan . . ."—Barros, Lisbon ed. 257.

1563.—"O . . . And returning to our subject, as Adel in Persian means 'justice,' they called the prince of these territories Adelham, as it were 'Lord of Justice.'

"R. A name highly inappropriate, for neither he nor the rest of them are wont to do justice. But tell me also why in Spain they call him the Sabaio?

"O. Some have told me that he was so called because they used to call a Captain by this name; but I afterwards came to know that in fact Asfior in Arabic means 'lord.' . . ."—García, f. 36.

SADRAS, SADRASPATAM, n.p. This name of a place 42 m. south of Madras, the seat of an old Dutch factory, was probably shaped into the usual form in a sort of conformity with Madras or Maddraspam. The correct name is Sadrara; but it is sometimes made into Sadrang- and Shatranj-patam. The Madras Gloss, gives Tam, Shathurangoppatamam, Skt. chatur-anga, 'the four military arus, infantry, cavalry, elephants and cars.']

Fryer (p. 28) calls it Sandrascalpatam, which is probably a misprint for Sadrascalpatam.

1672.—"From Tirepolier you come . . . to Sadrascalpatam, where our people have a Factory."—Balduens, 152.

1726.—"The name of the place is properly Sandrascalpatam; but for short it is also called Sadrampatam, and most commonly Sadrascalpatam. In the Tellinda it indicates the name of the founder, and in Persian it means 'thousand troubles' or the Shah-board which we call chess."—Valentijn, Choromandel, 11. The curious explanation of Shatranj or 'chess,' as 'a thousand troubles,' is no doubt some popular etymology; such as P. saflan, 'a hundred griefs.' The word is really of Sanskrit origin, from Chaturanga, literally, 'quadrupartite;' the four constituent parts of an army, viz. horse, foot, chariots and elephants.

[1727.—"Saderass, or Sadderass Patam." (See under LONG-CLOTH.)]

c. 1780.—"J'avois pensé que Sadras auroit été le lieu où devaient finir mes contrariétés et mes courses."—Hautier, i. 141.

"'Non, je ne suis point Anglois, m'écrit-je avec indignation et transport; 'je suis un Hollandais de Sadringsapatam.'"—Ibid. 191.

1781.—"The chief officer of the French now despatched a summons to the English commander of the Fort to surrender, and the commandant, not being of opinion he could resist . . . evacuated the fort, and proceeded by sea in boats to Sudrung Puttan."—H. of Hyder Nârî, 447.

SAFFLOWER. s. The flowers of the annual Carthamus tinctorius, L. (N.O. Compositae), a considerable article of export from India for use of a red dye, and sometimes, from the resemblance of the dried flowers to saffron, termed 'bastard saffron.' The colouring matter of safflower is the basis of rouge. The name is a curious modification of words by the 'striving after meaning.' For it points, in the first half of the name, to the analogy with saffron, and in the second half, to the object of trade being a flower. But neither one nor the other of these meanings forms any real element in the word. Safflower appears to be an eventual corruption of the Arabic name of the thing, as bursts. This word we find in medieval trade-lists (e.g. in Pegolotti) to take various forms such as asirr, astir, astor, saffo, saffre, saffro; from the last of which the transition to safflower is natural. In the old Latin translation of Avicenna, it seems to be called Crocos hortulanus, for the corresponding Arabic is given husfur. Another Arabic name for this article is kurtum, which we presume to be the origin of the botanist's carthamus. In Hind. it is called kusumbha or kusum. Bretschneider remarks that though the two plants, saffron and safflower, have not the slightest resemblance, and belong to two different families and classes of the nat. system, there has been a certain confusion between them among almost all nations, including the Chinese.

This plant yields a colouring matter, used in dyeing. There are two kinds, cultivated and wild, both of which grow in Arabia, and the seeds of which are called al-kurtum." — Ibn Baithar, ii. 196.

1612.—"The two Indian ships aforesaid did discharge these goods following . . . oosfar, which is a red die, great quantitie." — Capt. Saris, in Purchas, i. 347.

1813.—"Safflower (Cussum, Hind., As-four Arab.) is the flower of an annual plant, the Carthamus tinctorius, growing in Bengal and other parts of India, which when well-cured is not easily distinguishable from saffron by the eye, though it has nothing of its smell or taste." — Milburn, ii. 328.

SAFFRON, s. Arab. za'farân. The true saffron (Crocus sativus, L.) in India is cultivated in Kashmir only. In South India this name is given to turmeric, which the Portuguese called açafraõ da terra ("country saffron"). The Hind. name is halds, or in the Deccan halad, [Skt. haridra, hari, "green, yellow"]. Garcia de Orta calls it croco Indiaeco, 'Indian saffron.' Indeed, Dozy shows that the Arab. kurkum for turmeric (whence the bot. Lat. curcuma) is probably taken from the Greek krákos or obl. krákon.

Moodeen Sherif says that kurkum is applied to saffron in many Persian and other writers.

c. 1200.—"The Persians call this root al-Hard, and the inhabitants of Busra call it al-Kurkum, and al-Kurkum is Saffron.

They call these plants Saffron because they dye yellow in the same way as Saffron does." — Ibn Baithar, ii. 370.

1563.—"R. Since there is nothing else to be said on this subject, let us speak of what we call 'country saffron.'

"O. This is a medicine that should be spoken of, since it is in use by the Indian physicians; it is a medicine and article of trade much exported to Arabia and Persia. In this city (Goa) there is little of it, but much in Malabar, i.e., in Cananor and Calecut. The Canarins call the root alad; and the Malabars sometimes give it the same name, but more properly call it manjate, and the Malays cunket; the Persians, darsad, which is as much as to say 'yellow-wood.' The Arabs call it habet; and all of them, each in turn, say that this saffron does not exist in Persia, nor in Arabia, nor in Turkey, except what comes from India." — Garcia, f. 78v. Further on he identifies it with curcuma.

1726.—"Cureuma, or Indian Saffron." — Valentijn, Chor. 42.

SAGAR-PESHA, s. Camp-followers, or the body of servants in a private establishment. The word, though usually pronounced in vulgar Hind. as written above, is Pers. shâgird-pesha (lit. *shâgird, 'a disciple, a servant,' and pesha, 'business').

[1767.—"*Saggur Depessah-pay." . . ."—In Long, 513.]

SAGO. s. From Malay sâgä. The farinaceous pith taken out of the stem of several species of a particular genus of palm, especially Metroxylon laevis, Mart., and M. Rumphiï, Willd., found in every part of the Indian Archipelago, including the Philippines, wherever there is proper soil. They are most abundant in the eastern part of the region indicated, including the Moluccas and N. Guinea, which probably formed the original habitat; and in these they supply the sole bread of the natives. In the remaining parts of the Archipelago, sago is the food only of certain wild tribes, or consumed (as in Mindanao) by the poor only, or prepared (as at Singapore, &c.) for export. There are supposed to be five species producing the article.

1928.—"They have a kind of trees that produce flour, and excellent flour it is for food. These trees are very tall and thick, but have a very thin bark, and inside the bark they are crammed with flour."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. xi.

1330. "But as for the trees which produce flour, tis after this fashion. . . . And the result is the best paste in the world, from which they make whatever they choose, cakes of sorts, and excellent bread, of which I, Friar Odoric, have eaten."—Fr. Odoric, in Cathay, &c., 32.

1522. "Their bread (in Tidore) they make of the wood of a certain tree like a palm-tree, and they make it in this way. They take a piece of this wood, and extract from it certain long black thorns which are situated there; then they pound it, and make bread of it which they call sagu. They make provision of this bread for their sea voyages."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. p. 136. This is a bad description, and seems to refer to the Sagwire, not the true sago-tree.

1552. "There are also other trees which are called sagues, from the pith of which bread is made."—Castanheda, vi. 24.

1553. "Generally, although they have some millet and rice, all the people of the Isles of Maluco eat a certain food which they call Sagum, which is the pith of a tree which is like a palm-tree, except that the leaf is softer and smoother, and the green of it is rather dark."—Barros, III. v. 5.

1579. "... and a Kind of meale which they call Sago, made of the toppes of certaine trees, tasting in the mouth like some curds, but melts away like sugar."—Drake's Voyage, Hak. Soc. p. 142.

Also in a list of "Certaune Wordes of the Naturall Language of Iauu."; "Sagu, bread of the Countrie."—Hokl. iv. 246.

c. 1690. "Primo Sagus genuina, Malaeic Sagu, sive Lupia tinta, h.e. vera Sagu."—Rumphius, i. 75. (We cannot make out the language of lupia tinta.)

1727. "And the inland people subsist mostly on Sagow, the Pith of a small Twig split and dried in the Sun."—A. Hamilton, ii. 93; [ed. 1744].

SAGWIRE, s. A name applied often in books, and, formerly at least, in the colloquial use of European settlers and traders, to the Gomuti palm or Arenga saccharifera, Labill., which abounds in the Ind. Archipelago, and is of great importance in its rural economy. The name is Port. saqueira (analogous to palmeira), in Span. of the Indies saguran, and no doubt is taken from sagu, as the tree, though not the Sago-palm of commerce, affords a sago of inferior kind. Its most important product, however, is the sap, which is used as toddy (q.v.), and which in former days also afforded almost all the sugar used by natives in the islands. An excellent cordage is made from a substance resembling black horse-hair, which is found between the trunk and the fronds, and this is the gomuti of the Malays, which furnished one of the old specific names (Borassus gomutis, Loureiro). There is also found in a like position a fine cotton-like substance which makes excellent tinder, and strong stiff spines from which pens are made, as well as arrows for the blow-pipe, or Sumptan (see SARBATANE). "The seeds have been made into a confection, whilst their pulpy envelope abounds in a poisonous juice—used in the barbarian wars of the natives—to which the Dutch gave the appropriate name of 'hell-water'" (Crawfurd, Desc. Dict. p. 145). The term saqueire is sometimes applied to the toddy or palm-wine, as will be seen below.

1515. "They use no sustenance except the meal of certain trees, which trees they call Sagur; and of this they make bread."—Giov. da Empoli, 86.

1615. "Oryza tamen magna hic copia, ingenis etiam modus arborum quas Sagurus vocant, quaque varia suggerunt commoda."—Jarric, i. 201.

1784. "The natives drink much of a liquor called saqueire, drawn from the palm-tree."—Forrest, Meryti, 73.

1820. "The Portuguese, I know not for what reason, and other European nations who have followed them, call the tree and the liquor saqueire."—Crawfurd, Hist. i. 401.

SAHIB, s. The title by which, all over India, European gentlemen, and it may be said Europeans generally, are addressed, and spoken of, when no disrespect is intended, by natives. It is also the general title (at least where Hindustani or Persian is used) which is affixed to the name or office of a European, corresponding thus rather to Monsieur than to Mr. For Colonel Sahib, Collector Sahib, Lord Sahib, and even Sergeant Sahib are thus used, as well as the general vocative Sahib! 'Sir!' In other Hind. use the word is equivalent to 'Master'; and it is occasionally used as a specific title both among Hindus and Musulmans, e.g. Appa Sahib, Tipu Sahib; and generically is affixed to the titles of men of rank when indicated by those titles, as Khan Sahib, Nawab Sahib, Raja Sahib. The word is Arabic, and originally means 'a companion'; (sometimes a companion of Mahommed).

[In the Arabian Nights it is the title of a Wazir (Burton, i. 218).]

1673.—"... To which the subtle Heathen replied, Sahab (i.e. Sir), why will you do more than the Creator meant?"—Fryer, 417.

1689.—"Thus the distracted Husband in his Indian confest, English fashion, Sab, best fashion, have one Wife best for one Husband."—Ovington, 326.

1853.—"He was told that a 'Sahib' wanted to speak with him."—Oakfield, ii. 252.

1878.—"... forty Elephants and five Sahibs with guns and innumerable followers."—Life in the Mogusul, i. 194.

[ST. DEAVES, n.p. A corruption of the name of the island of Sandwip in the Bay of Bengal, situated off the coast of Chittagong and Noakhali, which is best known in connection with the awful loss of life and property in the cyclone of 1876.

[1888.—"From Chittagaum we sailed away the 29th January, after had sent small vessels to search round the Island St. Deaves."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. II. lxxx.]

a. An English sailor's corruption, which for a long time maintained its place in our maps. It is the Sindan of the old Arab Geographers, and was the first durable settling-place of the Parsee refugees on their emigration to India in the 8th century. [Dossahbai Framji, Hist. of the Parsees, i. 30.]
The proper name of the place, which is in lat. 20° 12' and lies 88 m. north of Bombay, is apparently Sanjan (see Hist. of Cambay, in Bo. Govt. Selections, No. xxvi., N.S., p. 52), but it is commonly called Sanján. E. B. Eastwick in J. Bo. As. Soc. R. i. 167, gives a Translation from the Persian of the "Kisgh-i-Sanján, or History of the arrival and settlement of the Parsees in India." Sanján is about 3 m. from the little river-mouth port of Umbargàn. "Evidence of the greatness of Sanján is found, for miles around, in old foundations and bricks. The bricks are of very superior quality."—Bomb. Gazetteer, vol. xiv. 302, [and for medieval references to the place, ibid. I. Pt. i. 262, 520 seq.]

c. 1150.—"Sindan is 1½ mile from the sea... The town is large and has an extensive commerce both in exports and imports."—Edrisi, in Elliot, i. 85.

c. 1599.—"When the Dastur saw the soil was good, he selected the place for their residence: The Dastur named the spot Sanján, and it became populous as the Land of Iran."—Kisghah, &c., as above, p. 179.

c. 1616.—"... aldea Nargol... in the lands of Daman was infested by Malabar Moors in their parís, who commonly landed there for water and provisions, and plundered the boats that entered or quitte the river, and the passengers who crossed it, with heavy loss to the aldeas adjoining the river, and to the revenue from them, as well as to that from the custom-house of Sangens."—Bocarro, Decades, 570.

1623.—"... La mattina seguenti, fatto giorno, scoprimmo terra di lontano... in a luogo pochissimo da Bassaam, quasi! Inglese chiamano Terra di San Giovanni... ma nella carta da navigare vidi esser notato, in lingua Portoghese, col nome d'ilha das vacas, o 'isole delle vacche' al modo nostro."—P. della Valle, ii. 500; [Hak. Soc. i. 16.]

1630.—"... it happened that in safety they made to the land of St. John on the shores of India..."—Lord, The Religion of the Persians, 3.

1644.—"... Besides these four posts there are in the said district four Taxadores (see TANADAR), or different Captainships, called Sangés (St. John's), Dánn, Máim, and Trapor."—Bocarro (Port. MS.).

1673.—"... In a Week's Time we turned it up, sailing by Besen, Tarapore, Valentine's Peak, St. John's, and Daman, the last City northward on the Continent, belonging to the Portuguese."—Fryer, 82.

1808.—"... They (the Parsee emigrants) landed at Dian, and lived there 19 years; but, disliking the place... the greater part of them left it and came to the Guzerat coast, in vessels which anchored off Beijan, the name of a town."—R. Drummond.

1813.—"... The Parsees or Guebres... continued in this place (Diu) for some time, and then crossing the Gulp, landed at Suzan, near Nunsaree, which is a little to the southward of Surat."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 109; [2nd ed. i. 78.]

1841.—"The high land of St. John, about 3 leagues inland, has a regular appearance..."—Harehorough's Directory, ed. 1841, i. 470.

1872.—"... In connexion with the landing of the Persis at Sanján in the early part of the 8th century, there still exist copies of the 15 Sanskrit Slokas, in which their Mobeds explained their religion to Jâd Rânâ, the Râja of the place, and the reply he gave them..."—Ind. Antiq. i. 214. The Slokas are given. See them also in Dossahbai Framji's Hist. of the Parsees, i. 31.

b. ST. JOHN'S ISLAND, n.p. This again is a corruption of San-SALAK.

Shan, or more correctly Shang-chung, the Chinese name of an island about 60 or 70 miles S.W. of Macao, and at some distance from the mouth of the Canton River, the place where St. Francis Xavier died, and was originally buried.

1687.—"We came to Anchor the same day, on the N.E. end of St. John's Island. This Island is in Lat. about 32 d. 30 min. North, lying on the S. Coast of the Province of Quangtung or Canton in China."—Dampier, i. 406.

1727.—"A Portuguese Ship . . . being near an Island on that Coast, called after St. Juan, some Gentlemen and Priests went ashore for Diversion, and accidentally found the Saint's Body uncorrupted, and carried it Passenger to Goa."—A. Hamilton, i. 252; [ed. 1744, ii. 255].

c. ST. JOHN'S ISLANDS. This is also the chart-name, and popular European name, of two islands about 6 m. S. of Singapore, the chief of which is properly Pulo Sikajang, [or as Denny's (Desc. Dict. 321) writes the word, Pulo Skiyan].

SAIVA, s. A worshipper of Śiva; Skt. Saiva, adj., 'belonging to Siva.'

1651.—"The second sect of the Bramins, Ševīvā. . . by name, say that a certain Ševa-rā is the supreme among the gods, and that all the others are subject to him."—Rogerius, 17.

1867.—"This temple is reckoned, I believe, the holiest shrine in India, at least among the Shaivites."—By. Milman, in Memoirs, p. 48.

SALA, s. Hind. salā, 'brother-in-law,' i.e. wife's brother; but used elliptically as a low term of abuse.

[1856.—"Another reason (for infanticide) is the blind pride which makes them hate that any man should call them sala, or Suseor—brother-in-law, or father-in-law."—Forbes, Rās Mālā, ed. 1878, 616.]

1881.—"Another of these popular Paris sayings is 'et ta sœur?' which is as insulting a remark to a Parisian as the apparently harmless remark sallā, 'brother-in-law,' is to a Hindoo."—Sat. Rev., Sept. 10, 326.

SALĀMA, s. A salutation; properly oral salutation of Mahomedans to each other. Arab. salām, 'peace.' Used for any act of salutation; or for 'compliments.'

[c. 60 B.C.—"'ΔΛΛ' ει μεν Σίρος εσσί Σαλάμι, ει δ' ουν σ' εις φοίνιξ 'Ναίδιος,' ει δ' Ελλην 'Χαίρε'. το δ' αέτο φράσου."—Meleagros, in Anthologia Palatina, vii. 149.
The point is that he has been a bird of passage, and says good-bye now to his various resting-places in their own tongue.]

1513.—"The ambassador (of Bisnagar) entering the door of the chamber, the Governor rose from the chair on which he was seated, and stood up while the ambassador made him great calema."—Correa, Lendas, i. 377. See also p. 431.

1552.—"The present having been seen he took the letter of the Governor, and read it to him, and having read it told him how the Governor sent him his calema, and was at his command with all his fleet, and with all the Portuguese. . . ."—Castanheda, iii. 445.

1611.—"Calema. The salutation of an inferior."—Cobbett's, Sp. Dict. s.v.

1626.—"Hee (Selim i.e. Jahangir) turneth over his Beades, and saith so many words, to wit three thousand and two hundred, and then presenteth himself to the people to receive their salams or good morrow . . . ."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 533.

1638.—"En entrant ils se salissent de leur Salam qu'ils accompagnent d'une profonde inclination."—Mandello, Paris, 1659, 223.

1648.—". . . this salutation they call salam; and it is made with bending of the body, and laying of the right hand upon the head."—Van Twist, 55.

1689.—"The Salem of the Religious Bramins is, to join their Hands together, and spreading them first, make a motion towards their Head, and then stretch them out."—Ovington, 183.

1694.—"The Town Conicopolies, and chief inhabitants of Egmore, came to make their Salam to the President."—Wheeler, i. 281.

1717.—"I wish the Priests in Tranquebar a Thousand fold Schalam."—Philipps's Acct. 62.

1809.—"The old priest was at the door, and with his head uncovered, to make his salaams."—Lt. Valentina, i. 273.

1813.—"' Ho! who art thou?—This low salam Replies, of Moslem faith I am.'"—Byron, The Gitaner.

1832.—"Il me rendit tous les salams que je fis autrefois au 'Grand Mogol.'"—Jacquemont, Corresp. ii. 137.

1844.—"All chiefs who have made their salam are entitled to carry arms personally."—G. O. of Sir C. Napier, 2.

SALAK, s. A singular-looking fruit, sold and eaten in the Malay regions, described in the quotation.
It is the fruit of a species of rattan (Salacca edulis), of which the Malay name is rotan-salak.

1768-71. — "The salac (Calamus rotang Salacca) which is the fruit of a prickly bush, and has a singular appearance, being covered with scales, like those of a lizard; it is nutritious and well tasted, in flavour somewhat resembling a raspberry." — Stavrovius, E.T. i. 241.

SALEB, SALEP, s. This name is applied to the tubers of various species of orchis found in Europe and Asia, which from ancient times have had a great reputation as being restorative and highly nutritious. This reputation seems originally to have rested on the 'doctrine of signatures,' but was due partly no doubt to the fact that the mucilage of saleb has the property of forming, even with the addition of 40 parts of water, a thick jelly. Good modern authorities quite disbelieve in the virtues ascribed to saleb, though a decoction of it, spiced and sweetened, makes an agreeable drink for invalids. Saleb is identified correctly by Ibn Baithar with the Satyrion of Dioscorides and Galen. The full name in Ar. (analogous to the Greek orchis) is Khursî-ghal-tha'lab, i.e. 'testiculus vulpis'; but it is commonly known in India as ga'lab mîrî, i.e. Salep of Egypt, or popularly salep-mîrî. In Upper India saleb is derived from various species of Euodaphia, found in Kashmir and the Lower Himalaya. Saloop, which is, or used to be, supplied hot in winter mornings by itinerant vendors in the streets of London, is, we believe, a representative of Saleb; but we do not know from what it is prepared. [In 1889 a correspondent to Notes & Queries (7 ser. vii. 35) stated that "within the last twenty years saloop vendors might have been seen plying their trade in the streets of London. The term saloop was also applied to an infusion of the sassafras bark or wood. In Pereira's Materia Medica, published in 1850, it is stated that 'sassafras tea, flavoured with milk and sugar, is sold at daybreak in the streets of London under the name of saloop.' Saloop in balls is still sold in London, and comes mostly from Smyrna."]

In the first quotation it is doubtful what is meant by salif; but it seems possible that the traveller may not have recognised the tha'lab, ga'lab in its Indian pronunciation.

c. 1340. — "After that, they fixed the amount of provision to be given by the Sultan, viz. 1000 Indian rîf'ât of flour . . . 1000 of meat, a large number of rîf'ât (how many I don't now remember) of sugar, of ghee, of salif, of areca, and 1000 leaves of betel." — Ibn Batuta, iii. 382.

1727. — "They have a fruit called Salob, about the size of a Peach, but without a stone. They dry it hard . . . and being beaten to Powder, they dress it as Tea and Coffee are. . . . They are of opinion that it is a great restorative." — A. Hamilton, i. 125; [ed. 1744, i. 126].

[1754.—In his list of Indian drugs Ives (p. 44) gives "Rad. Salop, Persia Rs. 35 per hundred pounds." —]

1588. — "Saleb Misrie, a medicine, comes (a little) from Russia. It is considered a good nutritive for the human constitution, and is for this purpose powdered and taken with milk. It is in the form of flat oval pieces of about 80 grains each . . . It is sold at 2 or 3 Rupees per ounce."—Desc. of articles found in Bazaar of Cabool. In Punjab Trade Report, 1862, App. vi.

1882 (?)—"Here we knock against an ambulant salep-shop (a kind of tea which people drink on winter mornings); there against roaming oil, salt, or water-vendors, bakers carrying brown bread on wooden trays, peddlars with cakes, fellows offering dainty little bits of meat to the knowing purchaser."—Leckosia, The Capital of Cyprus, ext. in St. James's Gazette, Sept. 10.

SALEM, n.p. A town and inland district of S. India. Properly Shalem, which is perhaps a corruption of Chera, the name of the ancient monarchy in which this district was embraced. ["According to one theory the town of Salem is said to be identical with Seran or Sheran, and occasionally to have been named Sheralan; when S. India was divided between the three dynasties of Chola, Sera and Pandia, according to the generally accepted belief, Karur was the place where the three territorial divisions met; the boundary was no doubt subject to vicissitudes, and at one time possibly Salem or Serar was a part of Sera."—Le Fanu, Man. of Salem, ii. 18.]

SALEMPOORY, s. A kind of chintz. See allusions under PALEMPORE. [The Madras Gloss., deriving the word from Tel. sâle, 'weaver,' pura, Skt. 'town,' describes it as "a kind of cotton cloth formerly manufactured at Nellore; half the length of ordinary Punjams" (see PIECE-GOODS). The third quotation indicates that it was sometimes white.]

[1598. — "Sarampuras." — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 95.

[1611.— "I . . . was only doubtful about the white Betteslas and Salempuryas." — Dauvers, Letters, i. 155.

[1614.— "Salampora, being a broad white cloth." — Foster, ibid. ii. 32.]

1680.— "Certain goods for Bantam priced as follows:—

1747.— "The Warehousekeeper reported that on the 1st inst. when the French entered our Bounds and attacked us . . . it appeared that 5 Pieces of Long Cloth and 10 Pieces of Salampores were stolen, That Two Pieces of Salampores were found upon a Pecon . . . and the Person detected is ordered to be severely whipped in the Face of the Publick. . . ."—Pt. St. David Consn., March 30 (MS. Records in India Office).

c. 1780.— "... en l'on y fabriquoit différentes espèces de toiles de coton, telles que salempours." — Haufner, ii. 461.

SALIGRAM. s. Skt. Śalagrahma (this word seems to be properly the name of a place, 'Village of the Sāl-tree'—a real or imaginary tirtha or place of sacred pilgrimage, mentioned in the Mahābhārata). [Other and less probable explanations are given by Oppert, Anc. Inhabitants, 337.] A pebble having mystic virtues, found in certain rivers, e.g. Gandak, Son, &c. Such stones are usually marked by containing a fossil amimonite. The śalagrahma is often adopted as the representative of some god, and the worship of any god may be performed before it.* It is daily worshipped by the Brahmins; but it is especially connected with Vaishnava doctrine. In May 1883 a śalagrahma was the ostensible cause of great popular excitement among the Hindus of Calcutta. During the proceedings in a family suit before the High Court, a question arose regarding the identity of a śalagrahma, regarded as a household god. Counsel on both sides suggested that the thing should be brought into court. Mr. Justice Norris hesitated to give this order till he had taken advice. The attorneys on both sides, Hindus, said there could be no objection; the Court interpreter, a high-caste Brahman, said it could not be brought into Court, because of the coir-matting, but it might with perfect propriety be brought into the corridor for inspection; which was done. This took place during the excitement about the "Ilbert Bill," giving natives magisterial authority in the provinces over Europeans; and there followed most violent and offensive articles in several native newspapers reviling Mr. Justice Norris, who was believed to be hostile to the Bill. The editor of the Bengalee newspaper, an educated man, and formerly a member of the covenanted Civil Service, the author of one of the most unscrupulous and violent articles, was summoned for contempt of court. He made an apology and complete retraction, but was sentenced to two months' imprisonment.

c. 1590.— "Salgram is a black stone which the Hindoos hold sacred. . . . They are found in the river Sown, at the distance of 40 cose from the mouth."—Ayeen, Gladwin's E. T. 1800, ii. 25.; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 150].

1782.— "Avant de finir l'histoire de Vichenou, je ne puis me dispenser de parler de la pierre de Salagran. Elle n'est autre chose qu'une coquille petrifiée du genre des corées d'Aumou; les Indiens prétendent qu'elle représente Vichenou, parcequ'ils en ont découvert de neuf nuances différentes, ce qu'ils rapportent aux neuf incarnations de ce Dieu. . . . Cette pierre est aux sectateurs de Vichenou ce que le Lingam est à ceux de Chiven."—Sommeret, i. 307.

[1822.— "In the Nebuddah are found those types of Shiva, called Solgrammas, which are sacred pebbles held in great estimation all over India."—Wallace, Fifty Years in India, 236.]

1824.— "The salagramũ is black, hollow, and nearly round; it is found in the Gun- dūk River, and is considered a representation of Vishnu. . . . The Šalagramũ is the only stone that is naturally divine; all the other stones are rendered sacred by incantations."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 43.

1885.— "My father had one (a Salagram). It was a round, rather flat, jet black, small, shining stone. He paid it the greatest reverence possible, and allowed no one to touch it, but worshipped it with his own hands. When he became ill, and as he would not allow a woman to touch it, he made it over to a Brahman ascetic with a money present." — Sundrdbâi, in Punjáb Notes and Queries, ii. 109. The sâlagrâma is in fact a Hindu fetish.

SALABAD, s. This word, now quite obsolete, occurs frequently in the early records of English settlements in India, for the customary or prescriptive exactions of the native Governments, and for native prescriptive claims in general. It is a word of Mahratti development, sâlabâd,
'perennial,' applied to permanent collections or charges; apparently a factitious word from Pers. sâl, 'year,' and Ar. âbâd, 'ages.'
[1680.—"Salabad." See under ROOC-KA.]

1703.—"... although these are hardships, yet by length of time become Salabad (as we esteem them), there is no great demur made now, and are not recited here as grievances." — In Wheeler, ii. 19.

1716.—"The Board upon reading them came to the following resolutions: — That for anything which has yet appeared the Comatees (Comaty) may cry out their Pennagundoo Nagaram ... at their houses, feasts, and weddings, &c., according to Salabad but not before the Pagoda of Chindy Pillary. ..." — Ibid. 234.

1788.—"Salabad. (Usual Custom).
A word used by the Moors Government to enforce their demand of a present." — Indian Vocabulary (Stockdale).

SALOOTREE, SALUSTREE, s.
Hind. Sâlotar, Sâlotrî. A native farrier or horse-doctor. This class is now almost always Mahommedan.
But the word is taken from the Skt.
name Sâlîhotra, the original owner of which is supposed to have written in that language a treatise on the Veterinary Art, which still exists in a form more or less modified and imperfect.
"A knowledge of Sanskrit must have prevailed pretty generally about this time (14th century), for there is in the Royal Library at Lucknow a work on the veterinary art, which was translated from the Sanskrit by order of Ghiyâsû-d din Muhammad Shâh Khâliji. This rare book, called Kurrutu-l-Mulk, was translated as early as A.H. 783 (A.D. 1381), from an original styled Sâlotar, which is the name of an Indian, who is said to have been a Brîhman, and the tutor of Susruta. The Preface says the translation was made 'from the barbarous Hindi into the refined Persian, in order that there may be no more need of a reference to infidels.'" — (Elliot, v. 573-4.)

[1831.—"... your aloes are not genuine.'
'Oy yes, they are,' he exclaimed. 'My salotre got them from the Bazaar." — Or.
Sport. Mag., reprint 1873, ii. 223.]

SALSETTE, n.p.
a. A considerable island immediately north of Bombay. The island of Bombay is indeed naturally a kind of pendant to the island of Salsette, and during the Portuguese occupation it was so in every sense. That occupation is still marked by the remains of numerous villas and churches, and by the survival of a large R. Catholic population. The island also contains the famous and extensive caves of Kânâhâri (see KENNERY). The old city of Tana (q.v.) also stands upon Salsette. Salsette was claimed as part of the Bombay dotation of Queen Catherine, but refused by the Portuguese. The Maharrats took it from them in 1739, and it was taken from these by us in 1774. The name has been by some connected with the salt-works which exist upon the islands (Saltinas). But it appears in fact to be the corruption of a Mahratti name Shâštî, from Shâstshâtî, meaning 'Sixty-six' (Skt. Shat-shashtî), because (it is supposed) the island was alleged to contain that number of villages.
This name occurs in the form Shat-sashti in a stone inscription dated Sak. 1103 (A.D. 1182). See Bo. J. R.
As. Soc. xii. 334. Another inscription on copper plates dated Sak. 748 (A.D. 1027) contains a grant of the village of Naura, "one of the 66 of Sri Shânâka (Thana)," thus entirely confirming the etymology (J.R. As.
Soc. ii. 353). I have to thank Mr. J. M.
Campbell, C.S.I., for drawing my attention to these inscriptions.

b. Salsette is also the name of the three provinces of the Goa territory which constituted the Velhas Con-quistas or Old Conquests. These lay all along the coast, consisting of (1)

the Ilhas (viz. the island of Goa and minor islands divided by rivers and creeks), (2) Bardez on the northern mainland, and (3) Salsette on the southern mainland. The port of Mormagaon, which is the terminus of the Portuguese Indian Railway, is in this Salsette. The name probably had the like origin to that of the Island Salsette; a parallel to which was found in the old name of the Island of Goa, Terça, meaning (Mahr.) '30 hamlets.' [See BARGANY.]

a. — 1586. — 'I, Aparádityey ("the paramount sovereign, the Ruler of the Koukana, the most illustrious King") have given with a libation of water 24 drachms, after exempting other taxes, from the fixed revenue of the oart in the village of Mahauli, connected with Shart-shashiti.' — Inscription edited by Pandit Bhágavatādīl Indrajit, in J. Bo. Br. R. A. S. xii. 332. [And see Bombay Gazetteer, I. Pt. ii. 544, 567.]

b. — 1585. — 'Beyond the Isle of Elephant (do Afijante) about a league distant is the island of Salsete. This island is seven leagues long by 5 in breadth. On the north it borders the Gulf of Cambay, on the south it has the I. of Elephant, on the east the mainland, and on the west the I. of Bombai or of Boa Vida. This island is very fertile, abounding in provisions, cattle, and game of sorts, and in its hills is great plenty of timber for building ships and galleys. In that part of the island which faces the S.W. wind is built a great and noble city called Thana; and a league and a half in the interior is an immense edifice called the Pagoda of Salsete; both one and the other objects most worthy of note; Thana for its decay (destruição) and the Pagoda as a work unique in its way, and the like of which is nowhere to be seen.' — João de Castro, Primo Roteiro da Índia, 69-70.

1554. — 'And to the Tanadar (tenadar) of Salsete 30,000 reis.

'He has under him 12 peons (píões) of whom the chief governor takes 7; leaving him 5, which at the aforesaid rate amount to 10,800 reis.'

"And to a Parvu (see PARVOE) that he has, who is the country writer . . . and having the same pay as the Tenadar Mor, which is 3 pardaos a month, amounting in a year at the said rate to 10,800 reis." — Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 211-212.

1610. — 'Frey Manuel de S. Mathias, guardian of the convent of St. Francis in Goa, writes to me that . . . in Goa alone there are 90 resident friars; and besides in Bardez and its adjuncts, viz., in the island of Salsete and other districts of the north they have 18 parishes (Freguezias) of native Christians with vicars; and five of the convents have colleges, or seminaries where they bring up little orphans; and that the said Ward of Goa extends 300 leagues from north to south." — Livros das Monções, 298.

1760. — 'It was a melancholy sight on the loss of Salset, to see the many families forced to seek refuge on Bombay, and among them some Portuguese Hidalgos or noblemen, reduced of a sudden from very flourishing circumstances to utter beggary.' — Grose, i. 72.

1768. — 'Those lands are comprised in 66 villages, and from this number it is called Salsette." — Foiral of Salsete, India Office MS.]

1777. — 'The acquisition of the Island of Salset, which in a manner surrounds the Island of Bombay, is sufficient to secure the latter from the danger of a famine." — Price's Tracts, i. 101.

1808. — 'The island of Sashky (corrupted by the Portuguese into Salsette) was conquered by that Nation in the year of Christ 1534, from the Mohammedan Prince who was then its Sovereign; and thereupon parcelled out, among the European subjects of Her Most Faithful Majesty, into village allotments, at a very small Foro or quitrent.' — Bombay, Regn. I. of 1808, sec. ii.

1510. — 'And he next day, by order of the Governor, with his own people and many more from the Island (Goa) passed over to the mainland of Salsete and Antruz, scouring the districts and the tanadars, and placing in them by his own hand and tanadars and collectors of revenue, and put all in such order that he collected much money, insomuch that he sent to the factor at Goa very good intelligence, accompanied by much money." — Correa, ii. 161.

1546. — 'We agree in the manner following, to wit, that I Idalxaa (Idalcan) promise and swear on our Koran (no mun mumpaf) and by the head of my eldest son, that I will remain always firm in the said amity with the King of Portugal and with his governors of India, and that the lands of Salsete and Barreos, which I have made contract and dotation of to His Highness,
I confirm and give anew, and I swear and promise by the oath aforesaid never to reclaim them or make them the Subject of War."—Treaty between D. John de Castro and Idolauvan, who was formerly called Idolpau (Adil Khat),—Botelho, Tombo, 46.

1598.—"On the South side of the Island of Goa, when the river runneth againe into the Sea, there cometh even out with the coast a land called Salsette, which is also ynder the subjection of the Portuguages, and is...planted both with people and fruite."—Linschoten, 51; [Hak. Soc. i. 177].

1602.—"Before we treat of the Wars which in this year (c. 1546) Idolau (Adil Shah) waged with the State about the mainland provinces of Salsete and Bardés, which caused much trouble to the Government of India, it seems well to us to give an account of these Moor Kings of Visiapor."—Couto, IV. x. 4.

SALWEN, n.p. The great river entering the sea near Martaban in British Burma, and which the Chinese in its upper course call Lu-kiang. The Burmese form is Than-ibon, but the original form is probably Shan. ["The Salwen River, which empties itself into the sea at Maulmain, rivals the Irrawaddy in length but not in importance." (Forbes, British Burma, 8).]

SAMBOOK, s. Ar. sanbuk, and sunbik (there is a Skt. word sambikha, "a bivalve shell, but we are unable to throw any light on any possible transfer); a kind of small vessel formerly used in Western India and still on the Arabian coast. [See Bombay Gazetteer, xiii. Pt. ii. 470.] It is smaller than the bagalâ (see BUGGALOW), and is chiefly used to communicate between a roadstead and the shore, or to go inside the reefs. Burton renders the word 'a foyst,' which is properly a smaller kind of galley. See description in the last but one quotation below.

c. 590.—"It is the custom when a vessel arrives (at Madakshaw) that the Sultan's sunbik boards her to ask whence the ship comes, who is the owner, and the skipper (or pilot), what she is laden with, and what merchants or other passengers are on board."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 183; also see pp. 17, 181, 469.

1498.—"The Zambuco came loaded with dongs' dung, which they have in those islands, and which they were carrying, it being merchandize for Cambay, where it is used in dyeing cloths."—Correa, Lendas, i. 33-34.

In the curious Vocabulary of the language of Calicut, at the end of the Roteiro of Vasco da Gama, we find: "Barcas; Cambuco."

[1502.—"Zambucos." See under NA-CODA.]

1506.—"Questo Capitano si presa uno sambuco molto ricco, veniva dalla Mecha per Colocut."—Leonardo Ca' Masser, 17.

1510.—"As to the names of their ships, some are called Sambuchi, and these are flat-bottomed."—Varthema, 154.

1516.—"Item—our Captain Major, or Captain of Cochim shall give passes to secure the navigation of the ships and zambuquos of their ports... provided they do not carry spices or drugs that we require for our cargoes, but if such be found, for the first occasion they shall lose all the spice and drugs so loaded, and on the second they shall lose both ship and cargo, and all may be taken as prize of war."—Treaty of Lopo Soares with Coulaio (Quilon), in Botelho, Tombo, Subsidios, p. 32.

1516.—"Zambucos." See under ARECA.

1518.—"Zambuco." See under PROW.

1543.—"Item— that the Zambuquos which shall trade in his port in rice or nere (paddy) and cottons and other matters shall pay the customary dues."—Treaty of Martin Afonso de Sousa with Coulaém, in Botelho, Tombo, 37.

[1814.—"Sambouk," See under DHOW.

1855.—"Our pilgrim ship... was a Sambuk of about 400 arâbês (50 tons), with narrow wedge-like bows, a clean water-line, a sharp keel, undecked except upon the poop, which was high enough to act as a sail in a gale of wind. We carried 2 masts, imminently raking forward, the main considerably longer than the mizen, and the former was provided with a large triangular latine..."—Burton, Pilgrimage to El Malinah and Mecca, i. 276; [Memorial ed. i. 188].

1858.—"The vessels of the Arabs called Sembuk are small Baggelows of 50 to 100 tons burden. Whilst they run out forward into a sharp prow, the after part of the vessel is disproportionately broad and elevated above the water, in order to form a counterpoise to the colossal triangular sail which is hoisted to the masthead with such a spread that often the extent of the yard is greater than the whole length of the vessel."—F. von Neiman, in Zeitschr. der Deutsch. Morgenl. Gesellsch. xii. 420.

1880.—"The small sailing boat with one sail, which is called by the Arabs 'Jambook' with which I went from Hodeida to Aden."—Letter in Athenaum, March 13, p. 348.

[1900.—"We scrambled into a sambouka crammed and stuffed with the baggage."—Bent, Southern Arabia, 220.]

SAMBRE, SAMBUR, s. Hind. sâbâr, sambâr; Skt. sambhara. A kind of stag (Rusa Aristotelis, Jordon; [Blanford, Mammalia, 543 seqq.]) the elk of S. Indian sportsmen; ghaus of Bengal; jarrow (jărō) of the Himalaya; the largest of Indian stags, and found in all the large forests of India. The word is often applied to the soft leather, somewhat resembling chamois leather, prepared from the hide.

1673. — "... Our usual diet was of spotted deer, Sabre, wild Hogs and sometimes wild Cows."—Fryer, 175.

[1813.—"Here he saw a number of deer, and four large sabirs or samboos, one considerably bigger than an ox...."—Diary, in Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 400.]

1828.—"The skin of the Sambre, when well prepared, forms an excellent material for the military accoutrements of the soldiers of the native Powers."—Malcolm, Central India, i. 9.

[1900.—"The Sambu stags which Lord Powerscourt turned out in his glens. ..."—Spectator, December 15, p. 883.]

SAMPAI. s. A kind of small boat or skiff. The word appears to be Javanese and Malay. It must have been adopted on the Indian shores, for it was picked up there at an early date by the Portuguese; and it is now current all through the further East. [The French have adopted the Annamite form tambon.] The word is often said to be originally Chinese, 'sampan,' = 'three boards,' and this is possible. It is certainly one of the most ordinary words for a boat in China. Moreover, we learn, on the authority of Mr. E. C. Baber, that there is another kind of boat on the Yangtse which is called wu-pan, 'five boards.' Giles however says: "From the Malay sam-pan=three boards'; but in this there is some confusion. The word has no such meaning in Malay.

1510. — "My companion said, 'What means then might there for going to this island?' They answered: 'That it was necessary to purchase a chiampana,' that is a small vessel, of which many are found there."—Varthema, 242.

1516. — "They (the Moors of Quilacare) perform their voyages in small vessels which they call champana."—Barbosa, 172.

c. 1540. — "In the other, whereof the captain was slain, there was not one escaped, for Quiuy Panvian pursued them in a Champana, which was the Boat of his Junk."—Pinto (Cogan, p. 79), orig. ch. lxxi.

1552.—"... Champanas, which are a kind of small vessels."—Cassanveda, ii. 76; [rather, Bk. ii. ch. xxii. p. 76].

1613. — "And on the beach called the Bazar of the Jaoes... they sell every sort of provision in rice and grain for the Jaos merchants of Java Major, who daily from the dawn are landing provisions from their junks and ships in their boats or Champanas (which are little skiffs). ..."—Godinho de Eredia, 6.

1702.—"Sampans being not to be got we were forced to send for the Sarah and Eaton's Long-boats."—MS. Correspondence in I. Office from China Factory (at Chusan), Jan. 5.

c. 1788.—"Some made their escape in rows, and some in sampans."—Mem. of a Malay Family, 3.

1868. — "The harbour is crowded with men-of-war and trading vessels... from vessels of several hundred tons burden down to little fishing-boats and passenger sampans."—Wallace, Malay Archip., 21.

SAMSHEO. s. A kind of ardent spirit made in China from rice. Mr. Baber doubts this being Chinese; but according to Wells Williams the name is san-shao, 'thrice fired.' [Gwidé, 220]. 'Distilled liquor' is shao-siu, 'fired liquor.' Compare Germ. Brunntwein, and XXX beer. Strabo says: 'Wine the Indians drink not except when sacrificing, and that is made of rice in lieu of barley' (xv. c. i. § 53).

1684.—"... sampoee, or Chinese Beer,"—Valentjin, iv. (China) 129.

SANDAL, SANDLE, SANDERS, SANDAL-WOOD. s. From Low Latin santalam, in Greek σάνταλος, and in later Greek σάνταλον; coming from the Arab. sandal, and that from Skt. chandana. The name properly belongs to the fragrant wood of the Santalum album, L. Three woods bearing the name santahum, white, yellow, and red, were in official use in the Middle Ages. But the name Red Sandalwood, or Red Sanders, has been long applied, both in English and in the Indian vernaculars, to the wood of Pterocarpus santalinus, L., a tree of S. India, the wood of which is inodorous, but which is valued for various purposes in India (pillars, turning, &c.), and is exported as a dye-wood. According to Hanbury and Flickiger this last was the sanders so much used in the cookery of the Middle Ages for colouring sauces, &c. In the opinion of those authorities it is doubtful whether the red sandal of the medieval pharmacologists was a kind of the real odorous sandal-wood, or was the wood of Pteroc. santal. It is possible that sometimes the one and sometimes the other was meant. For on the one hand, sander in modern times, we find Milburn (see below) speaking of the three colours of the real sandal-wood; and on the other hand we find Matthioli in the 16th century speaking of the red sandal as inodorous.

It has been a question how the Pterocarpus santalinus came to be called sandal-wood at all. We may suggest, as a possible origin of this, the fact that its powder "mixed with oil is used for bathing and purifying the skin" (Drury, s.v.), much as the true sandal-wood powder also is used in the East.

1230. — "Encore sachiez que en ceste yse a arbres de sandal vermela nansi grant come sunt les arbres des nostre contré . . . et il en ont boire come nos avus d'autres arbres sauvages." — Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. cxxvii.

c. 1390. — "Take powdered rice and boil it in almond milk . . . and colour it with sanders." — Recipe quoted by Wright, Domestic Manners, &c., 390.

1554. — "Le Sandal donc crois es Indes Orientales et Occidentales: en grandes Forestz, et fort espesses. Il s'en trouve trois especes: mais le plus pasle est le meilleur: le blanc apres: le rouge est mis au dernier ranc, pource qu'il n'a aucune odeur: mais les deux premiers sentent fort bon." — Matthioli (old Fr. version), liv. i. ch. xix.

1663. — "The Sandal grows about Timor, which produces the largest quantity, and it is called chundaza; and by this name it is known in all the regions about Malaca; and the Arabs, being those who carried on the trade of those parts, corrupted the word and called it sandal. Every Moor, whatever his nation, calls it thus . . ." — Garcia, f. 185v. He proceeds to speak of the sandalo vermello as quite a different product, growing in Tenasserim and on the Coromandel Coast.

1615. — " . . . certain renegade Christians of the said island, along with the Moors, called in the Hollander, who thinking it was a fine opportunity, went one time with five vessels, and another time with seven, against the said fort, at a time when most of the people . . . were gone to Solor for the Sandal trade, by which they had their living." — Bocarro, Decada, 723.

1615. — "Committee to procure the commodities recommended by Capt. Saris for Japan, viz. . . . pictures of wars, steel, skins, sanders-wood." — Sainsbury, i. 380.

1818. — "When the trees are felled, the bark is taken off; they are then cut into billets, and buried in a dry place for two months, during which period the white ants will eat the outer wood without touching the sandal; it is then taken up and . . . sorted into three kinds. The deeper the colour, the higher is the perfume; and hence the merchants sometimes divide sandal into red, yellow, and white; but these are all different shades of the same colour." — Milburn, i. 291.

1825. — "Redwood, properly Red Sanders, is produced chiefly on the Coromandel Coast, whence it has of late years been imported in considerable quantity to England, where it is employed in dyeing. It . . . comes in round billets of a thickish red colour on the outside, a deep brighter red within, with a wavy grain; no smell or taste." — Ibid. ed. 1825, p. 219.

SANDOWAY, n.p. A town of Arakan, the Burmese name of which is Thandwe (Sand-wé), for which an etymology ("iron-tied"), and a corresponding legend are invented, as usual [see Burmish Gazetteer, ii. 606]. It is quite possible that the name is ancient, and represented by the Sada of Ptolemy.

1555. — "In crossing the gulf of Bengal there arose a storm which dispersed them in such a manner that Martin Affonso found himself alone, with his ship, at the island called Negamale, opposite the town of Sdeo, which is on the mainland, and there was wrecked upon a reef . . ." — Barros, IV, ii. 1.

In i. ix. 1, it is called Sedoe.

1690. — "Other places along this Coast subjected to this King (of Arracan) are Coromoria, Sedoe, Zares, and With Magouni." — Appendix to Craven, p. 583.
SANGUICEL, s. This is a term (pl. sanguicels) often used by the Portuguese writers on India for a kind of boat, or small vessel, used in war. We are not able to trace any origin in a vernacular word. It is perhaps taken from the similar proper name which is the subject of the next article. [This supposition is rendered practically certain from the quotation from Albuquerque below, furnished by Mr. Whiteway. ] Bluteau gives "Sangiciel; termo da India. He hum genero de embarcação pequena q serve na costa da India para dar alçanze aos parôs dos Mouros," 'to give chase to the prows of the Moors.'

[1512.—"Here was Nuno Vaz in a ship, the St. John, which was built in Çamguicar."—Albuquerque, Cartas, p. 99. In a letter of Nov. 30, 1513, he varies the spelling to Cangicar. There are many other passages in the same writer which make it practically certain that Sanguicels were the vessels built at Sanguicar.]

1598.—"The Conde (Francisco da Gama) was occupied all the winter (q.v.) in reforming the fleets . . . and as the time came on he nominated his brother D. Luiz da Gama to be Captain-Major of the Indian Seas for the expedition to Malabar, and wrote to Baçaim to equip six very light Sanguicels according to instructions which should be given by Sebastian Botelho, a man of great experience in that craft. . . . These orders were given by the Count Admiral because he perceived that big fleets were not of use to guard convoys, and that it was light vessels like these alone which could catch the paranos and vessels of the pirates . . . for these escaped our fleets, and got hold of the merchant vessels at their pleasure, darting in and out, like light horse, where they would. . . ."—Couto, Dec. XII. liv. i. ch. 18.

1605.—"And seeing that I am informed that . . . the incursions of certain pirates who still infest that coast might be prevented with less apparatus and expense, if we had light vessels which would be more effective than the foists and galleys of which the fleets have hitherto been composed, seeing how the enemy use their sanguicels, which our ships and galleys cannot overtake, I enjoin and order you to build a quantity of light vessels to be employed in guarding the coast in place of the fleet of galleys and foists. . . ."—King's Letter to Dom Afonso de Castro, in Livros das Mongôes, i. 26.

1614.—"The eight Malabarques Sanguicels, that Francis de Miranda despatched to the north from the bar of Goa went with three chief captains, each of them to command a week in turn. . . ."—Bocarro, Decada, 262.

SANGUICER, SANGUECA, ZINGUIZAR, &c., n.p. This is a place often mentioned in the Portuguese narratives, as very hostile to the Goa Government, and latterly as a great nest of corsairs. This appears to be Sangameshvar, lat. 17° 9', formerly a port of Canara on the River Shästri, and standing 20 miles from the mouth of that river. The latter was navigable for large vessels up to Sangameshvar, but within the last 50 years has become impassable. [The name is derived from Skt. sangama-tśvara, 'Siva, Lord of the river confluence.']

1516.—"Passing this river of Dabul and going along the coast towards Goa you find a river called Cinguicar, inside of which there is a place where there is a traffic in many wares, and where carry many vessels and small Zambuces (Sambook) of Malabar to sell what they bring, and buy the products of the country. The place is peopled by Moors, and Gentiles of the aforesaid Kingdom of Daquem" (Deccan).—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. p. 286.

1538.—"Thirty-five leagues from Guoa, in the middle of the coast of the Malabars there runs a large river called Zangizara. This river is well known and of great renown. The bar is bad and very tortuous, but after you get within, it makes amends for the difficulties without. It runs inland for a great distance with great depth and breadth."—De Castro, Primeiro Roteiro, 36.

1553.—De Barros calls it Zingacar in II. i. 4, and Sangaca in IV. i. 14.

1584.—"There is a Haven belonging to those ryvers (rovers), distant from Goa about 12 miles, and is called Sanguiseo, where many of those Rovers dwell, and doe so much mischief that no man can passe by, but they receive some wrong by them. . . . Which the Viceroy understanding, prepared an armie of 15 Foists, over which he made chief Captain a Gentleman, his Nephew called Don Italanes Mascarenhas, giving him express commandement first to goe unto the Haven of Sanguiseu, and utterly to raze the same downe to the ground."—Linschoten, ch. 92; [Hak. Soc. ii. 170].

1602.—"Both these projects he now began to put in execution, sending all his treasures (which they said exceeded ten millions in gold) to the river of Sanguicier, which was also within his jurisdiction, being a seaport, and there embarking it at his pleasure."—Couto, ix. 8. See also Dec. X. iv.:

"How D. Gileanes Mascarenhas arrived in Malabar, and how he entered the river of Sanguicier to chastise the Navique of that place; and of the disaster in which he met his death." (This is the event of 1584 related by Linschoten); also Dec. X. vi. 4: "Of the things that happened to D. Jeronymo Mascarenhas in Malabar, and how he had a SANSKRIT, s. The name of the classical language of the Brahmans, Sanskritam, meaning in that language 'purified' or 'perfected.' This was obviously at first only an epithet, and it is not of very ancient use in this specific application. To the Brahmans Sanskrit was the bhāsha, or language, and had no particular name. The word Sanskrit is used by the protogrammarian Pāṇini (some centuries before Christ), but not as a denomination of the language. In the latter sense, however, both 'Sanskrit,' and 'Prakrit' (Pracrit) are used in the Bryāt Sanskhitā of Varāhamihira, c. a.d. 504, in a chapter on omens (lxxxvi. 3), to which Prof. Kern's translation does not extend. It occurs also in the Mṛchādhakatikā, translated by Prof. H. H. Wilson in his Hindu Theatre, under the name of the 'Toy-cart'; in the works of Kumārila Bhatta, a writer of the 7th century; and in the Pāmināya Sīkṣā, a metrical treatise ascribed by the Hindus to Pāṇini, but really of comparatively modern origin.

There is a curiously early mention of Sanskrit by the Mahommedan poet Amīr Khūsrū of Delhi, which is quoted below. The first mention (to our knowledge) of the word in any European writing is in an Italian letter of Sassetti's, addressed from Malabar to Bernardo Davenzati in Florence, and dating from 1586. The few words on the subject, of this writer, show much acumen.

In the 17th and 18th centuries such references to this language as occur are found chiefly in the works of travellers to Southern India, and by these it is often called Grandonic, or the like, from grantha, 'a book' (see GRUTH, GRUTHUM) i.e. a book of the classical Indian literature. The term Sanskrit came into familiar use after the investigations into this language by the English in Bengal (viz. by Wilkins, Jones, &c.) in the last quarter of the 18th century. [See Macdonell, Hist. of Sanskrit Lit. ch. i.]

A.D. 21—"Maîtreya. Now, to me, there are two things at which I cannot choose but laugh, a woman reading Sanskrit, and a man singing a song: the woman snuffles like a young cow when the rope is first passed through her nostrils; and the man wheezes like an old Pandit repeating his bead-roll."—The Toy-Cart, E.T. in Wilson's Works, xi. 60.

A.D. 91—"Three-and-sixty or four-and-sixty sounds are there originally in Prakrit (Pracrit) even as in Sanskrit, as taught by the Svyambhū."—Pāmināya Sīkṣā, quoted in Weber's Ind. Studien (1858), iv. 348. But see also Weber's Akadem. Vortesungen (1876), p. 194.

1318.—"But there is another language, more select than the other, which all the Brahmans use. Its name from of old is Sahasrit, and the common people know nothing of it."—Amīr Khūsrū, in Elliot, iii. 563.

1586.—"Sono scritte lo loro scienze tutte in una lingua che dimandano Samscrita, che vuol dire ' bene articolata': della quale non si ha memoria quando fusse parlata, con avere (com' io dico) memorie antichissime. Imparanla come noi la greca e la latina, e vi pongono molto maggior tempo, se che in 6 anni o 7 sene fanno padroni: et ha la lingua d'oggi molte cose comuni con quella, nella quale sono molti de' nostri nomi, e particolarmente de numeri il 6, 7, 8, et 9. Nio, serpe, et altri assai."—Sassetti, extracted in De Gubernatis, Storia, &c., Livorno, 1875, p. 221.

c. 1590.—"Although this country (Kashmir) has a peculiar tongue, the books of knowledge are Sanskrit (or Sahanskrit). They also have a written character of their own, with which they write their books. The substance which they chiefly write upon is Tosa, which is the bark of a tree, which with a little pains they make into leaves, and it lasts for years. In this way ancient books have been written thereon, and the ink is such that it cannot be washed out."—Aın (orig.), i. p. 563; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 351].

1623.—"The Jesuits conceive that the Brameans are of the dispersion of the Israelites, and their Books (called Samscretan) doe somewhat agree with the Scriptures, but that they understand them not."—Pachet, Pilgrimage, 557.

1651.—"... Sonni signifies the Sun in Samsorntam, which is a language in which all the mysteries of Heathendom are written, and which is held in esteem by the Brameis just as Latin is among the Learned in Europe."—Rogerius, 4. 4.

In some of the following quotations we have a form which it is difficult to account for:

different from the common Indian, and which is only known by the Pundits. This is that Tongue, of which Father Kircher hath published the Alphabet received from Father Ros. It is called Hanscrit, that is, a pure Language; and because they believe the Tongue in which God, by means of Brahama, gave them the four Beths (see VEDA), which they esteem Sacred Books, they call it a Holy and Divine Language."—Bernier, E.T. 107; [ed. SAPECA, SAPÈQUE, s. This word is used in Macao for what we call cash (q.v.) in Chinese currency; and it is the word generally used by French writers for that coin. Giles says: "From sapek, a coin found in Tonquin and Cochinchina, and equal to about half a pfennig (½ Thaler), or about one-sixth of a German Kreutzer" (Gloss. of Reference, 122). We cannot learn much about this coin of Tonquin. Milburn says, under 'Cochin China': "The only currency of the country is a sort of cash, called sappica, composed chiefly of tutenague (see TOOTNAGUE), 600 making a quan: this is divided into 10 mace of 60 cash each, the whole strung together, and divided by a knot at each mace" (ed. 1825, pp. 444-445). There is nothing here inconsistent with our proposed derivation, given later on. Mace and Sappica are equally Malay words. We can hardly doubt that the true origin of the term is that communicated by our friend Mr. E. C. Baber: "Very probably from Malay stu, 'one,' and pak, 'a string or file of the small coin called pichis.' Pichis is explained by Crawford as 'Small coin... money of copper, brass, or tin.... It was the ancient coin of Java, and also the only one of the Malays when first seen by the Portugese.' Paku, is written by Favre pekù (Diet. Malais-François) and is derived by him from Chinese pé-ko, 'cent.' In the dialect of Canton puk is the word for 'a hundred,' and one puk is the colloquial term for a string of one hundred cash." Sapeku would then be properly a string of 100 cash, but it is not difficult to conceive that it might through some misunderstanding (e.g. a confusion of peku and pichis) have been transferred to the single coin. There is a passage in Mr. Gerson da Cunha's Contributions to the Study of Portuguese Numismatics, which may seem at first sight inconsistent with this derivation. For he seems to imply that the smallest denomination of coin struck by Albuquerque at Goa in 1510 was called cepayqua, i.e. in the year before the capture of Malacca, and consequent familiarity with Malay terms. I do not trace his authority for this; the word is not mentioned in the Commentaries of Albuquerque, and it is quite possible that the dínheiros, as these small copper coins were also called, only received the name cepayqua at a later date, and some time after the occupation of Malacca (see Da Cunha, pp. 11-12, and 22). [But also see the quotation of 1510 from Correa under PARDO.] This word has been discussed by Col. Temple (Ind. Antiq., August 1897, pp. 222 seq.), who gives quotations establishing the derivation from the Malay sapaku.

[1639.—“It (caxa, cash) hath a four-square hole through it, at which they string them on a Straw; a String of two hundred Caxas, called Sata, is worth about three farthings sterling, and five Satas tied together make a Sapoon. The Javians, when this money first came amongst them, were so cheated with the Novelty, that they would give six bags of Pepper for ten Sapoons, thirteen whereof amount to but a Crown.”—Munster, Voyages, E.T. p. 117.

[1703.—“This is the reason why the Caxas are valued so little: they are punched in the middle, and string’d with little twists of Straw, two hundred in one Twist, which is called Sata, and is worth nine Deniers. Five Santas tied together make a thousand Caxas, or a Sapoon (? Sapocoon).”—Collection of Dutch Voyages, 199.

[1830.—“The money current in Bali consists solely of Chinese pieces with a hole in the centre. ... They however put them up in hundreds and thousands; two hundred are called satah, and are equal to one rupee copper, and a thousand called Sapaku, are valued at five rupees.”—Singapore Chronicle, June 1830, in Moor, Indian Archip. p. 94.

[1892.—“This is a brief history of the Sapeck (more commonly known to us as the cash), the native coin of China, and which is found everywhere from Malaya to Japan.”—Ridgeway, Origin of Currency, 157.]

SAPPAN-WOOD. s. The wood of Canna simplex sappon, the bakkam of the Arabs, and the Brazil-wood of medieval commerce. Bishop Caldwell at one time thought the Tamil name, from which this was taken, to have been given because the wood was supposed to come from Japan. Rumphius says that Siam and Champa are the original countries of the Sappan, and quotes from Rheede that in Malabar it was called Tasajampangan, suggestive apparently of a possible derivation from Champa. The mere fact that it does not come from Japan would not disprove this derivation any more than the fact that turkeys and maize did not originally come from Turkey would disprove the fact of the birds and the grain (gran turco) having got names from such a belief. But the tree appears to be indigenous in Malabar, the Deccan, and the Malay Peninsula; whilst the Malayal. shappaniam, and the Tamil shappu, both signifying ‘red (wood),’ are apparently derivatives from shava, ‘to be red,’ and suggest another origin as most probable. [The Mad. Gloss. gives Mal. chappannam, from chappu, ‘leaf,’ Skt. anga, ‘body;’ Tam. shappangam.] The Malay word is also sapang, which Crawford supposes to have originated the trade-name. If, however, the etymology just suggested be correct, the word must have passed from Continental India to the Archipelago. For curious particulars as to the names of this dye-wood, and its vicissitudes, see BRAZIL; and Burnell’s note on Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 121.

SARNAU, SORNAU.

1860.—"The other productions which constituted the exports of the island were Sapan wood to Persia..."—Tennent, Ceylon, ii. 54.

SARBATANE, SARBACANE, s. This is not Anglo-Indian, but it often occurs in French works on the East, as applied to the blowing-tubes used by various tribes of the Indian Islands for discharging small arrows, often poisoned. The same instrument is used among the tribes of northern South America, and in some parts of Madagascar. The word comes through the Span. cebratana, cerbata, zarbatana, also Port. sarrabatana, &c., Ital. cerbotana, Mod. Greek σαρβατάνα, from the Ar. zabatāna, 'a tube for blowing pellets' (a pea-shooter in fact!). Dozy says that the r must have been sounded in the Arabic of the Spanish Moors, as Pedro de Alcala translates cebratana by Ar. zarbatāna. The resemblance of this to the Malay sumpitan (q.v.) is curious, though it is not easy to suggest a transition, if the Arabic word is, as it appears, old enough to have been introduced into Spanish. There is apparently, however, no doubt that in Arabic it is a borrowed word. The Malay word seems to be formed directly from sumpit, 'to discharge from the mouth by a forcible expiration' (Crawford, Mal. Dict.).

SARBOJI, s. This is the name of some weapon used in the extreme south of India; but we have not been able to ascertain its character or etymology. We conjecture, however, that it may be the long lance or pike, 18 or 20 feet long, which was the characteristic and formidable weapon of the Marava Culleries (q.v.). See Bp. Caldwell's H. of Tinnevelly, p. 103 and passim; [Stuart, Mon. of Tinnevelly, 50. This explanation is probably incorrect. Welsh (Military Rem. i. 104) defines sarabogies as "a species of park guns, for firing salutes at feasts, &c.; but not used in war." It has been suggested that the word is simply Hind. sirbojha, 'a head-load,' and Dr. Grierson writes: "Laden with a head' may refer to a head carried home on a spear." Dr. Pope writes: "Sarboji is not found in any Dravidian dialect, as far as I know. It is a synonym for Sivaji. Sarro (sarbo)-ji is honorific. In the Tanjore Inscription it is Serfogi. In mythology Siva's name is 'arrow,' 'spear,' and 'head-burthen,' of course by metonymy." Mr. Brandt suggests Tam. sērū, "war," būya, "a tube," No weapon of the name appears in Mr. Egerton's Hand-book of Indian Arms."

1801.—"The Rt. Hon. the Governor in Council... orders and directs all persons, whether Polygars (see BOLIGAR), Colleries, or other inhabitants possessed of arms in the Provinces of Dingigul, Tinnevelly, Ramnadpuram, Sivagangai, and Madura, to deliver the said arms, consisting of Muskets, Matchlocks, Pikes, Gingauls (see GINGALL), and Sarabogoi to Lieut.-Col. SARNAU, SORNAU, n.p. A name often given to Siam in the early part of the 16th century; from Shahri-mna, Pers. 'New-city'; the name by which Yuthia or Ayodhya (see JUDEA), the capital founded on the Menam about 1350, seems to have become known to the traders of the Persian Gulf. Mr. Braddell (J. Ind. Arch. v. 317) has suggested that the name (Sheher-al-nawvi, as he calls it) refers to the distinction spoken of by La Loubère between the Thai-Yai, an older people of the race, and the Thai-Noi, the people known to us as Siamese. But this is less probable,
We have still a city of Siam called Lopahurz, anciently a capital, and the name of which appears to be a Sanskrit or Pali form, Nava-pura, meaning the same as Shahr-i-nao; and this indeed may have first given rise to the latter name. The Cernove of Nicolo Conti (c. 1430) is generally supposed to refer to a city of Bengal, and one of the present writers has identified it with Lakhnauti or Gaur, an official name of which in the 14th cent. was Shahr-i-nao. But it is just possible that Siam was the country spoken of.

1442.—"The inhabitants of the sea-coasts arrive here (atOrmuz) from the counties of Chín, Java, Bengal, the cities of Zirbád, Tenasii, Sokotora, Shahr-i-nao. . . ."—Abdurrazzak, in Not. et Cods., xiv. 429.

1498.—"Xarnauz is of Christians, and the King is Christian; it is 50 days voyage with a fair wind from Calicut. The King . . . has 400 elephants of war; in the land is much benzoin . . . and there is aloes-wood . . ."—Varthema, ii. 110.

1510.—". . . They said they were from a city called Sarnau, and had brought for sale silkens stuffs, and aloeswood, and benzoin, and musk."—Varthema, i. 212.

1514.—". . . Tannazzari, Sarnau, where is produced all the finest white benzoin, storax, and lac finer than that of Martaman. . . .”—Letter of Gio. d'Empoli, in Arch. Storico Italiano, App. 80.

1540.—". . . all along the coast of Malaya, and within the Land, a great King commands, who for a more famous and recommendable Title above all other Kings, causeth himself to be called Prechou Salle, Emperor of all Sornau, which is a Country wherein there are thirteen kingdoms, by us commonly called Siam" (Siião).—Pinho (orig. cap. xxxvi.), in Cogan, p. 45.

c. 1612.—"It is related of Siam, formerly called Sheher-al-Nawi, to which Country all lands under the wind here were tributary, that there was a King called Babanna, who when he heard of the greatness of Malacca sent to demand submission and homage of that kingdom."—Sirja Malayo, in J. Ind. Arch. v. 454.

1726.—"About 1340 reigned in the kingdom of Siam (then called Sjaharnow or Sornau), a very powerful Prince."—Valentijn, v. 319.

SARONG, s. Malay, sārung; the body-cloth, or long kilt, tucked or girt at the waist, and generally of coloured silk or cotton, which forms the chief article of dress of the Malays and Javanese. The same article of dress, and the name (saran) are used in Ceylon. It is an old Indian form of dress, but is now used only by some of the people of the south; e.g. on the coast of Malabar, where it is worn by the Hindus (white), by the Mappilas (Moplah) of that coast, and the Labbais (Lubbye) of Coromandel (coloured), and by the Bunts of Canara, who wear it of a dark blue. With the Labbais the coloured sarong is a modern adoption from the Malays. Crawford seems to explain sarung as Javanese, meaning first 'a case or sheath,' and then a wrapper or garment. But, both in the Malay islands and in Ceylon, the word is no doubt taken from Skt. सारण, meaning 'variegated' and also 'a garment.'

[1830.—". . . the cloth or sarong, which has been described by Mr. Marsden to be not unlike a Scots highlander's plaid in appearance, being a piece of party-coloured cloth, about 6 or 8 feet long, and 3 or 4 feet wide, sewed together at the ends, forming, as some writers have described it, a wide sack without a bottom. 'With the Maldives, the sarong is either worn slung over the shoulders as a sash, or tucked round the waist and descending to the ankles, so as to enclose the legs like a petticoat.'—Raffles, Java, i. 96.]

1858.—"He wore a sarong or Malay petticoat, and a green jacket."—Wallace, Mal. Arch. 171.

SATIGAM, n.p. Sâtigânon, formerly and from remote times a port of much trade on the right bank of the Hoogly R., 30 m. above Calcutta, but for two and a half centuries utterly decayed, and now only the site of a few huts, with a ruined mosque as the only relic of former importance. It is situated at the bifurcation of the Saraswati channel from the Hoogly, and the decay dates from the silting up of the former. It was commonly called by the Portuguese Porto Pequeno (q.v.).

c. 1340.—"About this time the rebellion of Fakhhr broke out in Bengal. Fakhñr and his Bengali forces killed Kádar Khán (Governor of Lakhnauti). . . . He then plundered the treasury of Lakhnauti, and secured possession of that place and of Satigânow and Sunârgânow. . . ."—Zia-ul-din Barrí, in Elliot, iii. 243.

1535.—"In this year Diogo Rabello, finishing his term of service as Captain and Factor of the Choromandel fishery, with license from the Governor went to Bengal in a vessel of his . . . and he went well armed along with two foists which equipped with his own money, the Governor only lending him artillery and nothing more. . . . So this SATIN. 797 SATRAP.

Diogo Rabello arrived at the Port of Satîgâon, where he found two great ships of Cambaya which three days before had arrived with great quantity of merchandise, selling and buying: and these, without touching them, he caused to quit the port and go down the river, forbidding them to carry on any trade, and he also sent one of the foists, with 30 men, to the other port of Chatigaon, where they found three ships from the Coast of Choromandel, which were driven away from the port. And Diogo Rabello sent word to the Gozil that he was sent by the Governor with choice of peace or war, and that he should send to ask the King if he chose to liberate the (Portuguese) prisoners, in which case he also would liberate his ports and leave them in their former peace. . . .”—Correa, iii, 619.

[c. 1590.—"In the Sarkâr of Sâtîgâon, there are two ports at a distance of half a kos from each other; the one is Sâtîgâon, the other Hughli: the latter the chief; both are in the possession of the Europeans. Fine pomegranates grow here."—In, ed. Jarrett, ii, 126.]

SATIN, s. This is of course English, not Anglo-Indian. The common derivation [accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. 2nd ed. s.v.) is with Low Lat. seta, 'silk,' Lat. seta, seta, 'a bristle, a hair,' through the Port. setim. Dr. Wells Williams (Mind. King., ii, 123) says it is probably derived eventually from the Chinese sz'tian, though intermediate through other languages. It is true that sz'tian or sz't-iân is a common (and ancient) term for this sort of silk texture. But we may remark that trade-words adopted directly from the Chinese are comparatively rare (though no doubt the intermediate transit indicated would meet this objection, more or less). And we can hardly doubt that the true derivation is that given in Cathay and the Way Thither, p. 486; viz. from Zaitân or Zayton, the name by which Chwan-chau (Chinchew), the great medieval port of western trade in Fokien, was known to western traders. We find that certain rich stuffs of damask and satin were called from this place, by the Arabs, Zêrî-tâmâ; the Span. aceytui (for 'satin'), the medieval French zatony, and the medieval Ital. zetani, afford intermediate steps.

c. 1352.—In an inventory of this year in Douel d'Arey we have: "Zatoni at 4 écus the ell" (p. 342).

1405.—"And besides, this city (Samarkand) is very rich in many wares which come to it from other parts. From Russia and Tartary come hides and linens, and from Cathay silk-stuffs, the best that are made in all that region, especially the setunis, which are said to be the best in the world, and the best of all are those that are without pattern."—Clavijo (translated anew—the passage corresponding to Markham's at p. 171). The word setuni occurs repeatedly in Clavijo's original.

1440.—In the Libro de Gabelli, &c., of Giov. da Uzzano, we have mention among silk stuffs, several times, of 'zetani velutati, and other kinds of zetani.'—Delia Decima, iv, 58, 107, &c.

1441.—"Before the throne (at Bijanagar) was placed a cushion of zaitiîn satin, round which three rows of the most exquisite pearls were sewn."—Abkârâzîk, in Elliot, iv, 120. (The original is 'darpesh-i-tekâh bâlisht az atlas-i-zaitiîn'; see Nat. et Exts. xiv, 376. Quartembre (ibid. 462) translated 'un carréau de satin olivé,' taking zaitiîn in its usual Arabic sense of 'an olive tree.') Also see Elliot, iv, 113.

SATRAP, s. Anc. Pers. kshhatîrâpa, which becomes sâtrak, as kshâyâjithiya becomes slâkh. The word comes to us direct from the Greek writers who speak of Persia. But the title occurs not only in the books of Ezra, Esther, and Daniel, but also in the ancient inscriptions, as used by certain lords in Western India, and more precisely in Surâshtra or Peninsular Guzerat. Thus, in a celebrated inscription regarding a dam, near Gînâr:

c. A.D. 150.—"... he, the Mahâ-Khshâ- trapâ Raipurâman ... for the increase of his merit and fame, has rebuilt the embankment three times stronger."—In Indus Antiquity, vii, 262. The identity of this with sâtrak was pointed out by James Prinsep, 1838 (J. As. Soc. Ben. vii, 245). [There were two Indian satrap dynasties, viz. the Western Satraps of Saurashtra and Gujarat, from about A.D. 150 to A.D. 988; for which see Râpsâm and Indraji, The Western Kshatrâpas (J. R. A. S., x, 1890, p. 639); and the Northern Kshatrâpas of Mathura and the neighbouring territories in the 1st cent. A.D. See articles by Râpsâm and Indraji in J. R. A. S., x, 1894, pp. 525, 541.]

1883.—"An eminent Greek scholar used to warn his pupils to beware of false analogies in philology. 'Because,' he used to say, 'σατράπης is the Greek for satrap, it does not follow that *patpâpîs is the Greek for rat-trap.'"—Sat. Rev. July 14, p. 53.
SATSUMA, n.p. Name of a city and formerly of a principality (daimio-ship) in Japan, the name of which is familiar not only from the deplorable necessity of bombarding its capital Kagosima in 1863 (in consequence of the murder of Mr. Richardson, and other outrages, with the refusal of reparation), but from the peculiar scream-coloured pottery made there and now well known in London shops.

1615.—"I said I had received suffition at his highnes hands in having the good hap to see the face of soe mightie a King as the King of Shaahma; whereat he smiled."— Cook's Diary, 1. 4-5.

1617.—"Speeches are given out that the cubokus or Japon players (or whores) going from Rouen for Boshama to meet the Coreans ambassadors, were set on by the way by a boate of Xahma theeves, and kild all both men and women, for the money they had gotten at Firando."—Ibid. 256.

SAUGOR, SAUGOR ISLAND,
n.p. A famous island at the mouth of the Hoogly R., the site of a great and pilgrimage—properly Gunga Sagara (‘Ocean Ganges’). It is said to have been populous, but in 1688 (the date is clearly wrong) to have been swept by a cyclone-wave.
It is now a dense jungle haunted by tigers.

1683.—"We went in our Budgeros to see ye Pagodas at Safgor, and returned to ye Oyster River, where we got as many Oysters as we desired."—Hedges, March 12; [Hak.
Soc. i. 68].

1684.—"James Price assured me that about 40 years since, when ye Island called Gonga Safur was inhabited, ye Raja of ye Island gathered yearly Rents out of it, to ye amount of 26 Lacks of Rupees."—Ibid.
Dec. 15; [Hak. Soc. i. 172].

1705.—"Sagore is a tree ooh y a una

Faquers qui y font leur residence. Ces Faquers savent charger les betes feroces, qu'on y trouve en quantite, sans quoi ils siroient tous les jours expoes a estre de-vorez."—Lalitier, p. 123.

1727.—"... among the Pagans, the Island Safor is accounted holy, and great numbers of Jongies go yearly thither in the Months of November and December, to worship and wash in Salt-Water, the many

A. Hamilton, ii. 3; [ed. 1744].

SAUL-WOOD, s. Hind. sa1, from
Skt. sāla; the timber of the tree Shorea robusta, Gaertner, N.O. Dipteryscarpae, which is the most valuable building timber of Northern India.
Its chief habitat is the forest immediately under the Himālaya, at intervals throughout that region from the Brahmaputra to the Biās; it abounds also in various more southerly tracts between the Ganges and the Godavery.
[The botanical name is taken from Sir John Shore. For the peculiar habitat of the Sāl as compared with the Teak, see Forsyth, Highlands of C. L. 25 seq.]
It is strong and durable, but very heavy, so that it cannot be floated without more buoyant aids, and is, on that and other accounts, inferior to teak. It does not appear among eight kinds of timber in general use, mentioned in the Aim. The saul has been introduced into China, perhaps at a remote period, on account of its connection with Buddha's history, and it is known there by the Indian name, so-lo (Breutschneider on Chinese Botan.
Works, p. 6).

c. 650.—"L’Honorable du siecle, animé d’une grande pitié, et obéissant à l’ordre des temps, jugea utile de paraître dans le monde. Quand il eut fini de convertir les hommes, il se plongea dans les joies du Nirvâna. Se plaçant entre deux arbres Sâlas, il tourna sa tête vers le nord et s’endormit."—Hiuen Thsang, 1765.—"The produce of the country constitutes the saal timbers (a wood equal in quality to the best of our oak)."—Holwell, Hist. Events, &c., i. 200.

1774.—"This continued five kos; towards the end there are saîl and large forest trees."
—Boyle, in Markham’s Tibet, 19.

1810.—"The saul is a very solid wood
... it is likewise heavy, yet by no means so ponderous as teak; both, like many of our former woods, sink in fresh water."—
Williamson, V.M. ii. 69.

SAYER, SYRE, &c., s. Hind. from Arab. sadir, a word used technically for many years in the Indian accounts to cover a variety of items of taxation and impost, other than the Land Revenue.

The transitions of meaning in Arabic words are (as we have several times had occasion to remark) very obscure; and until we undertook the investigation of the subject for this article (a task in which we are indebted to the kind help of Sir H. Waterfield, of the India Office, one of the busiest men in the public service, but, as so often happens, one of the readiest to render assistance) the obscurity attaching to the word sayer in this sense was especially great.

Wilson, s.v. says: "In its original purport the word signifies moving, walking, or the whole, the remainder; from the latter it came to denote the remaining, or all other, sources of revenue accruing to the Government in addition to the land-tax." In fact, according to this explanation, the application of the term might be illustrated by the ancient story of a German Professor lecturing on botany in the pre-scientific period. He is reported to have said: 'Every plant, gentlemen, is divided into two parts. This is the root,—and this is the rest of it!' Land revenue was the root, and all else was 'the rest of it.'

Sir C. Trevelyan again, in a passage quoted below, says that the Arabic word has "the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.'" Neither of these explanations, we conceive, pæce tantorum virorum, is correct.

The term Sayer in the 18th century was applied to a variety of inland imposts, but especially to local and arbitrary charges levied by zamindars and other individuals, with a show of authority, on all goods passing through their estates by land or water, or sold at markets (bazar, haut, guinge) established by them, charges which formed in the aggregate an enormous burden upon the trade of the country.

Now the fact is that in sā'ir two old Semitic forms have coalesced in sound though coming from different roots, viz. (in Arabic) sair, producing sā'ir, 'walking, current,' and sa'r, producing sā'ir, 'remainder,' the latter being a form of the same word that we have in the Biblical Shear-jashub, 'the remnant shall remain' (Isaiah, vii. 3). And we conceive that the true sense of the Indian term was 'current or customary charges'; an idea that lies at the root of sundry terms of the same kind in various languages, including our own Customs, as well as the dustyory which is so familiar in India. This interpretation is aptly illustrated by the quotation below from Mr. Stuart's Minute of Feb. 10, 1790.

At a later period it seems probable that some confusion arose with the other sense of sā'ir, leading to its use, more or less, for 'et ceteras,' and accounting for what we have indicated above as erroneous explanations of the word.

I find, however, that the Index and Glossary to the Regulations, ed. 1832 (vol. iii.), defines: "Sayer. What moves. Variable imports, distinct from land-rent or revenue, consisting of customs, tolls, licenses, duties on merchandise, and other articles of personal moveable property; as well as mixed duties, and taxes on houses, shops, bazars, &c." This of course throws some doubt on the rationale of the Arabic name as suggested above.

In a despatch of April 10, 1771, to Bengal, the Court of Directors drew attention to the private Bazar charges, as "a great detriment to the public collections, and a burthen and oppression to the inhabitants"; enjoining that no Buzars or Gunges should be kept up but such as particularly belonged to the Government. And in such the duties were to be rated in such manner as the respective positions and prosperity of the different districts would admit.

In consequence of these instructions it was ordered in 1773 that "all duties coming under the description of sayer Chelluntah (H. chalantà, 'in transit'), and Ruk-darry (radaree) . . . and other oppressive impositions on the foreign as well as the internal trade of the country" should be abolished; and, to prevent all pretext of injustice, proportional deductions of rent were conceded to the zamindars in the annual collections. Nevertheless the exactions went on much as before, in defiance of this and repeated orders.

And in 1786 the Board of Revenue issued a proclamation declaring that any person levying such duties should be subject to corporal punishment, and that the zamindar in whose zamindary such an offence might be committed, should forfeit his lands.

Still the evil practices went on till 1790, when Lord Cornwallis took up the matter with intelligence and determination. In the preceding year he had abolished all radaree duties in Behar and Benares, but the abuses in Bengal Proper seem to have been more swarming and persistent. On June 11, 1790, orders were issued resuming the collection of all duties indicated into the hands of Government; but this was followed after a few weeks (July 28) by an order abolishing them altogether, with some exceptions, which will be presently alluded to. This double step is explained by the Governor-General in a Minute dated July 18: "When I first proposed the resumption of the Sayer from the Landholders, it appeared to me advisable to continue the former collection (the unauthorised articles excepted) for the current year, in order that by the necessary accounts [we might have the means] for making a fair adjustment of the compensation, and at the same time acquire sufficient knowledge of the collections to enable us to enter upon the regulation of them from the commencement of the ensuing year. . . . The collections appear to be so numerous, and of so intricate a nature, as to preclude the possibility of regulating them all; and as the establishment of new rates for such articles as it might be thought advisable to continue would require much consideration, . . . I recommend that, instead of continuing the collection . . . for the current year . . . all the existing articles of Sayer collection (with the exception of the Abkarry (Abcarree) . . .) be immediately abolished; and that the Collectors be directed to withdraw their officers from the Gungees, Bazars and Hauts," compensation being duly made. The Board of Revenue could then consider on what few articles of luxury in general consumption it might be proper to reimpose a tax.

The Order of July 28 abolished "all duties, taxes, and collections coming under the denomination of Sayer (with the exception of the Government and Calcutta Customs, the duties levied on pilgrims by Gya, and other places of pilgrimage,—the Abkarry . . . which is to be collected on account of the Government . . . the collections made in the Gungees, Bazars and Hauts situated within the limits of Calcutta, and such collections as are confirmed to the landholders and the holders of Gungees &c. by the published Resolutions of June 11, 1790, namely, rent paid for the use of land (and the like) . . . or for orchards, pasture-ground, or fisheries sometimes included in the sayer under the denomination of phalkur (Hind. phalākur, from phal, 'fruit'), bunkur (from Hind. ban, 'forest or pasture-ground'), and jalkur (Hind. jalkar, from jal, 'water'). . . ." These Resolutions are printed with Regn. XXVII. of 1793.

By an order of the Board of Revenue of April 28, 1790, correspondence regarding Sayer was separated from 'Land Revenue'; and on the 16th idem the Abkarry was separately regulated.

The amount in the Accounts credited as Land Revenue in Bengal seems to have included both Sayer and Abkarry down to the Accts. presented to Parliament in 1796. In the "Abstract Statement of Receipts and Disbursements of the Bengal Government" for 1793-94, the "Collections under head of Syer and Abkarry" amount to Rs. 10,98,256. In the Accounts, printed in 1799, for 1794-5 to 1796-7, the "Land and Sayer Revenues" are given, but Abkāri is not mentioned. Among the Receipts and Disbursements for 1800-1 appears "Syer Collections, including Abkaree, 7,81,925."

These forms appear to have remained in force down to 1833. In the accounts presented in 1834, from 1828-9, to 1831-2, with Estimate for 1832-3, Land Revenue is given separately, and next to it Syer and Abkaree Revenue. Except that the spelling was altered back to Sayer and Abkarry, this remained till 1856. In 1857 the accounts for 1854-5 showed in separate lines,—

Land Revenue,
Excise Duties, in Calcutta, Sayer Revenue,
Abkarry ditto.

In the accounts for 1861-2 it became—

Land Revenue,
Sayer and Miscellaneous,
Abkaree,

and in those for 1863-4 Sayer vanished altogether.

The term Sayer has been in use in Madras and Bombay as well as in Bengal. From the former we give an example under 1802; from the latter we have not met with a suitable quotation.

The following entries in the Bengal accounts for 1858-59 will exemplify the application of Sayer in the more recent times of its maintenance:

1790.—"Without entering into a discussion of privileges founded on Custom, and of which it is easier to ascertain the abuse than the origin, I shall briefly remark on the Collections of Sayer, that while they remain in the hands of the Zamindars, every effort to free the internal Commerce from the baneful effects of their vexatious impositions must necessarily prove abortive."—Minute by the Hon. C. Stuart, dd. Feb. 10, quoted by Lord Cornwallis in his Minute of July 18.

", "The Board last year very humanely and politically recommended unanimously the abolition of the Sayer.
"The statement of Mr. Mercer from Burdwan makes all the Sayer (consisting of a strange medley of articles taxable, not omitting even Hermaphrodites) amount only to 58,000 Rupees ..."—Minute by Mr. Law of the Bd. of Revenue, forwarded by the Board, July 12.

1792.—"The Jumma on which a settlement for 10 years has been made is about 3 Rs. 1817.—"Besides the land-revenue, some other duties were levied in India, which were generally included under the denomination of Sayer."—Milt, H. of Br. India, v. 417.

1863.—"The next head was 'Sayer,' an obsolete Arabic word, which has the same meaning as 'miscellaneous.' It has latterly been composed of a variety of items connected with the Land Revenue, of which the Revenue derived from Forests has been the most important. The progress of improvement has given a value to the Forests which they never had before, and it has been determined ... to constitute the Revenue derived from them a separate head of the Public Accounts. The other Miscellaneous Items of Land Revenue which appeared under 'Sayer,' have therefore been added to Land Revenue, and what remains has been denominated 'Forest Revenue.'"—Sir C. Trevelyan, Financial Statement, dd. April 30.

SCAVENGER, s. We have been rather startled to find among the MS. records of the India Office, in certain "Lists of Persons in the Service of the Right. Honble. the East India Company, in Fort St. George, and the other Places on the Coast of Choromandell," beginning with Feby. 1704, and in the entries for that year, the following:

"1. Fort St. David.
"2. 5. Trevor Gaines, Land Customer and Scavenger of Cuddalore, 5th Council. . . .

Under 1714 we find again, at Fort St. George:

"Joseph Smart, Rentall General and Scavenger, 8th of Council."

and so on, in the entries of most years down to 1761, when we have, for the last time:

"Samuel Wardley, 7th of Council, Masulipatam, Land-Customer, Military Storekeeper, Rentall General, and Scavenger."

Some light is thrown upon this surprising occurrence of such a term by a reference to Cowell's Law Dictionary, or The Interpreter (published originally in 1697) new ed. of 1727, where we read:

"Scavage, Scavagium. It is otherwise called Scheinage, Sheavage, and Scheaving; maybe deduced from the Saxon Scawian (Scawian?) Oustonders, and is a kind of Toll or Custom exacted by Mayors, Sheriffs, &c., of Merchant strangers, for Wares shewed or offered to Sale within their Precincts, which is prohibited by the Statute 19 H. 7, 8. In a Charter of Henry the Second to the City of Canterbury it is written Scawinge, and (in Mon. Ang. 2, per fol. 890 b.) Scawing; and elsewhere I find it in Latin Tributum Ostensorium. The City of London still retains the Custom, of which in An old printed Book of the Customs of London, we read thus, Of which Custom halfeen del appetizeth to the Sheriff, and the other halfeen del to the Hosteys in whose Houses the Merchants been lodged; And it is to wet that Scavage is the Shep by cause that Merchants (sic) shewn unto the Sheriff's Merchandizes, of the which Customs ought to be taken ere that any thing thereof be sold, &c.

"Scawnger, From the Belgick Scavan, to scrape. Two of every Parish within London and the suburbs are yearly chosen into this Office, who hire men called Rakers, and carts, to cleanse the streets, and carry away the Dirt and Filth thereof, mentioned in 13 Car. cap. 2. The Germans call him a Droeksman, from one Simon, a noted Scavenger of Marburg.

* * * * * "

"Scab halluc, The officer who collected the Scavage-Money, which was sometimes done with Extortion and great Oppression." (Then quotes Hist. of Durham from Wharton, Anglia Sacra, Pt. i. p. 75; "Anno 1311. Schavaldos insurgentes in Episcopatu (Richardus episcopus) fortiter composit. Aliqui suspenderantur, aliqui extra Episcopatum fugabantur.")"

In Spelman also (Glossarium Archaiologicum, 1688) we find:—

"Scavarium.] Tributum quod mercatoribus exigere solent nondinarum dominii, ob licentiam proponendi ibidem venditioni mercimoniam, a Saxon (scaawian) id est, Ostendere, inspicer, Angli. scuaing and shrawar. Spelman has no Scavenger or Scavager."

The scavage then was a tax upon goods for sale which were liable to duty, the word being, as Skeat points out, a Law French (or Low Latin?) formation from shew. ["From O.F. escauwer, to examine, inspect. O. Sax. skuwan, to behold; cognate with A.S. sceawian, to look at." (Concise Dict. s.v.)] And the scavager or scavenger was originally the officer charged with the inspection of the goods and collection of this tax. Passages quoted below from the Liber Albus of the City of London refer to these officers, and Mr. Riley in his translation of that work (1861, p. 34) notes that they were "Officers whose duty it was originally to take custom upon the Scavage, i.e. inspection of the opening out, of imported goods. At a later date, part of their duty was to see that the streets were kept clean; and hence the modern word 'scavenger,' whose office corresponds with the rokker (raker) of former times." [The meaning and derivation of this word have been discussed in Notes & Queries, 2 ser. ix. 325; 5 ser. v. 49, 452.]

We can hardly doubt then that the office of the Coromandel scavenger of the 18th century, united as we find it with that of "Rentall General," or of Land-customer," and held by a senior member of the Company's Covenanted Service, must be understood in the older sense of Visitor or Inspector of Goods subject to duties, but (till we can find more light) we should suppose rather duties of the nature of bazar tax, such as at a later date we find classed as sayer (q.v.), than customs on imports from seaward.

It still remains an obscure matter how the charge of the scavagers or scavengers came to be transferred to the oversight of streets and street-cleaning. That this must have become..."
a predominant part of their duty at an early period is shown by the Scavager's Oath which we quote below from the Liber Albus. In Skinner's Etymologicon, 1671, the definition is Collectors sordium abrasarum (erroneously connecting the word with shaving and scraping), whilst he adds: "Nostri Scabinger villissimo omnium ministerio sordes et purgamenta urbis auferendi funguntur." In Cotgrave's English-French Dict., ed. by Howel, 1673, we have: "Scabinter. Boueure. Gadonard"—agreeing precisely with our modern use. Neither of these shows any knowledge of the less sordid office attaching to the name. The same remark applies to Lye's Junius, 1743. It is therefore remarkable to find such a survival of the latter sense in the service of the Company, and coming down so late as 1761. It must have begun with the very earliest of the Company's establishments in India, for it is probable that the denomination was even then only a survival in England, due to the Company's intimate connection with the city of London. Indeed we learn from Mr. Norton, quoted below, that the term scavage was still alive within the City in 1829.

Prior to 1419. — "Et debent ad dictum Wardemotum per Aldermannum et probos Wardiae, necnon per juratores, eligi Consulari, Scavegeours, Aleconners, Bedelle, et alii Officiari."—Liber Albus, p. 38.

"SEREMENT DE Scavegeours."

1594. — Letter from the Lords of the Council to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, requesting them to admit John de Cardenas to the office of Collector of Scavage, the reversion of which had... been granted to him.—Index to the Remembrancia of the C. of London (1878), p. 284.

1607. — Letter from the Lord Mayor to the Lord Treasurer... enclosing a Petition from the Ward of Aldersgate, complaining that William Court, an inhabitant of that Ward for 8 or 10 years past, refused to undergo the office of Scavenger in the Parish, claiming exemption... being privileged as Clerk to Sir William Spencer, Knight, one of the Auditors of the Court of Exchequer, and praying that Mr. Court, although privileged, should be directed to find a substitute or deputy and pay him.—Ibid., 288.

1623. — Letter... reciting that the City by ancient Charters held... "the office of Package and scavage of Strangers' goods, and merchandise carried by them by land or water, out of the City and Liberties to foreign parts, whereby the Customs and Duties due to H.M. had been lost, and a stricter oversight taken of such commodities so exported."—Remembrancia, p. 321.

1632. — Order in Council, reciting that a Petition had been presented to the Board from divers Merchants born in London, the sons of Strangers, complaining that the "Paeker of London required of them as much fees for Package, Ballilage, Shewage, &c., as of Strangers not English-born..."—Ibid., 322.

1760. — "Mr. Handle, applying to the Board to have his allowance of Scavenger increased, and representing to us the great fatigue he undergoes, and loss of time, which the Board being very sensible of. Agreed we allow him Rs. 20 per month more than before on account of his diligence and assiduity in that post."—Pt. William Cons., in Long, 245. It does not appear from this what the duties of the scavenger in Mr. Handle's case were.

1829. — "The oversight of customable goods. This office, termed in Latin superiervis, is translated in another charter by the words search and surveying, and in the 2nd Charter of Charles I. it is termed the scavage, which appears to have been its most ancient and common name, and that which is retained to the present day... The real nature of this duty is not a toll for showing, but a toll paid for the oversight of showing; and under that name superiervis apertiones it was claimed in an action of debt in the reign of Charles II. The duty performed was seeing and knowing the merchandise on which the King's import customs were paid, in order that no concealment, or fraudulent practices... should deprive the King of his just dues... (The duty) was well known under the name of scavage, in the time of Henry III., and it seems at that time to have been a franchise of the commonalty."—G. Norton, Commentaries on the Hist., &c., of the City of London, 3rd ed. (1869), pp. 380-381.

SCRIVAN, s. An old word for a clerk or writer, from Port. escrivão.

[1616.—"He desired that some English might early on the Morow come to his howse, wher should meete a Scroiano and finish that busines."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 173. On the same page "The Scruiane of Zulpheceareon."]

1673.—"In some Places they write on Cocoa-Leafes dried, and then use an Iron Style, or else on Paper, when they use a Pen made with a Reed, for which they have a Brass Case, which holds them and the Ink too, always stuck at the Girdles of their Scrivans."—Fryer, 191.

1683.—"Mr. Watson in the Taffaty warehouse without any provocation called me Fittful Prodigall Scrvian, and told me my Hatt stood too high upon my head, ..."—Letter of S. Langley, in Heddes Diary, Sept. 5; [Hak. Soc. i. 108].

SCYMITAR, s. This is an English word for an Asiatic sabre. The common Indian word is talwdr (see TULWAUR). We get it through the French cimèntre, Ital. scimeterra, and according to Marcel Devie originally from Pers. shamšīr (shimšīr as he writes it). This would be still very obscure unless we consider the constant clerical confusion in the Middle Ages between c and t, which has led to several metamorphoses of words; of which a notable example is Fr. carquois from Pers. tirhash, Scimeterra representing shimšīr might easily thus become scimeterra. But we cannot prove this to have been the real origin. This word (shamšīr) was known to Greek writers. Thus:

A.D. 93.—"... Kai kaiásttau tov presbítopov paída Morbízaón, bæsiléa pεræthéía ti dídámia kai dósía tov òpovn-tíra tov pætrów dáktilión, týnne saμψí δarann òpovn òmowbómewnav par aútaiv."—Joseph. Antíqû. xx. ii. 3.

C. A.D. 114. —"Δώρα φέρει Τραυμαδόν αυλάξησαν συρρικά καὶ σαμψίρας αἰ ἐντα σπάνια βαβαρρικά."—Quoted in Suidas Lexicon, s.v.

1595.—"... By this scimitar, That slew the Sophy, and a Persian prince That won three fields of Sultan Soliman ..."

Merchant of Venice, ii. 1.

1610.—"... Anon the Patron starting up, as if of a sodomie restored to life; like a mad man skips into the boate, and drawing a Turkise Cymiter, beginneth to lay about him (thinking that his vessell had been surprised by Pirats), when they all leapt into the sea; and diving under water like so many Diue-dappers, ascended without out the reach of his furie."—Sandys, Relation, &c., 1615, p. 28.

1614.—"Some days ago I visited the house of a goldsmith to see a scimitar (scimèntre) that Nasubshah's the first visit, whom I have mentioned above, had ordered as a present to the Grand Signor. Scabbard and hilt were all of gold; and all covered with diamonds, so that little or nothing of the gold was to be seen."—P. della Valle, i. 43.

c. 1630.—"They seldom go without their swords (shamshērs) they call them) form'd like a crescent, of pure metall, broad, and sharper than any rasor; nor do they value them, unless at one blow they can cut in two an Asingo. ..."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1688, p. 228.

1675.—"I kept my hand on the Cock of my Carabine; and my Comrade followed a foote pace, as well armed; and our Janizary better than either of us both: but our Armenian had only a Scimeter."—(Sir) George Wheler, Journey into Greece, London, 1682, p. 252.

1758.—"The Captain of the troop ... made a cut at his head with a scymetar which Mr. Lally parried with his stick, and a Caffee (Caffer) servant who attend him shot the Tanjerine dead with a pistol."—Ormes, i. 328.

SEACUNNY, s. This is, in the phraseology of the Anglo-Indian marine, a steersman or quartermaster. The word is the Pers. sukán, 'a helm.'

c. 1580.—"Aos Mocoâdos, Socôes, e Vogas."—Primor e Homra, &c. i. 680. ("To the Mocudduma, Seacunnies, and oars-men.")

c. 1590.—"Sukkângir, or helmsman. He steers the ship according to the orders of the Mu’âllím."—Ain. i. 280.

1805.—"I proposed concealing myself with 5 men among the bales of cloth, till it should be night, when the Frenchmen being necessarily divided into two watches might be easily overpowered. This was agreed to ... till daybreak, when unfortunately discovering the masts of a vessel on our weather beam, which was immediately supposed to be our old friend, the sentiments of every person underwent a most unfortunate alteration, and the Nakhoa, and the Soucan, as well as the Supercargo, informed me that they would not tell a lie for all the world, even to save their lives; and in short, that they would neither be airt nor paire in the business."—Letter of Leyden, ed. Oct. 4-7, in Morton’s Life.
SEBUNDY. 805

1810.—"The gunners and quartermasters . . . are Indian Portuguese; they are called Secunnis."—Maria Graham, 55.

[1855.—"... the Secunnies, or helmets, were principally Manila men."—Neale, Residence in Siam, 45.]

SEBUNDY. s. Hind, from Pers. sibbandi (sth, 'three'). The rationale of the word is obscure to us. [Platts says it means 'three-monthly or quarterly payment.' The Madras Gloss, less probably suggests Pers. sipahbandi (see SEPOY), 'recruitment.'] It is applied to irregular native soldiery, a sort of militia, or imperfectly disciplined troops for revenue or police duties, &c. Certain local infantry regiments were formerly officially termed Sebundy. The last official appearance of the title that we can find is in application to "The Sebundy Corps of Sappers and Miners" employed at Darjeeling. This is in the E.I. Register down to July, 1869, after which the title does not appear in any official list. Of this corps, if we are not mistaken, the late Field-Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala was in charge, as Lieut. Robert Napier, about 1840. An application to Lord Napier, for corroboration of this reminiscence of many years back, drew from him the following interesting note:—

"Captain Gilmore of the (Bengal) Engineers was appointed to open the settlement at Darjeeling, and to raise two companies of Sebundy Sappers, in order to provide the necessary labour."

"He commenced the work, obtained some (Native) officers and N.C. officers from the old Bengal Sappers, and enlisted about half of each company.

"The first season found the little colony quite unprepared for the early commencement of the Rains. All the Coolies, who did not die, fled, and some of the Sappers deserted. Gilmore got sick; and in 1838 I was suddenly ordered from the extreme border of Bengal—Nyaocelie—to relieve him for one month. I arrived somehow, with a pair of pitaraus as my sole possession.

"Just then, our relations with Nepaul became strained, and it was thought desirable to complete the Sebundy Sappers with men from the Border Hills unconnected with Nepaul—Garrows and similar tribes. Through the Political Officer the necessary number of men were enlisted and sent to me.

"When they arrived I found, instead of the 'fair recruits' announced, a number of most unfit men; some of them more or less crippled, or with defective sight. It seemed probable that, by the process known to us in India as addlee budlee (see BUDLEE), the original recruits had managed to insert substitutes during the journey! I was much embarrassed as to what I should do with them; but night was coming on, so I encamped them on the newly opened road, the only clear space amid the dense jungle on either side. To complete my difficulty it began to rain, and I pitied my poor recruits! During the night there was a storm—and in the morning, to my intense relief, they had all disappeared!"

"In the expressive language of my sergeant, there was not a 'visage' of the men left.

"The Sebundies were a local corps, designed to furnish a body of labourers fit for mountain-work. They were armed, and expected to fight if necessary. Their pay was Rs. a month, instead of a Sepoy's Rs. 7.5. The pensions of the Native officers were smaller than in the regular army, which was a ground of complaint with the Bengal Sappers, who never expected in accepting the new service that they would have lower pensions than those they enlisted for.

"I eventually completed the corps with Nepauilese, and, I think, left them in a satisfactory condition.

"I was for a long time their only sergeant-major. I supplied the Native officers and N.C. officers from India with a good pea-jacket each, out of my private means, and with a little gold-lace made them smart and happy.

"When I visited Darjeeling again in 1872, I found the remnant of my good Sapper officers living as pensioners, and waiting to give me an affectionate welcome."

"My month's acting appointment was turned into four years. I walked 30 miles to get to the place, lived much in hovels and temporary huts thrown up by my Hill-men, and derived more benefit from the climate than from my previous visit to England. I think I owe much practical teaching to the Hill-men, the Hills and the Climate. I learnt the worst the elements could do to me—very nearly—excepting earthquakes! And I think I was thus prepared for any hard work."

1778.—"At Dacca I made acquaintance with my venerable friend John Cowe. He had served in the Navy so far back as the memorable siege of Havannah, was reduced when a lieutenant, at the end of the American War, went out in the Company's military service, and here I found him in command of a regiment of Sebundees, or native militia."—Hon. R. Lindsay, in L. of the Lindseys, iii. 161.

1785.—"The Board were pleased to direct that in order to supply the place of the Sebundy corps, four regiments of Sepoys be employed in securing the collection of the revenues."—In Seton-Karr, i. 92

"One considerable charge upon the Nabob's country was for extraordinary sibbendies, sepoys and horsemen, who appear to us to be a very unnecessary encumbrance upon the revenue."—Append, to SEEDY. 806

SEEDY, s. Hind. sidi; Arab. sayiyd, 'lord' (whence the Cid of Spanish romantic history), sayyidî, 'my lord'; and Mahr. siddî. Properly an honorific name given in Western India to African Mahommedans, of whom many held high positions in the service of the kings of the Deccan. Of these at least one family has survived in princely position to our own day, viz. the Nawâb of Jangira (see JUNGEERA), near Bombay. The young heir to this principality, Siddî Ahmad, after a minority of some years, was installed in the Government in Oct., 1883. But the proper application of the word in the ports and on the shipping of Western India is to negroes in general. [It "is a title still applied to holy men in Morocco and the Maghrib; on the East African coast it is assumed by negro and negroid Moslems, e.g. Sidi Mubarak Bombay; and 'Seedy boy' is the Anglo-Indian term for a Zanzibaran." (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 231.)] 1563.—"And among these was an Abyssinian (Abexim) called Cide Meriam, a man reckoned a great cavalier, and who entertained five hundred horse at his own charges, and who greatly coveted the city of Damascus to quarter himself in, or at least the whole of its pargunnas (parguans—see PER-GUNNAH) to devour."—Couto, VII. x. 8. 1673.—"An Hoby or African Cofeery (they being preferred here to chief employ- ments, which they enter on by the name of Siddies)."—Freyer, 117. 1861.—"Sliding down Mount Tendong, the summit of which, with snow lying there, they crossed, the Sebundy Sappers were employed cutting a passage for the mules; this delayed our march exceedingly."—Report of Capt. Impey, R.E., in Gawler's Sikhim, p. 95.

1679.—"The protection which the Siddies had given to Gingerah against the repeated attacks of Sevagi, as well as their frequent annoyance of their country, had been so much facilitated by their resort to Bombay, that Sevagi at length determined to compel the English Government to a stricter neutrality, by reprisals on their own port."—Orme, Fragments, 78.

1690.—"As he whose Title is most Christian, encouraged him who is its principal Adversary to invade the Rights of Christendom, so did Senor Padre de Pandara, the Principal Jesuite and in an adjacent Island to Bombay, invite the Siddy to exterminate all the Protestants there."—Ovington, 137.

1750-60.—"These (islands) were formerly in the hands of Angria and the Siddies or Moors."—Grose, i. 58.

1759.—"The Indian seas having been infested to an intolerable degree by pirates, the Mogul appointed the Siddee, who was chief of a colony of Coffrees (Caffer), to be his Admiral. It was a colony which, having been settled at Dunant-Rajpores, carried on a considerable trade there, and had likewise many vessels of force."—Cambridge's Account of the War, &c., p. 216.

SEEMUL, SIMMUL, &c. (sometimes we have seen Symbol, and Cymbal), s. Hind. semal and semhāl; [Skt. śālmāli]. The (so-called) cotton-tree Bombax Malabaricum, D.C. (N.O. Malvaceae), which occurs sporadically from Malabar to Sylhet, and from Burma to the Indus and beyond. It is often cultivated. “About March it is a striking object with its immense buttressed trunks, and its large showy red flowers, 6 inches in breadth, clustered on the leafless branches. The flower-luids are used as a potherb and the gum as a medicine” (Punjab Plants). We remember to have seen a giant of this species near Kishnagar, the buttresses of which formed chambers, 12 or 13 feet long and 7 or 8 wide. The silky cotton is only used for stuffing pillows and the like. The wood, though wretched in quality for any ordinary purpose, lasts under water, and is commonly the material for the curbs on which wells are built and sunk in Upper India.

[c. 1807.—“... the Salmoli, or Simul ... is one of the most gaudy ornaments of the forest or village...”—Buchanan Hamilton, E. India, ii. 789.]

SEER, s. Hind. ser; Skt. setak. One of the most generally spread Indian denominations of weight, though, like all Indian measures, varying widely in different parts of the country. And besides the variations of local ser and ser we often find in the same locality a pucka (pucka) and a kachchhā (cutchah) ser; a state of things, however, which is human, and not Indian only (see under PUCKA). The ser is generally (at least in upper India) equivalent to 80 tolas or rupee-weights; but even this is far from universally true. The heaviest ser in the Useful Tables (see Thomas's ed. of Prinsep) is that called “Coolpahar,” equivalent to 123 tolas, and weighing 3 lbs. 1 oz. 6½ dr. avoid.; the lightest is the ser of Malabar and the S. Mahrratta country, which is little more than 8 oz. [The Macleod ser of Malabar, introduced in 1802, is of 130 tolas; 10 of these weigh 33 lb. (Madras Man. ii. 516).]

Regulation VII. of the Govt. of India of 1833 is entitled “A Reg. for altering the weight of the Furruckabad Rupee (see RUPEE) and for assimilating it to the legal currency of the Madras and Bombay Presidencies; for adjusting the weight of the Company's sicca Rupee, and for fixing a standard unit of weight for India.” This is the nearest thing to the establishment of standard weights that existed up to 1870. The preamble says: “It is further convenient to introduce the weight of the Furruckabad Rupee as the unit of a general system of weights for Government transactions throughout India.” And Section IV. contains the following:

“The Tola or Sicca weight to be equal to 180 grains troy, and the other denominations or weights to be derived from this unit, according to the following scale:—

8 Rutties = 1 Masha = 15 troy grains.
12 Mashas = 1 Tola = 150 ditto.
80 Tolas (or sicca weight) = 1 Seer = 2½ lbs. troy.
40 Seers = 1 Men or Bazar Maund = 100 lbs. troy.”

Section VI. of the same Regulation says:

“The system of weights and measures (?) described in Section IV. is to be adopted at the mints and assay offices of Calcutta and Sangor respectively in the adjustment and verification of all weights for government or public purposes sent thereto for examination.”

But this does not go far in establishing a standard unit of weight for India: though the weights detailed in § iv. became established for Government purposes in the Bengal Presidency. The seer of this Regulation was thus 14,400 grains troy—2½ lbs. troy, 2'057 lbs. avoidupois.

In 1870, in the Government of Lord Mayo, a strong movement was made by able and influential men to introduce the metrical system, and an Act was passed called “The Indian Weights and Measures Act” (Act XI. of 1870) to pave the way for this. The preamble declares it expedient to provide “for the ultimate adoption of an uniform system of weights and measures throughout British India, and the Act prescribes certain standards, with powers to the Local Governments to declare the adoption of these.”

Section II. runs:

“Standards.—The primary standard of weight shall be called ser, and shall be a weight of metal in the possession of the Government of India, which weight, when weighed in a vacuum, is equal to the weight known in France as the kilogramme des Archives.”
Again, Act XXXI. of 1872, called "The Indian Weights and Measures of Capacity Act," repeats in substance the same preamble and prescription of standard weight. It is not clear to us what the separate object of this second Act was. But with the death of Lord Mayo the whole scheme fall to the ground. The ser of these Acts would be 32 lbs. avoirdupois, or 0.143 of a pound greater than the 80 tola ser.

SEER-FISH, s. A name applied to several varieties of fish, species of the genus Cybium. When of the right size, neither too small nor too big, these are reckoned among the most delicate of Indian sea-fish. Some kinds salt well, and are also good for preparing as Tamarind-Fish. The name is sometimes said to be a corruption of Pers. síah (qu. Pers. 'black?') but the quotations show that it is a corruption of Port. serra. That name would appear to belong properly to the well-known saw-fish (Pristis)—see Bluteau, quoted below; but probably it may have been applied to the fish now in question, because of the serrated appearance of the rows of finlets, behind the second dorsal and anal fins, which are characteristic of the genus (see Day's Fishes of India, pp. 254-256, and plates iv., lvi.).

1598. — "There is a fish called Pieze Serra, which is cut in round pieces, as we cut Salmon and salt it. It is very good." — Linschoten, 88; [Hak. Soc. ii. 11].

1720. — "Peixe Serra is ordinarily produced in the Western Ocean, and is so called" etc. (describing the Saw-fish) . . .

"But in the Sea of the Islands of Quirimba (i.e. off Mozambique) there is a different peyxé serra resembling a large corvina,* but much better, and which it is the custom to pickle. When cured it seems just like ham." — Bluteau, Vocab. vii. 606-607.

1727. — "They have great Plenty of Seer-fish, which is as savoury as any Salmon or Trout in Europe." — A. Hamilton, i. 379; [ed. 1744, i. 382].

[1813. — " . . . the robal, the seir-fish, the grey mullet . . . are very good." — Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 36.]

1600. — "Of those in ordinary use for the table the finest by far is the Seir-fish;† a species of Scumber, which is called Tora-matu by the natives. It is in size and form very similar to the salmon, to which the flesh of the female fish, notwithstanding its white colour, bears a very close resemblance, both in firmness and in flavour." — Tennent's Ceylon, 1. 205.

SEERPAAW, s. Pers. through Hind. sar-d-pá — 'cap-a-pie.' A complete suit, presented as a Khilat (Killut) or dress of honour, by the sovereign or his representative.

c. 1666. — "He . . . commanded, there should be given to each of them an embroi-der'd Vest, a Turban, and a Girdle of Silk Embroidery, which is that which they call Ser-apah, that is, an Habit from head to foot." — Bernier, E.T. 37; [ed. Constable, 147].

1673 — "Sir George Oxendine . . . had a Collat (Killut) or Serpaw, a Robe of Honour from Head to Foot, offered him by the Great Mogul." — Fryer, 87.

1780. — "Answer is returned that it hath not been intimated to the Governor to go out to receive a bare Phrauwand (Firmann), except there come therewith a Serpow or a Tashiriffe (Tashreef)." — Pt. St. Geo. Cons. Dec. 2, in N. & E. No. iii. 40.

1715. — "We were met by Padre Stephanus, bringing two Serpaws." — In Wheeler, ii. 245.

1727. — "As soon as he came, the King embraced him, and ordered a serpaw or a royal Suit to be put upon him." — A. Hamilton, i. 171 [ed. 1744].

1735. — "The last Nabob (Sadatulla) would very seldom suffer any but himself to send a Serpaw; whereas in February last Sunta Sahib, Subder Ali Sahib, Jehare Khan and Imaum Sahib, had all of them taken upon them to send distinct Serpaws to the President." — In Wheeler, iii. 140.

1759. — "Another deputation carried six costly Serpaws; these are garments which are presented sometimes by superiors in token of protection, and sometimes by inferiors in token of homage." — Orme, i. 159.

* Corvina is applied by Curvier, Cantor and others to fish of the genus Sciaena of more recent ichthyologists.
† "Cybium (Scumber, Linn.) guttatum." — Tennent.
SEETULPUTTY, s. A fine kind of mat made especially in Eastern Bengal, and used to sleep on in the cold weather. [They are made from the split stems of the mukta pata, Phrynium dichotomum, Roxb. (see Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. 216 seq.).] Hind. sīṭāpatti, ‘cold-slip.’ Williamson’s spelling and derivation (from an Arab. word impossibly used, see SICLEGUR) are quite erroneous.

1810.—“A very beautiful species of mat is made... especially in the south-eastern districts... from a kind of reedy grass... These are peculiarly slippery, whence they are designated ‘seekul-putty’ (i.e. polished sheets).... The principal uses of the ‘seekul-putty’ are to be laid under the lower sheet of a bed, thereby to keep the body cool.”—Williamson, I. M. ii. 41.

[1819.—“Another kind (of mat) the shēṭālāpātēs, laid on beds and couches on account of their coolness, are sold from one rooppee to five each.”—Ward, Hindoos, i. 106.]

1879.—In Fallow’s Ditty, we find the following Hindi riddle:—

Chān kā pīyalā tāṭā, kā jōrā nākān; Māli kā lāg lajā, kā tūrā nākān; Sīṭāpatti bīdhē, kā sōā nākān; Rāj-bansī mād, kā rōtā nākān.

Which might be rendered:

“A china bowl that, broken, none can join; A flowery field, whose blossoms none can plurn in; A royal scion slain, and none shall weep; A sīṭāpatti spread where none shall sleep.”

The answer is an Egg; the Starry Sky; a Snake (Rāj-bansī, ‘royal scion,’ is a placatory name for a snake); and the Sea.

SEMBALL, s. Malay-Javan. sām-bīl, sāmbal. A spiced condiment, the curry of the Archipelago. [Dennys (Deer. Dict. p. 337) describes many varieties.]

1817.—“The most common seasoning employed to give a relish to their insipid food is the lomboek (i.e. red-pepper) triturated with salt it is called sāmbel.”—Raffles, H. of Java, i. 98.

SEPOY, SEAPOY, s. In Anglo-Indian use a native soldier, disciplined and dressed in the European style. The word is Pers. sipāhī, from sipāh, ‘soldier, an army;’ which J. Oppert traces to old Pers. spādā, ‘a soldier’ (Le peuple et la Langue des Médes, 1879, p. 24). But Shah is a horseman in Armenian; and sound etymologists connect sipāh with asp, ‘a horse’; [others with Skt. padāti, ‘a foot-soldier’]. The original word sipāhī occurs frequently in the poems of Amir Khusrū (c. A.D. 1300), bearing always probably the sense of a ‘horse-soldier,’ for all the important part of an army then consisted of horsemen. See sipāh below.

The word sepoy occurs in Southern India before we had troops in Bengal; and it was probably adopted from Portuguese. We have found no English example in print older than 1750, but probably an older one exists. The India Office record of 1747 from Fort St. David’s is the oldest notice we have found in extant MS. [But see below.]

c. 1300.—“Pride had inflated his brain with wind, which extinguished the light of his intellect, and a few sipāhīs from Hindustan, without any religion, had supported the credit of his authority.”—Amir Khusrū, in Elliot, iii. 593.

[1865.—“Souldier—Suppya and Haddee.”—Persian Gloss. in Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1877, p. 30.]

1862.—“As soon as these letters were sent away, I went immediately to Ray Nundelall’s to have ye Seapoy, or Nabob’s horseman, consigned to me, with order to see ye Personana put in execution; but having thought better of it, ye Ray desired me to have patience till tomorrow morning. He would then present me to the Nabob, whose commands to ye Seapoy and Bul-chunds Vekel would be more powerfull and advantageous to me than his own.”—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 55, seq. Here we see the word still retaining the sense of ‘horseman’ in India.

[1717.—“A Company of Sepoys with the colours.”—Y’er, in ditto, ii. eccles. On this Sir H. Yule notes: “This is an occurrence of the word sepoy, in its modern signification, 30 years earlier than any I had been able to find when publishing the A.-I. Gloss. I have one a year earlier, and expect now to find it earlier still.”

[1733.—“You are next... to make a complete survey... of the number of fighting Sepoys...”—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 55.]

1737.—“Elle com tota a força desonivel, que eram 1156 soldados pagos em que entraram 281 chegados na mão Mercês, o 780 sypaes ou lascars (lascar), recuperou o território.”—Balquejo das Posséses Portuguesas no Oriente, &c., por Joaquim Pedro Celestino Sorens, Lisboa, 1851, p. 58.

1746.—“The Enemy, by the best Intelligence that could be got, and best Judgment that could be formed, had or would have on Shore next Morning, upwards of 3000 Europeans, with at least 500 Coorys, and a number of Sepoys and Peons."—Est. of Diary, &c., in App. to A Letter to a Prop'r of the E.I. Co., London, 1750, p. 94.

[1746.—Their strength on shore I compute 2000 Europeans Seapials and 300 Coffrees."—Letter from Madras, Oct. 9, in Bengal Consultations. Ibid., p. 600, we have Seapies.]

1747.—"At a Council of War held at Fort St. David the 25th December, 1747.

Present:—
George Gibson    John Holland
John Crompton    John Rodolph de Gingens
William Brown    John Usgate
Robert Sanderson

"It is further ordered that Captn. Crompton keep the Detachment under his Command at Cuddalore, in a readiness to march to the Choultry over against the Fort as soon as the Signal shall be made from the Place, and then upon his firing two Muskets, Boats shall be sent to bring them here, and to leave a serjeant at Cuddalore Who shall conduct his Sepoys to the Garden Guard, and the Serjeant shall have a Word by which He shall be received at the Garden."—Original MS. Proceedings (in the India Office).

"The Council of Fort St. David write to Bombay, March 16th, "If they could not supply us with more than 300 Europeans, We should be glad of Five or Six Hundred of the best Northern People their way, as they are reported to be much better than ours, and not so liable to Desertion."

In Consn. May 30th they record the arrival of the ships Leven, Warwick, and Ilchester, Princess Augusta, "on the 28th inst., from Bombay, (bringing) us a General from that Presidency," as entered No. 38, advising of having sent us by them sundry stores and a Reinforcement of Men, consisting of 70 European Soldiers, 200 Topasses (Topaz), and 100 well-trained Sepoys, all of which under the command of Capt. Thomas Andrews, a Good Officer."

And under July 13th. "... The Reinforcement of Sepoys having arrived from Tellfichery, which, with those that were sent from Bombay, making a formidable Body, besides what are still expected; and as there is far greater Dependance to be placed on those People than on our own Peons ... many of whom have a very weakly Appearance, AGREE, that a General Review be now had of them, that all such may be discharged, and only the Choosest of them continued in the Service."—MS. Records in India Office.

1752.—"... they quitted their entrenchments on the first day of March, 1752, and advanced in order of battle, taking possession of a rising ground on the right, on which they placed 50 Europeans; the front consisted of 1500 Sepoys, and one hundred and twenty or thirty French."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1761, pp. 9-10.

1758.—A Tabular Statement (Mappe) of the Indian troops, 20th Jan. of this year, shows "Corpo de Sipaes" with 1162 "Sipaes promptos."—Bosquejo, as above.

... "A stout body of near 100 Sepoys has been raised within these few days."—In Long, 134.

[1759.—"Boat rice extraordinary for the Gentoo Seapois. ..."—Ibid. 174.].

1763.—"The Indian natives and Moors, who are trained in the European manner, are called Sepoys."—Orme, i. 80.

1763.—"Major Carnac ... observes that your establishment is loaded with the expense of more Captains than need be, owing to the unnecessarily making it a point that they should be Captains who command the Sepoy Battalions, whereas such is the nature of Sepoys that it requires a peculiar genius and talent to be qualified for that service, and the Battalion should be given only to such who are so without regard to rank."—Court's Letter, of March 9. In Long, 290.

1770.—"England has at present in India an establishment to the amount of 8800 European troops, and 54,000 sipais well armed and disciplined."—Raynal (tr. 1777), i. 459.

1774.—"Sipai sono li soldati Indiani."—Della Tomba, 297.

1778.—"La porta del Ponente della città si custodiva dalli sipais soldati Indiani radunati da tutte le tribù, e religioni."—Fra Paolino, Viaggio, 4.

1780.—"Next morning the sepoys came to see me. ... I told him that I owed my life. ... He then told me that he was not very rich himself, as his pay was only a pagoda and a half a month—and at the same time drew out his purse and offered me a rupee. This generous behaviour, so different to what I had hitherto experienced, drew tears from my eyes, and I thanked him for his generosity, but I would not take his money."—Hon. J. Lindsay's Imprisonment, Lives of Lindsay's, iii. 274.

1782.—"As to Europeans who run from their natural colours, and enter into the service of the country powers, I have heard very rich himself, that the best officers the Company ever had ... say that he considered them no otherwise than as so many Sepoys; for acting under blacks they became mere blacks in spirit."—Price, Some Observations, 95-96.

1789.—"There was not a captain, nor scarce a sepoy, But a Prince would depose, or a Brahmin destroy."—Letter of Simkin the Second, &c., 8.

1803.—"Our troops behaved admirably; the sepoys astonished me."—Wellington, ii. 384 SERAI, SERYE.

1827. — "He was betrothed to the daughter of a Sipahlee, who served in the mud-fort which they saw at a distance rising above the jungle."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

1836. — "The native army of the E. I. Company. ... Their formation took place in 1757. They are usually called sepoys, and are light and short."—In R. Phillips, A Million of Facts, 715.

1851. — "As early as A.D. 1592 the chief of Sind had 200 natives dressed and armed like Europeans: these were the first 'sepoys.'"—Burton's Comeoms, A Commentary, ii. 445.

The French write cipaye or cipay:

1759. — "De quinze mille Cipayes dont l'armée est censée composée, j'en compte à peu près huit cents sur la route de Pondichery, chargé de sucre et de poivre et autres marchandises, quant aux Coulis, ils sont tous employés pour le même objet."—Letter of Lally to the Governor of Pondicherry, in Cambridge's Account, p. 190.

Since the conquest of Algeria the same word is common in France under another form, viz., sphâh. But the Spâh is totally different from the sepoy, and is in fact an irregular horseman. With the Turks, from whom the word is taken, the spâhâ was always a horseman.

1534. — "Aderant magnis numeribus praeposit us multi, aderant praetoriani equites cohortes Sphai, Garipia, Utufagi, Ghanizarum magnus numeros, sed nullus in tanto conuenta nobilis nisi ex suis virtutibus et fortibus factis."—Busheq, Epistola, i. 99.

[1662. — "The Spachi, and other orders of horsemen."—J. Skute, Two Comm. (Tr.) fol. 53 ro. Sasfig Dict. where many early instances of the word will be found.]

1672. — "Mille ou quinze cents Spahiz, tous bien équipées et bien montés ... terminoient toute ceste longue, magnifique, et pompeuse cavalcade."—Journal d'Ant. Galland, i. 142.

1675. — "The other officers are the sardar (Sirdar), who commands the Janizaries ... the Spahi Agga, who commands the Spahies or Turkish Horse."—Wheelers Journal, 485.

[1686. — "I being providentially got over the river before the Spie employed by them could give them intelligence."—Hedges, Dobo, Hak. Soc. i. 229.]

1738. — "The Arab and other inhabitants are obliged, either by long custom ... or from fear and compulsion, to give the Spahies and their company the munnah ... which is such a sufficient quantity of provision for ourselves, together with straw and barley for our mules and horses."— Shade's Travels in Barbary, ed. 1757, p. xii.

1786. — "Bajazet had two years to collect his forces ... we may discriminate the janizaries ... a national cavalry, the Spahis of modern times."—Gibbon, ch. lvx.

1877. — "The regular cavalry was also originally composed of tribute children. ... The sipahis acquired the same pre-eminence among the cavalry which the janissaries held among the infantry, and their seditious conduct rendered them much sooner troublesome to the Government."—Finlay, H. of Greece, ed. 1877, v. 37.

SERAI, SERYE, s. This word is used to represent two Oriental words entirely different.

a. Hind. from Pers. sarra, sarai. This means originally an edifice, a palace. It was especially used by the Tartars when they began to build palaces. Hence Sarai, the name of more than one royal residence of the Mongol Khans upon the Volga, the Sarra of Chaucer. The Russians retained the word from their Tartar oppressors, but in their language saraï has been degraded to mean 'a shed.'

The word, as applied to the Palace of the Grand Turk, became, in the language of the Levantine Franks, serail and serraglio. In this form, as P. della Valle lucidly explains below, the 'striving after meaning?' connected the word with Ital. serrato, 'shut up'; and with a word serraglio perhaps previously existing in Italian in that connection. [ Serraglio, according to Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) is "formed with suffix-aglio (L. -aculum) from Late Lat. serare, 'to bar, shut in';—Lat. sara, a 'bar, bolt'; Lat. serere, 'to join together.' ] It is this association that has attached the meaning of 'women's apartments' to the word. Saraï has no such specific sense.

But the usual modern meaning in Persia, and the only one in India, is that of a building for the accommodation of travellers with their pack-animals; consisting of an enclosed yard with chambers round it.

Recurring to the Italian use, we have seen in Italy the advertisement of a travelling menagerie as Serraglio di Belvo. A friend tells us of an old Scotchman whose ideas must have run in this groove, for he used to talk of "a Serragl of blackguards." In the Diary in England of Annibale Litolfi of Mantua the writer says: "On entering the tower there is a Serragliot in which, from grandeur, they keep lions and tigers and cat-lions." (See Rycroft Brown's Calendar of Papers in Archives of Venice, vol. vi. pt. iii. 1557-8. App.) [The Stanf. Dict. quotes Evelyn as using the word of a place where persons are confined: 1644. "I passed by the Piazza Judea, where their serragliot begins" (Diary, ed. 1872, i. 142].

1609. —"... by it the great Suray, besides which are diuers others, both in the city and suburbs, wherein diuers neste lodgings are to be let, with doores, lockes, and keys to each."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 434.

1614. —"This term serraglio, so much used among us in speaking of the Grand Turk's dwelling ... has been corrupted into that form from the word serai, which in their language signifies properly 'a palace.' ... But since this word serai resembles seraito, as a Venetian would call it, or serraglio as we say, and seeing that the palace of the Turk is (serrato or) shut up all round by a strong wall, and also because the women and a great part of the courtiers dwell in it barred up and shut in, so it may perchance have seemed to some to have deserved such a name. And thus the real term serai has been converted into serraglio."—P. della Valle, i. 136.

1615. —"... Only one from dayes Journey to another the Sophic hath caused to be erected certaine kind of great harbours, or huge lodgings (like hamlets) called caravan-sara, or surroyes, for the benefit of Caravansers. ..."—De Montfort, 8.

1618. —"... In this kingdome there are no Houses to entertaine strangers, only in great Townes and Cities are faire Houses built for their receit, which they call Saray, not inhabited, where any Passenger may haue roome freely, but must bring with him his Bedding, his Cooke, and other necessaries."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1475.

1638. —"... Which being done we departed from our Seryre (or Ienne)."—W. Brunton, in Hakl. v. 49.

1648. —"A great sary or place for housing travelling folk."—Van Twist, 17.

[1754. —"... one of the Sciddees (seedy) officers with a party of men were lodged in the Sorrey. ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 307.]

1782. —"... The stationary tenants of the Seranne, many of them women, and some of them very pretty, approach the traveller on his entrance, and in alluring language describe to him the varied excellencies of their several lodgings."—Forster, Journey, ed. 1808, i. 86.

1825. —"... The whole number of lodgers in and about the serai, probably did not fall short of 500 persons. What an admirable scene for an Eastern romance would such an inn as this afford!"—Heber, ed. 1844, ii. 122.

1850. —"... He will find that, if we omit only three names in the long line of the Delhi Emperors, the comfort and happiness of the people were never contemplated by them; and with the exception of a few sarais and bridges—and those only on roads traversed by the imperial camps—he will see nothing in which purely selfish considerations did not prevail."—Sir H. M. Elliot, Original Preface to Historians of India, Elliot, i. xxiii.

b. A long-necked earthenware (or metal) flagon for water; a goglet (q.v.). This is Ar.—P. guddhi. [This is the dorak or kulleh of Egypt, of which Lane (Mod. Egypt, ed. 1871, i. 186 seq.) gives an account with illustrations.]

c. 1666. —"... my Nuxab having vouchsafed me a very particular favour, which is, that he hath appointed to give me every day a new loaf of his house, and a Sorous of the water of Ganges. ... Sorous is that Tin-flagon full of water, which the servant that marcheth on foot before the Gentleman on horseback, carrieth in his hand, wrapt up in a sleeve of red cloath."—Bernier, E.T. 114; [ed. Constable, 356].

1808. —"... We had some bread and butter, two surahces of water, and a bottle of brandy."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 108.

[1808.—"... The best known is the gilt silver work of Cashmere, which is almost confined to the production of the water-vessels or sarais, copied from the clay goblets in use throughout the northern parts of the Panjab."—Birdwood, Indus. Arts of India, 149.]

SERANG. s. A native boatswain, or chief of a lascar crew; the skipper of a small native vessel. The word is Pers. sarhun, 'a commander or overseer.' In modern Persia it seems to be used for a colonel (see Wills, 80).

1599. —"... there set sail two Portugese vessels which were come to Amamo-(Macao) from the City of Goa, as occurs every year. They are commanded by Captains, with Pilots, quartermasters, clerks, and other officers, who are Portuguese; but manned by sailors who are Arabs, Turks, Indians, and Bengalis, who serve for so much a month, and provide themselves under the direction and command of a chief of their own whom they call the Saranghi, who also belongs to one of these nations, whom they understand, and recognize and obey, carrying out the orders that the Portuguese Captain, Master, or Pilot may give to the said Saranghi.—Carletti, i. 206.

1690.—"Indus quem de hoc Ludo consului fuit scriba satis paritus ab officio in nave sua dictus le sarang, Anglice Boatswain seu Boson."—Hyde, De Ludos Orientti. in Synagoga, ii. 204.

[1582.—"... the ghaut syrange (a class of men equal to the kidnappers of Holland and the cramps of England). ..."
—Wallace, Fifteen Years in India, 256.]

SERAPHIN. See XERAFIN.

SERENDĪB, n.p. The Arabic form of the name of Ceylon in the earlier Middle Ages. (See under CEYLON.)

SERINGAPATAM, n.p. The city which was the capital of the Kingdom of Mysore during the reigns of Hyder Ali and his son Tipoo. Written Sri-ranga-pattana, meaning according to vulgar interpretation 'Vishnu's Town.' But as both this and the other Srrrangam (Seringam town and temple, so-called, in the Trichinopoly district) are on islands of the Cauvery, it is possible that ranga stands for Lanka, and that the true meaning is 'Holy-Isle-Town.'

[SERPEYCH, s. Pers. sarpech, sarpeš; an ornament of gold, silver or jewels, worn in front of the turban; it sometimes consists of gold plates strung together, each plate being set with precious stones. Also a band of silk and embroidery worn round the turban.

[1753.—"... a fillet. This they call a sirpeach, which is wore round the turban; persons of great distinction generally have them set with precious stones."—Hanway, iv. 191.

[1786.—"Surpaishes." See under CUGEE.

[1813.—"Serpeych." See under KIL-LUT.]

SEETT, s. Properly Hind. seth, which according to Wilson is the same word with the Cheetti (see GHETTY) or Shetti of the Malabar Coast, the different forms being all from Skt. sreshtha, 'best, or chief,' sreshthi, 'the chief of a corporation, a merchant or banker.' C. P. Brown entirely denies the identity of the S. Indian shetti with the Skt. word (see GHETTY).

1740.—"The Sets being all present at the Board inform us that last year they dissented to the employment of Fillich Chund (&c.), they being of a different caste; and consequently they could not do business with them."—In Long, p. 9.

1757.—"To the Seats Mootabray and Roopehund the Government of Chandmangore was indebted a million and a half Rupees."—Orme, ii. 193 of reprint (Sk. viii.).

1770.—"As soon as an European arrived the Gentos, who know mankind better than is commonly supposed, study his character ... and lend or procure him money upon bottomry, or at interest. This interest, which is usually 9 per cent. at this is higher when he is under a necessity of borrowing of the Cheyks.

"These Cheyks are a powerful family of Indians, who have, time immemorial, inhabited the banks of the Ganges. Their riches have long ago procured them the management of the bank belonging to the Court. ..."—Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 427.

Note that by Cheyks the Abbé means Setts.

[1883.—"... from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin a security endorsed by the Matrura Seth is as readily convertible into cash as a Bank of England Note in London or Paris."—F. S. Grose, Matwara, 14.]

SETTLEMENT, s. In the Land Revenue system of India, an estate or district is said to be settled, when instead of taking a quota of the year's produce the Government has agreed with the cultivators, individually or in community, for a fixed sum to be paid at several periods of the year, and not liable to enhancement during the term of years for which the agreement or settlement is made. The operation of arranging the terms of such an agreement, often involving tedious and complicated considerations and enquiries, is known as the process of settlement. A Permanent Settlement is that in which the annual payment is fixed in perpetuity. This was introduced in Bengal by Lord Cornwallis in 1793, and does not exist except within that great Province, [and a few districts in the Benares division of the N.W.P., and in Madras.]" [SEVEN PAGODAS, n.p. The Tam. Mavallipuram, Skt. Mahablipuram, ‘the City of the Great Ball,’ a place midway between Sadras and Covelong. But in one of the inscriptions (about 620 A.D.) a King, whose name is said to have been Amara, is described as having conquered the chief of the Mahamalla race. Mall was probably the name of a powerful highland chiefstain subdued by the Chalukyans. (See Crole, Man. of Chingleput, 98 seq.). Dr. Oppert (Orig. Inhabit., 98) takes the name to be derived from the Malla or Palli race.

SEVEN SISTERS, or BROTHERS. The popular name (Hind. sat-bhāt) of a certain kind of bird, about the size of a thrush, common throughout most parts of India, Malacocercus terricolor, Hodgson, ‘Bengal lubbler’ of Jerdon. The latter author gives the native name as Seven Brothers, which is the form also given in the quotation below from Tribes on My Frontier. The bird is so named from being constantly seen in little companies of about that number. Its characteristics are well given in the quotations. See also Jerdon’s Birds (Godwin-Austen’s ed., ii. 59). In China certain birds of starling kind are called by the Chinese pa-ko, or “Eight Brothers,” for a like reason. See Collingwood’s Rambles of a Naturalist, 1868, p. 319. (See MYNA.)

1878. — “The Seven Sisters pretend to feed on insects, but that is only when they cannot get peas... sad-coloured birds hopping about in the dust, and incessantly walking whilst they hop.”—Ph. Robinson, In My Indian Garden, 30-31.

1883.—“. . . the Satbhāi or ‘Seven Brothers’ . . . are too shrewd and knowing to be made fun of. . . . Among themselves they will quarrel by the hour, and bandy foul language like fishwives; but let a stranger treat one of their number with disrespect, and the other six are in arms at once. . . . Each Presidency of India has its own branch of this strange family. Here (at Bombay) they are brothers, and in Bengal they are sisters; but everywhere, like Wordsworth’s opinionative child, they are seven.”—Tribes on My Frontier, 145.

SEVERN DROOG, n.p. A somewhat absurd corruption, which has been applied to two forts of some fame, viz.:

a. Swavana-druga, or Swavandrug, on the west coast, about 78 m. below Bombay (Lat. 17° 48’ N.). It was taken in 1755 by a small naval force from Tulaj Angria, of the famous piratical family. [For the commander of the expedition, Commodore James, and his monument on Shooter’s Hill, see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 117 seq.]

b. Savandrug; a remarkable double hill-fort in Mysore, standing on a two-topped bare rock of granite, which was taken by Lord Cornwallis’s army in 1791 (Lat. 12° 35’). [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, Madras reprint, i. 228, ii. 232) calls it Seventy Droog, and Seven-droog.]

SEYCHELLE ISLANDS, n.p. A cluster of islands in the Indian Ocean, politically subordinate to the British Government of Mauritius, lying between 3° 40’ & 4° 50’ S. Lat., and about 950 sea-miles east of Mombas on the E. African coast. There are 29 or 30 of the Seychelles proper, of which Mahé, the largest, is about 17 m. long by 3 or 4 wide. The principal islands are granitic, and rise “in the centre of a vast plateau of coral” of some 120 m. diameter.

These islands are said to have been visited by Soares in 1506, and were known vaguely to the Portuguese navigators of the 16th century as the Seven Brothers (Os sete Irmanos or Hermanos), sometimes Seven Sisters (Sête Irmanas), whilst in Delisle’s Map of Asia (1700) we have both “Ies Sept Frères” and “Ies Sept Soeurs.” Adjoining these on the W. or S.W. we find also on the old maps a group called the Almirantes, and this group has retained that name to the present day, constituting now an appendage of the Seychelles.

The islands remained uninhabited, and apparently unvisited, till near the middle of the 18th century. In 1742 the celebrated Mahé de la Bourdonnais, who was then Governor of Mauritius and the Isle of Bourbon, despatched two small vessels to explore the islands of this little archipelago, an expedition which was renewed by Lazare Picault, the commander of one of the two vessels, in 1774, who gave to the principal island the name of Mahé, and to the group the name of Iles de Bourdonnais, for which Iles Mahé (which is the name given in the Neptune Orientale of D'Apres de Manneville, 1775, pp. 29-38, and the charts), seems to have been substituted. Whatever may have been La Bourdonnais' plans with respect to these islands, they were interrupted by his engagement in the Indian campaigns of 1745-46, and his government of Mauritius was never resumed. In 1756 the Sieur Morphy (Murphy!), commander of the frigate Le Cerf, was sent by M. Magon, Governor of Mauritius and Bourbon, to take possession of the Island of Mahe'. But it seems doubtful if any actual settlement of the islands by the French occurred till after 1769. [See the account of the islands in Owen's Narrative, i. 158 seqq.]

A question naturally has suggested itself to us as to how the group came by the name of the Seychelles Islands; and it is one to which no trustworthy answer will be easily found in English, if at all. Even French works of pretension (e.g. the Dictionnaire de la Rousse) are found to state that the islands were named after the "Minister of Marine, Herauld de Scechelles, who was eminent for his services and his able administration. He was the first to establish a French settlement there." This is quoted from La Rousse; but the fact is that the only man of the name known to fame is the Jacobin and friend of Danton, along with whom he perished by the guillotine. There never was a Minister of Marine so called! The name Scechelles first (so far as we can learn) appears in the Hydrographie Francaise of Belin, 1767, where in a map entitled Carte réduite du Canal de Mozambique the islands are given as Les Iles Séchelles, with two enlarged plans en cartouche of the Port de Séchelles. In 1767 also Chev. de Grenier, commanding the Heure du Berger, visited the Islands, and in his narrative states that he had with him the chart of Picault, "envoyé par La Bourdonnais pour reconnoître les isles des Sept Frères, lesquelles ont été depuis nommée isles Mahe' et ensuite isles Séchelles." We have not been able to learn by whom the latter name was given, but it was probably by Morphy of the Cerf; for among Dalrymple's Charts (pub. 1771), there is a "Plan of the Harbour adjacent to Bat River on the Island Seychelles, from a French plan made in 1756, published by Bellin." And there can be no doubt that the name was bestowed in honour of Moreau de Séchelles, who was Contrôleur-Général des Finances in France in 1754-56, i.e. at the very time when Governor Magon sent Capt. Morphy to take possession. One of the islands again is called Silhouette, the name of an official who had been Commissaire du roi près la Compagnie des Indes, and succeeded Moreau de Séchelles as Controller of Finance; and another is called Praslin, apparently after the Duc de Choiseul Praslin who was Minister of Marine from 1766 to 1770.

The exact date of the settlement of the islands we have not traced. We can only say that it must have been between 1769 and 1772. The quotation below from the Abbé Rochon shows that the islands were not settled when he visited them in 1769; whilst that from Capt. Neale shows that they were settled before his visit in 1772. It will be seen that both Rochon and Neale speak of Mahe' as "the island Seychelles, or Sécheyles," as in Belin's chart of 1767. It seems probable that the cloud under which La Bourdonnais fell, on his return to France, must have led to the suppression of his name in connection with the group.

The islands surrendered to the English Commodore Newcome in 1794, and were formally ceded to England with Mauritius in 1815. Seychelles appears to be an erroneous English spelling, now however become established. (For valuable assistance in the preceding article we are indebted to the courteous communications of M. James Jackson, Librarian of the Société de Géographie at Paris, and of M. G. Marcel of the Bibliothèque Nationale. And see, besides the works quoted here, a paper by M. Elie Pujot, in L'Explorateur, vol. iii. (1876) pp. 523-526).

The following passage of Pyrard probably refers to the Seychelles:

1610.—"Le Roy (des Maldives) ennuo par deux foys vn tres expert pilote pour aller desouvrir vne certaine ile nommée polonous, qui leur est presque inconnue. . . . Ils disent aussi que le diable les y tourmentoit visiblement, et que pour l'isle elle est fertile en tontes sortes de fruites, et mesme ils ont opinion que ces gros Cocos medicinaux qui sont si chers-la en viennent. . . . Elle est sous la hauteur de dix degrés au delà de la ligne et environ six vingt SHABUNDER, s. Pers. Shabbandar, lit. 'King of the Haven,' Harbour-Master. This was the title of an officer at native ports all over the Indian seas, who was the chief authority with whom foreign traders and ship-masters had to transact. He was often also head of the Customs. Hence the name is of prominent and frequent occurrence in the old narratives. Portuguese authors generally write the word Xabander; ours Shabunder or Sabunder. The title is not obsolete, though it does not now exist in India; the quotation from Lane shows its recent existence in Cairo, [and the Persians still call their Consuls Shah-bandar (Burton, Ar. Nights, iii. 158)]. In the marine Malay States the Shabunder was, and probably is, an important officer of State. The passages from Lane and from Tavernier show that the title was not confined to seaports. At Aleppo Thevenot (1663) calls the corresponding official, perhaps by a mistake, 'Schek Bandar' (Voyages, iii. 121). [This is the office which King Mihirjan conferred upon Sindbad the Seaman, when he made him 'his agent for the port and registrar of all ships that entered the harbour' (Burton, iv. 351)].

c. 1350.—"The chief of all the Muslims in this city (Kawiamond—see QUILON) is Mahomed Shabbandar."—Ibn Batuta, iv. 109.

c. 1539.—"This King (of the Batais) understanding that I had brought him a Letter and a Present from the Captain of Malao, caused me to be entertained by the Xabantar, who is he that with absolute Power governs all the affairs of the Army."—Pinto (orig. cap. xv.), in Cogan's Transl., p. 18.

1552.—"And he who most insisted on this was a Moor, Xabbandar of the Guzaratre (at Malaccas).—Cassanhalta, ii. 359.

1553.—"A Moorish lord called Sabayo (Sabato) . . . as soon as he knew that our ships belonged to the people of those parts of Christendom, desiring to have confirmation on the matter, sent for a certain Polish Jew who was in his service as Xabantar (Xabbandar), and asked him if he knew of what nation were the people who came in these ships. . . ."—Barros, i. iv. 11.

1561.—". . . a boatman, who, however, called himself Xabbandar."—Correa, Lendas, ii. 80.

1599.—"The Sabandar took off my Hat, and put a Roll of white linen about my head. . . ."—J. Davis, in Purchas, i. 12.

[1604.—"Sabindar." See under KLING.]
1606.—"Then came the Sabendor with light, and brought the Generall to his house,"—Middleton's Voyage, E. (4).

1610.—"The Sabander and the Governor of Manock (a place situated by the River). . . ."—Peter Williamson Floris, in Purchas, i. 322.

[1615.—"The opinion of the Sabindour shall be taken."—Foster, Letters, iv. 79.]

c. 1560.—"Coming to Golconda, I found that the person whom I had left in trust with my chamber was dead; but that which I observ'd most remarkable, was that I found the door seal'd with two Seals, one being the Cadi's or chief Justice's, the other the Sha-Bander's or Provost of the Merchants."—Tavernier, E.T. Pt. ii. 196 ; [ed. Ball, ii. 70].

1673.—"The Shawbunder has his Grandeur too, as well as receipt of Custom, for which he pays the King yearly 22,000 Thomands."—Fryer, 222.

1688.—"When we arrived at Achin, I was carried before the Shawbander, the chief Magistrate of the City. . . ."—Dampier, i. 502.

1711.—"The Duties the Honourable Company require to be paid here on Goods are not above one fifth Part of what is paid to the Shawbender or Custom-Master."—Lockyer, 223.

1726.—Valentyna, v. 318, gives a list of the Sjahbandars of Malakka from 1641 to 1725. They are named of Dutchmen.

[1727.—"Shawbandaar." See under TENASSEMER.]

1759.—"I have received a long letter from the Shahzada, in which he complains that you have begun to carry on a large trade in salt, and betel nut, and refuse to pay the duties on those articles . . . which practice, if continued, will oblige him to throw up his post of Shawbunder Droga (Daroga)."—W. Hastings, to the Chief at Dacca, in Van Sittart, i. 5.

1788.—". . . two or three days after my arrival (at Batavia), the landlord of the hotel where I lodged told me he had been ordered by the shebandar to let me know that my carriage, as well as others, must stop, if I should meet the Governor, or any of the council; but I desired him to acquaint the shebandar that I could not consent to perform any such ceremony."—Capt. Carteret, quoted by transl. of Sta. Venetiana, i. 281.

1790.—"The descendant of a Portuguese family, named Jaunsee, whose origin was very low . . . was invested with the important office of Shawbunder, or Intendant of the port, and receiver of the port customs."—Symes, p. 160.

1837.—"The Seyd Mohammad El Mahroockee, the Shabbendar (chief of the Merchants of Cairo) hearing of this event, surnorned a common fellah. . . ."—Lane's Mod. Egyptians, ed. 1837, i. 157.

SHADDOCK, s. This name properly belongs to the West Indies, having been given, according to Grainger, from that of the Englishman who first brought the fruit thither from the East, and who was, according to Crawford, an interloper captain, who traded to the Archipelago about the time of the Revolution, and is mentioned by his contemporary Dampier. The fruit is the same as the pommele (q.v.). And the name appears from a modern quotation below to be now occasionally used in India. [Nothing definite seems to be known of this Capt. Shaddock. Mr. R. C. A. Prior (7 ser. N. & Q., vii. 375) writes: "Lunan, in 'Hortus Jamaicensis,' vol. ii. p. 171, says, 'This fruit is not near so large as the shaddock, which received its name from a Capt. Shaddock, who first brought the plant from the East Indies.' The name of the captain is believed to have been Shattock, one not uncommon in the west of Somersetshire. Sloane, in his 'Voyage to Jamaica,' 1707, vol. i. p. 41 says, 'The seed of this was first brought to Barbados by one Capt. Shaddock, commander of an East Indian ship, who touch'd at that island in his passage to England, and left its seed there.'" Watti (Econ. Dict. ii. 349) remarks that the Indian vernacular name Batāvī nibā, 'Batavian line,' suggests its having been originally brought from Batavia.]

1754.—". . . pimple-noses (pommele), called in the West Indies, Shadock, a very fine large fruit of the citron-kind, but of four or five times its size. . . ."—Ives, 19.]

1784.—"Nor let thy bright impatient flames destroy The golden Shaddock, the forbidden fruit. . . ."—Grainger, Bk. i.

1803.—"The Shaddock, or pumpeenos (pommele), often grows to the size of a man's head."—Perceval's Ceylon, 313.

[1832.—"Several trays of ripe fruits of the season, viz., kurbootahs (shaddock), kabooza (melone). . . ."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 365.]

1878.—". . . the splendid Shaddock that, weary of ripening, lays itself upon the ground and swells at ease. . . ."—In My Indian Garden, 50.

1898.—"He has stripped my rails of the shaddock fruils and the green unpunen pinee."—R. Kipling, Barrack Room Ballads, p. 130.]
SHADE (TABLE-SHADE, WALL-SHADE), s. A glass guard to protect a candle or simple oil-lamp from the wind. The oldest form, in use at the beginning of the last century, was a tall glass cylinder which stood on the table, the candlestick and candle being placed bodily within it. In later days the universal form has been that of an inverted dome fitting into the candlestick, which has an annular socket to receive it. The wall-shade is a bracket attached to the wall, bearing a candle or cocoa-nut oil lamp, protected by such a shade. In the wine-drinking days of the earlier part of last century it was sometimes the subject of a challenge, or forfeit, for a man to empty a wall-shade filled with claret. The second quotation below gives a notable description of a captain's outfit when taking the field in the 18th century.

1780.—"Borrowed last Month by a Person or Persons unknown, out of a private Gentleman's House near the Esplanade, a very elegant Pair of Candle Shades. Whoever will return the same will receive a reward of 40 Sicca Rupees. —N.B. The Shades have private marks."—Hicky's Bengali Gazette, April 8.

1789.—"His tent is furnished with a good large bed, mattress, pillow, &c., a few campstools or chairs, a folding table, a pair of shades for his candles, six or seven trunks with table equipage, his stock of linen (at least 21 shirts); some dozens of wine, brandy, and gin; tea, sugar, and biscuit; and a hamper of live poultry and his milk-goat."—Muoro's Narrative, 188.

1817.—"I am now finishing this letter by candle-light, with the help of a handkerchief tied over the shade."—T. Muoro, in Life, i. 511.

[1838.—"We brought carpets, and chandeliers, and wall shades (the great staple commodity of Indian furniture), from Calcutta. . . ."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, 2nd ed. i. 182.]

SHAGREEN, s. This English word, —French chagrin; Ital. zigrino; Mid. High Ger. Zager,—comes from the Pers. saghrī, Turk. säghrī, meaning properly the croupe or quarter of a horse, from which the peculiar granulated leather, also called säghrī in the East, was originally made. Diez considers the French (and English adopted) chagrin in the sense of vexation to be the same word, as certain hard skins prepared in this way were used as files, and hence the word is used figuratively for gnawing vexation, as (he states) the Ital. vina also is (Etym. Worterbuch, ed. 1861, ii. 240). He might have added the figurative origin of tribulation. [This view is accepted by the N.E.D.; but Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict.) denies its correctness.]

1863.—". . . à Alep . . . on y travaille aussi bien qu'à Damas le sagri, qui est ce qu'on appelle chagrin en France, mais l'on en fait une bien plus grande quantité en Perse . . . Le sagri sa fait de croupe d'ane," &c.—Thevenot, Voyages, iii. 115-116.

1862.—"Saghree, or Koomookt, Horse or Ass-Hide."—Punjab Trade Report, App. cxx.; [For an account of the manufacture of kumukh, see Hoey, Mon. on Trades and Manufactures of N. India, 94.]

SHAITAN, Ar. 'The Evil One; Satan.' Shaitān kāt bhitī, 'Brother of the Arch-Enemy,' was a title given to Sir C. Napier by the Amirs of Sind and their followers. He was not the first great English soldier to whom this title had been applied in the East. In the romance of Cœur de Lion, when Richard entertains a deputation of Saracens by serving at table the head of one of their brethren, we are told:

"Every man sat style and pokyd othir; They saide: 'This is the Destys brothir, That sles our men, and thus hem eetes. . . ."

[c. 1630.—"But a Mountebank or Impostor is nick-named Shaitan, Tabib, i.e. the Devil's Chirurgion."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1671, p. 304.]

1753.—"God preserve me from the Scheithan Alimagh."—Hanway, iii. 90.]

1863.—"Not many years ago, an eccen tric gentleman wrote from Sikkim to the Secretary of the Asiatic Society in Calcutta, stating that, on the snows of the mountains there were found certain mysterious foot-steps, more than 30 or 40 paces awander, which the natives alleged to be Shaitan's. The writer at the same time offered, if Government would give him leave of absence for a certain period, etc., to go and trace the author of these mysterious vestiges, and thus this strange creature would be discovered without any expense to Government. The notion of catching Shaitan without any expense to Government was a sublime piece of Anglo-Indian tact, but the offer was not accepted."—Sir H. Yule, Notes to Friar Jordanus, 37.

SHALEE, SHALOO, SHELLA, SALLO, &c., s. We have a little doubt as to the identity of all these words; the two latter occur in old works as names of cotton stuffs; the first two (Shakespear and Fallon give shālā) are names in familiar use for a soft twilled cotton stuff, of a Turkey-red colour, somewhat resembling what we call, by what we had judged to be a modification of the word, shaloon. But we find that Skeat and other authorities ascribe the latter word to a corruption of Chalons, which gave its name to certain stuffs, apparently bed-coverlets of some sort. Thus in Chaucer:

"With shetes and with chalons faire yspredde."—The Ree's Tale.

On which Tyrwhitt quotes from the Monasticon, "... aut pannos pictos qui vocantur chalons loco lectisternii." See also in Liber Albus:

"La charge de chalouns et draps de Reyenes. ..."—p. 225, also at p. 231.

c. 1343.—"I went then to Shāliyāt (near Calicut—see CHALLA) a very pretty town, where they make the stuffs (qu. shālī?) that bear its name."—Iton Batuta, iv. 109.

[It is exceedingly difficult to disentangle the meanings and derivations of this series of words. In the first place we have saloo, Hind. sālā, the Turkey-red cloth above described; a word which is derived by Platts from Skt. sālā, 'a kind of astrigent substance,' and is perhaps the same word as the Tel. sālū, 'cloth.' This was originally an Indian fabric, but has now been replaced in the bazars by an English cloth, the art of dyeing which was introduced by French refugees who came over after the Revolution (see 7 ser. N. & Q. viii. 485 seq.). See PIECE-GOODS, SALOO-PAUTS.

[c. 1590.—"Shalā, per piece, 3 R. to 2 M."
—Atin, i. 94.

[1610.—"Sallallo, blue and black."—Danvers, Letters, i. 72.

[1672.—"Salooes, made at Guleundah, and brought from thence to Surat, and go to England."—In Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 62.

[1896.—"Salu is another fabric of a red colour prepared by dyeing English cloth named mārkān ('American') in the āl dye, and was formerly extensively used for turbans, curtains, borders of female coats and female dress."—Muhammad Hadi, Mon. on Dyes, 64.

Next we have shelah, which may be identical with Hind. sēlā, which Platts connects with Skt. chela, chaila, "a piece of cloth," and defines as "a kind of scarf or mantle (of silk, or lawn, or muslin; usually composed of four breadths depending from the shoulders loosely over the body: it is much worn and given as a present, in the Dakhkan); silk turban." In the Deccan it seems to be worn by men (Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, Madras reprint, 18). The Madras Gloss. gives sheelay, Mal. shīla, said to be from Skt. chira, 'a strip of cloth,' in the sense of clothes; and sullah, Hind. sēlā, 'gauze for turbans.'

[c. 1590.—"Shelah, from the Dek'han, per piece, ½ to 2 M."—Atin, i. 95.

[1598.—"Cheyla," in Linschoten, i. 91.

[1800.—"Shillas, or thin white muslins. ... They are very coarse, and are sometimes striped, and then called Dupattes (see DOOPUTTY)."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 210.]

1809.—"The shalie, a long piece of coloured silk or cotton, is wrapped round the waist in the form of a petticoat, which leaves part of one leg bare, whilst the other is covered to the ankle with long and graceful folds, gathered up in front, so as to leave one end of the shalie to cross the breast, and form a drapery, which is sometimes thrown over the head as a veil."—Maria Graham, 3. [But, as Sir H. Yule suggested, in this form the word may represent Saree.]

1813.—"Red Shellas or Saloos. ..."—Milburne, i. 124.

[... "His shela, of fine cloth, with a silk or gold thread border. ..."—Trans. Lit. Soc. Bo. iii. 219 seq.

The following may represent the same word, or be perhaps connected with P.—H. chilla, 'a selvage, gold threads in the border of a turban, &c.'

[1610.—"Tyse, the corge, Rs. 70."—Danvers, Letters, i. 72.]

1615.—"320 pieces red zelas."—Foster, Letters, iv. 129. The same word is used by Cocks, Diaryst. Hak. Soc. i. 4.]

SHAMA, s. Hind. shāmā [Skt. syāmā, 'black, dark-coloured.'] A favourite song-bird and cage-bird, Kitta cincla macrura, Gmel. "In confinement it imitates the notes of other birds, and of various animals, with ease and accuracy." (Jerdon). The long tail seems to indicate the identity of this bird rather than the mainā (see Myna) with that described by Aelian. [Mr. M'Crindle (Invasion of India, 186) favours the identification of the bird with the Mainā.]

C. A.D. 250.—"There is another bird found among the Indians, which is of the size of a starling. It is particoloured; and in imitating the voice of man it is more loquacious and clever than a parrot. But it does not readily bear confinement, and yearning for liberty, and longing for intercourse with its kind, it prefers hunger to bondage with fat living. The Macedonians who dwell among the Indians, in the city of Bucephala and thereabouts...call the bird kerekōw ("Taily"); and the name arose from the fact that the bird twitches its tail just like a wagtail."—Aelian, de Nat. Anim. xvi. 9.

SHAMAN, SHAMANISM.

These terms are applied in modern times to superstitions of the kind that connects itself with exorcism and "devil-dancing" as their most prominent characteristic, and which are found to prevail with wonderful identity of circumstance among non-Caucasian races over parts of the earth most remote from one another; not only among the vast variety of Indo-Chinese tribes, but among the Dravidian tribes of India, the Veddahs of Ceylon, the races of Siberia, and the red nations of N. and S. America. Hinduism has assimilated these 'prior superstitions of the sons of Tur,' as Mr. Hodgson calls them, in the form of Tantrika mysteries, whilst, in the wild performance of the Dancing Dervishes at Constantinople, we see, perhaps, again, the infection of Turanian blood breaking out from the very heart of Mussulman orthodoxy" (see Notes to Marco Polo, Bk. II. ch. 50). The characteristics of Shamanism is the existence of certain sooth-sayers or medicine-men, who profess a special art of dealing with the mischievous spirits who are supposed to produce illness and other calamities, and who invoke these spirits and ascertain the means of appeasing them, in trance produced by fantastic ceremonies and convulsive dancings.

The immediate origin of the term is the title of the spirit-conjuror in the Tunguz language, which is shaman, in that of the Manchus becoming saman, pl. samana. But then in Chinese Sha-mân or Shi-mân is used for a Buddhist ascetic, and this would seem to be taken from the Skt. śrāman, Pali samana. Whether the Tanguz word is in any way connected with this or adopted from it, is a doubtful question. W. Schott, who has treated the matter elaborately (Über den Doppelstift des Wortes Schaman und über den tungischen Schamanen-Cultus am Hofe der Mandju Kasern, Berlin Akad. 1842), finds it difficult to suppose any connection. We, however, give a few quotations relating to the two words in one series. In the first two the reference is undoubtedly to Buddhist ascetics.

C. B.C. 320.—"Tois de Σαρμάνασ, tois μὲν εκτιμώτατοι 'Σταλβνας φηναν ονομάζοντες, ζωνταν εν τοις θλαις απο φυλων και καρπων αγρών, εσθήσαν θ' ἧχειν απο φυλων δενδρων, δίφροιν διαρχηται και ονάς."—From Megasthenes, in Strabo, xvi. c. 712. "All the Samas assembled and sent a message to Bajara, saying, "We are devoted. Our religion is one of peace and quiet, and fighting and slaying is prohibited, as well as all kinds of shedding of blood."—Chach Nâma, in Elliot, i. 158.

1829.—"Kami is the Mongol name of the spirit-conjuror or sorcerer, who before the introduction of Buddhism exercised among the Mongols the office of Sacrificer and Priest, as he still does among the Tunguzes, Manjus, and other Asian tribes. ...In Europe they are known by the Tunguz name schaman; among the Manjus saman, and among the Tibetans as Hlaha. The Mongols now call them with contempt and abhorrence Bûh or Bûge, i.e. 'Sorcerer,' 'Wizard,' and the women who give themselves to the like fooleries Udu-gun."—J. J. Schmidt, Notes to Suanang Setzen, p. 416.

1871. "Among Siberian tribes, the shamans select children liable to convulsions as suitable to be brought up to the profession, which is apt to become hereditary with the epileptic tendencies it belongs to."—Tylor, Primitive Culture, ii. 121.

SHAMBOGUE, s. Canar. shâna-or sâna-bhoga: shânîya, 'allowance of grain paid to the village accountant,' Skt. bhoga, 'enjoyment.' A village clerk or accountant.

[c. 1766.—"...this order to be enforced in the accounts by the shanbogue."—Logan, Malabar, iii. 120.

1800. "Shanboga, called Shanbogue by corruption, and Curum by the Musselmans, is the village accountant."—Buchanan's Mysore, i. 268.]

1801. "When the whole kist is collected the shanbogue and potail (see PATEL) carry it to the teshildar's cutcherry."—T. Menro, in Life, i. 316.
SHAMEEANA, SEMIANNA, s. Pers. shamiyana or shāmiyāna [very doubtfully derived from Pers. šah, 'king,' miyāna, 'centre'), an awning or flat-tent-roof, sometimes without sides, but often in the present day with canauts; sometimes pitched like a porch before a large tent; often used by civil officers, when on tour, to hold their court or office proceedings coram populó, and in a manner generally accessible. [In the early records the word is used for a kind of striped calico.]

c. 1590.—"The Shāmyānah-awning is made of various sizes, but never more than of 12 yards square."—John, i. 54.

[1609. — A sort of Calico here called semi- janeses are also in abundance, it is broader than the Calico."—Du Caurier, Letters, i. 29.]

[1613. — 'The Hector having certain chuckers (chucker) of fine Semi chow- ters.'—Ibid. i. 217. In Foster, iv. 288, semanes.]

1616.—"... there is erected a throne four foot from the ground in the Durbar Court from the back whereof, to the place where the King comes out, a square of 56 paces long, and 43 broad was rayed in, and covered with fair Semeanes or Canopies of Cloth of Gold, Silke, or Velvet linnen together, and sustained with Canes so covered."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. Hak. Soc. i. 142.

[1676. — 'We desire you to furnish him with all things necessary for his voyage, ... with bridle and saddle, Semeanoes, canatts (Canaut). ...'—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 89.]

1814.—"I had seldom occasion to look out for gardens or pleasure grounds to pitch my tent or erect my Summimiana or Shamyana, the whole country being generally a garden."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 455; 2nd ed. ii. 64. In ii. 294 he writes Shumeena.

1857.—"At an early hour we retired to rest. Our beds were arranged under large canopies, open on all sides, and which are termed by the natives 'Shameenahs.'"—M. Thornhill, Personal Adventures, 14.

SHAMPOO, v. To knead and press the muscles with the view of relieving fatigue, &c. The word has now long been familiarly used in England. The Hind. verb is champa, from the imperative of which, champó, this is most probably a corruption, as in the case of Bunow, Puckerow, &c. The process is described, though not named, by Terry, in 1616: "Taking thus their ease, they often call their Barbers, who tenderly gripe and smite their Armes and other parts of their bodies instead of exercise, to stirre the bloud. It is a pleasing wantonnesse, and much valued in these hot climes."

(In Purchas, ii. 1475). The process was familiar to the Romans under the Empire, whose slaves employed in this way were styled tractator and tractatrix. [Perhaps the earliest reference to the practice is in Strabo (McCrindle, Ancient India, 73.) But with the ancients it seems to have been allied to vice, for which there is no ground that we know in the Indian custom.

1748.—"Shampooing is an operation not known in Europe, and is peculiar to the Chinese, which I had once the curiosity to go through, and for which I paid but a trifle. However, had I not seen several China merchants shampooed before me, I should have been apprehensive of danger, even at the sight of all the different instruments. ..." (The account is good, but too long for extract.)—A Voyage to the E. Indies in 1747 and 1748. London, 1762, p. 226.

1750-60.—"The practice of champng, which by the best intelligence I could gather is derived from the Chinese, may not be unworthy particularizing, as it is little known to the modern Europeans. ..."—Grose, i. 113. This writer quotes Martial, iii. Ep. 82, and Seneca, Epist. 66, to show that the practice was known in ancient Rome.

1800.—"The Sultan generally rose at break of day; after being champned, and rubbed, he washed himself, and read the Koran for an hour."—Beaton, War with Tippoo, p. 159.

[1810. — "Shamooing may be compared to a gentle kneading of the whole person, and is the same operation described by the voyagers to the Southern and Pacific ocean."—Liske, Hist. Sketches, Madras [reprint, i. 276.]

"Then whilst they fanned the children, or champned them if they were restless, they used to tell stories, some of which dealt of marvels as great as those recorded in the 1001 Nights."—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 410.

"That considerable relief is obtained from shamooing, cannot be doubted; I have repeatedly been restored surprisingly from severe fatigue. ..."—Williamson, V. M. ii. 198.

1813.—"There is sometimes a voluptuousness in the climate of India, a stillness in nature, an indescribable softness, which soothes the mind, and gives it up to the most delightful sensations: independent of the effects of opium, champoing, and other luxuries indulged in by oriental sensualists."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 35; [2nd ed. i. 25.]

SHAN, n.p. The name which we have learned from the Burmese to apply to the people who call themselves the great T'ai, kindred to the Siamese, and occupying extensive tracts in Indo-China, intermediate between Burma, Siam, and China. They are the same people that have been known, after the Portuguese, and some of the early R. C. Missionaries, as Laos (q.v.); but we now give the name an extensive signification covering the whole race. The Siamese, who have been for centuries politically the most important branch of this race, call (or did call themselves—see De la Loubère, who is very accurate) T'ai-Noe or 'Little T'ai,' whilst they applied the term T'ai-Yai, or 'Great T'ai,' to their northern kindred or some part of these; * sometimes also calling the latter T'ai-güit, or the 'Ta'i left behind.' The T'ai or Shan are certainly the most numerous and widely spread race in Indo-China, and innumerable petty Shan States exist on the borders of Burma, Siam, and China, more or less dependent on, or tributary to, their powerful neighbours. They are found from the extreme north of the Irawadi Valley, in the vicinity of Assam, to the borders of Camboja; and in nearly all we find, to a degree unusual in the case of populations politically so segregated, a certain homogeneity in language, civilisation, and religion (Buddhist), which seems to point to their former union in considerable States.

One branch of the race entered and conquered Assam in the 13th century, and from the name by which they were known, Ahom or Aham, was derived, by the frequent exchange of aspirant and sibilant, the name, just used, of the province itself. The most extensive and central Shan State, which occupied a position between Ava and Yunnan, is known in the Shan traditions as Mung-Man, and in Burma by the Buddhista-classical name of Kau-šikambi (from a famous city of that name in ancient India) corrupted by a usual process into Ko-Shan-heap and interpreted to mean 'Nine-Shan-States.' Further south were those T'ai States which have usually been called Laos, and which formed several considerable kingdoms, going through many vicissitudes of power. Several of their capitals were visited and their ruins described by the late Francis Garnier, and the cities of these and many smaller States of the same race, all built on the same general quadrangular plan, are spread broadcast over that part of Indo-China which extends from Siam north of Yunnan.

Mr. Cushing, in the Introduction to his Shan Dictionary (Rangoon, 1881), divides the Shan family by dialectic indications into the Ahoms, whose language is now extinct, the Chinese Shan (occupying the central territory of what was Man or Kansimbé), the Shan (Proper, or Burmese Shan), Laos (or Siamese Shan), and Siamese.

The term Shan is borrowed from the Burmese, in whose peculiar orthography the name, though pronounced Shan, is written rham. We have not met with its use in English prior to the Mission of Col. Symes in 1795. It appears in the map illustrating his narrative, and once or twice in the narrative itself, and it was frequently used by his companion, F. Buchanan, whose papers were only published many years afterwards in various periodicals difficult to meet with. It was not until the Burmese war of 1824-1826, and the active investigation of our Eastern frontier which followed, that the name became popularly known in British India. The best notice of the Shans that we are acquainted with is a scarce pamphlet by Mr. N. Elias, printed by the Foreign Dept. of Calcutta in 1876 (Introd. Sketch of the Hist. of the Shans, &c.). [The ethnology of the race is discussed by J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 187 seqq. Also see Prince Henri d'Orleans, Du Tonkin aux Indes, 1898; H. S. Hallett, Among the Shans, 1885, and A Thousand Miles on an Elephant, 1890.]

Though the name as we have taken it is a Burmese oral form, it seems to be essentially a genuine ethnic name for the race. It is applied in the form Sam by the Assamese, and the Kakhys; the Siamese themselves have an obsolete Sièm (written Siéyam) for themselves, and Sieng (Sieyang) for the Laos. The former word is evidently the Sièm, which the Chinese used in the compound Sièn-lo (for Siam,—see Marco Polo, 2nd ed. Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3), and from which we got, probably through a Malay

* On the probable indication of Great and Little used in this fashion, see remarks in notes on Marco Polo, bk. III. ch. 9.
medium, our Siam (q.v.). The Burmese distinguish the Siamese Shans as Yudia (see JUDEA) Shans, a term perhaps sometimes including Siam itself. Symes gives this (through Arakanese corruption) as 'Yoodra-Shaan,' and he also (no doubt improperly) calls the Manipur people 'Cassay Shaan' (see CASSAY).

1795.—"These events did not deter Shanbuan from pursuing his favourite scheme of conquest to the westward. The fertile plains and populous towns of Manipoora and the Cassay Shaan, attracted his ambition."—Symes, p. 77.

"Zemee (see JANGOMAY), Sandapoora, and many districts of the Yooodra Shaan to the eastward, were tributary, and governed by Chobwas, who annually paid homage to the Birman king."—Ibid., 102.

"Shaan, or Shan, is a very comprehensive term given to different nations, some independent, others the subjects of the greater states."—Ibid., 274.

c. 1815.—"... They were assisted by many of the Zobod (see CHOBWA) or petty princes of the Sciam, subject to the Burmese, who, weary of the oppressions and exactions of the Burmese Mandarins and generals, had revolted, and made common cause with the enemies of their cruel masters. ... The war which the Burmese had to support with these enemies was long and disastrous... instead of overcoming the Sciam (they) only lost day by day the territories... and saw their princes range themselves... under the protection of the King of Siam."—Sangermuno, p. 57.

1861.—"Fie, Fie! Captain Spry! You are surely in joke With your wires and your trams, Going past all the Shams With branches to Bham-yon (see BAMO), and end in A-smoke." Ode on the proposed Yunnan Railway. Bhamo and Ennok were names constantly recurring in the late Capt. Spry's railway projects.

SHANBAFF, SINABAFF, &c., s. Pers. shānbāft. A stuff often mentioned in the early narratives as an export from Bengal and other parts of India. Perhaps indeed these names indicate two different stuffs, as we do not know what they were, except that (as mentioned below) the sinabaff was a fine white stuff. Sinabaff is not in Vuller's Lexicon. Shānbāf is, and is explained as guava panni grossioris, sic descrita (E. T.): "A very coarse and cheap stuff which they make for the sleeves of kābds (see CABAYA) for sale."—Bādhār-i-Ajam. But this cannot have been the character of the stuffs sent by Sultan Mahommed Tughlak (as in the first quotation) to the Emperor of China. [Badger (quoted by Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 153) identifies the word with sina-bāfta, 'China-woven' cloths.]

1943.—"When the aforesaid present came to the Sultan of India (from the Emp. of China)... in return for this present he sent another of greater value... 100 pieces of shirinbāf, and 500 pieces of shānbaft."—Ibn Batūta, iv. 3.

1498.—"The overseer of the Treasury came next day to the Captain-Major, and brought him 20 pieces of white stuff, very fine, with gold embroidery which they call beyramies (beiramee), and other 20 large white stuffs, very fine, which were named sinabafos..."—Correa, E.T. b. Ed. Stanley, 197.

[1568.—See under ALJOFAR.]

1510.—"One of the Persians said: 'Let us go to our house, that is, to Calicent.' I answered, 'Do not go, for you will lose these fine sinabaph' (which were pieces of cloth we carried)."—Vertham, 269.

1516.—"The pintail of this sugar was worth two ducats and a half in Malabar, and a good Sinabâfo was worth two ducats."—Barbosa, 179.

[... "Also they make other stuffs which they call Mamonas (Mahmudis), others dugazas (dogasāt), others chautars (see chowtars, under PIECE-GOODS), others sinabafas, which last are the best, and which the Moors hold in most esteem to make shirts of."—Ibid., Lisbon ed. 362.]

SHASTER, s. The Law books or Sacred Writings of the Hindus. From Skt. śastra, 'a rule,' a religious code, a scientific treatise.

1612.—"... They have many books in their Latin... Six of these they call Xasta, which are the bodies; eighteen which they call Purāna (Poorana), which are the limbs."—Conto, V. vi. 3.

1630.—"... The Banians deliver that this book, by them called the Shasher, or the Book of their written word, consisted of these three tracts."—Lord's Display, ch. viii.

1651.—In Rogerius, the word is everywhere misprinted Iastra.

1717.—"The six Sastrangōl contain all the Points and different Ceremonies in Worship..."—Phillips's Account, 40.

1765.—"... at the capture of Calcutta, A.D. 1756, I lost many curious Gentoo manuscripts, and among them two very correct and valuable copies of the Gentoo Shashist.'—J. Z. Hofwell, Interesting Hist. Events, &c., 2d ed., 1766, i. 3.

1770.—"The Shashist is looked upon by some as a commentary on the vedams, and by others as an original work."—Raynal (tr 1777), i. 50.
1776.—"The occupation of the Bramin should be to read the Beids, and other Shasters."—Halhed, Gentoon Code, 39.

[SHASTREE, s. Hind. śāstrī (see SHASTER). A man of learning, one who teaches any branch of Hindu learning, such as law.

[1824.—"Gungadhor Shastree, the minister of the Baroda state, . . . was murdered by Trimbuckjee under circumstances which left no doubt that the deed was perpetrated with knowledge of Baijow."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 307.]

SHAWL, s. Pers. and Hind. shāl, also doshīla, 'a pair of shawls.' The Persian word is perhaps of Indian origin, from Skt. śavāla, 'variegated.' Sir George Birdwood tells us that he has found among the old India records "Carmania shells" and "Carmania shawools," meaning apparently Ker-mān shawls. He gives no dates unfortunately. [In a book of 1685 he finds "Shawles Carmania" and "Carmania Wool"; in one of 1704, "Chawools" (Report on Old Records, 27, 40). Carmania goats are mentioned in a letter in Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.] In Meninski (published in 1680) shāl is defined in a way that shows the humble sense of the word originally:

"Panni viliores qui partim albi, partim cineritii, partim nigri esse solent ex lana et pilis caprinis; hujusmodi pannum seu telam inijicunt humeris Dervisi . . . instar stolae aut pallii." To this he adds, "Datur etiam sericea ejusmodi tela, fere instar nostri nultiti, sive simplicis sive duplicatis." For this the 2nd edition a century later substitutes: "Shāl-i-Hindī" (Indian shawl), "Tela sericæa subtillissima ex India adferri solita."

c. 1590.—"In former times shawls were often brought from Kashmir. People folded them in four folds, and wore them for a very long time. . . . His Majesty encourages in every possible way the (shāl-bātī) manufacture of shawls in Kashmir. In Lahore also there are more than 1000 workshops."—At ins. ii. 92. [Also see ed. Jarrett, ii. 349, 355.]

c. 1665.—"Il mettent sur eux a toute saison, lorsqu'ils sortent, une Chai, qui est une maniere de toilette d'une laine tres-fine qui se fait a Cashmir. Ces Chais ont environ deux aunes (the old French aune, nearly 47 inches English) de long sur une de large. On les achete vingt-cinq ou trente ecus si elles sont fines. Il y en a meme qui contiennent vingt et une circumstances, mais ces sont les tres-fines."—Thevenot, v. 110.

c. 1666.—"Ces chales sont certaines pieces d'etoffe d'une aule et demie de long, et d'une de large ou environ, qui sont brodees aux deux bouts d'une espèce de broderie, faite au metier, d'un pied ou environ de large. . . . J'en ai vu de ceux que les Omraks font faire exprès, qui coutoient jusqu'a cinquante Roupies; des autres qui sont de cette laine du pays, je n'en ai pas vu qui passaient 50 Roupies."—Bernier, ii. 280-281; [ed. Constable, 402.]

1717.—". . . Con tutto ciò preziosissime nobilissime e senza comparazione magnifiche sono le tele che si chiamano Scial, si nella lingua Hindustana, come ancora nella lingua Persiana. Tali Scial altro non sono, che alcuni manti, che si posano sulla testa, e facendo da man destra, e da man sinistra scendere le due metà, con queste si cinge. . . ."—MS. Narrative of Padre Ip. Desideri.

[1662.—"Another rich Skarf, which they call schal, made of a very fine stuff."—J. Davies, Ambassador's True, Bk. vi. 235, Stanf. Dict.]

1727.—"When they go abroad they wear a Shawl folded up, or a piece of White Cotton Cloth, hanging loose on the Top of their Heads."—A. Hamilton, ii. 50; [Shain in ed. 1744, ii. 49.]

c. 1760.—"Some Shawls are manufactured there. . . . Those coming from the province of Cashemire on the borders of Tartary, being made of a peculiar kind of silky hair, that produces from the loom a cloth beautifully bordered at both ends, with a narrow flowered selvage, about two yards and a half long, and a yard and a half wide . . . and according to the price, which is from ten pounds and upwards to fifteen shillings, join, to exquisite fineness, a substance that renders them extremely warm, and so pliant that the fine ones are easily drawn through a common ring on the finger."—Grose, i. 118.

1781.—Sonnerat writes challes. He says: "Ces étoffes (faites avec la laine des moutons de Tibet) surpassent nos plus belles soieries en finesse."—Voyage, i. 52.

It seems from these extracts that the large and costly shawl, woven in figures over its whole surface, is a modern article. The old shawl, we see, was from 6 to 8 feet long, by about half that breadth; and it was most commonly white, with only a border of figured weaving at each end. In fact what is now called a Rampoor Chudder when made with figured ends is probably the best representation of the old shawl.

SHEEAH, SHIA, s. Arab. shī'a, i.e. 'sect.' A follower (more properly the followers collectively) of the Mahomedan 'sect,' or sects rather, which specially venerate 'Ali, and regard the Imāms (see IMAHM), his descendants, as the true successors to the Caliphate. The Persians (since the accession of the Sophy dynasty, (q.v.)) are Shi'as, and a good many of the Moslems in India. The sects which have followed more or less secret doctrines, and the veneration of hereditary quasi-divine heads, such as the Karmathites and Iṣma'iliya of Musulman history, and the modern Bohras (see BORA) and “Mulāhis,” may generally be regarded as Shi'a. [See the elaborate article on the sect in Hughes, Dict. of Islam, 572 seqq.]

1309.—“... dont encore il est ainsi, que tuit cil qui croient en la joy Haali dient que cil qui croient en la joy Mahomet sont mesrēant; et aussi tuit cil qui croient en la joy Mahomet dient que tuit cil qui croient en la joy Haali sont mesrēant.”—Joinville, 252.

1553.—“Among the Moors have always been controversies ... which of the four first Caliphs was the most legitimate successor to the Caliphate. The Arabians favoured Bubac, Homar, and Ottomman, the Persians (Pareos) favoured Alle, and held the others for usurpers, and as holding it against the testament of Mahamed . . . to the last this schism has endured between the Arabians and the Persians. The latter took the appellation Xiā, as much as to say ‘Union of one Body,’ and the Arabs them call in reproach Rajfady (Rajīdā, a heretic (lit. ‘deserter’)), as much as to say ‘People astray from the Path,’ whilst they call themselves Guny (see SUNNEE), which is the contrary.”—Barros, II. x. 6.

1620.—“The Sunnite adherents of tradition, like the Arabs, the Turks, and an infinite number of others, accept the primacy of those who actually possess it. The Persians and their adherents who are called Shi'as (Scial), i.e. ‘Sectaries,’ are not ashamed of the name, believe in the primacy of those who have only claimed it (without possessing it), and obstinately contend that it belongs to the family of Ali only.”—P. della Valle, ii. 75; [conf. Hak. Soc. i. 152].

1626.—“He is by Religion a Mahometan, descended from Persian Ancestors, and retaineth their opinions, which differing in many points from the Turkies, are distinguished in their Sectes by terrors of Seaw and Sunnas.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 995.

1633.—“Les Persans et Kuzzibaches (Kuzzizibāsh) se disent Schal ... si les Ottomans estoient Schiais, ou de la Secte de Ialty, les Persans se ferioient Sonnis qui est la Secte des Ottomans.”—De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, ed. 1657, 106.

1673.—“His Substitute here is a Chias Moor.”—Fryer, 29.

1798.—“In contradistinction to the Soomas, who in their prayers cross their hands on the lower part of the breast, the Schiabs drop their arms in straight lines.”—G. Forster, Travels, ii. 129.

1805.—“The word Sheeoh or Sheeuet, properly signifies a troop or sect . . . but has become the distinctive appellation of the followers of Aly, or all those who maintain that he was the first legitimate Khaleefa, or successor to Moomhammad.”—Bailie, Digest of Mah. Law, II. xii.

1889.—“La tolerance indienne est venue diminuer dans l’Inde le fanatisme Musulman. La Sonnites et Schïites n’ont point entre eux cette animosité qui divise les Turcs et les Persans . . . ces deux sectes divisent les musulmans de l’Inde ; mais comme je viens de dire, elles n’excitent généralement entre eux aucune animosité.”—Garcín de Tassy, Rel. Mus., p. 12.

1832.—“The dishes of meetah (mīdhā, ‘sweet’) are accompanied with the many varieties of bread common to Hindoostan, without leaven, as Sheeh-maul, bacherkawnie (baḵīr-ḵānī), choppatie (chupatty), &c.; the first two have milk and ghee mixed with the flour, and nearly resemble our pie-crust.”—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 101.

SHEIKH, s. Ar. shaikh; an old man, elder, chief, head of an Arab tribe. The word should properly mean one of the descendants of tribes of genuine Arab descent, but at the present day, in India, it is often applied to converts to Islam from the lower Hindu tribes. For the use of the word in the sense of a saint, see under PEER.

1598.—“Lieutenant (which the Arabians called zēqen).” — Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 24.

1625.—“They will not have them judged by any Custom, and they are content that their Xeque doe determine them as he list.”—Purchas, Pilgrimage, ii. 1148.

1727.—“... but if it was so, that he (Abraham) was their Sheek, as they allledge, they neither follow him in Morals or Religion.”—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 37.

1835.—“Some parents employ a sheykh or fikée to teach their boys at home.” — Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1871, i. 77.]

SHERBET. s. Though this word is used in India by natives in its native (Arab. and Pers.) form sharbat,

* In both written alike, but the final t in Arabic is generally silent, giving sharbat, in Persian sharat. So we get minaar from Pers. and Turk, mánār, in Ar. (and in India) mundra (*māndār, māndār).
‘draught,’ it is not a word now specially in Anglo-Indian use. The Arabic seems to have entered Europe by several different doors. Thus in Italian and French we have sorbetto and sorbet, which probably came direct from the Levantine or Turkish form shrubbat or shurbat; in Sp. and Port. we have xarabe, xazorabe (ash-sharabî, the standard Ar. sharabî, ‘wine or any beverage’), and xaropo, and from these forms probably Ital. sciroppe, sciroppo, with old French yesserop and mod. French sirop; also English syrup, and more directly from the Spanish, shrub. Mod. Span. again gets, by reflection from French or Italian, sorbete and sirop (see Dozy, 17, and Marcel Devic, s.v. sirop). Our sherbet looks as if it had been imparted direct from the Levant. The form shrub is applied in India to all wines and spirits and prepared drinks, e.g. Port-shrub, Sherry-shrub, Lall-shrub, Brandy-shrub, Beer-shrub.

c. 1334.—‘... They bring cups of gold, silver, and glass, filled with sugar-candy-water; i.e. syrup diluted with water. They call this beverage sherbet’ (ash-shurbat).—Inn Batuta, iii. 124.

1554.—‘... potio est gratissima prae-sertim ubi multa nivem, quae Constantino-poli nullo tempore deficit, fuerit refrigerata, Arab Sorbet vocant, hoc est, potionem Arabicam.’—Busby. Ep. i. p. 92.

1578. —“The physicians of the same country use this xarave (of tamarinds) in bilious and ardent fevers.”—Acosta, 67.

c. 1580.—‘Et saccharo potum jucundis-simum parant quem Sarbet vocant.’—Prosper Albaria, Pt. i. p. 70.

1617.—“In Persia there is good wine of grapes which is called Xarab in the language of the country.”—Teixeira, i. 16.

c. 1630.—“Their liquor may perhaps better delight you; ‘tis faire water, sugar, rose-water, and juice of Lemons mixt, call’d Sherbets or Zerbets, wholesome and potable.”—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 241.

1682.—“The Moors ... dranke a little milk and water, but not a drop of wine; they also dranke a little sorbet, and jocollut (see JOCOLE).”—Evelyn’s Diary, Jan 24.

1827.—“On one occasion, before Barakel-Hadgi left Madras, he visited the Doctor, and partook of his sherbet, which he preferred to his own, perhaps because a few glasses of rum or brandy were usually added to enrich the compound.”—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. x.

1837.—“The Egyptians have various kinds of sherbets. The most common kind (called simply shrubbat or shrubbat suok’har ...) is merely sugar and water ... lemonade (ley’moûnâch, or sharab el-leymoon) is another.”—Lane, Mod. Egypt., ed. 1837, i. 206.

1869.—“The Estate overseer usually gave a dance to the people, when the most dissolute of both sexes were sure to be present, and to indulge too freely in the shrub made for the occasion.”—Waddell, 29 Years in the W. Indies, 17.

SHEREEF, s. Ar. sharif, ‘noble.’ A dignitary descended from Mahomed.

1498.—“The ambassador was a white man who was Xarife, as much as to say a clericus” (i.e. clericu).—Rotterio, 2nd ed. 30.

1672.—“Scherifil.” See under CASIS.

1682.—“The first (emissage) was from the Cherif of Meca....”—Bernier, ed. Constable, 133.

1701.—“... ye Sherif of Judda....”—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 232.

SHERISTADAR, s. The head ministerial officer of a Court, whose duty it is to receive plaints, and see that they are in proper form and duly stamped, and generally to attend to routine business. Properly H.—P. from sar-rishtadar-dar or sarishta-dar, ‘register-keeper.’ Sar-risht, an office of registry, literally means ‘head of the string.’ C. P. Brown interprets Sarrishtadar as “he who holds the end of the string (on which puppets dance)”—satirically, it may be presumed. Perhaps ‘keeper of the clue,’ or ‘of the file’ would approximately express the idea.

1786.—“(With the object of establishing) the officers of the Canongoes’s Department upon its ancient footing, altogether independent of the Zemidars ... and to prevent confusion in the time to come. ... For these purposes, and to avail ourselves as much as possible of the knowledge and services of Mr. James Grant, we have determined on the institution of an office well-known in this country under the designation of Chief Serrishtadar, with which we have invested Mr. Grant, to act in that capacity under your Board, and also to attend as such at your deliberations, as well as at our meetings in the Revenue Department.”—Letter from G. G. in C. to Board of Revenue, July 19 (Bengal Rev. Regulation xii.).

1787.—“Nowadays, however, the Serishtadar’s signature is allowed to authen-ticate copies of documents, and the Assistant is thus spared so much drudgery.”—Life in the Mogfussil, i. 117.

SHIBAR, SHIBBAR. 827 SHIKAREE, SHEKARRY.

origin of the name has given rise to much difference of opinion. Mr. Lefanu (Man. of Salem, ii. 19 seq.) thinks that the original name was possibly Shivarayan, whence the German name Shivaraid and the English Shevaroy; or that Shivarayan may by confusion have become Sheravaray, named after the Raja of Sera; lastly, he suggests that it comes from sharpy or sharvon, 'the slope or declivity of a hill, and vay, 'a mouth, passage, way.' This he is inclined to accept, regarding Sheravaray or Shivaray, as 'the cliff which dominates (rayan) the way (vay) which leads through or under the declivity (sharvon). The Madras Gloss. gives the Tam. form of the name as Shivarayanmalai, from Sheran, 'the Chera race,' ivaray, 'king,' and malai, 'mountain.'

[1823. — "Mr. Cockburn . . . had the kindness to offer me the use of a bungalow on the Shervaraya hills. . . ."—Hoote, Missions in Madras, 282.]

SHIBAR, SHIBBAR, s. A kind of coating vessel, sometimes described as a great pattamar. Molesworth (Mahr. Dict. s.v.) gives shibr which, in the usual dictionary way, he defines as 'a ship or large vessel of a particular description.' The Bombay Gazetteer (x. 171) speaks of the 'shibadi,' a large vessel, from 100 to 300 tons, generally found in the Ratnagiri sub-division ports'; and in another place (xiii. Pt. ii. 720) says that it is a large vessel chiefly used in the Malabar trade, deriving the name from Pers. shahbâr, 'royal-carrier.'

[1884.—"The Macadam (MOCUDDUM) of this shibar bound for Goa."—Fule, in Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. clxv.; also see clxxiv.

[1727.—" . . . the other four were Grabs or Gallies, and Sheybars, or half Gallies."—A. Hamilton, ed. 1744, i. 134.

[1758.—" . . . then we cast off a boat called a large seebar, bound to Muscat. . . ."—Ives, 196.]

SHIGRAM, s. A Bombay and Madras name for a kind of hack palanquin carriage. The camel-shigram is often seen on roads in N. India. The name is from Mahr. shgâr, Skt. shghra, 'quick or quickly.' A similar carriage is the Jutkab, which takes its name from Hind. jhatâ, 'swift.'

[1890.—At Bombay, "In heavy coaches, lighter landaulets, or singular-looking shig-rampoes, might be seen bevies of British fair . . ."—Mrs. Elwood, Narr. ii. 376.

[1875.—"As it is, we have to go . . . 124 miles in a dak gharri, bullock shigram, or mail-cart. . . ."—Wilson, Abode of Snow, 18.]

SHIKAR, s. Hind. from Pers. shikâr, 'la chasse'; sport (in the sense of shooting and hunting); game.

e. 1590.—"Ain, 27. Of Hunting (orig. Aïn-i-Shêkâr). Superficial worldly observers see in killing an animal a sort of pleasure, and in their ignorances strive about, as if senseless, on the field of their passions. But deep enquirers see in hunting a means of acquisition of knowledge. . . . This is the case with His Majesty."—Aïn, i. 282.

1609-10.—"Sykary, which signifieth, seeking, or hunting."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 428.

1800.—"250 or 300 horsemen . . . divided into two or three small parties, supported by our infantry, would give a proper shekar; and I strongly advise not to let the Mahratta boundary stop you in the pursuit of your game."—Sir A. Wellesley to T. Munro, in Life of Munro, iii. 117.

1847.—"Yet there is a charm in this place for the lovers of Shikar."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 3.

[1859.—"Although the jungles literally swarm with tigers, a shikar, in the Indian sense of the term, is unknown."—Officinal, Narr. of Mission, i. 25.]

1866.—"May I ask what has brought you out to India, Mr. Cholmondeley? Did you come out for shikar, eh?"—TrelÂ'yman, The Dusk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxiii. 222.

In the following the word is wrongly used in the sense of Shikaree.

[1900.—"That so experienced a shikar should have met his death emphasises the necessity of caution."—Field, Sept. 1.]

SHIKAREE, SHEKARRY, s. Hind. shikârî, a sportsman. The word is used in three ways:

a. As applied to a native expert, who either brings in game on his own account, or accompanies European sportsmen as guide and aid.

[1822.—"Shecaries are generally Hindoos of low cast, who gain their livelihood entirely by catching birds, hares, and all sorts of animals."—Johnson, Sketches of Field Sports, 25.]

1879.—"Although the province (Pegu) abounds in large game, it is very difficult to discover, because there are no regular shikarees in the Indian acceptance of the word. Every village has its local shikaree, who lives by trapping and killing game. Taking life as he does, contrary to the principles of his religion, he is looked upon as damned by his neighbours, but that does not prevent their buying from him the spoils of the chase."—Polllok, Sport in Br. Burmah, &c., i. 13.

b. As applied to the European sportsman himself: e.g. "Jones is well known as a great Shikaree." There are several books of sporting adventure written circa 1860-75 by Mr. H. A. Leveson under the name of 'The Old Shekarry.'

[c. A shooting-boat used in the Cashmire lakes.

[1875.—"A shikāri is a sort of boat, that is in daily use with the English visitors; a light boat manned, as it commonly is, by six men, it goes at a fast pace, and, if well fitted with cushions, makes a comfortable conveyance. A bandātī (see BUNDOOK) shikāri is the smallest boat of all; a shooting punt, used in going after wild fowl on the lakes."—Drew, Jummao, &c., 181.]

SHIKAR-GĀH, s. Pers. A hunting-ground, or enclosed preserve. The word has also a technical application to patterns which exhibit a variety of figures and groups of animals, such as are still woven in brocade at Benares, and in shawl-work in Kashmir and elsewhere (see Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 17, and notes). [The great areas of jungle maintained by the Amirs of Sind and called Shikārgāhs are well known.

[1831.—"Once or twice a month when they (the Amoors) are all in good health, they pay visits to their different shikargahs or preserves for game."—J. Burns, Visit to the Court of Sind, 108.]

SHIKHÓ, n. and v. Burmese word. The posture of a Burmese in presence of a superior, i.e. kneeling with joined hands and bowed head in an attitude of worship. Some correspondence took place in 1883, in consequence of the use of this word by the then Chief Commissioner of British Burma, in an official report, to describe the attitude used by British envoys at the Court of Ava. The statement (which was grossly incorrect) led to remonstrance by Sir Arthur Phayre. The fact was that the envoy and his party sat on a carpet, but the attitude had no analogy whatever to that of shikhō, though the endeavour of the Burmese officials was persistent to involve them in some such degrading attitude. (See KOWTOW.)

"One Kerala Ulppati (i.e. legendary history of Malabar) of the Nasrani, says that their forefathers... built Codunganur, as may be learned from the granite inscription at the northern entrance of the Tiruvan-jiculam temple..." — Ibid. 122.

SHINTOO, SINTOO, s. Japanese Shintau, 'the Way of the Gods.' The primitive relation of Japan. It is described by Faria y Sousa and other old writers, but the name does not apparently occur in those older accounts, unless it be in the Sentó of Couto. According to Kaempfer the philosophic or Confucian sect is called in Japan Shinto. But that hardly seems to fit what is said by Couto, and his Sentó seems more likely to be a mistake for Sentó. [See Lowell's articles on Esoteric Shinto, in Proc. As. Soc. Japan, 1893.]

1612.—"But above all these idols they adore one Seutó, of which they say that it is the substance and principle of All, and that its abode is in the Heavens." — Couto, V. viii. 12.

1727. — "Le Sinto qu'on appelle aussi Sinsju et Kamintsi, est le Culte des Idoles, établi anciennement dans le pays. Sin et Kami sont les noms des Idoles qui font l'objet de ce Culte. Sîu (sic) signifie la Foi, ou la Religion. Sinsja et au pluriel Sinsju, ce sont les personnes qui professent cette Religion." — Kaempfer, Hist. de lapan, i. 176; [E.T. 204].

1770. — "Far from encouraging that gloomy fanaticism and fear of the gods, which is inspired by almost all other religions, the Xinto sect had applied itself to prevent, or at least to moderate that disorder of the imagination." — Raynal (E.T. 1777), i. 187.

1878. — "The indigenous religion of the Japanese people, called in later times by the name of Shintau or Way of the Gods, in order to distinguish it from the way of the Chinese moral philosophers, and the way of Buddha, had, at the time when Confucianism and Buddhism were introduced, passed through the earliest stages of development." — Westminster Rev., N.S., No. 29.

1813.—"I have never tasted this (pomegranate wine), nor any other Persian wine, except that of Schiraz, which, although much extolled by poets, I think inferior to many wines in Europe." — Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 468.]

SHIREENBAF, s. Pers. Shirânbâf, 'sweet-woof.' A kind of fine cotton stuff, but we cannot say more precisely what.

c. 1343.—"... one hundred pieces of shirânbâf..." — Ibn Batuta, iv. 5.

1609.—"Serribâf, a fine light stuff or cotton whereof the Moors make their cabayes or clothing." — Duverger, Letters, i. 29.] 1673. — "siring chintz, Broad Baftas. " — Fryer, 88.
SHISHAM. See under SISSOO.

SHISHMUHULL, s. Pers. shisha-mahal, lit. ‘glass apartment’ or palace. This is or was a common appendage of native palaces, viz. a hall or suite of rooms lined with mirror and other glittering surfaces, usually of a gim-crack aspect. There is a place of exactly the same description, now gone to hideous decay, in the absurd Villa Palagonia at Bagheria near Palermo.

1885.—‘The Shisha-mahal, or house of glass, is both curious and elegant, although the material is principally pounded talle and looking-glass. It consists of two rooms, of which the walls in the interior are divided into a thousand different panels, each of which is filled up with raised flowers in silver, gold, and colours, on a ground-work of tiny convex mirrors.’—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 365.

SHOE OF GOLD (or of Silver). The name for certain ingots of precious metal, somewhat in the form of a Chinese shoe, but more like a boat, which were formerly current in the trade of the Far East. Indeed of silver they are still current in China, for Giles says: ‘The common name among foreigners for the Chinese silver ingot, which bears some resemblance to a native shoe. May be of any weight from 1 oz. and even less, to 50 and sometimes 100 oz., and is always stamped by the assayer and banker, in evidence of purity’ (Gloss. of Reference, 128). [In Hisar the Chinese silver is called sillā from the slabs (stil) in which it is sold (Maclagan, Mon. on Gold and Silver Work in Punjab, p. 5).] The same form of ingot was probably the batish (or yostok) of the Middle Ages, respecting which see Cathay, &c., 115, 481, &c. Both of these latter words mean also ‘a cushion,’ which is perhaps as good a comparison as either ‘shoe’ or ‘boat.’ The word now used in C. Asia is yambū. There are cuts of the gold and silver ingots in Tavernier, whose words suggest what is probably the true origin of the popular English name, viz. a corruption of the Dutch Goldschuigt.

1566.—‘. . . valuable goods exported from this country (China) . . . are first, a quantity of gold, which is carried to India, in leaves in the shape of boats . . .’—C. Federici, in Rambusio, iii. 391b.

1611.—‘Then, I tell you, from China I could load ships with cakes of gold fashioned like boats, containing, each of them, roundly speaking, 2 marks weight, and so each cake will be worth 280 pardossos.”—Conto, Dialogo do Soldado Pratico, p. 155.

1676.—‘The Pieces of Gold mark’d Fig. 1, and 2, are by the Hollanders called Goltacht, that is to say, a Boat of Gold, because they are in the form of a Boat. Other Nations call them Leaves of Gold. . . . The Great Pieces come to 12 hundred Gilders of Holland Money, and thirteen hundred and fifty Livres of our Money.”—Terradossi, Nat. hist. ii. 8.

1702.—‘Soon the Moolah is to be delivered in the Nabob, Dewan, and Buxie. 48 China Oranges, but the Dewan bid the Moolah write the Governor for a hundred more that he might send them to Court; which is understood to be One Hundred shoes of price, or so many thousand pagodas or rupees.”—In Wheeler, i. 897.

1704.—‘Price Current, July, 1704, (at Malacca) . . . Gold, China, in Shoos 94 Touch.”—Lockyer, 70.

1862.—‘A silver ingot ‘Yambu’ weighs about 2 (Indian) seers . . . 4 lbs., and is worth 165 Co.’s rupees. Roomoosh, also called ‘Yamchucka,’ or small silver ingot, is worth 33 Rs. . . . 5 yambuchas, being equal to 1 yambu. There are two descriptions of ‘yamchucka’: one is a square piece of silver, having a Chinese stamp on it; the other . . . in the form of a boat, has no stamp. The Yambu is in the form of a boat, and has a Chinese stamp on it.”—Punjab Trade Report, App. ccxxxvi.—xxviii. 1.

1875.—‘The yambū or kārs is a silver ingot something the shape of a deep boat with projecting bow and stern. The upper surface is lightly hollowed, and stamped with a Chinese inscription. It is said to be pure silver, and to weigh 50 (Cashghar) far 30,000 grams English.”—Report of Forsyth’s Mission to Kashghar, 494.

[1876.—‘. . . he received his pay in Chinese yambs (gold coins), at the rate of 128 rubles each, while the real commercial value was only 115 rubles.”—Schuyler, Turkistan, ii. 322.

[1901.—A piece of Chinese shoe money, value 10 taels, was exhibited before the Numismatic Society.—Athenaeum, Jan. 26, p. 113. Perhaps the largest specimen known of Chinese ‘boat-money’ was exhibited. It weighed 894 ounces troy, and represented 50 taels, or 43, 8s. 6d. English.—Ibid. Jan. 25, 1902, p. 120].

SHOE-FLOWER, s. A name given in Madras Presidency to the flower of the Hibiscus Rosa-sinensis, L. It is a literal translation of the Tam. shapattupu, Singh. sappattumala, a name given because the flowers are used at Madras to blacken shoes. The Malay name Kempang sapatu means the same. Voigt gives shoe-flower as the English name, and adds: ‘Petals astringent, used by the Chinese to blacken their shoes (?) and eyebrows" (Hortus Suburbanus Calculennis, 116-7); see also Drury, s.v. The notion of the Chinese blackening their shoes is surely an error, but perhaps they use it to blacken leather for European use.

[1773.—"The flower (Trepalta, or Moorcock) (which commonly by us is called Shoe-flower, because used to black our shoes) is very large, of a deep but beautiful crimson colour."—Tees, 475.]

1791.—"La nuit suivante . . . je joignis aux pavots . . . une fleur de foule sapatte, qui sert aux cordonniers à teindre leurs cuirs en noir."—B. de St. Pierre, Chaumière Indienne. This foule-sapatte is apparently some quasi Hindustani form of the name (phul-sabāt) used by the Portuguese.

SHOEGOOSE, s. This ludicrous corruption of the Pers. siyāghosh, lit. 'black-ear,' i.e. lynx (Felix Caracal) occurs in the passage below from A. Hamilton. [The corruption of the same word by the Times, below, is equally amusing.]

[c. 1390.—". . . ounces, and another kind something like a greyhound, having only the ears black, and the whole body perfectly white, which among these people is called Siagois."—Friar Jordanaus, 18.]

1727.—"Antelope, Hares and Foxes, are their wild game, which they hunt with Dogs, Leopards, and a small fierce creature called by them Shoe-goose."—A. Hamilton, i. 124; [ed. 1744, i. 125].

1802.—". . . between the cat and the lion, are the . . . syaghush, the lynx, the tiger-cat. . . ."—Rilson, Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food, 12.

1813.—"The Moguls train another beast for antelope-hunting called the Syah-gush, or black-ears, which appears to be the same as the caracal, or Russian lynx."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 277; [2nd ed. i. 175 and 169].

[1886.—"In 1760 a Moor named Abdallah arrived in India with a 'Shah Goest' (so spelt, evidently a Shali Goat) as a present for Mr. Secretary Pitt."—Account of I. O. Records, in Times, Aug. 3.]

SHOKE, s. A hobby, a favourite pursuit or whim. Ar.—shauk.

1796.—"This increased my shouq . . . for soldiering, and I made it my study to become a proficient in all the Hindostanee modes of warfare."—Mily. Mem. of Lit.-Col. J. Skinner, i. 109.

[1886.—"One Hakim has a shouk for turning everything ootapooatta."—Confessions of an Orderly, 94.]

SHOLAS, s. In S. India, a wooded ravine; a thicket. Tam. sholāi.

1862.—"At daylight . . . we left the Sisipara bungalow, and rode for several miles through a valley interspersed with sholas of rhododendron trees."—Markham, Peru and India, 356.

1876.—"Here and there in the hollows were little jungles; sholas, as they are called."—Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, Notes of Indian Journey, 202.

SHOOCKA, s. Ar.—H. shukka (properly 'an oblong strip'), a letter from a king to a subject.

1787.—"I have received several melancholy Shukhas from the King (of Dehli) calling on me in the most pressing terms for assistance and support."—Letter of Lord Cornwallis, in Corresp. i. 307.

SHOOLDARRY, s. A small tent with steep sloping roof, two poles and a ridge-piece, and with very low side walls. The word is in familiar use, and is habitually pronounced as we have indicated. But the first dictionary in which we have found it is that of Platts. This author spells the word chooldari, identifying the first syllable with jhol, signifying 'puckering or bagging.' In this light, however, it seems possible that it is from jhāl in the sense of a bag or wallet, viz. a tent that is crammed into a bag when carried. [The word is in Fallon, with the rather doubtful suggestion that it is a corruption of the English 'soldier's' tent. See PAWL.]

1808.—"I have now a shooldarry for myself, and a long paul (see PAWL) for my people."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 183.

[1869.—". . . the men in their suldaris, or small single-roofed tents, had a bad time of it. . . ."—Ball, Jungle Life, 156.]

SHRAUBE, SHROBB, s. Ar. sharāb; Hind. sharāb, shrāb, 'wine.' See under SHERBET.

SHROFF, s. A money-changer, a banker. Ar. sārāf, saīrafi, saīraf. The word is used by Europeans in China as well as in India, and is there applied to the experts who are employed by banks and mercantile firms to check the quality of the dollars that pass into the houses (see Giles under next word). Also shroffage, for money-dealer's commission. From the same root comes the Heb. sōrēf, 'a goldsmith.' Compare the figure in Malachi, iii. 3: 'He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi.” Only in Hebrew the goldsmith tests metal, while the sarvaf tests coins. The Arab poet says of his muse: “Her forefeet scatter the gravel every midday, as the dirhams are scattered at their testing by the sarvaf” (W. R. S.)

1554.—“Salaries of the officers of the Custom Houses, and other charges for these which the Treasurers have to pay. . . . Also to the Xarraf, whose charge it is to see to the money, two pardaos a month, which make for a year seven thousand and two hundred reis.”—Botelho, Tombo, in Subsidios, 298.

1560.—“There are in the city many and very wealthy carafos who change money.”—Tenreiro, ch. 1.

1584.—“5 tangas make a seraphin (see XERAFINE) of gold; but if one would change them into basarachies (see BUDGROOK) he may have 5 tangas and 16 basarachies, which onerously they call cerafagio . . . .”—Barret, in Hakl. ii. 410.

1585.—“This present year, because only two ships came to Goa, (the rare) have sold at 12 per cent. of Xarafaggio (shroffage), as this commission is called, from the word Xaraf, which is the title of the banker.”—Sassetti, in De Gubernatis, Storia, p. 203.

1598.—“There is in every place of the street exchangers of money, by them called Xarafos, which are all christian Jews.”—Löschoten, 66; [Hak. Soc. i. 231, and see 244.]

c. 1610.—“Dans ce Marché . . . aussi sont les changeurs qu’ils nomment Cherafes, dont il y en a en plusieurs autres endroits; leurs boutiques sont aux bouts des rues et carrefours, toutes couvertes de monnaye, dont ils payent tribut au Roy.”—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 39; [Hak. Soc. ii. 67].

[1614.—“. . . having been borne in hand by our Sarafes to pay money there.”—Foster, Letters, iii. 282. The “Sheriff of Bantam” (ibid. iv. 7) may perhaps be a shroff, but compare Shereef.]

1673.—“It could not be improved till the Governor had released the Shroffs or Bankers.”—Pryer, 113.

1697.—“In addition to the cash and property which they had got by plunder, the enemy fixed two locs of rupees as the price of the ransom of the prisoners. . . . To make up the balance, the Sarras and merchants of Nandurbâr were importuned to raise a sum, small or great, by way of loan. But they would not consent.”—Khâfî Khân, in Elliot, vij. 362.

1750.—“. . . the Irruption of the Mo-rattas into Carnatic, was another event that brought several eminent Shroffs and wealthy Merchants into our Town; insomuch, that I may say, there was hardly a Shroff of any Note, in the Mogul empire but had a House in it; in a word, Madras was become the Admiration of all the Country People, and the Envy of all our European Neighbours.”—Letter to a Proprieter of the E. I. Co. 53-54.

1809.—“I had the satisfaction of hearing the Court order them (i.e. Gen. Martin’s executors) to pay two lacs and a half to the plaintiff, a shroff of Lucknow.”—Ed. Valenta, 1. 243.

[1891.—“The banker in Persia is looked on simply as a small tradesman—in fact the business of the Serof is despised.”—Willa, in the Land of the Lion and the Sun, 192].

SHROFF, TO, v. This verb is properly applied to the sorting of different rupees or other coins, so as to discard refuse, and to fix the various amounts of discount or agio upon the rest, establishing the value in standard coin. Hence figuratively ‘to sift,’ choosing the good (men, horses, facts, or what not) and rejecting the inferior.

[1554.—(See under BATTA, b.)]

1878.—“Shroffing schools are common in Canton, where teachers of the art keep bad dollars for the purpose of exercising their pupils; and several jwoks on the subject have been published there, with numerous illustrations of dollars and other foreign coins, the methods of scooping out silver and filling up with copper or lead, comparisons between genuine and counterfeit dollars, the difference between native and foreign milling, etc., etc.”—Giles, Glossary of Reference, 129.

1882.—(The Compradore) “derived a profit from the process of shroffing which (the money received) underwent before being deposited in the Treasury.”—The Fankraw at Canton, 55.

SHRUB, s. See under SHERBET.

SHULWAURS, s. Trousers, or drawers rather, of the Oriental kind, the same as pyjammas, long-drawers, or mogul-breeches (qq.v). The Persian is shubvdr, which according to Prof. Max Müller is more correctly shubâr, from shul, ‘the thigh,’ related to Latin crus, curris, and to Skt. kshuras or khura, ‘hoof’ (see Pusey on Daniel, 570). Be this as it may, the Ar. form is surwâl (vulg. sharwâl), pl. surâwâl, [which Burton (Arab. Nights, i. 205) translates ‘bag-trowsers’ and ‘petticoat-trowsers,’ “the latter being the divided skirt of the future.”] This appears in the ordinary editions of the Book of Daniel in Greek, as ἀράβδαπα, and also in the Vulgate, as follows: “Et capillus capitis eorum non esset adustus, et sarabala eorum non fuissent immutata, et odor ignisnon transisset per eos" (iii. 27). The original word is sarbāla, pl. of sarbāla, Luther, however, renders this Mantel; as the A.V. also does by coats; [the R.V. hosen]. On this Prof. Robertson-Smith writes:

"It is not certain but that Luther and the A.V. are right. The word sarbāla means 'cloak' in the Gemara; and in Arabic sirdal is 'a garment, a coat of mail.' Perhaps quite an equal weight of scholarship would now lean (though with hesitation) towards the cloak or coat, and against the breeches theory.

"The Arabic word occurs in the Traditions of the Prophet (Bokhari, vii. 36).

"Of course it is certain that sārābāra comes from the Persian, but not through Arabic. The Bedouins did not wear trowsers in the time of Ammanius, and don't do so now.

"The ordinary so-called LXX. editions of Daniel contain what is really the post-Christian version of Theodotion. The true LXX. text has ὑπόδυμα.

"It may be added that Jerome says that both Aquila and Symmachus wrote saraballa. [The Encyc. Biblica also prefers the rendering of the A.V. (i. 607), and see iii. 2994.]

The word is widely spread as well as old; it is found among the Tartars of W. Asia as jalbar, among the Siberians and Bashkirds as sălbur, among the Kalmucks as šalbur, whilst it reached Russia as sharwari, Spain as saraguelles, and Portugal as sarelos. A great many Low Latin variations of the word will be found in Ducange, sarabula, sarabulla, sarabella, sarabola, sarabura, and more! [And Crawford (Desc. Dict. 124) writes of Malay dress: "Trowsers are occasionally used under the sarung by the richer classes, and this portion of dress, like the imitation of the turban, seems to have been borrowed from the Arabs, as is implied by its Arabic name, sarual, corrupted salwar."]

In the second quotation from Isidore of Seville below it will be seen that the word had in some cases been interpreted as 'turbans.'

A.D. (1).—"Kal ēthēwrouν τον άνδρα διώ ούν ἐκτριβετε τό πθ τού άνδρα τάφοι αὐτῶν καὶ ἡ θραί τῇ κεφαλίς αὐτῶν οὐκ ἐφλυγίζει καὶ τα σαράβαρα αὐτῶν οὐκ ἠλωθεν, καὶ σομή πυρός οὐκ ἦν ἐν αὐτοῖς."—Gr. Tr. of Dan. iii. 27.

Thilo, 191.

SIAM, n.p. This name of the Indo-Chinese Kingdom appears to come to us through the Malays, who call it Sīyūm. From them we presume the Portuguese took their Reyno de Sīdō as Barros and Couto write it, though we have in Correa Siam precisely as we write it. Camões also writes Sūdō for the kingdom; and the statement of De la Loubère quoted below that the Portuguese used Siam as a national, not a geographical, expression cannot be accepted in its generality, accurate as that French writer usually is. It is true that both Barros and F. M. Pinto use os Siames for the nation, and the latter also uses the adjective form o reino Siame. But he also constantly says reys de Siam. The origin of the name would seem to be a term Sien, or Siame, identical with Shan (q.v.). "The kingdom of Siam is known to the Chinese by the name Sien-lo. . . .
The supplement to Matvlin's Encyclopedia describes Sien-lo as on the seaboard, to the extreme south of Chen-ching (or Cochín China). 'It originally consisted of two kingdoms, Sien and Lo-hoh. The Sien people are the remains of a tribe which in the year (A.D. 1341) began to come down upon the Lo-hoh and united with the latter into one nation.' See Marco Polo, 2nd ed., Bk. iii. ch. 7, note 3. The considerations there adduced indicate that the Lo who occupied the coast of the Gulf before the descent of the Sien, belonged to the Loutian Shans, Thainvayi, or Great Tai, whilst the Sien or Siamese Proper were the Tai Noi, or Little Tai. (See also SARNAU.)
["The name Siam . . . whether it is 'a barbarous Anglicism derived from the Portuguese or Italian word Siciana,' or is derived from the Malay Sayam, which means 'brown.'"—J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 205.]

1516.—"Proceeding further, quitting the kingdom of Pegu, along the coast over against Malaca there is a very great kingdom of pagans which they call Danseam (of Anseam); the king of which is a pagan also, and a very great lord."—Barbana (Lisbon, Acad.), 369. It is difficult to interpret this Anseam, which we find also in C. Federici below in the form Asion. But the An is probably a Malay prefix of some kind. [Also see anysane in quotation from the same writer under MALACCA.]

C. 1522.—"The king (of Zumba) answered him that he was welcome, but that the custom was that all ships which arrived at his country or port paid tribute, and it was only 4 days since that a ship called the Junk of Ciama, laden with gold and slaves, had paid him his tribute, and to verify what he said, he showed them a merchant of the said Ciama, who had remained there to trade with the gold and slaves."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 85.

"All these cities are constructed like ours, and are subject to the king of Siam, who is named Siri Zaebedera, and who inhabits Indua (see JUDEA)."—Ibid.
156.

1525.—"In this same Port of Pam (Pahang), which is in the kingdom of Syam, there was another junk of Malaca, the captain whereof was Alvaro da Costa, and it had aboard 15 Portuguese, at the same time that in Joatane (Patane) they seized the ship of Andre de Bryto, and the junk of Gaspar Sourez, and as soon as this news was known they laid hands on the junk and the crew and the cargo; it is presumed that the people were killed, but it is not known for certain."—Lembrança das Coisas da India, 6.

1572.—"Vés Pam, Patâne, reinos e a longura
De Syão, que este es outros mais sujeita;
Olho o rio Menão que se derrama
Do grande lago, que Chiamay se chiama."
Câmões, x. 25.

By Burton:

"See Pam, Patane and in length obscure, Siam that ruleth all with lordly sway;
behold Menam, who rolls his lordly tide from source Chiamal called, lake long and wide."

C. 1567.—"Va etiandio ogni anno per fu pressa dal Re del Pegu, qual caminando per terra quattro mesi di viaggio, con vn cercato d'vn million, e quattro cento mila uomini da guerra, la venne ad assediare

. . . e lo so io perciò d'ogni contadino in Pegh seis mesi dopo la sua partita."—Ibid.

1598.—". . . The King of Sian at this

Soc. Rep. 102. ii. 1 Sian.]

[1611. "We hawe newes that the Hollanders were in Shian."—Dowers, Letters,
i. 149.]

1688.—"The Name of Siam is unknown to the Siamese. 'Tis one of those words which the Portugues of the Indies do use, and of which it is very difficult to discover the Original. They use it as the Name of the Nation and not of the Kingdom: And the Names of Pegu, Lao, Mogul, and most of the Names which we give to the Indian Kingdoms, are likewise National Names."— De la Lombe, E.T. p. 6.

SICCA, s. As will be seen by reference to the article RUPEE, up to 1835 a variety of rupees had been coined in the Company's territories.
The term sicca (sikkā, from Ar. sikka,
'a coining die,'—and 'coining money,' whence Pers. sikka zudān, 'to coin') had been applied to newly coined rupees, which were at a batta or premium over those worn, or assumed to be worn, by use. In 1793 the Government of Bengal, with a view to terminating, as far as that Presidency was concerned, the confusion and abuses engendered by this system, ordered that all rupees coined for the future should bear the impress of the 19th year of Shah Alam (the "Great Mogul" then reigning), and this rupee, "19 San Sikkah," struck in the 19th year, was to be the legal tender in Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa. This rupee, which is the Sicca of more recent monetary history, weighed 192 grs. troy, and then contained 176.13 grs. of pure silver. The "Company's Rupee," which introduced uniformity of coinage over British India in 1835, contained only 165 grs. silver. Hence the Sicca bore to the Company's Rupee (which was based on the old Farrukhabad rupee) the proportion of 16:15 nearly. The Sicca was allowed by Act VII. of 1833 to survive as an exceptional coin in Bengal, but was abolished as such in 1836. It continued, however, a ghostly existence for many years longer in the form of certain Government Book-debts in that currency. (See also CHICK.)

1537.—"... Sua senhoria avia d'aver por bem que as siquas das moedas corresem em seu nome per todo o Reino do Guzerate, assy em Dio como nos outros lugares que forem do Rey de Portuguese."—Treaty of Nuno de Carvalho with Nizamommed Zamam (Mikommommed Zamam) concerning Cambodia, in Botelho, Tomo, 225.

1537.—"... e quanto á moeda ser chapada de sua siva (read sica) pois já lhe concedia."—Ibid. 226.

[1615.—"... cecaus of Amadavrs which goeth fo eighty-six pious (see PICE). ..."
—Foster, Letters, iii. 87.]

1683.—"Having received 25,000 Rupees Siccas for Rajamaul."—Hedges, Diary, April 4; [Hak. Soc. i. 75].

1705.—"Les roupies Sicca valent á Bengal 39 sols."—Ludlitt, 255.

1779.—"In the 2nd Term, 1779, on Saturday, March 6th: Judgment was pronounced for the plaintiff. Damages fifty thousand Sicca rupees.

"... 50,000 Sicca Rupees are equal to five thousand one hundred and nine pounds, two shillings and elevenpence sterling, reckoning according to the weight and fineness of the silver."—Notes of Mr. Justice Hyde on the case Grand v. Francis, in Echos of Old Calcutta, 243. [To this Mr. Bysteed adds: "Nor does there seem to be any foundation for the other time-honoured story (also repeated by Kaye) in connection with this judgment, viz., the alleged interruption of the Chief Justice, while he was delivering judgment, by Mr. Justice Hyde, with the eager suggestion or reminder of 'Siccas, Siccas, Brother Impye,' with the view of making the damages as high at the awarded figure as possible. Mr. Merivale says that he could find no confirmation of the old joke. ... The story seems to have been first promulgated in a book of 'Personal Recollections' by John Nicholls, M.P., published in 1822."—Ibid. 3rd ed. 229]. 1833.—* * *

"IV.—The use of the sicca weight of 179.666 grains, hitherto employed for the receipt of bullion at the Mint, being in fact the weight of the Moosshedabad rupee of the old standard ... shall be discontinued, and in its place the following unit to be called the Tola (q.v.) shall be introduced."—India Regulation VII. of 1833.

[SICKMAN, s. adj. The English sick man has been adopted into Hind. sepyo patois as meaning 'one who has to go to hospital,' and generally sikmain ho jatna means 'to be disabled."

[1665.—"That sickman Chaseman."—In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. cclxxx.

[1843.—"... my hired cart was broken —or, in the more poetical garb of the sepachee, 'seek mân hagya,' i.e. become a sick man."—Davidson, Travels, i. 251.]

SICLEEGUR, s. Hind. saikolgar, from Ar. saikul, 'polish.' A furbisher of arms, a sword-armourer, a sword- or knife-grinder. [This, in Madras, is turned into Chickledar, Tel. chikilli-darudhu.]

[1826.—"My father was a sheikul-ghur, or sword-grinder."—Panadwarg Hari, ed. 1873, i. 216.]

SIKH, SEIKH, n.p. Panjab-Hind. Sikh, 'a disciple,' from Skt. Sishya; the distinctive name of the disciples of Nanak Shâh who in the 16th century established that sect, which eventually rose to warlike predominance in the Punjab, and from which sprang Ranjit Singh, the founder of the brief Kingdom of Lahore.

c. 1650-60.—"The Nanak-Panthians, who are known as composing the nation of the Sikhs, have neither idols, nor temples of idols. . ." (Much follows.) — Dabistân, ii. 246.

1708-9.—"There is a sect of infidels called Gurâ (see GOOROO), more commonly known as Sikhs. Their chief, who dresses as a fakir, has a fixed residence at Lahore. . . This sect consists principally of Jâts and Khâtirs of the Panjab and other tribes of infidels. When Aurangzeb got knowledge of these matters, he ordered these deity Gurâs to be removed and the temples to be pulled down." — Khâfi Khân, in Elliot, vii. 413.

1756.—"April of 1716, when the Emperor took the field and marched towards Lahore, against the Sykes, a nation of Indians lately reared to power, and bearing mortal enmity to the Mahomedans." — Orme, ii. 22. He also writes Sikhs.

1781.—"Before I left Calcutta, a gentleman with whom I wished to be discoursing of that sect who are distinguished from the worshippers of Brijhu, and the followers of Mahomed by the appellation Seek, informed me that there was a considerable number of them settled in the city of Patna, where they had a College for teaching the tenets of their philosophy." — Wilkins, in As. Res. i. 238.

1781-2.—"In the year 1128 of the Hedjra" (1716) "a bloody action happened in the plains of the Pendjab, between the Syces and the Imperialists, in which the latter, commanded by Abdol-semed-Khan, a famous Viceroy of that province, gave these inhuman freebooters a great defeat, in which their General, Benda, fell into the victors' hands. . . He was a Syce by profession, that is one of those men attached to the tenets of Guru-Govind, and who from their birth or from the moment of their admission never cut or shave either their beard or whiskers or any hair whatever of their body. They form a particular Society as well as a sect, which distinguishes itself by wearing almost always blue cloaths, and going armed at all times." &c.—Seir Mutaqerîn, i. 87.

1782.—"News was received that the Seiks had crossed the Jumna." — India Gazette, May 11.

1783.—"Unhurt by the Sicques, tigers, and thieves, I am safely lodged at Nourpurs." — Forster, Journey, ed. 1808, i. 247.

1784.—"The Seecks are encamped at the distance of 12 coss from the Pass of Dirderry, and have plundered all that quarter." — In Seton-Karr, i. 13.

1790.—"Particulars relating to the seizure of Colonel Robert Stewart by the Sicques." — Calc. Monthly Register, &c., i. 152.

1810.—Williamson (V.M.) writes Seeks.

The following extract indicates the prevalence of a very notable error:—

1840.—"Runjet possesses great personal courage, a quality in which the Sikhs (sic) are supposed to be generally deficient." — Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjet Singh, 88. We occasionally about 1845-6 saw the word written by people in Calcutta, who ought to have known better, Sheiks.

SILBOOT, SILPET, SLIPPET, s. Domestic Hind. corruptions of 'slipper.' The first is an instance of "striving after meaning" by connecting it in some way with 'boot.' [The Railway 'sleeper' is in the same way corrupted into slippet.]

SILLADAR, adj. and s. Hind. from Pers. silâh-dâr, 'bearing or having arms,' from Ar. silâh, 'arms.' [In the Arabian Nights (Burton, ii. 114) it has the primary sense of an 'armour-bearer.'] Its Anglo-Indian application is to a soldier, in a regiment of irregular cavalry, who provides his own arms and horse; and sometimes to regiments composed of such men—"a corps of Silladar Horse." [See Irvine, The Army of the Indian Moghuls, (J. R. As. Soc., July 1806, p. 549.)]

1766.—"When this intelligence reached the Nawaub, he leaving the whole of his troops and baggage in the plains, with only 6000 stable horse, 9000 Silladârs, 4000 regular infantry, and 6 guns . . . fell bravely on the Mahrattas. . . ."—Mir Hussein Ali, ii. of Hyder Nâzir, 178. 1804.—"It is my opinion, that the arrangement with the Soubah of the Deccan should be, that the whole of the force . . . should be silladar horse." — Wellington, iii. 671.

1813.—"Bhôn . . . in the prosecution of his plan, selected Malhar Row Holcar, a Silledar or soldier of fortune." — Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 349.

[SILLAPOSH, s. An armour-clad warrior; from Pers. silâh, 'body armour,' posh, Pers. poshâdan, 'to wear,' (1792)—"The Sillah posh or body-guard of the Rajah (of Jaipur)." — W. Frantclín, Mil. Mem. of Mr. George Thomas, ed. 1805, p. 165.

[1829.—". . . he stood two assaults, in one of which he slew thirty Sillâbopsh, or men in armour, the body-guard of the prince." — Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, ii. 462.]

SILMAGOOB, s. Ship Hind. for 'sail-maker' (Roebuck).

SIMKIN, s. Domestic Hind. for champagne, of which it is a corruption; sometimes samkin.

1853.—"The dinner was good, and the iced simkin, Sir, delicious." — Oakfield, ii. 127.
SIND, SCINDE, &c., n.p. The territory on the Indus below the Punjab. [In the early inscriptions the two words Sindhu-Sawriro are often found conjoined, the latter probably part of Upper Sind (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 36)]. The earlier Mahommedans hardly regarded Sind as part of India, but distinguished sharply between Sind and Hind, and denoted the whole region that we call India by the copula 'Hind and Sind.' We know that originally these were in fact but diverging forms of one word; the aspirant and sibilant tending in several parts of India (including the extreme east—compare Assam, Ahom—and the extreme west), as in some other regions, to exchange places.

C. 545.—"Συνδό, "Οροφθα, Καλλάνα, Σακβδο και Μαλέ πέντε επιφορά εχονσα." —Cosmas, lib. xi.

770.—"Per idem tempus quingenti circa urbe Mauris, Sindis, et Chazaris servit in urbis Haran rebellarunt, et facto agmine regionem tamen diripere tentarunt." —Diomysii Patriarchae Chronicon, in Assamani, ii. 114. But from the association with the Khazars, and in a passage on the preceding page with Alans and Khazars, we may be almost certain that these Sind are not Indian, but a Sarmatic people mentioned by Ammianus (xxii. 5), Valerius Flaccus (vi. 56), and other writers.

C. 1630.—"Sind and her sister (i.e. Hind) trembled at his power and vengeance." —Al l'Uffi, in Elliot, ii. 32.

C. 1810.—"Mohammed-ben-Jousout Thakaoui trouvà dans la province de Sind quarante behar (see Bahar) d'or, et chaque behar comprend 333 mons." —Skhidbaddin Dimishkii, in Not. et Ext. xiii. 173.

1525.—"Expenses of Mheyqyys (i.e. Malik Ayaz of Diu):—1,000 foot soldiers (lasqyara), viz., 300 Arabs, at 40 and 50 fedeas each; also 200 Corones (Khorasans) at the wage of the Arabs; also 200 Guzarates and Cymdes at 25 to 30 fedeas each; also 30 Rumes at 100 fedeas each; 120 Fartaqyys at 50 fedeas each. Horse soldiers (Lasqyara ou guanalo), whom he supplies with horses, 300 at 70 fedeas a month." —Lembranca, p. 37. The preceding extract is curious as showing the comparative value put upon Arabs, Khorasans (qu. Afghans?), Sindis, Ramins (i.e. Turks), Farakis (Arabs of Hadratmout), &c.

1548.—"And the rent of the shops (baticea) of the Guzaratis of Cindy, who prepare rice (parice) and parched rice (uned), paying 6 bazarucos (see Budgroom) a month." —Botelho, Tombo, 1556.

1563.—"Towards the Gulf of Chakad, in the vicinity of Sind." —Sidr' Ali, in J. As. Soc. i. tom. i. 67.

1583.—"The first city of India...after we had passed the coast of Zindi is called Diu." —Fitch, in Hakl. p. 385.

1584.—"Spicknald from Zindi and Lahor." —W. Barret, in Hakl. ii. 412.

1598.—"I have written to the said Antonio d'Azevedo on the ill treatment experienced by the Portuguese in the kingdom of Cimde." —King's Letter to Goa, in Archiv. Port. Orient. Fascic. iii. 877. [1610.—"Tzinde, are silk cloths with red stripes." —Davners, Letters, i. 72.]

1611.—"Cuts-nagore, a place not far from the River of Zinde." —N. Dowton, in Purchas, i. 307.

1613.—"...considering the state of destination in which the fortress of Ormuz had need be,—since it had no other resources but the revenue of the custom-house, and there could now be returning nothing, from the fact that the ports of Cambaia and Sinde were closed, and that no ship had arrived from Goa in the current monsoon of January and February, owing to the news of the English ships having collected at Suratte." —Bocarro, Decada, 379.

[c. 1665.—"...he (Dara) proceeded towards Scindy, and sought refuge in the fortress of Tatabaker." —Bernier, ed. Constable, 71.]

1666.—"De la Province du Sind ou Sindy... que quelques-uns nomment le Tatta." —Thevenot, v. 158.

1673.—"...Retiring with their ill got Booty to the Coasts of Sindu." —Fryer, 218.

1727.—"Sindy is the westmost Province of the Mogul's Dominions on the Sea-coast, and has Larribunder (see Larry-Bunder) to its Mart." —A. Hamilton, i. 114; [ed. 1744, i. 115].

C. 1760.—"Scindy, or Tatta." —Grose, i. 286.

SINDABUR, SANDABUR, n.p. This is the name by which Goa was known to the old Arab writers. The identity was clearly established in Cathay and the Way Thither, pp. 444 and ccli. We will give the quotations first, and then point out the grounds of identification.

A.D. 943.—"Crocodiles abound, it is true, in the ajowin or bays formed by the Sea of India, such as that of Sindabu in the Indian Kingdom of Bighira, or in the bay of Zabaj (see Java) in the dominion of the Maharaj," —Mag'elii, i. 207.

1013.—"I have it from Abu Yusuf bin Muslim, who had it from Abu Bakr of Pasaj at Saimur, that the latter heard told by Mosa the Sindaburi: 'I was one day conversing with the Shihab of Sindabur, when suddenly he burst out laughing. But... it was, said he, because there is a lizard on the wall, and it said, 'There is a guest coming to-day... Don't you go till you see what comes of it.' So we remained talking till one of his servants came in and said 'There is a ship of Oman come in.' Shortly after, people arrived, carrying hampers with various things, such as cloths, and rose-water. As they opened one, out came a longizard, which instantly clung to the wall and went to join the other one. It was the same person, they say, who enchanted the crocodiles in the estuary of Sindabūr, so that now they hurt nobody.'—Livre des Merveilles de l'Inde. V. der Lüth et Decr. 157-159.

1150.—"From the city of Barūth (Barūch, i.e. Broach) following the coast, to Sindabūr 4 days.

"Sindabūr is on a great inlet where ships anchor. It is a place of trade, where one sees fine buildings and rich bazars."—Edrisi, i. 179. And see Elliot, i. 89.

c. 1300.—"Beyond Guzerat are Konkan and Tāma; beyond them the country of Malibār. The people are all Sāmanis (Buddhists), and worship idols. Of the cities on the shore the first is Sindabūr, then Faknūr, then the country of Manjārūr, then the country of Hilli."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 68.

c. 1390.—"A traveller states that the country from Sindabūr to Hanāwar towards its eastern extremity joins with Malabar. . . ."—Abulfeda, Fr. tr., II. ii. 115. Further on in his Tables he jumbles up (as Edrisi has done) Sindabūr with Sindan (see ST. JOHN).

"The heat is great at Aden. This is the port frequented by the people of India; great ships arrive there from Cambay, Tāna, Kaomal, Calieuft, Fandarūnā, Shāliyāt, Manjārūr, Fākanūr, Hanaur, Sandabūr, et cetera."—Batuta, ii. 177.

c. 1343-4.—"Three days after setting sail we arrived at the Island of Sandabūr, within which there are 36 villages. It is surrounded by an inlet, and at the time of ebb the water of this is fresh and pleasant, whilst at flow it is salt and bitter. There are in the island two cities, one ancient, built by the pagans; the second built by the Musulmans when they conquered the island the first time. . . . We left this island behind us and anchored at a small island near the mainland, where we found a temple, a grove, and a tank of water. . . ."—Ibid. iv. 61-62.

1350-1375.—In the Medicean and the Catalan maps of those dates we find on the coast of India Cintabor and Chintabor respectively, on the west coast of India.

c. 1554.—"24th Voyage: from Gouvah-Sindabūr to Aden. If you start from Gouvah-Sindabūr at the end of the season, take care to fall on Cape Fal," &c.—Mokht, in J.A.S.B. v. 564.

The last quotation shows that Goa was known even in the middle of the 16th century to Oriental seamen as Goa-Sindabūr, whatever Indian name the last part represented; probably, from the use of the word by the earlier Arab writers, and from the Chintabor of the European maps, Chondāpur rather than Sindabūr. No Indian name like this has yet been recovered from inscriptions as attaching to Goa; but the Turkish author of the Mohit supplies the connection, and Ibn Batuta's description even without this would be sufficient for the identification. His description, it will be seen, is that of a delta-island, and Goa is the only one partaking of that character upon the coast. He says it contained 36 villages; and Barros tells us that Goa Island was known to the natives as Tmahdt, a name signifying "Thirty villages." (See SAL-SETTE.) Its vicinity to the island where Ibn Batuta proceeded to anchor, which we have shown to be Anchediva (q.v.), is another proof. Turning to Rashiduddin, the order in which he places Sindabūr, Faknūr (Baccanore), Manjārūr (Mangalore), Hilli (Mt. D'Ely), is perfectly correct, if for Sindabūr he substitutes Goa. This goes from Edrisi and one indicated from Abulfeda only show a confusion which has misled many readers since.

SINGALESE, CINGHALESE, n.p. Native of Ceylon; pertaining to Ceylon. The word is formed from Sinhal, 'Dwelling of Lions,' the word used by the natives for the Island, and which is the origin of most of the names given to it (see CEYLON). The explanation given by De Barros and Couto is altogether fanciful, though it leads them to notice the curious and obscure fact of the introduction of Chinese influence in Ceylon during the 15th century.

1552.—"That the Chinese (Chiwa) were masters of the Choromandol Coast of part of Malabar, and of this Island of Ceylon, we have not only the assertion of the Natives of the latter, but also evidence in the buildings, names, and language that they left in it. . . . and because they were in the vicinity of this Cape Galle, the other people who lived from the middle of the Island upwards called those dwelling about there Chingalla, and their language the same, as much as to say the language, or the people of the Chins of Galle."—Barros, III. ii. 177.

1583. (The Cauchin Chinesa) "are of the race of the Chingalays, which they say are the best kinds of all the Malabares."—Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 397.

1598.—". . . inhabited with people called Cingalas . . ."—Linschoten, 24; [Hak. Soc. i. 77; & in ii. 81, Cingalas].

c. 1610.—"Ilst tiennent done que . . . les premiers qui y allèrent, et qui les peuplèrent (les Maldives) furent . . . les Cingales de l'île de Ceylan."—Pyrard de Laval, i. 185; [Hak. Soc. i. 105, and sec i. 266].

1612.—Couto, after giving the same explanation of the word as Barros, says: "And as they spring from the Chins, who are the falsest heathen of the East. . . ." so are they
This island was the weakest, falsest, and most tricky people in all India, insomuch that, to this day, you never find faith or truth in a Chingalla."—V. i. 5.

1851.—"The Chingaleys are naturally a people given to sloth and laziness: if they can but anyways live, they abhor to work." . . .—Knox, 32.

SINGAPORE, SINGAPORE, n.p.
This name was adopted by Sir Stamford Raffles in favour of the city which he founded, February 23, 1819, on the island which had always retained the name since the Middle Ages. This it derived from Singapura, Skt. 'Lion-city,' the name of a town founded by Malay or Javanese settlers from Sumatra, probably in the 14th century, and to which Barros ascribes great commercial importance. The Indian origin of the name, as of many other names and phrases which survive from the old Indian civilisation of the Archipelago, had been forgotten, and the origin which Barros was taught to ascribe to it is on a par with his etymology of Singalese quoted in the preceding article. The words on which his etymology is founded are no doubt Malay: singah, 'to tarry, halt, or lodge,' and pora-pora, 'to pretend'; and these were probably supposed to refer to the temporary occupation of Singapura, before the chiefs who founded it passed on to Malacca.
(It may be noted that Denny's *Desc.
Dict.* s.v.) derives the word from singho,
'a place of call,* and pura, 'a city.' In Dalboquerque's Comm. Hak. Soc. iii.
73, we are told: "Singapura, whence the city takes its name, is a channel through which all the shipping of those parts passes, and signifies in his Malay language, 'treacherous delay.'*

See quotation from Barros below.]

The settlement of Hindueized people on the site, if not the name, is probably as old as the 4th century, A.D., for inscriptions have been found there in a very old character. One of these, on a rock at the mouth of the little river on which the town stands, was destroyed some 40 or 50 years ago for the accommodation of some wretched bungalow.

The modern Singapore and its prosperity form a monument to the patriotism, sagacity, and fervid spirit of the founder. According to an article in the Geogr. Magazine (i. 107) derived from Mr. Archibald Ritchie, who was present with the expedition which founded the colony, Raffles, after consultation with Lord Hastings, was about to establish a settlement for the protection and encouragement of our Eastern trade, in the Nicobar Islands, when his attention was drawn to the superior advantages of Singapor by Captains Ross and Crawford of the Bombay Marine, who had been engaged in the survey of those seas.
Its great adaptation for a mercantile settlement had been discerned by the shrewd, if somewhat vulgar, Scot, Alexander Hamilton, 120 years earlier.
It seems hardly possible, we must however observe, to reconcile the details in the article cited, with the letters and facts contained in the Life of Raffles; though probably the latter had, at some time or other, received information from the officers named by Mr. Ritchie.

1512.—"And as the enterprise was one to make good booty, everybody was delighted to go on it, so that they were more than 1200 men, the soundest and best armed of the garrison, and so they were ready incontinently, and started for the Strait of Cincapura, where they were to wait for the junks."—Correa, ii. 284-5.

1551.—"Sed hactenus Deus nobis adsit omnibus. Amen. Anno post Christum natum, MDLI. Ex Preto Sincapurano."— Scti. Franc. XavTii Epist. Pragae, 1667, Lib. III. viii.

1553.—"Anciently the most celebrated settlement in this region of Malaca was one called Cingapura, a name which in their tongue means 'pretended halt' (falsa dimonia); and this stood upon a point of that country which is the most southerly of all Asia, and lies, according to our graduation, in half a degree of North Latitude . . .
before the foundation of Malaca, at this same Cingapura . . . flocked together all the navigators of the Seas of India from West and East . . ."—Barros, II. vi. 1.
[The same derivation is given in the Comm.
of Dalboquerque, Hak. Soc. iii. 73.]

1572.—
"Mas na ponta da terra Cingapura.
Verás, onde o caminho ns ao se estreita;
Daqui, tornando a costa a Cynosura,
Se incurva, e para a Aurora se endireita."
Camões, x. 125.

By Burton:

"But on her Lands-end thrond see Cingapur, where the wide sea-road shrinks to narrow way:
Thence curves the coast to face the Cynosure, and lastly trends Aurora-wards its lay."

1598.—". . . by water the coast stretcheth to the Cape of Singapura, and from thence it runneth upwards [inwards] again.

1599.—"In this voyage nothing occurred worth relating, except that, after passing the Strait of Sincapura, situated in one degree and a half, between the main land and a variety of islands ... with so narrow a channel that from the ship you could jump ashore, or touch the branches of the trees on either side, our vessel struck on a shoal."—Viaggi di Carletti, ii. 208-9.

1606.—"The 5th May came there 2 Prows from the King of Johore, with the Shahbander (Shabunder) of Singapore, called Sir Raja Nagara ..."—Valentijn, v. 331.

1616.—"Found a Dutch man-of-war, one of a fleet appointed for the siege of Malacca, with the aid of the King of Acheen, at the entrance of the Straits of Singapore."—Swinburne, i. 458.

1727.—"In anno 1703 I called at Johore on my Way to China, and he treated me very kindly, and made me a Present of the Island of Sincapure, but I told him it could be of no use to a private Person, tho' a proper Place for a Company to settle a Colony in, lying in the Center of Trade, and being accommodated with good Rivers and safe Harbours, so conveniently situated that all Winds served Shipping, both to go out and come in."—A. Hamilton, ii. 98; [ed. 1744, ii. 97].

1818.—"We are now on our way to the eastward, in the hope of doing something; but I much fear the Dutch have hardly left us an inch of ground. ... My attention is principally turned to Johore, and you must not be surprised if my next letter to you is dated from the site of the ancient city of Singapura."—Raffles, Letter to Marsden, dated Sandheads, Dec. 12.

SINGARA, s. Hind. singhärä, Skt. srínγhátaka, srínya, 'a horn.' The calltrop or water-chestnut; Trapa bispínösa, Roxb. (N.O. Haloragaceae).

[c. 1590.—The Ātin (ed. Jarrett, ii. 65) mentions it as one of the crops on which revenue was levied in cash.

[1798.—In Kashmir "many of them ... were obliged to live on the Kernel of the singæräh, or water-nut. ..."—Forster, Travels, ii. 29.

[1809—Buchanan-Hamilton writes singhāra.—Eastern Indies, i. 241.]

1855.—"Here, as in most other parts of India, the tank is spoiled by the water-chestnut, singhāra (Trapa bispínösa), which is everywhere as regularly planted and cultivated in fields under a large surface of water, as wheat or barley is in the dry plains. ... The nut grows under the water after the flowers decay, and is of a triangular shape, and covered with a tough brown integument adhering strongly to the kernel, which is wholly esculent, and of a fine cartilaginous texture. The people are very fond of these nuts, and they are carried often upon bullocks' backs two or three hundred miles to market,"—Sleeman, Rembles, &c. (1844), i. 101; [ed. Smith, i. 94.]

1839.—"The nuts of the Trapa bispínösa, called Singhara, are sold in all the Bazaars of India; and a species called by the same name, forms a considerable portion of the food of the inhabitants of Cashmere, as we learn from Mr. Forster [loc. cit.] that it yields the Government 12,000L. of revenue; and Mr. Moorcroft mentions nearly the same sum as Runjeet Sing's share, from 80,000 to 128,000 ass-loads of this nut, yielded by the Lakes of Oaller."—Royle, Hist. Plants, i. 211.

SIPAHSELAR, s. A General-in-chief; Pers. sipāš-sālār, 'army-leader,' the last word being the same as in the title of the late famous Minister-Regent of Hyderabad, Sir Sālār Jang, i.e. 'the leader in war.'

c. 1000-1100.—"Voici quelle était alors la gloire et la puissance des Orphéions dans le royaume. Ils possédaient la charge de sbasalar, ou de généralissime de toute la Georgie. Tous les officiers du palais étaient de leur dépendance."—Hist. of the Orphéions, in St. Martin, Mem. sur l'Arménie, ii. 77.

c. 1358.—"At 16 my father took me by the hand, and brought me to his own Monastery. He there addressed me: 'My boy, our ancestors from generation to generation have been commanders of the armies of the Jagtay and the Berlas family. The dignity of (Sepah Salar) Commander-in-Chief has now descended to me, but as I am tired of this world ... I mean therefore to resign my public office.'"—Autob. Mem. of Timour, Ét. p. 22.

1712.—"Omnibus illis superior est ... Sipah Salar, sive Imperator Generallis Regni, Præsidem dignitatis excipiunt. ..."—Kaempfer, Amoen. Exot. 73.

1726.—A letter from the Heer Van Maatziker to His Highness Chan Chanaan, Sappatsselar, Grand Duke, and General in Chief of the Great Mogol in Assam, Bengal, &c.—Valentijn, v. 173.

1755.—"After the Sipahsalar Hydur, by his prudence and courage, had defeated the Mahrratts and recovered the country taken by them, he placed the government of Seringapatun on a sure and established basis. ..."—Meer Hussen Ali Khan, H. of Hydur Naik, O. T. F. p. 61.

[c. 1803.—In a collection of native letters, the titles of Lord Lake are given as follows: "Ashā-i-l-Muhammad Khan Durwân, General Guru LakeBahādur, Sipahsalar-i-kishwar-i-Hind, Governor of the Kingdom, Lord of the Cycle, Commander-in-chief of the Territories of Hindustan."—North Indian Notes and Queries, iv. 17.]

SIRCAR, s. Hind. from Pers. surkār, 'head (of) affairs.' This word has very divers applications; but its senses may fall under three heads.
The State, the Government, the Supreme authority; also 'the Master' or head of the domestic government. Thus a servant, if asked 'Whose are those horses?' in replying 'They are the sarkār's,' may mean according to circumstances, that they are Government horses, or that they belong to his own master.

In Bengal the word is applied to a domestic servant who is a kind of house-steward, and keeps the accounts of household expenditure, and makes miscellaneous purchases for the family; also, in merchants' offices, to any native accountant or native employed in making purchases, &c.

Under the Mahommadan Governments, as in the time of the Mogul Empire, and more recently in the Deccan, the word was applied to certain extensive administrative divisions of territory. In its application in the Deccan it has been in English generally spelt Circar (q.v.).

[1759.—"... there is no separation between your Honour ... and this Circar. ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 129.]

1800.—"Would it not be possible and proper to make people pay the circar according to the exchange fixed at Seringapatam?"—Wellington, i. 60.

[1866.—"... the Circar Bahadur gives me four rupees a month. ..."—Confessions of an Orderly, 43.]

"There is not in any country in the world, of which I have any knowledge, a more pernicious race of vermin in human shape than are the numerous cast of people known in Bengal by the appellation of Sircars; they are educated and trained to deceive."—Price's Tracts, i. 24.

1822.—"One morning our Sircar, in answer to my having observed that the articles purchased were highly priced, said, 'You are my father and my mother, and I am your poor little child. I have only taken 2 annas in the rupee dustoorie'" (dustoor).—Wonderings of a Pilgrim, i. 21-22.

"And how the deuce, asked his companion, 'do you manage to pay for them?' 'Nothing so easy,—I say to my Sirkar: 'Baboo, go pay for that horse 2000 rupees, and it is done, Sir, as quickly as you could dock him.'"—The Baboo and Other Tales, i. 13.

1590.—"In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sircars, subdivided into 2737 kusbahs" (cuseba), the revenue of which he settled for ten years at 2 Arribs, 62 Crore, 97 Lacks, 55,246 Dams (q.v. 3,62,97,55,246 dāms = about 9 millions sterling).—Aenea, E.T. by Gladwin, 1800, ii. 1; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115.]

SIRDAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sardār; and less correctly sirdār, 'leader, a commander, an officer'; a chief, or lord; the head of a set of palankin-bearers, and hence the 'sirdār-bearer,' or elliptically 'the Sirdār,' is in Bengal the style of the valet or body-servant, even when he may have no others under him (see BEARER). [Sirdār is now the official title of the Commander-in-Chief of the Egyptian army; Sirdār Bahadur is an Indian military distinction.]

[c. 1610.—"... a captain of a company, or, as they call it, a Sardare."—Pyrrhvard de Laca, Hak. Soc. i. 251.]

[c. 1675.—"Sardar." See under SEPOY.]

1808.—"I, with great difficulty, knocked up some of the villagers, who were nearly as much afraid as Christie's Will, at the visit of a Sirdar" (here an officer).—Life of Legten.

[c. 1817.—"... the bearers, with their Sirdaur, have a large room with a verandah before it."—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Boxey, 60.]

1826.—"Gopsc's father had been a Sirdar of some consequence."—Padurung Hari, 174; [ed. 1873, i. 252.]

SIRDARS, s. This is the name which native valets (bearer) give to common drawers (underclothing). A friend (Gen. R. Maclagan, R.E.) has suggested the origin, which is doubtless "short drawers" in contradistinction to Long-drawers, or Pyjamas (qq.v.). A common bearer's pronunciation is sirdraj; as a chest of drawers is also called Drāj kā almāvāra (see ALMYRA).

SIRKY, s. Hind. sirkā. A kind of unplaited matting formed by laying the fine cylindrical culms from the upper part of the Saccharum sara, Roxb. (see SURKUNDA) side by side, and binding them in single or double layers. This is used to lay under the thatch of a house, to cover carts and palankins, to make Chicks (q.v.) and table-mats, and for many other purposes of rural and domestic economy.

1810.—"It is perhaps singular that I should have seen seerky in use among a group of gypsies in Essex. In India these itinerants, whose habits and characters correspond with this intolerable species of banditti, invariably shelter themselves under seerky."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 490.

[1852.—"... neat little huts of sirrakee, a reed or grass, resembling bright straw."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 23.]

SIRRIS. s. Hind. siris, Skt. shirisha, shir, 'to break,' from the brittle-ness of its branches; the tree Acacia Lebbe, Benth., indigenous in S. India, the Ceylon, Bengal, and the sub-Himalayan tract; cultivated in Egypt and elsewhere. A closely kindred sp., A. Julibrissin, Boivin, affords a specimen of scientific 'Hobson-Jobson'; the specific name is a corruption of Gulbad-resham, 'silk-flower.'

1808.—"Quelques années après le mort de Dariyal, des charpentiers ayant abattu un arbre de Seris, qui croisait auprès de son tombeau, le coupèrent en plusieurs pièces pour l'employer à des constructions. Tout-à-coup une voix terrible se fit entendre, la terre se mit à trembler et le tronc de cet arbre se releva de lui-même. Les ouvriers épouvantés s’enfuirent, et l’arbre ne tarda pas à reprendre."—Afso, Aranyish-i-Mahfil, quoted by Garcin de Tassy, Ref. Mus. 88.

[c. 1890.—"An it fell when sirris-shaws were sere, And the nights were long and mirk."—R. Kipling, Departmental Ditties, The Fall of Jock Gillespie.]

SISSOO, SHISHAM, s. Hind. sis, sisam, shisham, Skt. shishapat; Ar. sasam, sasim; the tree Dalbergia Sissoo, Roxb. (N.O. Leguminosae) and its wood. This is excellent, and valuable for construction, joinery, boat- and carriage-building, and furniture. It was the favourite wood for gun-carriages as long as the supply of large timber lasted. It is now much cultivated in the Punjab plantations. The tree is indigenous in the sub-Himalayan tracts; and believed to be so likewise in Beluchistan, Guzerat, and Central India. Another sp. of Dalbergia (D. latifolia) affords the Black Wood (q.v.) of S. and W. India. There can be little doubt that one or more of these species of Dalbergia afforded the sesamum wood spoken of in the Periplus, and in some old Arabic writers. A quotation under Black Wood shows that this wood was exported from India to Chaldaea in remote ages. Sissoo has continued in recent times to be exported to Egypt, (see Forskal, quoted by Royle, Hindu Medicine, 128). Royle notices the resemblance of the Biblical shittim wood to shisham.

c. a.d. 80.—"... Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza (Broach) to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers, and beams of tea-k (felled ağacli and dököt). ... and logs of shisham (םאהמטנ רכּהּוֹפּ). . . .

—Periplus, Maria Bryth., cap 36.

c. 545.—"These again are passed on from Sieduliba to the marts on this side, such as Male, where the pepper is grown, and Kalliana, whence are exported brass, and shisham logs (םאהמטנ אכּלים), and other wares."—Cosmas, lib. xi.

? before 1200.—"There are the wolf and the parrot, and the peacock, and the dove.
And the plant of Zinj, and al-sasim, and pepper. . . ."

1810.—"Sissoo grows in most of the great forests, intermixed with saal . . . This wood is extraordinarily hard and heavy, at a dark brown, inclining to a purple tint when polished."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 71.

1859.—"As I rode through the city one day I saw a considerable quantity of timber lying in an obscure street. On examining it I found it was shisham, a wood of the most valuable kind, being not liable to the attacks of white ants."—Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, ed. 1851, p. 102.

SITTING-UP. A curious custom, in vogue at the Presidency towns more than a century ago, and the nature of which is indicated by the quotations. Was it of Dutch origin?

1780.—"When a young lady arrives at Madras, she must, in a few days afterwards sit up to receive company, attended by some beau or master of the ceremonies, which perhaps continues for a week, or until she has seen all the fair sex, and gentlemen of the settlement."—Moore’s Narr., 66.

1795.—"You see how many good reasons there are against your scheme of my taking horse instantly, and hastening to throw myself at the lady’s feet; as to the other, of proxy, I can only agree to it under certain conditions. . . . I am not to be forced to sit up, and receive male or female visitors. . . . I am not to be obliged to deliver my opinion on patterns for caps or petticoats for any lady. . . ."—T. Munro to his Sister, in Life, i. 169.

1810. — "Among the several justly exploded ceremonies we may reckon that . . . of 'Sitting up.' . . . This 'Sitting up,' as it was termed, generally took place at the house of some lady of rank or fortune, who, for three successive nights, threw open her mansion for the purpose of receiving all . . . who chose to pay their respects to such ladies as might have recently arrived in the country."—Williamson, V.M. i. 113.

SITRINGY, s. Hind. from Ar. sittronji, shatронji, and that from Pers. shatrong, 'chess,' which is again of Skt. origin, chaturvanga, 'quadrupartite' (see SADRAS). A carpet of coloured cotton, now usually made in stripes, but with no doubt originally, as the name implies, in chequers.

1648. — "... Een andere soorte van slechte Tapijten die mů noemt Chitrenga." — Van Twest, 63.

1673. — "They pull off their Slippers, and after the usual Salams, seat themselves in Choultries, open to some Tank of purling Water; commonly spread with Carpets or Sittringees." — Fryer, 93.

[1688. — "2 citterenkees." — In Yule, Hedges' Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. colxv.]

1785. — "To be sold by public auction ... the valuable effects of Warren Hastings, Esquire ... carpets and sittringees." — In Seton-Karr, i. 111.

SIWALIK, n.p. This is the name now applied distinctively to that outer range of tertiary hills which in various parts of the Himalaya runs parallel to the foot of the mountain region, separated from it by valleys known in Upper India as duns (see DHOON). But this special and convenient sense (d) has been attributed to the term by modern Anglo-Indian geographers only. Among the older Mahommedan historians the term Siwalik is applied to a territory to the west of and perhaps embracing the Aravalli Hills, but certainly including specifically Nagore (Nágaur) and Mandawai the predecessor of modern Jodhpûr, and in the vicinity of that city. This application is denoted by (a).

In one or two passages we find the application of the name (Siwâlkî) extending a good deal further south, as if reaching to the vicinity of Mâlwa. Such instances we have grouped under (b). But it is possible that the early application (a) habitually extended thus far.

At a later date the name is applied to the Himalaya; either to the range in its whole extent, as in the passages from Cherefeddin (Shariffuddin 'Ali of Yezd) and from Baber; sometimes with a possible limitation to that part of the mountains which overlooks the Punjab; or, as the quotation from Rennell indicates, with a distinction between the less lofty region nearest the plains, and the Alpine summits beyond, Siwâlik applying to the former only.

The true Indian form of the name is, we doubt not, to be gathered from the occurrence, in a list of Indian national names, in the Vishnû Purâṇa, of the Saivâlas. But of the position of these we can only say that the nations, with whom the context immediately associates them, seem to lie towards the western part of Upper India. (See Wilson's Works, Vishnû Purâṇa, ii. 175.) The popular derivation of Siwâlik as given in several of the quotations below, is from savalâkh, 'One lakh and a quarter'; but this is of no more value than most popular etymologies.

We give numerous quotations to establish the old application of the term, because this has been somewhat confused in Elliot's extracts by the interpolated phrase 'Siwâlik Hills,' where it is evident from Ravery's version of the Tahakât-i-Nââvi that there is no such word as Hills in the original.

We have said that the special application of the term to the detached sub-Himalayan range is quite modern. It seems in fact due to that very eminent investigator in many branches of natural science, Dr. Hugh Falconer; at least we can find no trace of it before the use of the term by him in papers presented to the Asiatic Society of Bengal. It is not previously used, so far as we can discover, even by Royle; nor is it known to Jacquetmont, who was intimately associated with Royle and Cauley, at Sahâranpûr, very shortly before Falconer's arrival there. Jacquetmont (Journal, ii. 11) calls the range: "la première chaine de montagnes que j'appellerai les montagnes de Dehro." The first occurrence that we can find is in a paper by Falconer on the 'Aptitude of the Himalayan Range for the Culture of the Tea Plant,' in vol. iii. of the J. As. Soc. Bengal, which we quote below. A year later, in the account of the Sivalikherium fossil, by Falconer and Cautley, in the As. Researches, we have a fuller explanation of the use of the term Sivalik, and its alleged etymology.

It is probable that there may have been some real legendary connection of the hills in the vicinity with the name of Siva. For in some of the old maps, such as that in Bernier's Travels, we find Siba given as the name of a province about Hurdwâr; and the same name occurs in the same connection in the Mem. of the Emperor Jahângir (Elliot, vi. 382). [On the connection of Siva worship with the lower Himalaya, see Atkinson, Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 743.]

1253.—"When the new year came round, on Tuesday, the 1st of the month of Muharram, 651 H., command was given to Ulugh Kháñ-i-A'zâm ... to proceed to his fiefs, the territory of Sivalik and Hânsi."—Ibid. 986.

1257.—"Malik Balban ... withdrew (from Dehil), and by way of the Sivalik [country], and with a slight retinue, less than 200 or 300 in number, returned to Uchchah again."—Ibid. 786.

1255.—"When the royal tent was pitched at Tal-hat, [the contingent] forces of the Sivalik [districts], which were the fiefs of Ulugh Kháñ-i-A'zâm, had been delayed ... (he) set out for Hânsi ... (and there) issued his mandate, so that, in the space of 14 days, the troops of the Sivalik, Hânsi, Sursutî, Jind [Jhînd], and Barwâlîh ... assemled ..."—Ibid. 887.

1260.—"Ulugh Kháñ-i-A'zâm resolved upon making a raid upon the Koh-pâyâh [hill tracts of Mewât] round about the capital, because in this ... there was a community of obdurate rebels, who, uncasingly, committed highway robbery, and plundered the property of Musalânâs ... and destruction of the villages in the districts of Harînâh, the Sivalik, and Bihânâh, necessarily followed their outbreaks."—Ibid. 856.

1300-10.—"The Mughals having wasted the Sivalik, had moved some distance off. When they and their horses returned weary and thirsty to the river, the army of Islâm, which had been waiting for them some days, caught them as they expected ..."
—Zâd-uddîn Bârî, in Elliot, iii. 199.

c. 1300.—"Of the cities on the shore the first is Sandabûr, then Fakmûr, then the country of Manjârûr, then the country of (Pandarainâ), then Jangu (Jinkai), then Kûlam. ... After this comes the country of Sâwalîk, which comprises 125,000 cities and villages. After that comes Mâlwa ..."
(Elliot, p. 468.)

1644.—"... It confines ... on the east with certain kingdoms of heathen, which are called Sâulacca prabatta [Sk. purvata], as much as to say 120,000 mountains."—Bocarro, MS.

1399.—"Le Détroit de Coupelot est situé au pied d'une montagne par où passe le Gange, et à quinze milles plus haut que ce Détroit il y a une pierre en forme de Vache, de laquelle sort la source de ce grand Fleuve; c'est la cause pour laquelle les Indiens parlent avec cette pierre, et dans tous les pays circonvoisins jusqu'à une année de chemin, ils se tournent pour prier du côté de ce Détroit et de cette Vache de pierre. ... Cependant on eût avis que dans la montagne de Soualec, qui est une des plus considérables de l'Inde, et qui s'étend dans le deux tiers de ce grand Empire, il s'étoit assemblé un grand nombre d'Indiens qui cherchoient à nous faire insulte."—H. de Timour-Bec, par Cherefedîn Alî d'Yezd (Fr. Tr. by Petis de la Croix), Delf, 1723, iii. ch. xxv.-xxvi.
1528.—"The northern range of hills has been mentioned . . . after leaving Kashmir, these hills contain innumerable tribes and states, pergannahs and countries, and extend all the way to Bengal and the shores of the Great Ocean. . . . The chief trade of the inhabitants of these hills is in musk-bags, the tails of the mountain cow, saffron, lead, and copper. The natives of Hind call these hills Sewalik-Purbat. In the language of Hind Sewalik means a hill and quarter (or 125,000), and Purbat means a hill, that is, the 125,000 hills. On these hills the snow never melts, and from some parts of Hindustán, such as Lahore, Sehrend, and Sambal, it is seen white on them all the year round."—Baber, p. 313.

c. 1545.—"Sher Sháh's dying regrets.

"On being remonstrated with for giving way to soft spirits, when he had done so much for the good of the people during his short reign, after earnest solicitation, he said, 'I have had three or four desires on my heart, which still remain without accomplishment. . . . One is, a design to have depopulated the country of Roh, and to have transferred its inhabitants to the tract between the Niláb and Lahore, including the hills below Nindúna as far as the Siwalik.'—Tárikh-Khán Jahán Lodi, in Elliot, v. 107-8. Nindúna was on Bakháth, a hill over the Jolam (compare Elliot, ii. 450-1).

c. 1547-8. —"After their defeat the Náízas took refuge with the Ghakkars, in the hill-country bordering on Kashmir. Islám Sháh . . . during the space of two years was engaged in constant conflicts with the Ghakkars, whom he desired to subdue. . . . Skirting the hills he went thence to Múrín (!), and all the Rájás of the Siwalik presented themselves. . . . Parsurám, the Rája of Gwálíor, became a staunch servant of the King. . . . Gwálíor is a hill, which is on the right hand towards the South, amongst the hills, and one go to Kángra and Naggar. (See NUGGUR-GOTE.)—Tárikh-i-Dádís, in Elliot, iv. 493-4.

c. 1555. —"The Imperial forces encountered the Afghans near the Siwalik mountains, and gained a victory which elicited gracious marks of approval from the Emperor. Sikandar took refuge in the mountains and jungles. . . . Rájá Rám Chand, Rájá of Nagarkot, was the most renowned of all the Rájás of the hills, and he came and made his submission."—Tabákh-í-Akbari, in Elliot, v. 248.

c. 1560.—"The Emperor (Akbar) then marched on wards towards the Siwalik hills, in pursuit of the Khán-Khánán. He reached the neighbourhood of Talwára, a district in the Siwalik, belonging to Rájá Gobind Chand. . . . A party of adventurous soldiers dashed forward into the hills, and surrounding the place put many of the defenders to the sword."—Ibid. 267.

c. 1570.—"Husain Khán . . . set forth from Lucknow with the design of breaking down the idols, and demolishing the idol temples. For false reports of their unhounded treasures had come to his ears. He proceeded through Oudh, towards the Siwalik hills. . . . He then ravaged the whole country, as far as the Kasbok of Wajráf, in the country of Rájá Ranka, a powerful zamíndár, and from that town to Ajmír which is his capital."—Badáání, in Elliot, iv. 497.

1594-5. —"The force marched to the Siwalik hills, and the Bábáshi resolved to begin by attacking Jamní, one of the strongest forts of that country."—Akbar Náma, in Elliot, v. 125.

c. . . . Rám Déo . . . returned to Kanajj . . . after that he marched into the Siwalik hills, and made all the zamíndár tributary. The Rájá of Kamáín . . . came out against Rám Déo and gave him battle."—Víríshta's Introduction, in Elliot, vi. 561.

1793.—"Mr. Daniel, with a party, also visited Sirinagur the same year [1789]: . . . It is situated in an exceedingly deep and very narrow valley; formed by Mount Sewalik, the northern boundary of Hindoostan, on the one side; and the vast range of snowy mountains of Himámalé or IMATS, on the other; and from the report of the natives, it would appear, that the nearest part of the base of the latter (on which snow was actually falling in the month of May), was not more than 14 or 15 G. miles in direct distance to the N. or N.E. of Sirinagur town.

"In crossing the mountains of Sewalik, they met with vegetable productions, proper to the temperate climates."—Rennell's Mem., ed. 1793, pp. [368-369].

1834.—"On the flank of the great range there is a line of low hills, the Sewalik, which commence at Roopur, on the Satlej, and run down a long way to the south, skirting the great chain. In some places they run up to, and rise upon, the Himálayas; in others, as in this neighbourhood (Seháránpur), they are separated by an intermediate valley. Between the Jamna and Ganges they attain their greatest height, which Capt. Herbert estimates at 2,000 feet above the plains at their foot, or 3,000 above the sea. Seháránpur is about 1,000 feet above the sea. About 25 miles north are the Sewálik hills."— Falconer, in J.A.S.B. iii. 152.

1855.—"We have named the fossil Siva-therium from Siva the Hindu god, and byplavr, bullua. The Siválík, or Sub-Himalayan range of hills, is considered, in the Hindu mythology, as the Látíah or edge of the roof of Siva's dwelling on the Himálaya, and hence they are called the Siva-ala or Sib-ala, which by an easy transition of sound became the Sewálík of the English.

"The fossil has been discovered in a tract which may be included in the Sewálík..."—"Sewalick is the term, according to the common acceptation; but Capt. Kirkpatrick proves, from the evident etymology of it, that it should be Sewa-luck."—Note by Rennell.
range, and we have given the name of Siva-therium to it, to commemorate the remarkable formation, so rich in new animals. Another derivation of the name of the hills, as explained by the Mahant, or High Priest at Dehra, is as follows:

"Sewálik, a corruption of Siva-rála, a name given to the tract of mountains between the Jumna and Ganges, from having been the residence of Iswara Siva and his son Ganes." — Falconer and Cantley, in As Res., xix. p. 2.

1879. — "These fringing ranges of the later formations are known generally as the Sub-Himalayas. The most important being the Siwalik hills, a term especially applied to the hills south of the Deyra Dün, but frequently employed in a wider sense." — Mathen and Blanford, Man. of the Geology of India, Intro. p. x.

[1899.—Even so late as this year the old inaccurate etymology of the word appears:

"The term Sewalik is stated by one of the native historians to be a combination of two Hindee words ᵉ waive and ᵉ lae (sic), the word ᵉ waive signifying one and a quarter, and the word ᵉ lae being the term which expresses the number of one hundred thousand." —Thornhill, Haunts and Hobbies, 213.]

SKEEN. s. Tib. skyin. The Himalayan Ibex; (Capra Sibirica, Meyer). [See Blanford, Mammalia, 503.]

SLAVE. We cannot now attempt a history of the former tenure of slaves in British India, which would be a considerable work in itself. We only gather a few quotations illustrating that history.

1676. — "Of three Theeves, two were executed and one made a Slave. We do not approve of putting any to death for theft, nor that any of our own nation should be made a Slave, a word that becomes not an Englishman's mouth." —The Court to Ft. St. Geo., March 7. In Notes and Exts. No. i. p. 18.

1682. — "... making also proclamation by beat of drum that if any Slave would run away from us he should be free, and liberty to go where they pleased." —Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14. [Hak. Soc. i. 38.]

[. . .] "There being a great number of Slaves yearly exported from this place, to ye great grievance of many persons whose Children are very commonly stollen away from them, by those who are constant traders in this way, the Agent, &c., considering his several call that might accrue to ye Government, &c., the great losse that many parents may undergo by such actions, have order'd that noe more Slaves be sent off the shore again." —Pringle, Diary, Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. i. 70.

1637. — "We have taken into consideration the most effectual and speedy method for supplying our settlements upon the West Coast with slaves, and we have therefore fixed upon two ships for that purpose . . . to proceed from hence to Madagascar to purchase as many as can be procured, and the said ships conveniently carry, who are to be delivered by the captains of those ships to our agents at Fort Marlborough at the rate of £15 a head." —Court's Letter of Dec. 8. In Long, 293.

1764. — "That as an inducement to the Commanders and Chief Mates to exert themselves in procuring as large a number of Slaves as the Ships can conveniently carry, and to encourage the Surgeons to take proper care of them in the passage, there is to be allowed 20 shillings for every slave shipped at Madagascar, to be divided, viz., 13s. 4d. a head to the Commander, and 6s. 8d. to the Chief Mate, also for every one delivered at Fort Marlborough the Commander is to be allowed the further sum of 6s. 8d. and the Chief Mate 3s. 4d. The Surgeon is likewise to be allowed 10s. for each slave landed at Fort Marlborough." — Court's Letter, Feb. 22. In Long, 396.

1775. — "Mr. Busteed has given some curious extracts from the charge-sheet of the Calcutta Magistrate in this year, showing slaves and slave-girls, of Europeans, Portuguese, and Armenians, sent to the magistrate to be punished with the rattan for running away and such offences.—Echoes of Old Calcutta, 117 seqq. [Also see extracts from newspapers, &c., in Carey, Good Old Days, ii. 71 seqq.].

1782. — "On Monday the 29th inst. will be sold by auction . . . a bay Buggy Horse, a Buggy and Harness . . . some cut Diamonds, a quantity of China Sugarandy . . . a quantity of the best Danish Claret . . . deliverable at Serampore; two Slave Girls about 6 years old; and a great variety of other articles." —India Gazette, July 27.

1785. — "Malver. Hair-dresser from Eu- rope, proposes himself to the ladies of the settlement to dress hair daily, at two gold mohurs per month, in the latest fashion, with gauze flowers, &c. He will also instruct the slaves at a moderate price." —In Seton-Kerr, i. 119. This was surely a piece of slang. Though we hear occasionally, in the advertisements of the time, of slave boys and girls, the domestic servants were not usually of that description.

1794. — "50 Rupees Reward for Discovery. "Run off about four Weeks ago from a Gentleman in Bombay, A Malay Slave called Cambing or Rambing. He stole a Silk Purse, with 45 Venetians, and some Silver Buttons. . . ." —Bombay Courier, Feb. 22.

SLING, SELING. N.P. This is the name used in the Himalayan regions for a certain mart in the direction of Snake-stone. s. This is a term applied to a substance, the application of which to the part where a snake-bite has taken effect, is supposed to draw out the poison and render it innocuous. Such applications are made in various parts of the Old and New Worlds. The substances which have this reputation are usually of a porous kind, and when they have been chemically examined have proved to be made of charred bone, or the like. There is an article in the 13th vol. of the Asiatic Researches by Dr. J. Davy, entitled An Analysis of the Snake-Stone, in which the results of the examination of three different kinds, all obtained from Sir Alex. Johnstone, Chief Justice of Ceylon, is given. (1) The first kind was of round or oval form, black or brown in the middle, white towards the circumference, polished and somewhat lustrous, and pretty enough to be sometimes worn as a neck ornament; easily cut with a knife, but not scratched by the nail. When breathed on it emitted an earthy smell, and when applied to the tongue, or other moist surface, it adhered firmly. This kind proved to be of bone partially calcined. (2) We give below a quotation regarding the second kind. (3) The third was apparently a bezoar, (q.v.), rather than a snake-stone. There is another article in the As. Res. xv. 382 seqq. by Captain J. D. Herbert, on Zahr Moherch, or Snake-Stone. Two kinds are described which were sold under the name given (Zahr muhra, where zahr is 'poison,' muhra, 'a kind of polished shell,' a 'bead,' applied to a species of bezoar). Both of these were mineral, and not of the class we are treating of.

Sloth, s. In the usual way of transferring names which belong to other regions, this name is sometimes applied in S. India to the Lemur (Loris gracilis, Jerdon).

Snake-stone. c. 1666.—"C'est dans cette Ville de Diou que se font les Pierres de Cobra si reconnues; elles sont composées de racines qu'on brûle et dont on amasse les cendres pour les mettre avec une sorte de terre qu'ils ont, et les brûler encore une fois avec cette terre; et après cela on en fait la pâte dont ces Pierres sont formées. . . . Il faut faire sortir avec une éguille, un peu de sang de la plaie, y appliquer la Pierre, et l'y laisser jusqu'à ce qu'elle tombe d'elle même."—Thevenot, v. 87.
1673. — "Here are also those Elephant Legged St. Thomeans, which the unbiased Enquirers will tell you chances to them two ways: By the Venom of a certain Snake, by which the inferiors (see JOGEE) or Pilgrims furnish them with a Particular Stone (which we call a snake-stone), and is a Counter-poison of all deadly Bites; if it stick, it attracts the Poison; and put into Milk it recovers itself again, leaving its virulence therein, discovered by its Greenness."— Fryer, 53.

c. 1676. — "There is the Serpent's stone not to be forgot, about the bigness of a double (doubloon); and some are almost oval, thick in the middle and thin about the sides. The Indians report that it is bred in the head of certain Serpents. But I rather take it to be a story of the Idolot's Priests, and that the Stone is rather a composition of certain Drugs. . . . If the Person bit be not much wounded, the place must be incis'd; and the Stone being appl'd thereto, will not fall off till it has drawn all the poison to it: To cleanse it you must steep it in Womans-milk, or for want of that, in Cows-milk. There are two ways to try whether the Serpent-stone be true or false. The first is, by putting the Stone in your mouth, for there it will give a leap, and fix to the Palate. The other is by putting it in a glass full of water; for if the Stone be true, the water will fall a boiling, and rise in little bubbles. . . ." — Tavernier, E.T., Pt. ii. 155; [ed. Bull, ii. 152]. Tavernier also speaks of another snake-stone alleged to be found behind the hood of the Cobra: "This Stone being rubb'd against another Stone, yields a slime, which being drank in water," &c. &c.— Ibid.

1690.— "The thing which he carried . . . is a Specific against the Poison of Snakes . . . and therefore obtained the name of Snake-stone. It is a small artificial Stone. . . . The Composition of it is Ashes of burnt Roots, mixt with a kind of Earth, which is found at Diu. . . ."— Ovington, 260-261.

1772.— "Being returned to Roode-Zand, the much celebrated Snake-stone (Stange-sten) was shown to me, which few of the farmers here could afford to purchase, it being sold at a high price, and held in great esteem. It is imported from the Indies, especially from Malabar, and cost several, frequently 10 or 12, rix dollars. It is round, and convex on one side, of a black colour, with a pale ash-grey speck in the middle, and tubulated with very minute pores. . . . When it is applied to any part that has been bitten by a serpent, it sticks fast to the wound, and extracts the poison; when an ant has been injected, it falls off of itself." — Thesiger, Travels, E.T. i. 155 (A Journey into Caffraria).

1796.— "Of the remedies to which cures of venomous bites are often ascribed in India, some are certainly not less frivolous than those employed in Europe for the bite of the viper; yet to infer from thence that the effects of the poison cannot be very dangerous, would not be more rational than to ascribe the recovery of a person bitten by a Cobra de Capello, to the application of a snake-stone, or to the words muttered over the patient by a Bramin."— Patrick Russell, Account of Indian Serpents, 77.

1820. — "Another kind of snake-stone . . . was a small oval body, smooth and shining, externally black, internally grey; it had no earthy smell when breathed on, and had no absorbent or adhesive power. By the person who presented it to Sir Alexander Johnstone it was much valued, and for adequate reason if true, 'it had saved the lives of four men.'"— Dr. Davy, in As. Res. xiii. 318.

1860.— "The use of the Pamboo-Kaloo, or snake-stone, as a remedy in cases of wounds by venomous serpents, has probably been communicated to the Singhalese by the itinerant snake-charmers who resort to the island from the Coast of Coromandel; and more than one well-authenticated instance of its successful application has been told to me by persons who had been eye-witnesses. . . . (These follow.) . . . "As to the snake-stone itself, I submitted one, the application of which I have been describing, to Mr. Faraday, and he has communicated to me as the result of his analysis, his belief that it is 'a piece of charred bone which has been filled with blood, perhaps several times, and then charred again.' . . . The probability is, that the animal charcoal, when instantaneously applied, may be sufficiently porous and absorbent to extract the venom from the recent wound, together with a portion of the blood, before it has time to be carried into the system . . ."— Tennent, Ceylon, i. 197-200.

1861.— "Have you been bitten? 'Yes, Sabib,' he replied, calmly; 'the last snake was a vicious one, and it has bitten me. But there is no danger,' he added, extracting from the recesses of his mysterious bag a small piece of white stone. This he wetted, and applied to the wound, to which it seemed to adhere . . . he apparently suffered no . . . material hurt. I was thus effectually convinced that snake-charming is a real art, and not merely clever conjuring, as I had previously imagined. These so-called snake stones are well known throughout India."— Lt.-Col. T. Lewis, A Fly on the Wheel, 91-92.

1872.— "With reference to the snake-stones, which, when applied to the bites, are said to absorb and suck out the poison, SNEAKER, s. A large cup (or small basin) with a saucer and cover. The native servants call it sinigur. We had guessed that it was perhaps formed in some way from sinī in the sense of 'china-ware,' or from the same word, used in Ar. and Pers., in the sense of 'a salver' (see CHINA, s.). But we have since seen that the word is not only in Grose's Lexicon Balatonicum, with the explanation 'a small bowl,' but is also in Todd: 'A small vessel of drink.' A sneaker of punch is a term still used in several places for a small bowl; and in fact it occurs in the Spectator and other works of the 18th century. So the word is of genuine English origin; no doubt of a semi-slang kind.

1714.—"Our little burlesque authors, who are the delight of ordinary readers, generally abound in these pert phrases, which have in them more vivacity than wit. I lately saw an instance of this kind of writing, which gave me so truly an idea of it, that I could not forbear begging a copy of the letter...."

"Dear Jack, and a frosty morning. "I have just left the Right Worshipful and his myrmidons about a sneaker of 5 gallons. The whole magistracy was very well disguised before I gave them the slip."—The Spectator, No. 616.

1715.—"Hugh Peters is making A sneaker within For Luther, Buchanan, John Knox, and Calvin; And when they have toss'd off A brace of full bowls, 3 H You'll swear you ne'er met With honester souls."

1743.—"Wild... then retired to his seat of contemplation, a night-cellar, where, without a single farthing in his pocket, he called for a sneaker of punch, and placing himself on a bench by himself, he softly vented the following soliloquy."—Fielding, Jonathan Wild, Bk. ii. ch. iv.

1772.—"He received us with great cordiality, and entreated us all, five in number, to be seated in a bungalow, where there were only two broken chairs. This compliment we could not accept of; he then ordered five sneakers of a mixture which he denominated punch."—Letter in Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 217.

[Snow Rupee, s. A term in use in S. India, which is an excellent example of a corruption of the 'Hobson-Jobson' type. It is an Anglo-Indian corruption of the Tel. tsanawu, 'authority, currency.]

SOFALA, n.p. Ar. Sufala, a district and town of the East African coast, the most remote settlement towards the south made upon that coast by the Arabs. The town is in S. Lat. 20° 10', more that 2° south of the Zambesi delta. The territory was famous in old days for the gold produced in the interior, and also for iron. It was not visited by V. da Gama either in going or returning.

c. 1150.—"This section embraces the description of the remainder of the country of Sofala... The inhabitants are poor, miserable, and without resources to support them except iron; of this metal there are numerous mines in the mountains of Sofala. The people of the islands... come hither for iron, which they carry to the continent and islands of India... for although there is iron in the islands and in the mines of that country, it does not equal the iron of Sofala."—Edrisi, i. 65.

c. 1220.—"Sofala is the most remote known city in the country of the Zenj... wares are carried to them, and left by the merchants who then go away, and coming again find that the natives have laid down the price [they are willing to give] for every article beside it... Sofala gold is well-known among the Zenj merchants."—Yakût, Mu'jam al-Balûtân, s.v.

In his article on the gold country, Yakût describes the kind of dumb trade in which the natives decline to come face to face with the merchants at greater length. It is a practice that has been ascribed to a great variety of uncivilized races; e.g. in various parts of Africa; in the extreme north of Europe and of Asia; in the Clove Islands (in the Moluccas and Molokai, to the Poliars of Malabar, and (by Pliny, surely under some mistake) to the Seres or Chinese. See on this subject a note in Marco Polo, Bk. iv. ch. 21; a note by Mr. De B. Friarz, in R. As. Soc., xviii. 348 (in which several references are erroneously printed); Tennent's Ceylon, i. 593 sqq.; Rawlinson's Hirodatus, under Bk. iv. ch. 196.

c. 1330.—"Sofala is situated in the country of the Zanj. According to the author of the Kāwān, the inhabitants are Muslims. Ibn Sayd says that their chief means of subsistence are the extraction of gold and of iron, and that their clothes are of leopard-skin."—Abulfeda, Fr. Tr. i. 222.

"A merchant told me that the town of Sofala is a half month's march distant from Culua (Quilao), and that from Sofala to Yāfi (Nūfī) . . . is a month's march. From Yāfi they bring gold-dust to Sofala."— Ibn Batuta, i. 192-3.

1199. —"Coming to Moçambique (i.e. Vasco and his squadron on their return) they did not desire to go in because there was no need, so they kept their course, and being off the coast of Cofala, the pilots warned the officers that they should be alert and ready to strike sail, and at night they should keep their course, with little sail set, and a good look-out, for just thereabouts there was a river belonging to a place called Cofala, whence there sometimes issued a tremendous squall, which tore up trees and carried cattle and all into the sea . . ."—Correa, Lendas, i. 134-135.

1516.—". . . at xviii. leagues from there is a river, which is not very large, whereon is a town of the Moors called Sofala, close to which town the King of Portugal has a fort. These Moors established themselves there a long time ago on account of the great trade in gold, which they carry on with the Gentiles of the mainland."—Barrosa, 4.

1523.—"Item—that as regards all the ships and goods of the said Realm of Ormuz, and its ports and vassals, they shall be secure by land and by sea, and they shall be as free to navigate where they please as vassals of the King our lord, save only that they shall not navigate inside the Strait of Mecca, nor yet to Cofala and the ports of that coast, as that is forbidden by the King our lord. . . ."—Treaty of Dom Duarte de Menezes, with the King of Ormuz, in Botelho, Tombo, 80.

1538.—"Vasco da Gama . . . was afraid that there was some gulf running far inland, from which he would not be able to get out. And this apprehension made him so careful to keep well from the shore that he passed without even seeing the town of Cofala, so famous in these parts for the quantity of gold which the Moors procured there from the Blacks of the country by trade . . ."
—Barros, l. iv. 3.

1572. —". . . Fizemos desta costa algum desvio Deitando para o pego toda a armada: Porque, vestando Noto manso e frío, Não nos apanhase a agua da enseada, Que a costa faz ali daquella banda, Donde a rica Sofala o ouro manda."—Camões, v. 73.

By Burton:

"off from the coast-line for a spell we stood, till deep blue water 'neath our kelsoms lay; for frigid Notus, in his fainty mood, was fain to drive us leewards to the Bay made in that quarter by the crooked shore, whence rich Sofala sendeth golden ore."—1665.

"Mombaza and Quilao and Melind, And Sofala, thought Ophir, to the realm Of Congo, and Angola farthest south."—Paradise Lost, xi. 599 sqq.

Milton, it may be noticed, misplaces the accent, reading Sofala.

1727.—"Between Delagoa and Mosambique is a dangerous Sea-coast, it was formerly known by the names of Subofa and Cuama, but now by the Portuguese, who know that country best, is called Sena."—A. Hamilton, i. 8 [ed. 1744].

SOLA, vulgar. SOLAR, s. This is properly Hind, shold, corrupted by the Bengali inability to utter the shibboleth, to sold, and often again into solar by English people, led astray by the usual "striving after meaning." Shold is the name of the plant Aeschynomene aspera, L. (N.O. Leguminosae), and is particularly applied to the light pith of that plant, from which the light thick Sola topées, or pith hats, are made. The material is also used to pad the roofs of palankins, as a protection against the sun's power, and for various minor purposes, e.g. for slips of tinder, for making models, &c. The word, until its wide diffusion within the last 45 years, was peculiar to the Bengal Presidency. In the Deccan the thing is called bhend, Mahr. bhenda, and in Tamil netti, ["breaking with a crackle."] Solar hats are now often advertised in London. [Hats made of elder pith were used in S. Europe in the early 16th century. In Albert Dürer's Diary in the Netherlands (1520-21) we find: "Also Tomasin has given me a plaited hat of elder-pith" (Mrs. Heaton, Life of Albrecht Dürer, 269). Miss Eden, in 1839, speaks of Europeans wearing "broad white feather hats to keep off the sun." (Up the Country, ii. 56).
Illustrations of the various shapes of Sola hats used in Bengal about 1854 will be found in Grant, Rural Life in Bengal, 105 seq.

1836.—"I stopped at a fisherman's, to look at the curiously-shaped floats he used for his very large and heavy fishing-nets: each float was formed of eight pieces of shola, tied together by the ends... When this light and spongy pith is wetted, it can be cut into thin layers, which pasted together are formed into hats; Chinese paper appears to be made of the same material."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 100.

1872.—"In a moment the flint gave out a spark of fire, which fell into the sola; the sulphur match was applied; and an earthen lamp..."—Gowinda Samanta, i. 10.

1875.—"My solar topee (pith hat) was whisked away during the struggle."—Life in the Moghul, i. 161.

1885.—"I have slipped a pair of galoshes over my ordinary walking-boots; and, with my solar topee (or sun helmet) on, have ridden through a mile of deserted streets and thronged bazaars, in a grilling sunshine."—A Professional Visit in Persia, St. James's Gazette, March 9.

[SOMBA, SOMBAY, s. A present. Malay sambah-an.

[1614.—"Sombay or presents."—Foster, Letters, ii. 112.

[1615.—"... concluded rather than pay the great Somba of eight hundred reals."—Ibid. iv. 43.]

SOMBREIRO, s. Port. sombreiro. In England we now understand by this word a broad-brimmed hat; but in older writers it is used for an umbrella. Summerhead is a name in the Bombay Arsenal (as M.-Gen. Keatinge tells me) for a great umbrella. I make no doubt that it is a corruption (by 'striving after meaning') of Sombreiro, and it is a capital example of Hobson-Jobson.

1593.—"And the next day the Captain-Major before daylight embarked armed with all his people in the boats, and the King (of Cochin) in his boats which they call tones (see DONEY)... and in the tone of the King went his Sombreiros, which are made of straw, of a diameter of 4 palms, mounted on very long canes, some 3 or 4 fathoms in height. They are used for state ceremonial, showing that the King is there in person, as it were his penon or royal banner, for no other lord in his realm may carry the like."—Correa, i. 378.

1516.—"And besides the page I speak of who carries the sword, they take another page who carries a sombreiro with a stand to shade his master, and keep the rain off him; and some of these are of silk stuff finely wrought, with many fringes of gold, and set with stones and seed pearl. ..."—Barboza, Lisbon ed. 288.

1553.—"At this time Dom Jorge discerned a great body of men coming towards where he was standing, and amid them a sombreiro on a lofty staff, covering the head of a man on horseback, by way of token he knew it to be some noble person. This sombreiro is a fashion in India coming from China, and among the Chinese no one may use it but a gentleman, for it is a token of nobility, which we may describe as a one-handed pallium (having regard to those which we use to see carried by four, at the reception of some great King or Prince on his entrance into a city)..."—Barros, III. x. 9. Then follows a minute description of the sombreiro or umbrella.

[1599.—"... a great broad sombreiro or shadow in their hands to defend them in the Summer from the Sunne, and in the Winter from the Raine."—Hakl. II. i. 261 (Stanf. Dict.).

1602.—In his character of D. Pedro Mascarenhas, the Viceroy, Couto says he was anxious to change certain habits of the Portuguese in India: "One of these was to forbid the tall sombreiros for warding off the rain and sun, to relieve men of the expense of paying those who carried them; he himself did not have one, but used a woollen umbrella with small cords (?) which they called for many years Mascarenhas. Afterwards finding the sun intolerable and the rain immoderate, he permitted the use of tall umbrellas, on the condition that private slaves should bear them, to save the wages of the Hindus who carry them, and are called boys de sombreiro (see BOY)."

—Couto, Dec. VII. Bk. i. ch. 12.

1630.—"Betwixt towns men usually travel in Chariots drawn by Oxen, but in Towns upon Pamalckeens, and with Sombreros de Sol over them."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1655, p. 46.

1657.—"A costé du cheval il y a un homme qui esvente Wistnon, afin qu'il ne reçoive point d'inconmodité soit par les monches, ou par la chaleur; et à chaque costé on porte deux Zombreiros, afin qu'il le Soleil ne luse pas sur luy."..."—Abr. Roger, Fr. Tr. ed. 1670, p. 223.

1673.—"None but the Emperor have a Sunbrero among the Moguls."—Fryer, 36.

1727.—"The Portuguese ladies... sent to beg the Favour that he would pick them out some lusty Dutch men to carry their Palenqueens and Somereras or Umbrellas."—A. Hamilton, i. 338; [ed. 1744, i. 340].

1768-71.—"Close behind it, followed the heir-apparent, on foot, under a sambreel, or sunshade, of state."—Stavorinus, E. T. i. 87.

[1845.—"No open umbrellas or summerheads allowed to pass through the gates."—Public Notice on Gates of Bombay Town, in Douglas, Glimpses of Old Bombay, 86.]
SOMBERRO, CHANNEL OF THE, n.p. The channel between the northern part of the Nicobar group, and the southern part embracing the Great and Little Nicobar, has had this name since the early Portuguese days. The origin of the name is given by A. Hamilton below. The indications in C. Federici and Hamilton are probably not accurate. They do not agree with those given by Horsburgh.

1566.—"Si passa per il canale di Nicobar, ouero per quello del Sombrero, li quali son per mezzo l'isola di Sumatra. ..."—C. Federici, in Ranuusto, ii. 391.

1727.—"The Islands off this Part of the Coast are the Nicobars. ... The northernmost Cluster is low, and are called the Carneicubars. ... The middle Cluster is fine champaign Ground, and all but one, well inhabited. They are called the Somerera Islands, because on the South End of the largest Island, is an Hill that resembles the top of an Umbrella or Somerera."—A. Hamilton, ii. 68 [ed. 1744].

1843.—"Sombreso Channel, bounded on the north by the Islands of Katchull and Noncowry, and by Merve or Passage Island on the South side, is very safe and about seven leagues wide."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 59-60.

SONAPARANTA, n.p. This is a quasi-classical name, of Indian origin, used by the Burmese Court in State documents and formal enumerations of the style of the King, to indicate the central part of his dominions; Skt. Suvarna (Pali Soña) prānta (or perhaps aparānta), 'golden frontier-land,' or something like that. There can be little doubt that it is a survival of the names which gave origin to the Chryse of the Greeks. And it is notable, that the same series of titles embraces Tamabadipa ('Copper Island' or Region) which is also represented by the Chalcis of Ptolemy. [Also see J. G. Scott, Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 103.]

(Ancient).—"There were two brothers resident in the country called Sunaránta, merchants who went to trade with 500 wagons. ..."—Legends of Gotama Buddha, in Hardy's Manual of Buddhism, 259.

1636.—"All comprised within the great districts ... of Tsa-Koo, Tsa-lan, Laygain, Phoung-Len, Kalé, and Thooun-thwot is constituted the Kingdom of Thunaparanta. All within the great districts of Pagán, Ava, Penya, and Myen-Zaí, is constituted the Kingdom of Tampadeva. ..."—From an Inscription at the Great Pagoda of Khong-Mhoo-dau, near Ava; from the M.S. Journal of Major H. Burney, accompanying a Letter from him, dated 11th September, 1839, in the Foreign Office, Calcutta. Burney adds: "The Ministers told me that, by Thunaparanta they mean all the countries to the northward of Ava, and by Tampadeva all to the southward. But this inscription shows that the Ministers themselves do not exactly understand what countries are comprised in Thunaparanta and Tamba-dewa."

1767.—"The King despotick; of great Merit, of great Power, Lord of the Countries Thonapronnah, Tompdewah, and Camboja, Sovereign of the Kingdom of BURAGHMAGH (Burma), the Kingdom of Siam and Hugten (?), and the Kingdom of Cassay."—Letter from the King of Burma, in Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 106.

1785.—"The Lord of Earth and Air, the Monarch of extensive Countries, the Sovereign of the Kingdoms of Somahparind, Tompadewah, and many others etc. ... Letter from the King to Sir John Shore, in Smyth, 487.

1855.—"His great, glorious and most excellent Majesty, who reigns over the Kingdom of Thunaparanta, Tampadeva, and all the great umbrella-wearing chiefs of the Eastern countries, the King of the Rising Sun, Lord of the Celestial Elephants, and Master of many white Elephants, and great Chief of Righteousness. ..."—King's Letter to the Governor-General (Lord Dalhousie), Oct. 2, 1855.

SONTHALS, n.p. Properly Santals, [the name being said to come from a place called Saont, now Silda in Medinipur, where the tribe remained for a long time (Dalton, Descr. Eth. 210-11)]. The name of a non-Aryan people belonging to the Kolarian class, extensively settled in the hilly country to the west of the Hoogly R. and to the south of Bhāgalpur, from which they extended to Bālāsore at interval, sometimes in considerable masses, but more generally much scattered. The territory in which they are chiefly settled is now formed into a separate district called Santal Parganas, and sometimes Santalbia. Their settlement in this tract is, however, quite modern; they have emigrated thither from the S.W. In Dr. F. Buchanan's statistical account of Bhāgalpur and its Hill people the Santals are not mentioned. The earliest mention of this tribe that we have found is in Mr. Sutherland's Report on the Hill People, which is printed in the Appendix to Long. No date is given there, but we learn from Mr. Man's book, quoted below, that the date is 1817. [The word is, however, much older than this. Forbes (Or. Mem. ii. 374 seq.) gives an account.
taken from Lord Teignmouth of witch tests among the Soontaar.

[1798. — "... amongst a wild and unlettered tribe, denominated Soontaar, who have reduced the detection and trial of persons suspected of witchcraft to a system."— As. Res. iv. 359.]

1837. — "For several years many of the industrious tribes called Sonthurs have established themselves in these forests, and have been clearing and bringing into cultivation large tracts of land..."—Sutherland’s Report, quoted in Long, 569.

1867. — "This system, indicated and proposed by Mr. Eden,* was carried out in its integrity under Mr. George Yule, C.B., by whose able management, with Messrs. Robinson and Wood as his deputies, the Sonthals were raised from misery, dull despair, and deadly hatred of the government, to a pitch of prosperity which, to my knowledge, has never been equalled in any other part of India under the British rule. The Regulation Courts, with their horde of leeches in the shape of badly paid, and corrupt Amlah (Omlah) and petitfigogging Mooktears, were abolished, and in their place a Number of active English gentlemen, termed Assistant Commissioners, and nominated by Mr. Yule, were set down among the Sonthals, with a Code of Regulations drawn up by that gentleman, the pith of which may be summed up as follows—

"‘To have no medium between the Sonthal and the Hakim, i.e. Assistant Commissioner.

‘To patiently hear any complaint made by the Sonthal from his own mouth, without any written petition or charge whatever, and without any Amlah or Court at the time.

‘To carry out all criminal work by the aid of the villagers themselves, who were to bring in the accused, with witnesses, to the Hakim, who should immediately attend to their statements, and punish them, if found guilty, according to the tenor of the law.

‘These were some of the most important of the golden rules carried out by men who recognised the responsibility of their situation; and with an adored chief, in the shape of Yule, for their ruler, whose firm, judicious, and gentlemanly conduct made them work with willing hearts, their endeavours were crowned with a success which far exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine. ..."—Sonthalia and the Sonthals, by E. G. Mon, Barrister-at-Law, &c. Calcutta, 1867, pp. 125-127.

SOODRA, SOODER, s. Skt. Sudra, [usually derived from root, su, ‘to be afflicted,’ but probably of non-Aryan origin]. The (theoretical) Fourth Caste of the Hindus. In South India, there being no claimants of the 2nd or 3rd classes, the highest castes among the (so-called) Sudras come next after the Brahmans in social rank, and Sudra is a note of respect, not of the contrary as in Northern India.

1630. — "The third Tribe or Cast, called the Shudderies."—Lord, Display, &c., ch. xii.

[c. 1685. — "The fourth caste is called Charados or Soudra."—Tavernier, ed. Belf, ii. 181.]

[1667. — "... and fourthly, the tribe of Seydra, or artisans and labourers."—Bernier, ed. Constable, 325.] 1674. — "The... Chudrer (these are the Nayres)."—Faria y Sousa, ii. 710.

1838. — "Such of the Aborigines as yet remained were formed into a fourth class, the Chodra, a class which has no rights, but only duties."—Whitney, Or. and Ling. Studies, ii. 6.

1867. — "A Brahman does not stand afool from a Soudra with a keener pride than a Greek Christian shows towards a Copt."—Dict. New America, 7th ed. i. 276.

SOOJEE, SOOJY, s. Hind. suji, [which comes probably from Skt. suka, ‘pure’]; a word curiously misinterpreted ("the coarser part of pounded wheat") by the usually accurate Shakespear. It is, in fact, the fine flour, made from the heart of the wheat, used in India to make bread for European tables. It is prepared by grinding between two millstones which are not in close contact. [Suji "is a granular meal obtained by moistening the grain overnight, then grinding it. The fine flour passes through a coarse sieve, leaving the Suji and bran above. The latter is got rid of by winnowing, and the round, granular meal or Suji, composed of the harder pieces of the grain, remains" (Watt. Econ. Dict. VI. pt. iv. 167).] It is the semolina of Italy. Bread made from this was called in Low Latin semelita; Germ. Semmelbrodchen, and old English simnel-cakes. A kind of porridge made with soojee.
SOORKY, s. Pounded brick used to mix with lime to form a hydraulic mortar. Hind. from Pers. surkhā, 'red-stuff.'

1777. — "The inquiry verified the information. We found a large group of miserable objects confined by order of Mr. Mills; some were simply so; some under sentence from him to beat Salkey."—Report of Impey and others, quoted in Stephen's Nuncomar and Impey, ii. 201.

1784. — "One lack of 9-inch bricks, and about 1400 maunds of sooryky."—Notefn. in Seton-Karr, i. 34; see also ii. 15.

1811. — "The road from Calcutta to Barapore... like all the Bengal roads it is paved with bricks, with a layer of sulky, or broken bricks over them."—Solvyns, Les Hindous, iii. The word is misused as well as misspelt here. The substance in question is khoa (q.v.).

SOORMA, s. Hind. from Pers. susī. Sulphuret of antimony, used for the purpose of darkening the eyes, kūht of the Arabs, the stīmmi and stibium of the ancients. With this Jezebel "painted her eyes" (2 Kings, ix. 30; Jeremiah, iv. 30 R.V.) "With it, I believe, is often confounded the sulphuret of lead, which in N. India is called soormee (ee is the feminine termination in Hindust.), and used as a substitute for the former: a mistake not of recent occurrence only, as Sprengel says, 'Distinguit vero Plinius marem a feminâ'" (Boyle, on Ant. of Hindu Medicine, 100). [See Watt. Econ. Dict. i. 271.]

1766. — "The powder is called by them surum; which they pretend refreshes and cools the eye, besides exciting its lustre, by the ambient blackness."—Grose, 2nd ed. ii. 142.

1829. — "Soorma, or the oxide of antimony, is found on the western frontier."—Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 13.

1832. — "Sulmah—A prepared permanent black dye, from antimony. ..."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, ii. 72.]
1667.—"... 2 patch of ye finest with what colours you thinke handsome for my own wear Chockoles and suases."—In Yule, Hedges's Diary, Hak. Soc. ii. celxii.

[1690.—"It (Suratt) is renown'd ... for sooses."

[1714-20.—In an inventory of Sir J. Fellowes: "A susa window-curtain."—2nd ser. N. & Q. vii. 244.]

1784.—"Four cassimere of different colours: p'atina dimity, and striped sooses."—In Seton-Karr, i. 42.

SOPHY, n.p. The name by which the King of Persia was long known in Europe—"The Sophy," as the Sultan of Turkey was "The Turk" or "Grand Turk," and the King of Delhi the "Great Mogul." This title represented Safi, Safavi, or Safi, the name of the dynasty which reigned over Persia for more than two centuries (1449-1722, nominally to 1736). The first king of the family was Isma'il, claiming descent from 'Ali and the Imâms, through a long line of persons of saintly reputation at Ardebil. The surname of Safi or Safi assumed by Isma'il is generally supposed to have been taken from Shaikh Safi-ud-din, the first of his more recent ancestors to become famous, and who belonged to the class of Sufis or philosophic devotees. After Isma'il the most famous of the dynasty was Shah Abbâs (1585-1629).

[1568.—"The King of Persia (whom here we call the great Sophy) is not there so called, but is called the Shaugh. They were dangerous to call him by the name of Sophy, because that Sophy in the Persian tongue is a beggar, and it were as much as to call him The great beggar."—Geoffrey Ducket, ibid. i. 447.]

1598.—"And all the Kings continued so with the name of Xa, which in Persia is a King, and Ishmael is a proper name, whereby Xa Ismael, and Xa Thamus are as much as to say King Ismael, and King Thamus, and of the Turks and Rumes are called Suffy or Sophy, which signifieth a great Captaine."—Linschoten, ch. xxvii.; [Hak. Soc. i. 173.]

1601.—"Sir Toby. Why, man, he's a very devil: I have not seen such a firago ..." "They say, he has been fencer to the Sophy."—Twelfth Night, III. iv.

1626.—"Were it to bring the Great Turk bound in chains Through France in triumph, or to couple up The Sophy and great Prester-John together; I would attempt it."—Beaum. & Fletch., The Noble Gentleman, v. 1.

c. 1630.—"Ismael at his Coronation proclaimed himself King of Persia by the name of Pot-shaw (Padshah)-Ismael-Sophy. Whence that word Sophy was borrowed is much controverted. Whether it be from the Armenian idiom, signifying Wool, of which the Shashes are made that ennobled his new order. Whether the name was from Sophy his grandsire, or from the Greek word Sophia imposed upon Aydar at his conquest of Trebizond by the Greeks there, I know not. Since then, many have called the Kings of Persia Sophy's: but I see no reason for it; since Ismael's son, grand and great grandsons Kings of Persia never continued that name, till this that now reigns, whose name indeed is Saffar, but casual."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, 280.

1665.—"As when the Tartar from his Russian foe, By Astrarcan, over the snowy plains Retires; or Bactrian Sophy, from the hights Of Turkish crescent, leaves all waste beyond The realm of Aladule, in his retreat To Taurus or Casbeen ..."

1727.—"The whole Reign of the last Sophi or King, was managed by such Vermin, that the Balochees and Mackrans . . . threw off the Yoke of Obedience first, and in full Bodies fell upon their Neighbours in Caramanit."—A. Hamilton, i. 108 ; [ed. 1744, i. 103].

1815.—"The Saffuean monarchs were revered and deemed holy on account of their descent from a saint."—Malcolm, H. of Pers. ii. 427.

1828.—"It is thy happy destiny to follow in that train of that brilliant star whose light shall shed a lustre on Persia, unknown since the days of the earlier Soofees."—J. B. Fraser, The Kuzzilbash, i. 192.

SOUBA, SOOBAH, s. Hind. from Pers. sūba. A large Division or Province of the Mogul Empire (e.g. the Sūbah of the Deccan, the Sābah of Bengal). The word is also frequently used as short for Sūbbādār (see SOUBADAR), 'the Viceroy' (over a sūba). It is also "among the Marathas sometimes applied to a smaller division comprising from 5 to 8 tarafs" (Wilson).

1594.—"In the fortieth year of his majesty's reign, his dominions consisted of 105 Sircars . . . The empire was then parcelled into 12 grand divisions, and each was committed to the government of a Soobadar . . . upon which occasion the Sovereign of the world distributed 12 Lacks of beetle. The names of the Soobahs were Allahabad, Agra, Oudh, Ajmeer, Ahmedabad, Bahar, Bengal, Dehly, Cabul, Lahooer, Multan, and Malwa: when his majesty conquered Berar, Khandees, and Ahmednagar, they were formed into three Soobahs, increasing the number to 15."—Ayen, ed. Gladwin, ii. 1-5; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 115].

1753.—"Princes of this rank are called Subahs. Nizam al muluck was Subah of the Deccan (or Southern) provinces. . . The Nabobs of Condonore, Cudapah, Carnatica, Valore, &c., the Kings of Trichinopoly, Mysore, Tanjore, are subject to this Subahship. 1823.—"The Delhi Sovereigns whose vast empire was divided into Soobhahs, or Governments, each of which was ruled by a Soobhadar or Viceroy."—Malcolm, Cent. India, i. 2.

SOUBADAR, SUBADAR, s. Hind. from Pers. sūbadār, 'one holding a sūba' (see SOUBA).

a. The Viceroy, or Governor of a sūba.

b. A local commandant or chief officer.

c. The chief native officer of a company of Sepoys; under the original constitution of such companies, its actual captain.

a. See SOUBA.

b.—

1673.—"The Subidar of the Town being a Person of Quality . . . he (the Ambassadour) thought good to give him a Visit."—Fryer, 77.

[c. 1809.—"The term Soudagar, which implies merely a principal merchant, is here (Behar) usually given to those who keep what the English of India call Europe shops; that is, shops where all sorts of goods imported from Europe, and chiefly consumed by Europeans, are retailed."—Buchanan, Eastern India, i. 375.

[c. 1817.—"This sahib was a very rich man, a Soudagar. ..."—Mrs. Sherwood, Last Days of Boosy, 84.]

a. The fruit Anona muricata, L., a variety of the Custard apple. This kind is not well known on the Bengal side of India, but it is completely naturalised at Bombay. The terms sour sop and sweet sop are, we believe, West Indian.

b. In a note to the passage quoted below, Grainger identifies the sour sop with the sursack of the Dutch. But in this, at least as regards use in the East Indies, there is some mistake. The latter term, in old Dutch writers on the East, seems always to apply to the Common Jack fruit, the 'sourjack,' in fact, as distinguished from the superior kinds, especially the champada of the Malay Archipelago.

1661.—Walter Schutz says that the famous fruit Jaka was called by the Netherlands in the Indies Soursack.—p. 236.

1675.—"The whole is planted for the most part with coco-palms, mangoes, and suursacks."—Hyckof van Goens, in Valentijn, Ceylon, 225.

1768–71.—"The Sursack-tree has a fruit of a similar kind with the durioon (duran), but it is not accompanied by such a fetid smell."—Stavorinus, E.T. i. 226.

1778.—"The one which yields smaller fruit, without seed, I found at Columbo, Galle, and several other places. The name by which it is properly known here is the Maldivian Sour Sack, and its use here is less universal than that of the other sort, which ... weighs 30 or 40 lbs."—Thurnberg, E.T. iv. 255.

[1833.—"Of the eatable fruitied kinds above referred to, the most remarkable are the sweet sop, sour sop, and cherimoyer. ..."—Penny Cyclo. ii. 64.]

SOWAR, SUWAR, s. Pers. sawar, 'a horseman.' A native cavalry soldier; a mounted orderly. In the Greek provinces in Turkey, the word is familiar in the form souzapis, pl. souzapis, for a mounted gendarme. [The regulations for suwars in the Mogul armies are given by Blochmann, Ain, i. 244 seq.]

1824.—"... The sowar who accompanied him."—Heber, Orig. i. 404.

1827.—"Hartley had therefore no resource save to keep his eye steadily fixed on the lighted match of the sowar ... who rode before him."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiii.

[1880.—"... Meerza, an Asswar well known on the Collector's establishment."—Or. Sport. Mag. reprint 1873, i. 390.]

SOWAR, SHOOTER, s. Hind. from Pers. shutur-sawar, the rider of a dromedary or swift camel. Such riders are attached to the establishment of the Viceroy on the march, and of other high officials in Upper India. The word sowar is quite misused by the Great Duke in the passage below, for a camel-driver, a sense it never has. The word written, or intended, may however have been surwaun (q.v.)

[1815.—"As we approached the camp his own surwars (camel-rides) went ahead of us."—Journal, Marques of Hastings, i. 337.]

1834.—"I ... found a fresh horse at Suffer Jung's tomb, and at the Kutub (cootub) a couple of riding camels and an attendant Shutur Suwar."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 129.

[1837.—"There are twenty Shooter Su- wars I have not an idea how I ought to spell those words), but they are native soldiers mounted on swift camels, very much trapped, and two of them always ride before our carriage."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 31."

1840.—"Sent a Shuta Sarwar (camel driver) off with an express to Simla."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Runj. Singh, 179.

1842.—"At Peshawur, it appears by the papers I read last night, that they have camels, but no sowars, or drivers."—Letter of D. of Wellington, in Indian Administration of Edl. Ellenhorough, 228.

1857.—"I have given general notice of the Shutur Sowar going into Meerut to all the Meerut men."—Il. Greathead's Letters during Siege of Delhi, 42.

SOWARRY, SUWARREE, s. Hind. from Pers. savārī. A cavalcade, a cortège of mounted attendants.

1803.—"They must have tents, elephants, and other sawary; and must have with them a sufficient body of troops to guard their persons."—A. Wellesley, in Life of Mowro, i. 346.

1809.—"He had no *sawarry")."—Ed. Valenția, i. 388.

1814.—"I was often reprimanded by the Zemindars and native officers, for leaving the suwarree, or state attendants, at the outer gate of the city, when I took my evening excursion."—Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 420; [2nd ed. ii. 372].

1826.—"The 'sawary', or suite of Trim-buckije, arrived at the palace."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 119."

1827.—"Orders were given that on the next day all should be in readiness for the Sowarree, a grand procession, when the Prince was to receive the Begum as an honored guest."—Sir Walter Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter, ch. xiv.

c. 1851.—"Je tâcherai d'éviter toute la pousrière de ces immenses sowarris."—Jacywemont, Corresp. ii. 121.

1837.—"The Raja of Benares came with a very magnificent suwarree of elephants and camels."—Miss Eden, Up the Country, i. 35.

SOWARRY CAMEL, s. A swift or riding camel. See SOWAR, SHOOTER.

1895.—"I am told you dress a camel beautifully," said the young Princess, 'and I was anxious to . . . ask you to instruct my people how to attire a savārī camel.' This was flattering me on a very weak point: there is but one thing in the world that I perfectly understand, and that is how to dress a camel."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 96.

SOWCAR, s. Hind. sāvākār; alleged to be from Skt. sādhu, 'right,' with the Hind. affix kār, 'doer'; Guj. Mahr. sāvakār. A native banker; corresponding to the Chetty of S. India.

1803.—"You should not confine your dealings to one soucar. Open a communication with every soucar in Poonah, and take money from any man who will give it you for bills."—Wellington, Desp., ed. 1837, ii. 1.

1826.—"We were also sahoukars, and granted bills of exchange upon Bombay and Madras, and we advanced moneys upon interest."—Pandurang Hari, 174; [ed. 1873, i. 251].

1857.—"It was the habit of the sowars, as the goldsmiths are called, to bear their wealth upon their persons."—Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 294.]

SOY, s. A kind of condiment once popular. The word is Japanese si-yau (a young Japanese fellow-passenger gave the pronunciation clearly as sho-yu.—A. B.), Chin. shi-yu. [Mr. Platts (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 475) points out that in Japanese as written with the native character sow would not be siyau, but si-yau-yu; in the Romanised Japanese this is simplified to shoyo (colloquially this is still further reduced, by dropping the final vowel, to shoyu or soy). Of this monosyllable only the y represents the classical siyau; the final consonant (y) is a relic of the termination yu. The Japanese word is itself derived from the Chinese, which at Shanghai is se-yu, at Amoy, si-yu, at Canton, shi-yu, of which the first element means 'salted beans,' or other fruits, dried and used as condiments; the second element merely means 'oil.' It is made from the beans of a plant common in the Hindalaya and E. Asia, and much cultivated, viz. Glycine Soja, Sieb. and Zucc. (Soya hispída, Moench.), boiled down and fermented. [In India the bean is eaten in places where it is cultivated, as in Chutia Nagpur (Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 510 seq.).]

1688.—"I have been told that sow is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the Taste; tho' a Gentleman of my Acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tonquin to Japan, from whence the true Soy comes, told me that it was made only with Wheat and a sort of Beans mixt with Water and Salt."—Dampier, ii. 28.

1690.—"... Souy, the choicest of all Sauces."—Ovington, 397.

[1900. —"Mushrooms shred into small pieces, flavoured with soyu" (soy).—Mrs. Frazer, A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan, i. 238.]

SPIN, s. An unmarried lady; popular abbreviation of 'Spinster.' [The Port. equivalent soltera (soliterea) was used in a derogatory sense (Gray, note on Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. ii. 128).]

SPONGE-CAKE, s. This well-known form of cake is called throughout Italy pane di Spagna, a fact that suggested to us the possibility that the English name is really a corruption of Spanish-kae. The name in Japan tends to confirm this, and must be our excuse for introducing the term here.

1880.—"There is a cake called kasateira resembling sponge-cake... It is said to have been introduced by the Spaniards, and that its name is a corruption of Castilla."—Miss Bird's Japan, i. 255.

SPOTTED-DEER, s. Axis maculatus of Gray; [Cervus axis of Blanford (Mammalia, 546)]; Hind. chital, Skt. chitra, 'spotted.'

1673. —"The same Night we travelled easily to Megatanâ, using our Fowling-Pieces all the way, being here presented with Rich Game, as Peacocks, Doves, and Pigeons, Chitrets, or Spotted Deer."—Fryer, 71.

[1677.—"Spotted Deare we shall send home, some by ye Europe ships, if they touch here."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 140.]

1679. —"There being conveniency in this place for ye breeding up of Spotted Deer, which the Hon'ble Company doe every yeare order to be sent home for His Majesty, it is ordered that care be taken to breed them up in this Factory (Madapollam), to be sent home accordingly."—Pl. St. George Council (on Tour), 16th April, in Notes and Extvs., Madras, 1871.

1862.—"This is a fine pleasant situation, full of great shady trees, most of them Tamarins, well stored with peacocks and Spotted Deer like our fallow-deer."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 18; [Hak. Soc. i. 39].

SQUEEZE, s. This is used in Anglo-Chinese talk for an illegal action. It is, we suppose, the translation of a Chinese expression. It corresponds to the malatolita of the Middle Ages, and to many other slang phrases in many tongues.

1882.—"If the licence (of the Hong merchants) ... was costly, it secured to them uninterrupted and extraordinary pecuniary advantages; but on the other hand it subjected them to 'calls' or 'squeezes' for contributions to public works, ... for the relief of districts suffering from scarcity ... as well as for the often imaginary ... damage caused by the overflying of the 'Yangtse Keang' or the 'Yellow River.'"—The Fourkees at Canton, p. 96.

STATION, s. A word of constant recurrence in Anglo-Indian colloquial. It is the usual designation of the place where the English officials of a district, or the officers of a garrison (not in a fortress) reside. Also the aggregate society of such a place.

[1832.—"The nobles and gentlemen are frequently invited to witness a Station ball.' ..."—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 196.]

1866.—"And if I told how much I ate at one Mofussil station, I'm sure 'twould cause at home a most extraordinary sensation."—Trelwlyn, The Dawk Bungalow, in Fraser, lxxiii. p. 391.

"Who asked the Station to dinner, and allowed only one glass of Simkin to each guest."—Ibid. 291.

STEVENDORE, s. One employed to stow the cargo of a ship and to unload it. The verb estivar [Lat. stiperare] is used both in Sp. and Port. in the sense of stowing cargo, implying originally to pack close, as to press wool. Estivador in the sense of a wool-packer only is given in the Sp. Dictionaries, but no doubt has been used in every sense of estivar. See Skeat, s.v.

STICK-INSECT, s. The name commonly applied to certain orthopterous insects, of the family Phasmidae, which have the strongest possible resemblance to dry twigs or pieces of stick, sometimes 6 or 7 inches in length.

1754. — "The other remarkable animal which I met with at Cuddalore was the animated Stalk, of which there are different kinds. Some appear like dried straws tied together, others like grass. . . ."—Ives, 20.

1860.—"The Stick-insect. — The Phas-midae or spectres . . . present as close a resemblance to small branches, or leafless twigs, as their congeners do to green leaves. . . ."—Tennent, Ceylon, i. 252.

[STICKLAC, s. Lac encrusted on sticks, which in this form is collected in the jungles of Central India.

[1880. — "Where, however, there is a regular trade in stick-lac, the propagation of the insect is systematically carried on by those who wish for a certain and abundant crop."—Ball, Jungle Life, 308.]

STINK-WOOD, s. Focidia Mauritiana, Lam., a myrtaceous plant of Mauritius, called there Bois puant. "At the Carnival in Goa, one of the sports is to drop bits of this stinkwood into the pockets of respectable persons."—Birdwood (MS.).

STRIDHANA, STREEDHANA, s. Skt. stri-dhana, 'women's property.' A term of Hindu Law, applied to certain property belonging to a woman, which follows a law of succession different from that which regulates other property. The term is first to be found in the works of Jones and Colebrooke (1790-1800), but has recently been introduced into European scientific treatises. [See Mayne, Hindu Law, 541 seqq.]

1875.—"The settled property of a married woman . . . is well known to the Hindoos under the name of stridhana."—Maine, Early Institutions, 321.

STUPA. See TOPE.

SUCKIN, n.p. This name, and the melancholy victories in its vicinity, are too familiar now to need explanation. Arab. Sawâkin.

c. 1381.—"This very day we arrived at the island of Sawâkin. It is about 6 miles from the mainland, and has neither drinkable water, nor corn, nor trees. Water is brought in boats, and there are cisterns to collect rain water. . . ."—Ibn Batuta, ii. 161-2.

1526.—"The Preste continued speaking with our people, and said to Don Rodrigo that he would have great pleasure and complete contentment, if he saw a fort of ours erected in Macau, or in Çuaquem, or in Zyla."—Correa, ii. 42; [see Dalboquerque, Comm. ii. 229].

[c. 1590.—". . . thence it (the sea) washes both Persia and Ethiopia where are Dhaltak and Suckin, and is called (the Gulf of) Oman and the Persian Sea."—Àin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 121.]

SUCKER-BUCKER, n.p. A name often given in N. India to Upper Sind, from two neighbouring places, viz., the town of Sukkar on the right bank of the Indus, and the island fortress of Bakkar or Bhakkar in the river. An alternative name is Rorée-Bucker, from Rohri, a town opposite Bakkar, on the left bank, the name of which is probably a relic of the ancient town of Aror or Aor, though the site has been changed since the Indus adopted its present bed. [See McCrindle, Invasion of India, 352 seqq.]

c. 1335.—"I passed 5 days at Lâhar . . . and quit it to proceed to Bakár. They thus call a fine town through which flows a canal derived from the river Sind."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 114-115.

1521.—Shah Beg "then took his departure for Bhakkar, and after seven or eight days' marching arrived at the plain surrounding Sakkah."—Turkhan Nâma, in Elliot, i. 311.

1554.—"After a thousand sufferings we arrived at the end of some days' journey, at Siawan (Sekhar), and then, passing by Patara and Darilja, we entered the fortress of Bâkr."—Sidi Ali', p. 136.

[c. 1590. — "Bhakkar (Bhukkara) is a notable fortress; in ancient chronicles it is called Mâmsânâr."—Àin, ed. Jarrett, ii. 327.]

1616. — "Buckor, the Chiefe Citie, is called Buckor Sucor."—Terry, [ed. 1777, p. 75].

1753.—"Vient ensuite Buckor, ou comme il est écrit dans la Géographie Turque, Peker, ville située sur une colline, entre deux bras de l'Indus, qui en font une île . . . la géographie . . . ajoute que Lonhri (i.e. Rori) est une autre ville située vis-à-vis de cette île du côté meridional, et que Sekker, autrement Sukor, est en même position du côté septentrional."—D'Anville, p. 37.

SUCKET, s. Old English. Wright explains the word as 'dried sweet-meats or sugar-plums.' Does it not in the quotations rather mean boef-sugar? [Palmer (Folk Etymol. 378) says that the original meaning was a 'slice of melon or gourd,' Ital. succata, 'a kind of meat made of Pumipons or Gourdes’ (Florio) from _zucca_, ‘a gourd or pumpkin’, which is a shortened form of _cucuzza_, a corruption of Lat. _cucurbita_ (Dicia). This is perhaps the same word which appears in the quotation from Linschoten below, where the editor suggests that it is derived from Mahr _sukat_ ‘slightly dried, desiccated,’ and Sir H. Yule suggests a corruption of H. _suth_, ‘dried ginger.’

[1537.—‘C. packed in a frail, two little barrels of _sukat_. . .’— _Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII._ xii. pt. i. 451.]

1584.—‘White _sukat_ from Zindi’ (i.e. Sind) ‘Cambala, and China.’—Barret, in _Hakl_. ii. 412.

[1580.—Ginger by the Abrians, Persians and Turks is called _sangilli_ (see _GINGER_), in Casrure, Deean, and Bengala, when it is fresh and green Adrac, and when dried _sukte_.— _Linschoten_, Hak. Soc. ii. 79.]

C. 1620-30.—

‘. . . . . For this, This Candy wine, three merchant were undone;
These _suckets_ brake as manly more.’
 _Browne_ and _Fletch._, _The Little French Lawyer_, i. 1.

SUCLAT, SACKCLOTH. &c., s. Pers. _sakkalt_, _sakallat_, _saklatin_, _suklatun_, applied to certain woollen stuffs, and particularly now to European broadcloth. It is sometimes defined as _scarlet_ broad cloth; but though this colour is frequent, it does not seem to be essential to the name. [ _Scarlet_ was the name of a material long before it denoted a colour. In the Liberale Roll of 14 Hen. III. (1230, quoted in _N. & Q._ 8 ser. i. 129) we read of _sanguine scarlet_, brown, red, white and _scarlet coloris de Marble._ It has, however, been supposed that our word _scarlet_ comes from some form of the present word (see _Sheat_, s.v. _Sheart._) But the fact that the Arab, dictionaries give a form _saklhat_ must not be trusted to. It is a modern form, particularly taken from the European word, [as according to _Sheat_, the Turkish _saklhat_ is merely borrowed from the Ital. _scarlatto_].

The word is found in the medieval literature of Europe in the form _sicklatown_, a term which has been the subject of controversy both as to etymology and to exact meaning (see _Marco Polo_, Bk. i. ch. 58, _notes_). Among the conjectures as to etymology are a derivation from Ar. _sukl_. ‘polishing’ (see _SICLEEGUR_); from Sicily (Ar. _Sikletyjo_); and from the Lat. _cylcas_, _cyladatus_. In the Arabic _Vocabulist_ of the 13th century (Florence, 1871), _siklatun_ is translated by _ciclos_. The conclusion come to in the note. on _Marco Polo_, based partly but not entirely, on the modern meaning of _sakllat_, was that _suklatun_ was probably a light woollen texture. But Dozy and De Jong give it as _étoffe de soie, brodée d’or_, and the passage from _Edrisi_ supports this undoubtedly. To the north of India the name _suklat_ is given to a stuff imported from the borders of China.

1040.—‘The robes were then brought, consisting of valuable frocks of _saklatun_ of various colours.’— _Baukati_, in _Elliot_, ii. 148.

C. 1150.—‘Almeria (_Amsaria_) was a Musulman city at the time of the Moravidae. It was then a place of great industry, and reckoned, among others, 800 silk looms, where they manufactured costly robes, brocades, the stuffs known as _Saklatun Isfahani_ . . . and various other silk tissues.’— _Edrisi_ (Joubert), ii. 40.

C. 1220.—‘Tabriz. The chief city of Azarbajian. . . They make there the stuffs called _attabi_ (see _TABBY_), _Siklatun_, _Khitabi_, fine satins and other textures which are exported everywhere.’— _Yaküt_, in _Barber de Meynard_, i. 138.

C. 1370—

‘His heer, his berd, was lyk saffronn That to his girdel raughte adoun His soho of Cordewane, Of Brugges were his hosen broun His Rode was of _Syklatoun_ That coste many a Jane.’
 _Chaucer, Sir Thopas_, 4 ( _Furnival_, Ellesmere Text).

C. 1590—

‘_Suklat-i-Rumi of Farangi o Portugali_’ (Broadcloth of Turkey, of Europe, and of Portugal). . . _Ain_ (orig.) 110. Blochmann renders ‘ _Scarlet Broadcloth_’ (see above). [The same word, _suklat_, is used later on of ‘woollen stuffs’ made in Kashmir (Carret, _Ain_, ii. 936.)]

1675—‘_Saffrana_ is already full of London Clotch, or _Sackcloath London_, as they call it.’— _Fryer_, 224.

‘His Hose of London Sackcloth of any Colour.’— _Ibid._ 391.

laat_ and flat black woolen cap.’ . . .’— _Lloyd, Gerard, Narr._ i. 167.]
SUGAR.

1854.—"List of Chinese articles brought to India. . . Suklat, a kind of camlet made of camel’s hair."—Cunningham’s Ladak, 242.

1862.—"In this season travellers wear garments of sheep-skin with sleeves, the fleece side inwards, and the exterior covered with Sooklat, or blanket."—Punjab Trade Report, 57.

SUDDEN DEATH. Anglo-Indian slang for a fowl served as a spatchcock, the standing dish at a dawk-bungalow in former days. The bird was caught in the yard, as the traveller entered, and was on the table by the time he had bathed and dressed.

[c. 1848.—"‘Sudden death’ means a young chicken about a month old, caught, killed, and grilled at the shortest notice."—Borneo, Voyage to China, i. 193.]

SUDDER, adj., but used as s. Literally ‘chief,’ being Ar. sadr. This term had a technical application under Mahommedan rule to a chief Judge, as in the example quoted below. The use of the word seems to be almost confined to the Bengal Presidency. Its principal applications are the following:

a. Sudder Board. This is the ‘Board of Revenue,’ of which there is one at Calcutta, and one in the N.W. Provinces at Allahabad. There is a Board of Revenue at Madras, but not called ‘Sudder Board’ there.

b. Sudder Court, i.e. ‘Sudder Adawlut (sadr ’udālat). This was till 1862, in Calcutta and in the N.W.P., the chief court of appeal from the Mofussil or District Courts, the Judges being members of the Bengal Civil Service. In the year named the Calcutta Sudder Court was amalgamated with the Supreme Court (in which English Law had been administered by English Barrister Judges), the amalgamated Court being entitled the High Court of Judiciary. A similar court also superseded the Sudder Adawlut in the N.W.P.

c. Sudder Ameen, i.e. chief Ameen (q.v.). This was the designation of the second class of native Judge in the classification which was superseded in Bengal by Act XVI. of 1868, in Bombay by Act XIV. of 1869, and in Madras by Act III. of 1873. Under that system the highest rank of native Judge was Principal Sudder Ameen; the 2nd rank, Sudder Ameen; the 3rd, Moonsiff. In the new classification there are in Bengal Subordinate Judges of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd grade, and Munsiffs (see MOONSIFF) of 4 grades; in Bombay, Subordinate Judges of the 1st class in 3 grades, and 2nd class in 4 grades; and in Madras Subordinate Judges in 3 grades, and Munsiffs in 4 grades.

d. Sudder Station. The chief station of a district, viz. that where the Collector, Judge, and other chief civil officials reside, and where their Courts are.

c. 1340.—"The Sadr-Jīhān (‘Chief of the Word’) i.e. the Kadi-al-Kuṭl (‘Judge of Judges’) (CAZEE) . . . possesses ten townships, producing a revenue of about 60,000 tankas. He is also called Sadr-al-Islām."—Skhābuddin Dinikhrī, in Notes et Exts. xiii. 185.

SUPEENA, s. Hind, sāffina. This is the native corr. of sulphen. It is shaped, but not much distorted, by the existence in Hind. of the Ar. word sāffina for ‘a blank-book, a note-book.’

SUGAR, s. This familiar word is of Skt. origin. Sākara originally signifies ‘grit or gravel,’ thence crystallised sugar, and through a Prakrit form sakara gave the Pers. shakkār, the Greek σάκχαρος and σάκχαρος, and the late Latin saccharum. The Ar. is sukkār, or with the article as-sukkār, and it is probable that our modern forms, It. zucchero and succheria, Fr. sucre, Germ. Zucker, Eng. sugar, came as well as the Sp. azucar, and Port. assucar, from the Arabic direct, and not through Latin or Greek. The Russian is sakkar; Polish zukier; Hung. zukor. In fact the ancient knowledge of the product was slight and vague, and it was by the Arabs that the cultivation of the sugar-cane was introduced into Egypt, Sicily, and Andalusia. It is possible indeed, and not improbable, that palm-sugar (see JAGGERY) is a much older product than that of the cane. [This is disputed by Watt (Econ. Dict. vi. pt. i. p. 31), who is inclined to fix the home of the cane in E. India.] The original habitat of the cane is not known; there is only a slight and doubtful statement of Loureiro, who, in speaking of Cochin-China, uses the words "habitat et colitur," which may imply its existence in a wild state, as well as under cultivation, in that country. De Candolle assigns its earliest production to the country extending from Cochín-China to Bengal.

Though, as we have said, the knowledge which the ancients had of sugar was very dim, we are disposed greatly to question the thesis, which has been so confidently maintained by Salmiasi and later writers, that the original saccharum of Greek and Roman writers was not sugar but the siliceous concretion sometimes deposited in bamboos, and used in medieval medicine under the name tabasheer (q.v.) (where see a quotation from Royle, taking the same view). It is just possible that Pliny in the passage quoted below may have jumbled up two different things, but we see no sufficient evidence even of this. In White's Latin Dict. we read that by the word saccharum is meant (not sugar but) "a sweet juice distilling from the joints of the bamboo." This is nonsense. There is no such sweet juice distilled from the joints of the bamboo; nor is the substance tabashir at all sweet. On the contrary it is slightly bitter and physickly in taste, with no approach to sweetness. It is a hydrate of silica. It could never have been called "honey" (see Dioscorides and Pliny below); and the name of bamboo-sugar appears to have been given it by the Arabs merely because of some resemblance of its concretions to lumps of sugar. [The same view is taken in the Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. xxii. 625, quoting Not. et Extr., xxv. 267.] All the erroneous notices of ἄκχαρον seem to be easily accounted for by lack of knowledge; and they are exactly paralleled by the loose and inaccurate stories about the origin of camphor, of lac, and what not, that may be found within the boards of this book.

In the absence or scarcity of sugar, honey was the type of sweetness, and hence the name of honey applied to sugar in several of these early extracts. This phraseology continued down to the Middle Ages, at least in its application to uncrystallised products of the sugar-cane, and analogous substances. In the quotation from Pegolotti we apprehend that his three kinds of honey indicate honey, treacle, and a syrup or treacle made from the sweet pods of the carob-tree.

Sugar does not seem to have been in early Chinese use. The old Chinese books often mention shì-mí or "stone-honey" as a product of India and Persia. In the reign of T'ai Tsung (627-650) a man was sent to Gangetic India to learn the art of sugar-making; and Marco Polo below mentions the introduction from Egypt of the further art of refining it. In India now, Chinī (Cheeny) (Chinese) is applied to the whiter kinds of common sugar; Misrī (Misree) or Egyptian, to sugar-candy; loaf-sugar is called kand.

c. A.D. 60.—
"Quisque ferens rapidum diviso gurgite fontem" Vastis Indus aquis mixtum non sentit Hydaspem.
Quique bibunt tenera dulecis ab arundine succos. . . ."—Lucan, iii. 235.

"Aiant inveniri apud Indoel mel in arundinum folis, quod aut nos ilius coeli, aut ipsius arundinis humor dulecis et pinguis gignat."—Seneca, Epist. lxxxiv.

c. A.D. 65.—"It is called σάχχαρον, and is a kind of honey which solidifies in India, and in Arabia Felix; and is found upon canes, in its substance resembling salt, and crushed by the teeth as salt is. Mixed with water and drunk, it is good for the belly and stomach, and for affections of the bladder and kidneys."—Diocorides, Med. Med. ii. c. 104.

c. 170.—"But all these articles are hotter than is desirable, and so they aggravate fevers, much as wine would. But osmei alone does not aggravate fever, whilst it is an active purgative. . . . Not undeservedly, I think, that saccharum may also be counted among things of this quality."—Galen, Methodus Medendi, viii.

c. 1220.—"Sunt insuper in Terra (Sancta) caumellae de quibus zucchara ex compositione eliquatur."—Jacobi Vitriaci, Hist. Jherosolym. cap. lxxxv.

c. 1298.—"Bangala est une provence vers midi . . . Il font grant marchandise, car il ont espi e galanga e gingiber e succare et de maintes autres chieres espices."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. cxxxvi.

1298.—"Je voiz di que en ceste provences" (Quinsai or Chekiang) "naist et se fait plus sucar que ne fait en tout le autre monde, et ce est encore grandissime vente."—Ibid. ch. cliii.

1298.—"And before this city" (a place near Fu-chan) "came under the Great Can those people knew not how to make fine sugar (zuccher) ; they only used to boil and skim the juice, which, when cold, left a black paste. But after they came under the Great Can some men of Babylonia" (i.e. of Cairo) "who happened to be at the Court proceeded to this city and taught the people to refine sugar with the ashes of certain trees."—Ibid. in Rannesto, ii. 49.

c. 1343. — "In Cyprus the following articles are sold by the hundred-weight (cantara di peso) and at a price in besants: Round pepper, sugar in powder (polvere di zucchero) . . . sugars in loaves (zuccheri in pane), beast's honey, sugar-cane honey, and carob-honey (mele d'ape, mele di canameli, mele di carrube). . . ."—Pegolotti, 64.

"Loaf sugars are of several sorts, viz. zucchero munchera, caffettino, and bam- billonia; and musciatto, and donnmacsino; and the &c., is the best sugar there is; for it is more thoroughly boiled, and its paste is whiter, and more solid, than any other sugar; it is in the form of the bambillonia sugar like this Δ; and of this mucchera kind but little comes to the west, because nearly the whole is kept for the mouth and for the use of the Soltan himself.

"Zucchero caffettino is the next after the mucchera . . . .

"Zuccher Bambillonia is the best next after the best caffettino.

"Zuccheri musciatto is the best after that of Bambillonia.

"Zuccheri chandi, the bigger the pieces are, and the whiter, and the brighter, so much is it the better and finer, and there should not be too much small stuff.

"Powdered sugars are of many kinds, as of Cyprus, of Rhodes, of the Crano of Monreale, and of Alexandria; and they are all made originally in entire loaves; but as they are not so thoroughly done, as the other sugars that keep their loaf shape . . . the loaves tumble to pieces, and return to powder, and so it is called powdered sugar . . ." (and a great deal more).—Ibid. 382-385. We cannot interpret most of the names in the preceding extract. Bambillonia is 'Sugar of Babylony,' i.e. of Cairo, and Dommacsino of Damascus. Mucchera (see CANDY (SUGAR), the second quotation), Caffettino, and Musciatto, no doubt all represent Arabic terms used in the trade at Alexandria, but we cannot identify them.

c. 1345.—"J'ai vu vendre dans le Bengale . . . un rithl (rottile) de sucre (al-sukkar), poids de Dibhy, pour quatre drachmes."—Tbn Batuta, iv. 211.

1516.—"Moreover they make in this city (Bengala, i.e. probably Chittagong) much and good white cane sugar (squere branco de cana), but they do not know how to consolidate it and make loaves of it, as they so wrap up the powder in certain wrappers of raw hide, very well stitched up; and make great loads of it, which are despatched for sale to many parts, for it is a great traffic."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 362.

[1630.—"Let us have a word or two of the prices of sugar and suger candy."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, i. 5.]

1807. — "Chacun sait que par effet des regards de Farid, des monceaux de terre se changeaient en sucre. Tel est le motif du surnom de Schakar ganj, ' tresor de sucre' qui lui a été donné."—Arishk-ı-Mahbûl, quoted by Garvin de Tassy, Rel. Mus. 95. (This is the saint, Farid-uddin Shakarganj (d. A.D. 1268) whose shrine is at Pâk Pattan in the Punjab.) [See Crooke, Popular Religion, &c. i. 214 seqq.]

1810.—"Although the sugar cane is supposed by many to be indigenous in India, yet it has only been within the last 50 years that it has been cultivated to any great extent . . . Strange to say, the only sugar-candy used until that time" (20 years before the date of the book) "was received from China; latterly, however, many gentlemen have speculated deeply in the manufacture. We now see sugar-candy of the first quality manufactured in various places of Bengal, and I believe that it is at least admitted that the raw sugars from that quarter are eminently good."—Williamson, V.M. ii. 193.

SULTAN, s. Ar. sultan, 'a Prince, a Monarch.' But this concrete sense, is in Arabic, post-classical only. The classical sense is abstract 'dominion.'

The corresponding words in Hebrew and Aramaic have, as usual, sh or s. Thus shol坦 in Daniel (e.g. vi. 26—"in the whole dominion of my kingis" is exactly the same word. The concrete word, corresponding to sultan in its post-classical sense, is shalît, which is applied to Joseph in Gen. xlii. 6—"governor." So Saladin (Yûsûf Salâh-ad-dîn) was not the first Joseph who was sultan of Egypt. ["In Arabia it is a not uncommon proper name; and as a title it is taken by a host of petty kinglyts. The Abbasiye Caliphs (as Al-Wâsik . . .) formerly created these Sultans as their regents. Al Tâ'i bîllah (A.D. 974) invested the famous Sabuktgan with the office . . . Sabuktgan's son, the famous Mahnûd of the Ghaznavite dynasty in 1002, was the first to adopt 'Sultan' as an independent title some 200 years after the death of Harîn-al-Rashid."

SUMATRA.

SULTAN. 865

a. n.p. This name has been applied to the great city of Sumatra since about A.D. 1400. There can be no reasonable doubt that it was taken from the very similar name of one of the maritime principalities upon the north coast of the island, which seems to have originated in the 13th century. The seat of this principality, a town called Samudra, was certainly not far from Pasei, the Parem of the early Portuguese writers, the Pasir of some modern charts, and probably lay near the inner end of the Bay of Telo Samawe (see notes to Marco Polo, 2nd ed. ii. 276 seqq.). This view is corroborated by a letter from C. W. J. Wenniker (Bijdragen tot de Taal-Land-en Volken- kunde van Nederlandsch Indie, ser. iv. vol. 6. (1882), p, 298) from which we learn that in 1881 an official of Netherlands India, who was visiting Pasei, not far from that place, and on the left bank of the river (we presume the river which is shown in maps as entering the Bay of Telo Samawe near Pasei) came upon a kampong, or village, called Samudra. We cannot doubt that this is an indication of the site of the old capital.

The first mention of the name is probably to be recognised in Samara, the name given in the text of Marco Polo to one of the kingdoms of this coast, intervening between Busina, or Pacem, and Dagroian or Draglogic, which last seems to correspond with Pedir. This must have been the position of Samudra, and it is probable that had it disappeared accidentally from Polo's Samara. Malay legends give trivial stories to account for the etymology of the name, and others have been suggested; but in all probability it was the Skt. Samudra, the 'sea.' [See Miscellaneous Papers relating to Indo-China, 2nd ser. ii. 50; Leyden, Malay Annals, 65.] At the very time of the alleged foundation of the town a kingdom was flourishing at Dwara Samudra in S. India (see DOOR SUMMUND).

The first authentic occurrence of the name is probably in the Chinese annals, which mention, among the Indian kingdoms which were prevailed on to send tribute to Kublai Khan, that of Sumutala. The chief of this State is called in the Chinese record Tu-han-pa-ti (Pauthier, Marc Pol, 605), which seems to exactly represent the Malay words Tuan-Pa'ti, 'Lord Ruler.'

We learn next from Ibn Batuta that at the time of his visit (about the middle of the 14th century) the State of Sumatra, as he calls it, had become important and powerful in the Archipelago; and no doubt it was about that time or soon after, that the name began to be applied by foreigners to the whole of the great island, just as Lambrí had been applied to the same island some centuries earlier, from Lambrí, which was then the State and port habitually visited by ships from India. We see that the name was so applied early in the following century by Nicolo Conti, who was in those seas apparently c. 1420-30, and who calls the island Shamuthera. Fra Mauro, who derived much information from Conti, in his famous World-Map, calls the island Isola Siamotra or Taprobane. The confusion with Taprobane lasted long.

When the Portuguese first reached those regions Pedir was the leading State upon the coast, and certainly no State known as Sumatra or Sumatra then continued to exist. Whether the city continued to exist, even in decay, is obscure. The Aín, quoted below, refers to the "port of Sumatra," but this may have been based on old information. Valentijn seems to recognise the existence of a place called Samudra or Sumotdara, though it is not entered in his map. A famous mystic theologian who flourished under the great King of Achin, Iskandar Muda, and died in 1630, bore the name of Shamsuddin Shamatrani, which seems to point to a place called Shamatra as his birthplace. And a distinct mention of "the island of Samatra" as named from "a city of this northern part" occurs in the so-called "Voyage which Juan Serano made when he fled from Malacca" in 1512, published by Lord Stanley of Alderley at the end of his translation of Barbosa. This man, on leaving Pedir and going down the coast, says: "I drew towards the south and south-east direction, and reached to another country and city which is called Samatara," and so on. Now this indicates the position in which the city of Sumatra must really have been, if it continued to exist. But, though this passage is not, all the rest of the narrative seems to be mere plunder from Varthema. Unless, indeed, the plunder was the other way; for there is reason to believe that Varthema never went east of Malabar.

There is, however, a like intimation in a curious letter respecting the Portuguese discoveries, written from Lisbon in 1515, by a German, Valentino Moravia (the same probably who published a Portuguese version of Marco Polo, at Lisbon, in 1502) and who shows an extremely accurate conception of Indian geography. He says: "The greatest island is that called by Marco Polo the Venetian Java Minor, and at present it is called Sumotra from a port of the said island" (see in De Gubernatis, Viaggio. Ital. 391).

It is probable that before the Portuguese epoch the adjoining States of Pasei and Sumatra had become united. Mr. G. Phillips, of the Consular Service in China, was good enough to send to one of the present writers, when engaged on Marco Polo, a copy of an old Chinese chart showing the northern coast of the island, and this showed the town of Sumatra (Sumantala). It seemed to be placed in the Gulf of Pasei, and very near where Pasei itself still exists. An extract of a Chinese account of about A.D. 1413 accompanied the map. This was fundamentally the same as that quoted below from Groeneveldt. There was a village at the mouth of the river called Talu-mangkin (qu, Telu-Sama'we?). A curious passage also will be found below, extracted by the late M. Pauthier from the great Chinese Imperial Geography, which alludes to the disappearance of Sumatra from knowledge.

We are quite unable to understand the doubts that have been thrown upon the derivation of the name, given to the island by foreigners, from that of the kingdom of which we have been speaking (see the letter quoted above from the Byjáden). 1298.—"So you must know that when you leave the Kingdom of Basma (Pacem) you come to another Kingdom called Samara on the same island."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 10.

c. 1500.—"Beyond it (Lámbrí, or Lámbrí, near Achin) lies the country of Samatra, and beyond that Darband Niás, which is a dependency of Java."—Rashiduddin, in Elliot, i. 71.

c. 1323.—"In this same island, towards the south, is another Kingdom by name Sumoltra, in which is a singular generation of people."—Odoire, in Cauthy, &c., i. 277.

c. 1546.—"... after a voyage of 25 days we arrived at the island of Jawa" (i.e. the Java Minor of Marco Polo, or Sumatra). "... We thus made our entrance into the capital, that is to say, into the city of Sumuthra. It is large and handsome, and is encompassed with a wall and towers of timber."—Ibn Battuta, iv. 228-230.

1416.—"SUMATRA [Su-men-ta-la]. This country is situated on the great road of western trade. When a ship leaves Malacca for the west, and goes with a fair eastern wind for five days and nights, it first comes to a village on the sea-coast called Ta-tu-man, and anchoring here and going south-east for about 10 li (3 miles) one arrives at the said place. "This country has no walled city. There is a large brook running out into the sea, with two tides every day; the waves at the mouth of it are very high, and ships continually founder there...."—Chinese work, quoted by Groeneweldt, p. 85.

c. 1430.—"He afterwards went to a fine city of the island Tapsobana, which island is called by the natives Sciamuthera."—Conti, in India in XVth. Cent., 9.

1459.—"Isola Siamotra."—Fro Mauro.

1498.—"... Camatara is of the Christians; it is distant from Calicut a voyage of 30 days with a good wind."—Roteiro, 109.

1510.—"Wherefore we took a junk and went towards Sumatra to a city called Picker."—Varthema, 228.

1522.—"... We left the island of Timor, and entered upon the great sea called Lant Chidol, and taking a west-south-west course, we left to the right and the north, for fear of the Portuguese, the island of Sumatra, anciently called Tapsobana; also Pegu, Bengal, Urissa, Chelinn (see KLING) where are the Malabars, subjects of the King of Narsinga."—Pigafetta, Hak. Soc. 159.

1572.—"Dizem, que desta terra, co'as possantes Ondas o mar intrando, dividio A nobre ilha Samaota, que j'a dantes Juntas ambas a gente antigua vio: Chersoneso foi dita, e das prestantes Vezas d'ouro, que a terra produzio, Aurea por epitetho le ajuntam, Algus que fosse Ophir imaginaram."—Quinones, x. 124.

By Burton:

"From this Peninsula, they say, the sea parted with puissant waves, and entering 'tore Samaota's noble island, wont to be joined to the Main as seen by men of yore. 'Twas called Chersonese, and such degree it gained by earth that yielded golden ore, they gave a golden epithet to the ground: Some be who fancy Ophir here was found,"

c. 1590.—"The zabad (i.e. civet) which I brought from the harbour, town of Sumatra, from the territory of Achin, goes by the name of Sumatra zabad (chin az bandar-i Samaat), az muzafat-i Achin awurdand, Samaatgoyand."—Am, bloekmann, i. 79, [orig. i. 99]. [And see a reference to Lami in in, ed. Jarrett, ii. 48.]

1612.—"It is related that Raja Shaher-ul-Navi (see SARNAU) was a soveraign of great power, and on hearing that Samadra was a fine and flourishing land he said to his warriors—which of you will take the Rajah of Samadra?"—Sijiera Malanyu, in J. Ind. Archip. v. 316.

c. .—"Sou-men-tala est située au sud-ouest de Telen-teling (la Cochine Chine) ... jusqu'à la fin du règne de Taching-tseu (in 1425), ce roi ne cessa d'envoyer son tribut à la cour. Pendant les années wen-hi (1573-1615) ce royaume se partagea en deux, dont le nouveau se nomma J-teki. ... Par la suite on n'en entendit plus parler."—Grandes Geog. Impériales, quoted by Panthier, Marc Pol, 567.

SUMATRA, s. Sudden squalls, precisely such as are described by Lockyer and the others below, and which are common in the narrow sea between the Malay Peninsula and the island of Sumatra, are called by this name.

1615.—"... it befell that the galliot of Miguel de Macedo was lost on the Ilha Grande of Malaca (!), where he had come to anchor, when a Samaota arose that drove him on the island, the vessel going to pieces, though the crew and most part of what she carried were saved."—Bocarro, Desc. 626.

1711.—"Frequent squalls ... these are often accompanied with Thunder and Lightning, and continue very fierce for Half an Hour, more or less. Our English Sailors call them Sumatras, because they always meet with them on the Coasts of this Island."—Lockyer, 56.

1726.—"At Malacca the streights are not above 4 Leagues broad; for though the opposite shore on Sumatra is very low, yet it may easily be seen on a clear day, which is the Reason that the Sea is always as smooth as a Mill-pond, except it is ruffled with Squalls of Wind, which seldom come without Lightning, Thunder, and Rain, and though they come with great Violence, yet they are soon over, not often exceeding an Hour."—A. Hamilton, ii. 79, [ed. 1741].

1843.—"Sumatras, or squalls from the S. Westward, are often experienced in the S.W. Monsoon. Sumatras generally come off the land during the first part of the night, and are sometimes sudden and severe, accompanied with loud thunder, lightning, and rain."—Horsburgh, ed. 1843, ii. 215.
[SUMJAO, v. This is properly the imp. of the H. verb samjhadá, 'to cause to know, warn, correct,' usually with the implication of physical coercion.
Other examples of a similar formation will be found under PUCKEROW.

[1826.—"... in this case they apply to themselves to sumjao, the defendant."— Pundwarg Hari, ed. 1873, ii. 170.]

[SUMPITAN, s. The Malay blowing-tube, by means of which arrows, often poisoned, are discharged. The weapon is discussed under SARBATANE. The word is Malay sumpitán, properly 'a narrow thing,' from sumpit,
'narrow, strait.' There is an elaborate account of it, with illustrations, in Ltng Roth, Natives of Sarawak and Br.
N. Borneo, ii. 184 seqq. Also see Scott, Malayan Words, 104 seqq.

[f. 1630.—"Sempitans." See under [1841,—"In advancing, the sumpitán is carried at the mouth and elevated, and they will discharge at least five arrows to one compared with a musket."—Brooke, in Narrative of Events in Borneo and Celebes,

i. 261.

[1883.—"Their (the Samangs') weapon is the sumpitán, a blow-gun, from which poisoned arrows are expelled."—Miss Bird,
The Golden Chrisonese, 16.]

SUNDA, n.p. The western and most mountainous part of the island of Java, in which a language different from the proper Javanese is spoken, and the people have many differences of manner, indicating distinction of race. In the 16th century, Java and Sunda being often distinguished, a common impression grew up that they were separate islands; and they are so represented in some maps of the 16th century, just as some medieval maps, including that of Fra Mauro (1459), show a like separation between England and Scotland. The name Sunda is more properly indeed that of the people than of their country.
The Dutch call them Sundanese (Soendanezen). The Sunda country is considered to extend from the extreme western point of the island to Cheribon, i.e. embracing about one-third of the whole island of Java.
Hinduism appears to have prevailed in the Sunda country, and held its ground longer than in 'Java,' a name which the proper Javanese restrict to their own part of the island. From this country the sea between Sumatra and Java got from Europeans the name of the Straits of Sunda. Geographers have also called the great chain of islands from Sumatra to Timor the 'Sunda Islands.'

[Mr. Whiteway adds: "There was another Sunda near Goa, but above the Ghats, where an offspring of the Vijayanagara family ruled. It was founded at the end of the 16th century, and in the 18th the Portuguese had much to do with it, till Tippoo Sultan absorbed it, and the ruler became a Portuguese pensioner."]

1516. — "And having passed Samatara towards Java there is the island of Sunda, in which there is much good pepper, and it has a king over it, who they say desires to serve the King of Portugal. They ship thence many slaves to China."—Barbosa, 196.

1526.—"Duarte Coelho in a ship, along with the galeot and a foist, went into the port of Cunda, which is at the end of the island of Sumatra, on a separate large island, in which grows a great quantity of excellent pepper, and of which there is a great traffic from this port to China, this being in fact the most important merchandise exported there. The country is very abundant in provisions, and rich in groves of trees, and has excellent water, and is peopled with Moors who have a Moorish king over them."
—Correa, iii. 92.

1553.—"Of the land of Jaiia we make two islands, one before the other, lying west and east as if both on one parallel. But the Jaos themselves do not reckon two islands of Jaoa, but one only, of the length that has been stated ... about a third in length of this island towards the west constitutes Sunda, of which we have now to speak.
The natives of that part consider their country to be an island divided from Jaiia
by a river, little known to our navigators, called by them Chiamo or Chenano, which cuts off right from the sea," all that third part of the land in such a way that when these natives define the limits of Jaiia they say that on the west it is bounded by the Island of Sunda, and separated from it by this river Chiamo, and on the east by the island of Bale, and that on the north they have the island of Madura, and on the south the unexplored sea. ..." &c.—Barros, IV.
i. 12.

1554.—"The information we have of this port of Calapa, which is the same as Cunda, and of another port called Bocca, these two being 15 leagues one from the other, and

* "... hum rio ... que corta do mar todo aquelle terço de terra." ... We are not quite sure how to translate. Crawford renders: "This which seems very free. But it is true, as we have said, that several old maps show Java and Sunda thus divided from sea to sea.

both under one King, is to the effect that the supply of pepper one year with another will be xxx thousand quintals.* that is to say, xx thousand in one year, and a thousand the next year; also that it is very good pepper, as good as that of Malabar, and it is purchased with cloths of Cambaya, Bengalla, and Choromandel."—A. Nunez, in Subsidios, 42.

1566.—"Sonda, vn Isola de Morì appresso la costa della Giava."—Ces. Federici, in Rammuro, iii. 391 v.

c. 1570.—
"Os Sundas o Malaioes com pimenta, Con massa, e noz ricos Bandanezes,
Com roupja e droga Cambia a opulenta,
E com bravoa os longinquos Malugueses."

Ant. deso Abreu, De. de Malacca.

1598.—Linschoten does not recognize the two islands. To him Sunda is only a place in Java:

... there is a straight or narrow passage between Sunda and Java, called the straight of Sundas, of a place so called, lying not far from thence within the Il of Java. ... The principal haun in the land is Sunda Calapa,† whereof the straight beareth the name; in this place of Suda there is much Pepper."—p. 34.

SUNDERBUNDS, n.p. The well-known name of the tract of intersecting creeks and channels, swampy islands, and jungles, which constitutes that part of the Ganges Delta nearest the sea. The limits of the region so-called are the mouth of the Hooghly on the west, and that of the Megna (i.e. of the combined great Ganges and Brahmaputra) on the east, a width of about 220 miles. The name appears not to have been traced in old native documents of any kind, and hence its real form and etymology remain uncertain. Sundara-vana, "beautiful forest"; Sundari-vana, or -ban, "forest of the Sundari tree"; Chandra-ban, and Chandra-band, "moon-forest" or "moon-embankment"; Chanda-bhanda, the name of an old tribe of salt-makers; Chandra dip-ban from a large zamindary called Chandra-dip in the Bakarganj district at the eastern extremity of the Sunderbunds; these are all suggestions that have been made. Whatever be the true etymology, we doubt if it is to be sought in sundara or sundari. [As to the derivation from the Sundari tree which is perhaps most usually accepted, Mr. Beveridge (Man. of Bakarganj, 24, 167, 32) remarks that this tree is by no means common in many parts of the Bakarganj Sunderbunds; he suggests that the word means "beautiful wood" and was possibly given by the Brahmins.] The name has never (except in one quotation below) been in English mouths, or in English popular orthography, Sunderbunds, but Sunderbunds, which implies (in correct transliteration) an original sandra or chandra, not sundara. And going back to what we conjecture may be an early occurrence of the name in two Dutch writers, we find this confirmed. These two writers, it will be seen, both speak of a famous Sandery, or Santry, Forest in Lower Bengal, and we should be more positive in our identification were it not that in Van der Broucke's map (1660) which was published in Valentijn's East Indies (1726) this Sandery Forest is shown on the west side of the Hooghly R., in fact about due west of the site of Calcutta, and a little above a place marked as Basanderi, located near the exit into the Hooghly of what represents the old Saraswati R., which enters the former at Sankrál, not far below the Botanical Gardens, and 5 or 6 miles below Fort William. This has led Mr. Blochmann to identify the Sanderi Bosch with the old Mahall Basandhari which appears in the Ain as belonging to the Sirkár of Sulimánábád (Gladwin's Ayen, ii. 207, orig. i. 407; Jarrett, ii. 140; Blochm. in J.A.S.B. xlii. pt. i. p. 232), and which formed one of the original "xxiv. Pergunnas."* Undoubtedly this is the Basanderi of V. den Broucke's map; but it seems possible that some confusion between Basanderi and Bosch Sandery (which would be Sandarban in the vernacular) may have led the map-maker to misplace the latter. We should gather from Schulz† that he passed the Forest of Sandry about a Dutch mile below Sankral, which he mentions. But his statement is so nearly identical with that in Valentijn that we appre-

* Basandhari is also mentioned by Mr. James Grant (1780) in his View of the Revenues of Bengal, as the Pergonna of Belo-bussendry; and by A. Hamilton as a place on the Damdmar, producing much good sugar (Fifth Report, p. 405; A. Ham. ii. 4). It would seem to have been the present Pergonna of Balia, some 13 or 14 miles west of the northern part of Calcutta. See Hunter's Bengal Gaz. i. 305.
† So called in the German version which we use; but in the Dutch original he is Schouten.

* Apparently 80,000 quintals every two years.
† Sunda Kalapa was the same as Jacatra, on the site of which the Dutch founded Batavia in 1619.
‡ These are mentioned in a copper tablet inscription of A.D. 1136; see Blochmaos, as quoted further on, p. 226.
hend they have no separate value. Valentijn, in an earlier page, like Bernier, describes the Sunderbunds as the resort of the Arakan pirates, but does not give a name (p. 169).

1661.—"We got under sail again" (just after meeting the Arakan pirates) "in the morning early, and went past the Forest of Santry, so styled because (as has been credibly related) Alexander the Great with his mighty army was hindered by the strong rush of the ebb and flood at this place, from advancing further, and therefore had to turn back to Macedonia."—Walter Schult, 155.

c. 1668.—"And hence it is " (from piratical raids of the Mugs, &c.,) "that at present there are seen in the mouth of the Ganges, so many fine Isles quite deserted, which were formerly well peopled, and where no other Inhabitants are found but wild Beasts, and especially Tygers."—Bernier, E.T. 54; [ed. Constable, 442].

1728.—"This (Bengal) is the land wherein they will have it that Alexander the Great, called by the Moors, whether Hindostanders or Persians, Sulthain Iskender, and in their historians Iskender Doulaourain, was ... they can show you the exact place where King Porus held his court. The natives will prate much of this matter; for example, that in front of the Sandier-wood (Sanderie Bosch), which we show in the map, and which they call properly after him Iskenderie he was stopped by the great and rushing streams."—Valentijn, v. 179.

1728.—"But your petitioner did not arrive off Sunderbund Wood till four in the evening, where they rowed backward and forward for six days; with which labour and toil of provisions three of the petitioners died."—Petition of Siechem Makund Amewi, &c., to Govr. of Ft. St. Geo., in Wheeler, ii, 41.

1764.—"On the 11th Bhauand, whilst the Boats were at Kerma in Soonderbund, a little before daybreak, Captain Ross arose and ordered the Manjee to put off with the Budgerow. ... Native Letter regarding Murder of Captain John Ross by a Native Crew. In Long, 383. This instance is an exception to the general remark made above that the English popular orthography has always been Sunder, and not Soonder-bunds.

1758.—"If the Jelinghy be navigable we shall soon be in Calcutta; if not, we must pass a second time through the Sundarbans."—Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii, 83.

"A portion of the Sunderbunds ... for the most part overflowed by the tide, as indicated by the original Hindoo name of Chunderbund, signifying mounds, or offspring of the moon."—James Grant, in App. to Fifth Report, p. 260. In a note Mr. Grant notices the derivation from "Soonderwod," and "Soonder-bund," a beautiful wood, and proceeds: "But we adhere to our own etymology rather ... above all, because the richest and greatest part of the Sunderbunds is still comprised in the ancient Zemindarry pergunnah of Chunder deep, or lunar territory."

1792.—"Many of these lands, what is called the Sundari bunds, and others at the mouth of the Ganges, if we may believe the history of Bengal, was formerly well inhabited."—Forrest, V. to Morgui, Pref. p. 5.

1793.—"That part of the delta bordering on the sea, is composed of a labyrinth of rivers and creeks. ... this tract known by the name of the Woods, or Sunderbunds, is in extent equal to the principality of Wales."—Rennell, Mem. of Map of Hind., 3rd ed., p. 539.

1853.—"The scenery, too, exceeded his expectations; the terrible forest solitude of the Sunderbunds was full of interest to an European imagination."—Oakfield, i, 38.

[SUNGAR, s. Pers. sanga, song, 'a stone.' A rude stone breastwork, such as is commonly erected for defence by the Afridis and other tribes on the Indian N.W. frontier. The word has now come into general military use, and has been adopted in the S. African war.

[1857.—"... breastworks of wood and stone (mureeha and sanga respectively)."

[1900.—"Conspicuous sungars are constructed to draw the enemy's fire."—Pioneer Mail, March 16.]

The same word seems to be used in the Hills in the sense of a rude wooden bridge supported by stone piers, used for crossing a torrent.

[1833.—"Across a deep ravine ... his Lordship erected a neat sungah, or mountain bridge of pines."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 117.

[1871.—"A sungaha bridge is formed as follows: on either side the river piers of rubble masonry, laced with colonnades of timber, are built up; and into these are inserted stout poles, one above the other in successively projecting tiers, the interstices between the latter being filled up with crossbeams," &c.—Harcourt, Himalayan Districts of Kohool, p. 67 seq.]

SUNGTARA, s. Pers. sungtara. The name of a kind of orange, probably from Cintra. See under ORANGE a quotation regarding the fruit of Cintra, from Abulfeda.

c. 1526.—"The Sengtereh ... is another fruit. ... In colour and appearance it is like the citron (Titranj), but the skin of the fruit is smooth."—Baber, 328.

c. 1590.—"Sirkar Silhet is very mountainous. ... Here grows a delicious fruit called Soontara (sautara) in colour like an orange, but of an oblong form."—Ayen, by SUNN. 871  SUNYÁSEE.

Gladwin, ii. 10; [Jarrett (ii. 124) writes Suntarah].

1793.—"The people of this country have infinitely more reason to be proud of their oranges, which appear to me to be superior to those of Silhet, and probably indeed are not surpassed by any in the world. They are here called Samtiba, which I take to be a corruption of Sengterralah, the name by which a similar species of orange is known in the Upper Provinces of India."—Kirkpatrick's Nepal, 129.

1835.—"The most delicious oranges have been procured here. The rind is fine and thin, the flavour excellent; the natives call them 'cintra.'"—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, ii. 99.

SUNN, s. Beng. and Hind. san, from Skt. sâna; the fibre of the Crotalaria juncea, L. (N.O. Leguminosae); often called Bengal, or Country, hemp. It is of course in no way kindred to true hemp, except in its economic use. In the following passage from the Ain the reference is to the Hibiscus cannabinus (see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 597).

"c. 1590.—"Hemp grows in clusters like a nosegay.... One species bears a flower like the cotton-shrub, and this is called in Hindostan, sun-poot. It makes a very soft rope."—Ayen, by Gladwin, i. 89; in Blockmann (i. 87) Patson.

1838.—"Sunn ... a plant the bark of which is used as hemp, and is usually sown around cotton fields."—Playfair, Tales of Shereef, 96.

SUNNÉE, SOONNÉE, s. Ar. suní, which is really a Pers. form and stands for that which is expressed by the Ar. Ahlul-Sunnah, 'the people of the Path,' a 'Traditionist.' The term applied to the large Mahomedan sect who acknowledge the first four Khalifahs to have been the right-ful descendants of the Prophet, and are thus opposed to the Sheeaaahs. The latter are much less numerous than the former, the proportion being, according to Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's estimate, 15 millions Shias to 145 millions of Sunnis.

[c. 1590.—"The Mahomedans (of Kash- mir) are partly Sunnis, and others of the sects of Aly and Noorbukhshy; and they are frequently engaged in wars with each other."—Ayen, by Gladwin, i. 125; ed. Jarrett, ii. 352.

[1623.—"The other two ... are Sonni, as the Turks and Moghol."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. i. 152.

[1812.—"A fellow told me with the gravest face, that a lion of their own country would never hurt a Sheyah ... but would always devour a Sunni.'—Morier, Journey through Persia, 62.]

SUNNUD, s. Hind. from Ar. sanud. A diploma, patent, or deed of grant by the government of office, privilege, or right. The corresponding Skt.—H. is kâsana.

[c. 1590.—"A paper authenticated by proper signatures is called a sunnud. ..."—Ayen, by Gladwin, i. 214; ed. Blockmann, i. 253.]

1758.—"They likewise brought sunnuds, or the commission for the nabobship."—Orme, Hist., ed. 1803, ii. 281.

1775.—"That your Petitioners, being the Bramins, &c. ... were permitted by Sunnud from the President and Council to collect daily alms from each shop or doocan (Doocaun) of this place, at 5 cowries per diem."—In Long, 184.

1776.—"If the path to and from a House ... be in the Territories of another Person, that Person, who always hath passed to and fro, shall continue to do so, the other Person aforesaid, though he hath a Right of Property in the Ground, and hath an attested Sunnud thereof, shall not have Authority to cause him any Lot or Molestation."—Halsed, Code, 100-101.

1779.—"I enclose you sunnuds for pension for the Killadar of Chitlledroog."—Wellington, i. 45.

1800.—"I wished to have traced the nature of landed property in Soondah ... by a chain of Sunnuds up to the 8th century."—Sir T. Munro, in Life, i. 249.

1809.—"This sunnud is the foundation of all the rights and privileges annexed to a Jager (Jagheer)."—Harrington's Analysis, ii. 410.

SUNYÁSEE, s. Skt. sannyāṣi, lit. 'one who resigns, or abandons,' scil. 'wordly affairs'; a Hindu religious mendicant. The name of Sunyásee was applied familiarly in Bengal, c. 1760-75, to a body of banditti claiming to belong to a religious fraternity, who, in the interval between the decay of the imperial authority and the regular establishment of our own, had their head-quarters in the forest-tracts at the foot of the Himalaya. From these they used to issue periodically in large bodies, plundering and levying exactions far and wide, and returning to their asylum in the jungle when threatened with pursuit. In the days of Nawab Mir Kāsim 'Ali (1760-64) they were bold enough to plunder the city of Dacca; and in 1766 the great geographer James Rennell, in an encounter with a large body of them in the territory of Koch (see COOCH) Bihár, was nearly cut to pieces. Rennell himself, five years later, was employed to carry out a project which he had formed for the suppression of these bands, and did so apparently with what was considered at the time to be success, though we find the depredators still spoken of by W. Hastings as active, two or three years later.

[c. 200 A.D. — "Having thus performed religious acts in a forest during the third portion of his life, let him become a San^yasi for the fourth portion of it, abandoning all sensual affection."—Manu, vi. 33.

1626.—"Some (an unlearned kind) are called Sanasses."—Parrias, Pilgrimage, 549.

1631.—"The San^yasas are people who set the world and worldly joys, as they say, on one side. These are indeed more precise and strict in their lives than the foregoing."—Rogerius, 21.

1674.—"Sania, or Sanias, is a dignity greater than that of Kings."—Faria y Sousa, Asia Port. ii. 711.

1726.—"The San^yasas are men who, forsaking the world and all its fruits, betake themselves to a very strict and retired manner of life."—Valentijn, Choro. 75.

1766.—"The Sanasby Faquirs (part of the same Tribe which plundered Dacca in Cossim Ally's Time*) were in arms to the number of 7 or 800 at the Time I was surveying Báár (a small Province near Bountan), and had taken and plundered the Capital of that name within a few Coss of my route. I came up with Morrison immediately after he had defeated the Sanasbyas in a pitched Battle. . . . Our Escorte, which were a few Horse, rode off, and the Enemy with drawn Sabres immediately surrounded us. Morrison escaped unhurt, Richards, my Brother officer, received only a slight Wound, and fought his Way off; my Armenian Assistant was killed, and the Sepoy Adjutant much wounded. . . . I was put in a Palankeen, and Morrison made an attack on the Enemy and cut most of them to Pieces. I was now in a most shocking Condition indeed, being deprived of the Use of both my Arms, . . . a cut of a Sable (sic) had cut through my right Shoulder Bone, and laid me open for nearly a Foot down the Back, cutting thro' and wounding some of my Ribs. I had besides a Cut on the left Elbow which took off the Muscular part of the breadth of a Hand, a Stab in the Arm, and a large Cut on the head. . . ."

—MS. Letter from James Rennell, dd. August 30, in possession of his grandson Major Rodd.

1767.—"A body of 5000 Sinasses have lately entered the Sircar Sorang country; the Phousard sent two companies of Sepoys after them, under the command of a serjeant . . . the Sinasses stood their ground, and after the Sepoys had fired away their ammunition, fell on them, killed and wounded near 80, and put the rest to flight. . . ."

1773.—"You will hear of great disturbances committed by the Sinasses, or wandering Fackeers, who annually infest the provinces about this time of the year, in pilgrimage to Juggernaut, going in bodies of 1000 and sometimes even 10,000 men."—Letter of Warren Hastings, dd. February 2, in Gleig, ii. 292.

"At this time we have five battalions of Sepoys in pursuit of them."—Do. do., March 31, in Gleig, i. 294.

1774.—"The history of these people is curious. . . . They . . . rove continually from place to place, recruiting their numbers with the healthiest children they can steal. . . . Thus they are the stoutest and most active men in India. . . . Such are the Sinasses, the gypsies of Hindostan."—Do. do., dd. August 25, in Gleig, 303-4. See the same vol., also pp. 284, 290-7-8, 395.

1826.—"Being looked upon with an evil eye by many persons in society, I pretended to bewail my brother's loss, and gave out my intention of becoming a Suyasa, and retiring from the world."—Pandurang Hari, 394; [ed. 1573, ii. 267; also i. 189.]

SUPÁRA, n.p. The name of a very ancient port and city of Western India; in Skt. Súrprákara,* popularly Supíra. It was near Wasí (Bagaim of the Portuguese—see (1) Bassein)—which was for many centuries the chief city of the Konkan, where the name still survives as that of a well-to-do town of 1700 inhabitants, the channel by which vessels in former days reached

* Williams (Skt. Dict. s.v.) gives Súrprákara as "the name of a mythical country"; but it was real enough. There is some ground for believing that there was another Súrprákara on the coast of Orissa, Sūrprāpa of Ptolemy.

it from the sea being now dry. The city is mentioned in the Mahābhārata as a very holy place, and in other old Sanskrit works, as well as in cave inscriptions at Kārī and Nāsik, going back to the 1st and 2nd centuries of the Christian era. Excavations affording interesting Buddhist relics, were made in 1882 by Mr. (now Sir) J. M. Campbell (see his interesting notice in Bombay Gazetteer, xiv. 314-342; xvi. 125) and Pandit Indrajī Bhagvānīlāl. The name of Supāra is one of those which have been plausibly connected, through Ṣophīr, the Coptic name of India, with the Ṣophīr of Scripture. Some Arab writers call it the Sofālā of India.

SUPREME COURT. The designation of the English Court established at Fort William by the Regulation Act of 1773 (13 Geo. III. c. 63), and afterwards at the other two Presidencies. Its extent of jurisdiction was the subject of acrimonious controversies in the early years of its existence; controversies which were closed by 21 Geo. III. c. 70, which explained and defined the jurisdiction of the Court. The use of the name came to an end in 1862 with the establishment of the 'High Court,' the bench of which is occupied by barrister judges, judges from the Civil Service, and judges promoted from the native bar.

The Charter of Charles II., of 1661, gave the Company certain powers to administer the laws of England, and that of 1883 to establish Courts of Judicature. That of Geo. I. (1726) gave power to establish at each Presidency Mayor's Courts for civil suits, with appeal to the Governor and Council, and from these, in cases involving more than 1000 pagodas, to the King in Council. The same charter constituted the Governor and Council of each Presidency a Court for trial of all offences except high treason. Courts of Requests were established by charter of Geo. II., 1753. The Mayor's Court at Madras and Bombay survived till 1797, when (by 37 Geo. III. ch. 142) a Recorder's Court was instituted at each. This was superseded at Madras by a Supreme Court in 1801, and at Bombay in 1823.
SURA, s. Toddy (q.v.), i.e. the fermented sap of several kinds of palm, such as coco, palmyra, and wild date. It is the Skt. sura, 'vinous liquor,' which has passed into most of the vernaculars. In the first quotation we certainly have the word, though combined with other elements of uncertain identity, applied by Cosmas to the milk of the coco-nut, perhaps making some confusion between that and the fermented sap. It will be seen that Linschoten applies sura in the same way. Bluteau, curiously, calls this a Caffre word. It has in fact been introduced from India into Africa by the Portuguese (see Ann. Marit. iv. 293).

c. 545.—"The Argell" (i.e. Nargil, or margeela, or coco-nut) "is at first full of very sweet water, which the Indians drink, using it instead of wine. This drink is called Rhone-sura," and is exceedingly pleasant."—Cosmas, in Cathay, &c., clixvi.

[1554.—"Cura." See under ARRACK.]

1563.—"They grow two qualities of palm-tree, one kind for the fruit, and the other to give cura."—Garcis, f. 67.

1578.—"Sura, which is, as it were, vino mono."—Astold, 100.

1588.—"... in that sort the pot in short space is full of water, which they call Sura, and is very pleasant to drink, like sweet whey, and somewhat better."—Linschoten, 101; [Hak. Soc. ii. 48].

1609-10.—"... a goodly country and fertile... abounding with Date Trees, whence they draw a liquor, called Taree (Todd) or Sure. ..."—W. Finch, in Purchas, i. 436.

1643.—"Isn't the little sobe, or rather,) they make, close together sort of a thing, which they call Sur, that is, as it were, the drink of palms."

1650.—"Nor could they drink either Wine, or Sure, or Strong Water, by reason of the great Imposts which he laid upon them."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 86; [ed. Ball, i. 343].

1663.—"Les Portugais appellent ce tari o vin des Indes, Soure... de cette liqueur le singe, et la grande chaune-souris... sont extremement amateurs, aussi bien que les Indiens Mansulmans (sic), Parisis, et quelque tribus d'Indou..."—De la Boulaye-Gouz, ed. 1657, 263.

SURAT, n.p. In English use the name of this city is accented Suratt; but the name is in native writing and parlance generally Särát. In the Aín, however (see below), it is written Sárât; also in Śādik Isfahānī (p. 106). Surat was taken by Akbar in 1573, having till then remained a part of the falling Mahommedan kingdom of Guzerat. An English factory was first established in 1608-9, which was for more than half a century the chief settlement of the English Company in Continental India. The transfer of the Chiefs to Bombay took place in 1687.

We do not know the origin of the name. Various legends on the subject are given in Mr. (now Sir J.) Campbell's Bombay Gazetteer (vol. ii.), but none of them have any probability. The ancient Indian Saurāṣṭrā was the name of the Peninsula of Guzerat or Kattywar, or at least of the maritime part of it. This latter name and country is represented by the differently-spelt and pronounced Sōrath (see SURATH). Sir Henry Elliot and his editor have repeatedly stated the opinion that the names are identical. Thus: "The names 'Surat' and 'Sūrath' are identical, both being derived from the Sankrit Surāṣṭrā; but as they belong to different places a distinction in spelling has been maintained. 'Surat' is the city; 'Sūrath' is a prīnt or district of Kattīwar, of which Junīgarh is the chief town." (Elliot, v. 350; see also 197). Also: "The Sanskrit Surāṣṭrā and Gurjīrā survive in the modern names Surat and Guzerat, and however the territories embraced by the old terms have varied, it is hard to conceive that Surat was not in Surāṣṭrā nor Guzerat in Gurjīrā. All evidence goes to prove that the old and modern names applied to the same places. Thus Ptolomy's Surastrenē comprises Surat..." (Dusoun [?] ibid. i. 359). This last statement seems distinctly erroneous. Surat is in Ptolomy's Ádarakon, not in Σώραστρη, which represents, like Saurāṣṭrā, the peninsula. It must remain doubtful whether there was any connection between the names, or the resemblance was accidental. It is possible that continental Surat may have originally had some name implying its being the place of passage to Saurāṣṭrā or Sorath.

Surat is not a place of any antiquity. There are some traces of the existence of the name ascribed to the 14th century, in passages of uncertain value in certain native writers. But it only came to notice as a place of any importance about the very end of the 15th century, when a rich Hindu trader, Gopi by name, is stated to have established himself on the spot, and founded the town. The way, however, in which it is spoken of by Barbosa previous to 1516 shows that the rise of its prosperity must have been rapid.

[Surat in English slang is equivalent to the French Rapiot, in the sense of 'no great shakes,' an adulterated article of inferior quality (Barrière, s. v. Rapiot). This perhaps was accounted for by the fact that "until lately the character of Indian cotton in the Liverpool market stood very low, and the name 'Surats,' the description under which the cotton of this province is still included, was a byword and a general term of contempt" (Berar Gazetteer, 226 seq.)]

1510.—"Don Afonso" (de Noronha, nephew of Albuquerque) "in the storm not knowing whether they went, entered the Gulf of Cambay, and struck upon a shoal in front of Çurrâte. Trying to save themselves by swimming or on planks many perished, and among them Don Afonso."—Correa, ii. 29.

1516.—"Having passed beyond the river of Reynel, on the other side there is a city which they call Çurrâte, peopled by Moors, and close upon the river; they deal there in many kinds of wares, and carry on a great trade; for many ships of Malabar and other parts sail thither, and sell what they bring, and return loaded with what they choose."—Barbosa, Lisbon ed. 250.

1525.—"The corja (Corge) of cotton cloths of Çurrâte, of 14 yards each, is worth ... 250 fokes."—Lembrança, 45.

1528.—"Héctor da Silveira put to sea again, scouring the Gulf, and making war everywhere with fire and sword, by sea and land; and he made an onslaught on Çurrâte and Reynel, great cities on the sea-coast, and sacked them, and burnt part of them, for all the people fled, they being traders and without a garrison. ..."—Correa, ii. 277.

1533.—"Thence he proceeded to the bar of the river Tapti, above which stood two cities the most notable on that gulf. The first they call Surat, 3 leagues from the mouth, and the other Reiner, on the opposite side of the river and half a league from the bank. ... The latter was the most sumptuous in buildings and civilisation, inhabited by warlike people, all of them Moors inured to maritime war, and it was from this city that most of the foists and ships of the King of Cambay's fleet were furnished. Surat again was inhabited by an unwarlike people whom they call Ban-yans, folk given to mechanic crafts, chiefly to the business of weaving cotton cloths."—Barros, IV. iv. 8.

1554.—"So saying they quitted their rowing-benches, got ashore, and started for Surrat."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 83.

1573.—"Next day the Emperor went to inspect the fortress. ... During his inspection some large mortars and guns attracted his attention. Those mortars bore the name of Sulaimán, from the name of Sulaimán Sultán of Turkey. When he made his attempt to conquer the ports of Gujarát, he sent these ... with a large army by sea. As the Turks ... were obliged to return, they left these mortars. The mortars remained upon the sea-shore, until Khudâwând Khán built the fort of Surat, when he placed them in the fort. The one which he left in the country of Surat was taken to the fort of Junığarh by the ruler of that country."—Tahâkât-i-Akbar, in Elliot, v. 350.

c. 1590.—"Surat is among famous ports. The river Tapti runs hard by, and at seven compass distance joins the salt sea. Râûr on the other side of the river is now a port dependent on Surat, but was formerly a big city. The ports of Khandevî and Balsâr are also annexed to Surat. Fruit, and especially the anânâs, is abundant. ... The sectaries of Zardasht, emigrant from Fars, have made their dwelling here; they revere the Zhand and Fazband and erect their dâkhuas (or places for awaiting the dead). ... Through the carelessness of the agents of Government and the commandants of the troops (sipah-salârân, Sipah Salar), a considerable tract of this Sîrkâr is at present in the hands of the Frank, e.g. Daman, Sanjân (St. John's), Târâpur, Mâhim, and Basal (see (1) Bassein), that are both cities and forts."—Ain, orig. i. 483; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 243].

1688.—"Within a League of the Road we entred into the River upon which Surat is seated, and which hath on both sides a very fertile soil, and many fair gardens, with pleasant Country-houses, which being all white, a colour which it seems the Indians are much in love with, afford a noble prospect amidst the greenness whereby they are encompassed. But the River, which is the Tapte ... is so shallow at the mouth of it, that Barks of 70 or 80 Tuns can hardly come into it."—Mandelslo, p. 12.

1690.—"Suratt is reckoned the most fam'd Emporium of the Indian Empire, where all Commodities are vendible. ... And the River is very commodious for the Importation of Foreign Goods, which are brought up to the City in Hous and Yachts, and Country Boats."—Ovington, 218.

1779.—"There is some report that he (Gen. Goddard) is gone to Bender-Souret ... but the truth of this God knows."—Seir Mutag, iii. 328.
SŪRATH. more properly Sōrath, and Sōreth, n.p. This name is the legitimate modern form and representative of the ancient Indian Sau-rāshiśtra and Greek Syrastreēne, names which applied to what we now call the Kattywar Peninsula, but especially to the fertile plains on the sea-coast. ["Surāshtra, the land of the Suds, afterwards Sanskritized into Sau-rāshtra the Goodly Land, preserves its name in Sōrath the southern part of Kāthiāvāda. The name appears as Surāshtra in the Mahābāhārata and Pāṇini's Gānapātha, in Rudradāman's (A.D. 150) and Skandagupta's (A.D. 456) Gînâr inscriptions, and in several Valabhi copper-plates. Its Prākrit form appears as Suratha in the Nāisik inscription of Gotaniputra (A.D. 150) and in later Prākrit as Surāṭhā in the Tirthakalpa of Jinapra-bhasuri (Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 6). The remarkable discovery of one of the great inscriptions of Aśoka (B.C. 250) on a rock at Gînâr, near Junāgarh in Saurāshtra, shows that the dominion of that great sovereign, whose capital was at Pataliputra (Pālakṣāṭhā or Patna), extended to this distant shore. The application of the modern form Sūrāth or Sōrath has varied in extent. It is now the name of one of the four prāntis or districts into which the peninsula is divided for political purposes, each of these prāntis containing a number of small States, and being partly managed, partly controlled by a Political Assistant. Sorath occupies the south-western portion, embracing an area of 5,220 sq. miles.

C. A. D. 80-90.—"Tāṣṭhā ta mēn megalēgya tis Σωμιλία συνορίαν Ἀβίρια καλείται, ta de paraballásia Συναστρήνη."—Pereclus, § 41.

c. 150.—"Συναστρήνης, * * * Βαρδάξιμος πόλις . . . Συνάστρα κωμή . . . Μονόγλυκωσον ἐμπόριον . . ."—Ptolemy, VII. i. 2-3.

c. 545.—"Αυτοὶ οὖν τὰ λαμπρὰ ἐμπόρια τῆς Ἰνδικῆς ταῖα, Σινδοῦ, Ὄρβοθα, Καλλίνα, Σιμφόρ, ἢ Μαλί, πέντε ἐμπόρια ἔχουνα, βάλλοντα τὸ πέτερ."—Cosmas, lib. xi. These names may be interpreted as Sind, Sorath, Calyan, Choui (!), Malabar.

c. 640.—"En quitting the royaume de Fula-pi (Vallabhi), il fit 500 li à l'ouest, et arriva au royaume de Sou-la-tekha (Sourashtra). . . . Comme ce royaume se trouve sur le chemin de la mer occidentale, tous les habitans profitent des avantages qu'offre la mer; ils se livrent au négoces, et à un commerce d'échange."—Hiuen-Thsang, in Pél. Bouddh., iii. 164-165.

1516.—"Passing this city and following the sea-coast, you come to another place which has also a good port, and is called Čurati Mangalor,* and here, as at the other, put in many vessels of Malabar for horses, grain, cloths, and cottons, and for vegetables and other goods prized in India, and they bring hither coco-nuts, Jagara (Jagerry), which is sugar that they make drink of, emery, wax, cardamoms, and every other kind of spice, a trade in which great gain is made in a short time."—Barboua, in Rucuoio, i. f. 296.

1573. — See quotation of this date under preceding article, in which both the names Surat and Sūrath, occur.

1584.—"After his second defeat Muzaffar Gujaráti retreated by way of Champánir, Birpáir, and Jaláwar, to the country of Sūrath, and rested at the town of Gondal, 12 kos from the fort of Junágarh. . . . He gave a lac of Mahmúdis and a jewelled dagger to Amin Khán Ghorí, ruler of Sūrath, and so won his support."—Taḥābūt-i Akbarī, in Elliot, v. 437-438.

c. 1590.—"Sirāc Surat (Sūrath) was formerly an independent territory; the chief of the Ghelos tribe, and commanded 50,000 cavalry, and 100,000 infantry. Its length from the port of Ghogeh (Gogo) to the port of Arumóy (Arāntrī) measures 125 kos; and the breadth from Sindehar (Sirdhrā) to the port of Diu, is a distance of 72 kos."—Ayesn, by Gladwin, ii. 73 ; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 243].

1616.—"7 Soret, the chief city, is called Janagar; it is but a little Province, yet very rich; it lies upon Guzarat; it hath the Ocean to the South."—Terry, ed. 1665, p. 354.

SURKUNDA. s. Hind. sarkanda, [Skt. śara, ‘reed-grass, kânda, ‘joint, section’]. The name of a very tall reed-grass, Saccharum Sāra, Roxb., perhaps also applied to Saccharum procerum, Roxb. These grasses are often tall enough in the riverine plains of Eastern Bengal greatly to overtop a tall man standing in a howda on the back of a tall elephant. It is from the upper part of the flower-bearing stalk of surkundia that sikry (q.v.) is derived. A most intelligent visitor to India was led into a curious mistake about the name of this grass by some official, who ought to have known better. We quote the passage. ——'s story about the main branch of a river channel probably rests on no better foundation.

1875.—"As I drove yesterday with ——, I asked him if he knew the scientific name of the tall grass which I heard called tiger-grass at Ahmedabad, and which is very abundant here [about Lahore]. I think it is saccharum, but am not quite sure. 'No,' he said, 'but the people in the neighbourbourgh call it Sikunder's Grass, as they still call the main branch of a river 'Sikinder's channel.' Strange, is it not?—how that great individuality looms through history."—Grant Duff, Notes of an Indian Journey, 105.

SURPOSE, s. Pers. sar-posh, 'head-cover,' [which again becomes corrupted into our Tarboosh (turban), and Tarbrush of the wandering Briton]. A cover, as of a basin, dish, hooka-bowl, &c.

1829.—"Tugging away at your hookah, find no smoke; a thief having purloined your silver chelam (see CHILLUM) and surpoose."—Memo, of John Skipp, ii. 159.

SURREAPURDA, s. Pers. sar-parda. A canvas screen surrounding royal tents or the like (see CANAUT).

1404.—"And round this pavilion stood an enclosure, as it were, of a town or castle made of silk of many colours, inlaid in many ways, with battlements at the top, and with cords to strain it outside and inside, and with poles inside to hold it up. And there was a gateway of great height forming an arch, with doors within and without made in the same fashion as the wall . . . and above the gateway a square tower with battlements: however the said wall was with its many devices and artifices, the said gateway, arch and tower, was of much more exquisite work still. And this enclosure they call Zala-parda."—Cavafio, s. cxvi.

c. 1590.—"The Sarappardah was made in former times of coarse canvas, but his Majesty has now caused it to be made of carpeting, and thereby improved its appearance and usefulness."—Ab., i. 54.

[1838.—"The camp contained numerous enclosures of serrapurdahs or canvas skrees. . . "—Elphistone, Caulbul, 2nd ed. i. 101.]

SURREINJAUM, s. Pers. sar-anjam, lit. 'beginning-ending.' Used in India for 'apparatus,' 'goods and chattels,' and the like. But in the Maharatta provinces it has a special application to grants of land, or rather assignments of revenue, for special objects, such as keeping up a contingent of troops for service; to civil officers for the maintenance of their state; or for charitable purposes.

[1893.—"It was by accident I discovered the deed for this tenure (for the support of troops), which is termed serinjam. The Pandit of Dhar showed some alarm; at which I smiled, and told him that his master had now the best tenure in India . . ."—Malcolm, Central India, 2nd ed. i. 103.]

[1877.—"Government . . . did not accede to the recommendation of the political agent immediately to confiscate his saringam, or territories."—Mrs. Guthrie, My Year in an Indian Fort, i. 169.]

SURREINJAUMEE, GRAM, s. Hind. gram-sarjanjam; Skt. grānā, 'a village,' and sar-jam (see SURREINJAUM); explained in the quotation.

1767. — "Gram-serenjamme, or peons and pykes stationed in every village of the province to assist the farmers in the collections, and to watch the villages and the crops on the ground, who are also responsible for all thefts within the village they belong to . . . (Rs.) 1,54,521 : 14." — Revenue Accounts of Buriwan. In Long, 507.

SURROW, SEROW, &c., s. Hind. sorū. A big, odd, awkward-looking antelope in the Himalaya, 'something in appearance between a jackass and a Tahir (Tehr or Him, wild goat). — Col. Markham in Jerdon. It is Nemorhoedus bubalina, Jerdon; [N. bubalinus, Blanford (Mammalia, 513)].

SURWAUN, s. Hind. from Pers. sār-wān, sār-bān, from sār in the sense of camel, a camel-man.

[1828.—". . . camels roaring and blubbering, and resisting every effort, soothing or forcible, of their serwans to induce them to embark."—Mundy, Pen and Pencil Sketches, ed. 1858, p. 185.]

1844. — " . . . armed Surwans, or camel-drivers."—G. O. of Sir C. Napier, 93.

SUTLEDGE, n.p. The most easterly of the Five Rivers of the Punjab, the great tributaries of the Indus. Hind. Satlaj, with certain variations in spelling and pronunciation. It is in Skt. Sutadru, 'flowing in a hundred channels,' Sutudru, Sutudri, Sutatdru, &c., and is the Σαταδρος, Σαταδρος, or Σαδαδρος of Ptolemy, the Sydrus (or Hesudrus) of Pliny (vi. 21).

c. 1020.—"The Sultan . . . crossed in safety the Sihãn (Indus), Jailam, Chandráha, Ubrã (Kãvil), Bah (Bihãh), and Sataludr. . . ."—Al-'Utbi, in Elliot, ii. 41.

c. 1030. —"They all combine with the Sataladër below Multân, at a place called Panjnad, or 'the junction of the five rivers.'"—Al-Birûnî, in Elliot, i. 48. The same writer says: "(The name) should be written Shatadaldr. It is the name of a province in Hind. But I have ascertained from well-informed people that it should be Sataludr, not Shatadaldr" (sic).—Ibid. p. 52.

c. 1310. —"After crossing the Panjáb, or five rivers, namely, Sind, Jailam, the river of Lohâwar, Satlût, and Bihâh . . ."—Wassaf, in Elliot, iii. 36.

c. 1380.—"The Sultan (Firoz Shâh) . . . conducted two streams into the city from two rivers, one from the river Juma, the other from the Sutlej."—Târikh-i-Firoz-Shâhî, in Elliot, iii. 390.

c. 1450.—"In the year 756 H. (1355 A.D.) the Sultan proceeded to Dîalpâr, and conducted a stream from the river Sataladër, for a distance of 40 kos as far as Jhajjar."—Târikh-i-Mubârak Shâhî, in Elliot, iv. 8.

c. 1582. —"Letters came from Lahore with the intelligence that Ibrahim Husain Mirzâ had crossed the Sataliada, and was marching upon Dîalpâr."—Tabâkât-i-Akbâri, in Elliot, v. 358.

c. 1590. —"Sîbâb Dîhî. In the 3rd climate. The length (of this Sîbâb) from Palwal to Lodhâna, which is on the bank of the river Satlaj, is 165 Kãrh."—Atân, orig. i. 513; [ed. Jorret, ii. 278].

1793.—"Near Moultan they unite again, and bear the name of Setleje, until both the substance and name are lost in the Indus."—Renell, Memoir, p. 102.

In the following passage the great French geographer has missed the Sutlej:

1753.—"Les cartes qui ont précédé celles que j'ai composées de l'Arie, ou de l'Inde . . . ne marquent aucune rivière entre l'Hyphasis, ou Hypasis, dernier des fleuves qui se rendent dans l'Indus, et le Genné, qui est le Jomanes de l'Antiquité. . . .

Mais la marche de Timur s'indique dans cette intervalle deux rivières, celle de Keker et celle de Panipat. Dans un ancien itinéraire de l'Inde, que Pline nous a conservé, on trouve entre l'Hyphasis et le Jomanes une rivière sous le nom d'Hesidrus à égale distance d'Hyphasis et de Jomanes, et qu'on a tout lieu de prendre pour Keker."—D'Anville, p. 47.

SUTTEE, s. The rite of widow-burning; i.e. the burning of the living widow along with the corpse of her husband, as practised by people of certain castes among the Hindus, and eminently by the Rájpûts.

The word is properly Skt. satî, 'a good woman,' 'a true wife,' and thence-specially applied, in modern vernaculars of Sanskrit parentage, to the wife who was considered to accomplish the supreme act of fidelity by sacrificing herself on the funeral pile of her husband. The application of this substantive to the suicidal act, instead of the person, is European. The proper Skt. term for the act is saha-gamana, or 'keeping company,' [sahâ-marâna, 'dying together']. A very long series of quotations in illustration of the practice, from classical times downwards, might be given. We shall present a selection.

We should remark that the word (sati or suttee) does not occur, so far as we know, in any European work older than the 17th century. And it only occurs in a disguised form (see quotation from P. Della Valle). The term masti which he uses is probably maha-sati, which occurs in Skt. Dictionaries ('a wife of great virtue'). Della Valle is usually eminent in the correctness of his transcriptions of Oriental words. This conjecture of the interpretation of masti is confirmed, and the traveller himself justified, by an entry in Mr. Whittworth's Dictionary of a word Masti-kalla used in Canara for a monument commemorating a sati. Kalla is stone and masti=mahâ-sati. We have not found the term exactly in any European document older than Sir C. Malet's letter of 1787, and Sir W. Jones's of the same year (see below).

Suttee is a Brahmanical rite, and there is a Sanskrit ritual in existence (see Classified Index to the Tanjore MSS., p. 1358). It was introduced into Southern India with the Brahman civilisation, and was prevalent there chiefly in the Brahmanical Kingdom of Vijayanagar, and among the Maharratts. In Malabar, the most primitive part of S. India, the rite is forbidden (Andacharaniraya, v. 26). The cases mentioned by Teixeira below, and in the Lettres Edifiantes, occurred at Tanjore and Madura. A (Mahratta) Brahman at Tanjore told one of the present writers that he had to perform commemorative funeral rites for his grandfather and grandmother on the same day, and this indicated that his grandmother had been a sati.

The practice has prevailed in various regions besides India. Thus it seems to have been an early custom among the heathen Russians, or at least among nations on the Volga called Russians by Mas'uddy and Ibn Fozlân. Herodotus (Bk. v. ch. 5) describes it among certain tribes of Thracians. It was in vogue in Tonga and the Fiji Islands. It has prevailed in the island of Bali within our own time, though there accompanying Hindu rites, and perhaps of Hindu origin,—certainly modified by Hindu influence. A full account of Suttee as practised in those Malay Islands will be found in Zollinger's account of the Religion of Sassak in J. Ind. Arch. ii. 166; also see Friedrich's Bali as in note preceding. [A large number of references to Suttee are collected in Frazer, Pausanias, iii. 198 seqq.]

In Diodorus we have a long account of the rivalry as to which of the two wives of Kêteus, a leader of the Indian contingent in the army of Eumenes, should perform suttee. One is rejected as with child. The history of the other terminates thus:

B.C. 317.—"Finally, having taken leave of those of the household, she was set upon the pyre by her own brother, and was regarded with wonder by the crowd that had run together to the spectacle, and heroically ended her life; the whole force with their arms thrice marching round the pyre before it was kindled. But she, her smoking herself beside her husband, and even at the violence of the flame giving utterance to no unbecoming cry, stirred pity indeed in others of the spectators, and in some excess of eulogy; not but what there were some of the Greeks present who reproached such rites as barbarous and cruel. . . ."—Diod. Sic. Biblioth. xix. 33-34.

c. B.C. 30.

"Felix Eois lex funeris una maritis Quos Aurora suis rubra colorat equis;
Namque ubi mortiferâ jacta est fax ultima
Uxorum funis stat pia turba comis;
Et certamen habet leti, quae viva sequatur
Conjugium ; pudor est non licuuisse mori.

Ardent victrices; et flammeae pectora praebent, Imponuntque suis ora perusta viris."

Property.* Lib. iii. xiii. 15-22.

c. B.C. 20.—"He (Aristobulus) says that he had heard from some persons of wives burning themselves voluntarily with their deceased husbands, and that those women who refused to submit to this custom were disgraced."—Strabo, xv. 62 (E.T. by Hamilton and Falconer, iii. 112).

c. 851.—"All the Indians burn their dead. Serendib is the furthest out of the islands dependent upon India. Sometimes when they burn the body of a King, his wives cast themselves on the pile, and burn with him; but it is at their choice to abstain."—Reinward, Relation, &c. i. 50.

c. 1200.—"Hearing the Raja was dead, the Parmâri became a sati;—dying she said—The son of the Jadavani will rule the country, may my blessing be on him!"—Chand. Bardi, in Ind. Ant. i. 227. We cannot be sure that sati is in the original, as this is a condensed version by Mr. Beames.

c. 1298.—"Many of the women also, when their husbands die and are placed on the pile to be burnt, do burn themselves along with the bodies."—Marco Polo, Bk. iii. ch. 17.

c. 1322.—"The idolaters of this realm have one detestable custom (that I must mention). For when any man dies they burn him; and if he leave a wife they burn her alive with him, saying that she ought to go and keep her husband company in the other world. But if the woman have sons by her husband she may abide with them, an she will."—Odorie, in Cathay, &c., i. 79.

"Also in Zampa or Champa: "When a married man dies in this country his body is burned, and his living wife along with it. For they say that she should go to keep company with her husband in the other world also."—Ibid. 97, c. 1328.—"In this India, on the death of a noble, or of any people of substance, their bodies are burned; and eke their wives follow them alive to the fire, and for the sake of worldly glory, and for the love of their husbands, and for eternal life, burn along with them, with as much joy as if they were going to be wedded. And those who do this have the higher repute for virtue and perfection among the rest."—Fr. Jordànes, 20.

c. 1343.—"The burning of the wife after the death of her husband is an act among the Indians recommended, but not obligatory. If a widow burns herself, the members of the family get the glory thereof, and the fame of fidelity in fulfilling their duties. She who does not give herself up to the flames puts on coarse raiment and abides with her kindred, wretched and despised for having failed in duty. But she is not compelled to burn herself." (There follows an interesting account of instances witnessed by the traveller.)—Ibn Battuta, li. 198.

c. 1450.—"In Madrâ, the wife of a mortal comburuntur, cumque his, ut plurimum vivae uxores, iuxta se proprie matrimonii conventio. Prior ex lege uritur, etiam quae unica est. Sumuntur autem et aliae uxores quaedam eo pacto, ut morte funus sui exornetur, isque haur pacus apud eos hos ductur ... submissis ignis ovani ornatior luctus. Adest interea et sacerdos ... hortandae, unum circumanet ilia saepius ignem prope suggestum consistit, vestisque exxnex, loto de more prius corpore, tunc syndonem albam induta, ad exhortationem dicentis in ignem proslit."—N. Conti, in Poggius de Var. Port. iv.

c. 1520.—"There are in this Kingdom (the Deccan) many heathen, natives of the country, whose custom it is that when they die they are burnt, and their wives along with them; and if these will not do it they remarry in disgrace. If they do, they burn. And as it happens oft times that they are unwilling to do it, their Brahmin kinsfolk persuade them thereto, and this in order that such a fine custom should not be broken and fall into oblivion."—Summario de Gentii, in Ramusio, i. f. 329.

"In this country of Camboja ... when the King dies, the lords voluntarily burn themselves, and so do the King's wives at the same time, and so also do other women on the death of their husbands."—Ibid. i. 336.

1522.—"They told us that in Java Major it was the custom, when one of the chief men died, to burn his body; and then his principal wife, adorned with garlands of flowers, has herself carried in a chair by four men ... comforting her relations, who are afflicted because she is going to burn herself with the corpse of her husband ... saying to them, 'I am going this evening to sup with my dear husband and to sleep with him this night.' ... After again consoling them (she) casts herself into the fire and is burned. If she did not do this she would not be looked upon as an honourable woman, nor as a faithful wife."—Pigafetta, E.T. by Lord Stanley of A., 154.

c. 1566.—Cesare Federici notes the rite as peculiar to the Kingdom of "Bezengar" (see BISNAGAR): "vidi cose stranier e bestiali di quella gentiltà; vano primamente abbrusciare i corpi morti così d'huomini come di donne nobili; e sì l'huomo è maritato, la moglie è obligata ad abbruscarsi vita e viva col corpo del marito."—Orig. ed. p. 36. This traveller gives a good account of a Suttee.

1583.—"In the interior of Hindustán it is the custom when a husband dies, for his wife willingly and cheerfully to cast herself into the flames of the funeral pile, although she may not have lived happily with him. Occasionally love of life holds her back, and then her husband's relations assemble, light the pile, and place her upon it, thinking that thereby preserve the honour and character of the family. But since the country had come under the rule of his gracious Majesty [Akbar], inspectors had been appointed in every city and district, who were to watch carefully over these two cases, to discriminate between them, and to prevent any woman being forcibly burnt."—Abul Fazl, Akbar Nāmā, in Elliot, vi. 69.

1583.—"Among other sights I saw one I may note as wonderful. When I landed (at Negapatam) from the vessel, I saw a pit full of kindled charcoal; and at that moment a young and beautiful woman was brought by her people on a litter, with a great company of other women, friends of hers, with great festivity, she holding a mirror in her left hand, and a lemon in her right hand. ..."—and so forth.—G. Balbi, t. 82e. 83.

1586.—"The custom of the country (Java) is, that whenever the King doeth die, they take the body so dead and burn it, and preserve the ashes of him, and within five days next after, the wives of the said King so dead, according to the custom and use of their country, every one of them goe together to a place appointed, and the chiefe of the women which was nearest to him in accept, hath a ball in her hand, and throweth it from her, and the place where the ball resteth, thither they goe all, and turne their faces to the Eastward, and every one with a dagger in their hand (which dagger they call a cisse (see CREASE), and is as sharp as a razor), stab themselves in their owne blood, and fall a-groueling on their faces, and so ende their days."—T. Candish, in Hakl. iv. 335. This passage refers to Blambangan at the end of Java, which till a late date was subject to Bali, in which such practices have continued to our day. It seems probable that the Hindu rite here came in contact with the old Polynesian practices of a like kind, which prevailed e.g. in Fiji, quite recently. The narrative referred to below under 1633, where the victims were the slaves of a deceased queen, points to the latter origin. W. Humboldt thus alludes to similar passages in old Javanese literature: "Thus we may reckon as one of the finest episodes in the Brata Yuda, the story how Satya Wati, when she had sought out her slain husband among the corpses on the battlefield, stabs herself by his side with a dagger."—Kawi-Sprache, i. 89 (and see the whole section, pp. 87-95).
[c. 1590. — "When he (the Rajah of Asham) dies, his principal attendants of both sexes voluntarily bury themselves alive in his grave."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 118.]

1598.—The usual account is given by Linschoten, ch. xxxvi., with a plate; [Hak. Soc, i. 249.]

[c. 1610.—See an account in Pyrrad de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 394.]

1611.—"When I was in India, on the death of the Naïque (see NAIK) of Maduré, a country situated between that of Malaur and that of Choromandel, 400 wives of his burned themselves along with him."—Teixeira, i. 9.

c. 1620.—"The author ... when in the territory of the Karnakít ... arrived in company with his father at the city of Southern Mathura (Madura), where, after a few days, the ruler died and went to hell. The chief had 700 wives, and they all threw themselves at the same time into the fire."—Muhammad Sharif Hanouf, in Elliot, vii. 139.

1623.—"When I asked further if force was ever used in these cases, they told me that usually it was not so, but only at times among persons of quality, when some one had left a young and handsome widow, and there was a risk either of her desiring to marry again (which they consider a great scandal) or of a worse mischief,—in such a case the relations of her husband, if they were very strict, would compel her, even against her will, to burn ... a barbarous and cruel law indeed! But in short, as regarded Giaccamá, no one exercised either compulsion or persuasion; and she did the thing of her own free choice; both her kindred and herself exulting in it, as in an act magnanimous (which in sooth it was) and held in high honour among them. And when I asked about the ornaments and flowers that she wore, they told me this was customary as a sign of the joyousness of the Mastí (Masti is what they call a woman who gives herself up to be burnt upon the death of her husband)."—P. della Valle, ii. 671; [Hak. Soc. ii. 275, and see ii. 266 seq.]

1633.—"The same day, about noon, the queen's body was burnt without the city, with two and twenty of her female slaves; and we consider ourselves bound to render an exact account of the barbarous ceremonies practised in this place on such occasions as we were witness to."—Narrative of a Dutch Mission to Bali, quoted by Crawford, H. of Ind. Arch., ii. 244-253, from Procott. It is very interesting, but too long for extract.

c. 1650.—"They say that when a woman becomes a Sattee, that is burns herself with the deceased. She mightly pardons all the sins committed by the wife and husband and that they remain a long time in paradise; nay if the husband were in the infernal regions, the wife by this means draws him thence and takes him to paradise. ... Moreover the Sattee, in a future birth, returns not to the female sex ... but she who becomes not a Sattee, and passes her life in widowhood, is never emancipated from the female state. ... It is however criminal to force a woman into the fire, and equally to prevent her who voluntarily devotes herself."—Debistan, ii. 75-76.

c. 1650-60.—Tavernier gives a full account of the different manners of Sattee, which he had witnessed often, and in various parts of India, but does not use the word. We extract the following:

c. 1618.—"... there fell of a sudden so violent a Shower, that the Priests, willing to get out of the Rain, thrust the Woman all along into the Fire. But the Shower was so vehement, and endured so long, that the Fire was quench'd, and the Woman was not burn'd. About midnight she arose, and went and knock'd at one of her Kins-men's Houses, where Father Zenan and many Hollanders saw her, looking so vastly and grimly, that it was enough to pro- scar'd them; however the pain she endur'd did not so far terrifie her, but that three days after, accompany'd by her Kindred, she went and was burn'd according to her first intention."—Tavernier, E. T. ii. 84; [ed. Ball, i. 219].

Again:

"In most places upon the Coast of Coromandel, the Women are not burn't with their deceas'd Husbands, but they are buried alive with them in holes, which the Bramins make a foot deeper than the tallness of the man and woman. Usually they chuse a Sandy place; so that when the man and woman are both left down together, all the Company with Baskets of Sand fill up the hole above half a foot higher than the surface of the ground, after which they jump and dance upon it, till they believe the woman to be still'd."—Ibid. 171; [ed. Ball, ii. 216].

c. 1667.—Bernier also has several highly interesting pages on this subject, in his "Letter written to M. Chapelan, sent from Chirzah in Persia." We extract a few sentences: "Concerning the Women that have actually burn'd themselves, I have so often been present at such dreadful spectacles, that at length I could endure no more to see it, and I retain still some horror when I think on't. ... The Pile of Wood was presently all on fire, because store of Oyl and Butter had been thrown upon it, and I saw at the time through the Flames that the Fire took hold of the Cloaths of the Woman. ... All this I saw, but observ'd not that the Woman was at all disturb'd; yea it was said, that she had been heard to pronounce with great force these two words, Vive, Troi, to signify, according to the Opinion of those who hold the Souls Trans-migration, that this was the 5th time she had burn'd herself with the same Husband, and that there remain'd but two times for perfection; as if she had at that time this Remembrance, or some Prophetical Spirit."—E. T. p. 99; [ed. Constant , 306 seq].
1677.—Suttee, described by A. Bassing, in Valentine v. (Ceylon) 300.

1727.—"I have seen several burned several Ways... I heard a Story of a Lady that had received Addresses from a Gentleman who afterwards deserted her, and her Relations died shortly after the Marriage... and as the Fire was well kindled... she espied her former Admirer, and beckned him to come to her. When he came she took him in her Arms, as if she had a Mind to embrace him; but being stronger than he, she carried him into the Fire, and burned him in her Arms, where they were both consumed, with the Corpse of her Husband." —A. Hamilton, i. 278; [ed. 1744, i. 280].

"The Country about (Calcutta) being overspread with Paganisms, the Custom of Wives burning themselves with their deceased Husbands, is also practised here. Before the Mogul's War, Mr. Channock went one time with his Ordinary Guard of Soldiers, to see a young Widow act that tragical Catastrophe, but he was so smitten with the Widow's Beauty, that he sent his Guards to take her by Force from her Executioners, and conducted her to his own Lodgings. They lived lovingly many Years, and had several Children; at length she died, after he had settled in Calcutta, but instead of converting her to Christianity, she made him a Proselyte to Paganism, and the only part of Christianity that was remarkable in him, was burying her decently, and burning her body, and he built a Tomb over her, where all his Life after her Death, he kept the anniversary Day of her Death by sacrificing a Cock on her Tomb, after the Pagan Manner." —Ibid. [ed. 1744], ii. 6-7. [With this compare the curious lines described as an Epitaph on "Joseph Townsend, Pilot of the Ganges" (5 ser. Notes & Queries, i. 466 seq.)]

1774.—"Here (in Bali) not only women often kill themselves, or burn with their deceased husbands, but men also burn in honour of their deceased masters." —Forrest, V. to N. Guineu, 170.

1787.—"Soon after I and my conductor had quitted the house, we were informed the suttee (for that is the name given to the person who so devotes herself) had passed. W. —Sir C. Maldit, in Parly. Papers of 1821, p. 1 ("Hindoo Widows").

"My Father, said he (Pundit Rhadacauta), died at the age of one hundred years, and my mother, who was eighty years old, became a sati, and burned herself to expiate sins." —Letter of Sir W. Jones, in Life, ii. 120.

1792.—"In the course of my endeavours I found the poor suttee had no relations at Poonah." —Letter from Sir C. Maldit, in Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 394; [2nd ed. ii. 28, and see i. 178, in which the previous passage is quoted].

1808.—"These proceedings (Hindu marriage ceremonies in Guzerat) take place in the presence of a Brahmin... And farther, now the young woman vows that her affections shall be fixed upon her Lord alone, not only in all this life, but will follow in death, or to the next, that she will die, that she may burn with him, through as many transmigrations as shall secure their joint immortal bliss. Seven successions of suttees (a woman seven times born and burning, thus, as often) secure to the loving couple a seat among the gods." —R. Drummond.

1809.—"O sight of misery! You cannot hear her cries... their sound In that wild dissonance is drowned... But in her face you see The supplication and the agony... See in her swelling throat the desperate strength That with vain effort struggles yet for life; Her arms contracted now in fruitless strife, Now wildly at full length, Towards the crowd in vain for pity spread,... They force her on, they bind her to the dead." —Kehama, i. 12.

In all the poem and its copious notes, the word suttee does not occur.

[1815.—"In reference to this mark of strong attachment (of Sati for Siva), a Hindoo widow burning with her husband on the funeral pile is called suttee." —Ward, Hindoo, 2nd ed. ii. 25.]

1828.—"After having bathed in the river, the widow lighted a brand, walked round the pile, set it on fire, and then mounted cheerfully; the flame caught and blazed up instantly; she sat down, placing the head of the corpse on her lap, and repeated several times the usual form, 'Ram, Ram, Suttee; Ram, Ram, Suttee.' —Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 91-92.

1829.—"Regulation XVII. "A Regulation for declaring the practice of Suttee, or of burning or burying alive the widows of Hindoos, illegal, and punishable by the Criminal Courts." —Passed by the G.-C. in C., Dec. 4.

1839.—"Have you yet heard in England of the horrors that took place at the funeral of that wretched old Ranjeet Singh? Poor wives, and seven slave-girls were burnt with him; not a word of remonstrance from the British Government." —Letters from Madras, 278.

1843.—"It is lamentable to think how long after our power was firmly established in Bengal, we, grossly neglecting the first and plainest duty of the civil magistrate, suffered the practices of infanticide and suttee to continue unchecked." —Macaulay's Speech on Gates of Somnauth.
1856. — "The pile of the sutee is unusually large; heavy cart-wheels are placed upon it, to which her limbs are bound, or sometimes a canopy of massive logs is raised above it, to crush her by its fall. . . . It is a fatal omen to hear the sutee’s groan; therefore as the fire springs up from the pile, there rises simultaneously with it a deafening shout of Victory to Umbal! Victory to Ranchor! and the horn and the hard rattling sound their loudest, until the sacrifice is consumed." — Rôs Môdh, ii. 435; [ed. 1878, p. 691].

1870. — A case in this year is recorded by Chevers, Ind. Med. Jurisp. 665.]

1871. — "Our bridal finery of dress and feast too often proves to be no better than the Hindu woman’s ‘bravery,’ when she comes to perform sutee." — Cornhill Mag. vol. xxiv. 675.

SWALLOW, SWALLOE, s. The old trade-name of the sea-slug, or tripang (q.v.). It is a corruption of the Bugi (Makassar) name of the creature, swâvâl (see Crawford’s Malay Dict.); [Scott, Malagun Words, 107].

1783. — "I have been told by several Bussigges that they sail in their Paduakan to the northern parts of New Holand . . . to gather Swallow (Biche de Mer), which they sell to the annual China junk at Macassar." — Forrest, V. to Mergui, 83.

SWALLY, SWALLOW, ROADS.

SWALLY MARINE, SWALLY HOLE, n.p. Swâvâl, the once familiar name of the roadstead north of the mouth of the Tapti, where ships for Surat usually anchored, and discharged or took in cargo. It was perhaps Ar. savâlîl, ‘the shores’ (?). [Others suggest Skt. Svâlalaya, ‘abode of Siva.’]

[1615. — "The Osinder proving so leaky through the worm in the foulness of the sea-water at Swally." — Foster, Letters, iv. 22. Also see Birdwood, Report on Old Rees. 209.]

1623. — "At the beach there was no kind of vehicle to be found; so the Captain went on foot to a town about a mile distant called Sohali . . . The Franks have houses there for the goods which they continually despatch for embarkation." — P. della Valle, ii. 503.

1675. — "As also passing by . . . eight ships riding at Surat River’s Mouth, we then came to Swally Marine, where were flying the Colours of the Three Nations, English, French, and Dutch . . . who here land and ship off all Goods, without molestation." — Fryer, 82.

1677. — "The 22d of February 1674 from Swally hole the Ship was despatched alone." — Ibid. 217.

1690. — "In a little time we happily arriv’d at Suablybar, and the Tide serving, came to an Anchor very near the Shouar." — Ovington, 163.

1727. — "One Season the English had eight good large Ships riding at Swally . . . the Place where all Goods were unloaded from the Shipping, and all Goods for Exportation were there ship’d off." — A. Hamilton, i. 106; [ed. 1744].

1841. — "These are sometimes called the inner and the outer sands of Swallow, and are both dry at low water." — Horburgh’s India Directory, ed. 1841, i. 474.

SWAMY, SAMMY, s. This word is a corruption of Skt. suâmin, ‘Lord.’ It is especially used in S. India, in two senses: (a) a Hindu idol, especially applied to those of Siva or Subramanyam; especially, as Sammy, in the dialect of the British soldier. This comes from the usual Tamil pronunciation sâmî. (b) The Skt. word is used by Hindus as a term of respectful address, especially to Brahmans.

a. —

1755. — "Towards the upper end there is a dark repository, where they keep their Swanme, that is their chief god." — Fees, 70.

1794. — "The gold might for us as well have been worshipped in the shape of a Sawny at Juggernaut." — The Indian Observer, p. 167.

1838. — "The Government lately presented a shawl to a Hindu idol, and the Government officer . . . was ordered to superintend the delivery of it . . . so he went with the shawl in his tonjân, and told the Brahmins that they might come and take it, for that he would not touch it with his fingers to present it to a Swanmy." — Letters from Madras, 183.

b. —

1516. — "These people are commonly called Jorgues (see JOGEE), and in their own speech they are called Zoame, which means Servant of God." — Barbaras, 99.

SWAMY-HOUSE, SAMMY-HOUSE, s. An idol-temple, or pagoda. The Sammy-house of the Delhi ridge in 1857 will not soon be forgotten.

1760.—"The French cavalry were advancing before their infantry; and it was the intention of Colliaud that his own should wait until they came in a line with the flank-fire of the field-pieces of the Swamy-house."—Orme, iii. 443.

1829.—"Here too was a little detached Swamie-house (or chapel) with a lamp burning before a little idol."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 99.

1857.—"We met Wilby at the advanced post, the 'Sammy House,' within 600 yards of the Bastion. It was a curious place for three brothers to meet in. The view was charming. Delhi is as green as an emerald just now, and the Muna Musjid and Palace are beautiful objects though held by infidels."—Letters written during the Siege of Delhi, by Hervey Greated, p. 112.

SWAMY JEWELRY. s. A kind of gold and silver jewelry, made chiefly at Trichinopoly, in European shapes covered with grotesque mythological figures.

[1880. — "In the characteristic Swami work of the Madras Presidency the ornamentation consists of figures of the Puranic gods in high relief, either beaten out from the surface, or affixed to it; whether by soldering, or wedging, or screwing them on."—Birdwood, Industr. Arts, 152.]

SWAMY-PAGODA. s. A coin formerly current at Madras; probably so called from the figure of an idol on it. Milburn gives 100 Swamy Pagodas = 110 Star Pagodas. A "three swami pagoda" was a name given to a gold coin bearing on the obverse the effigy of Chenna Keswam Swami (a title of Krishna) and on the reverse Lakshmi and Rukmini (C.P.B.).

SWATCH. s. This is a marine term which probably has various applications beyond Indian limits. But the only two instances of its application are both Indian, viz., "the Swatch of No Ground," or elliptically "The Swatch," marked in all the charts just off the Ganges Delta, and a space bearing the same name, and probably produced by analogous tidal action, off the Indus Delta. [The word is not to be found in Smyth, Sailor's Word-book.]

1726.—In Valentijn's first map of Bengal, though no name is applied there is a space marked "no ground with 60 raam (fathoms) of line."

1863. — (Ganges). "There is still one other phenomenon. . . . This is the existence of a great depression, or hole, in the middle of the Bay of Bengal, known in the charts as the Swatch of No Ground."—Ferguson, on 'Recent Changes in the Delta of the Ganges, Qy. Jour. Geol. Soc., Aug. 1863.

1877. — (Indus). "This is the famous Swatch of no ground where the lead falls at once into 200 fathoms."—Burton, Sind Revised, 21.

[1878. — "He (Capt. Lloyd, in 1840) describes the remarkable phenomenon at the head of the Bay of Bengal, similar to that reported by Captain Selby off the mouths of the Indus, called 'the Swatch of no ground.' It is a deep chasm, open to seaward and very steep on the north-west face, with no soundings at 250 fathoms."—Markham, Mem. of Indian Surveys, 27.]

SWEET APPLE, s. An Anglo-Indian corruption of sitaphal, 'the fruit of Sita,' the Musk Melon, Fr. Potiron. Cucurbita moschata (see CUSTARD-APPLE.)

SWEETOLEANDER, s. This is in fact the common oleander, Nerium odorum, Ait.

1880.—"Nothing is more charming than, even in the upland valleys of the Mahrratta country, to come out of a wood of all outlandish trees and flowers suddenly on the dry winter bed of some mountain stream, grown along the banks, or on the little islets of verdure in mid (shingle) stream, with clumps of mixed tamarisk and lovely blooming oleander."—Birdwood, MS. 9.

SWEET POTATO, s. The root of Batatas edulis, Choisy (Convolvulus Batatas, L.), N.O. Convolvulaceae; a very palatable vegetable, grown in most parts of India. Though extensively cultivated in America, and in the W. Indies, it has been alleged in various books (e.g. in Eng. Cyclop. Nat. Hist. Section, and in Drury's Useful Plants of India), that the plant is a native of the Malay islands. The Eng. Cyc. even states that batatas is the Malay name. But the whole allegation is probably founded in error. The Malay names of the plant, as given by Crawfur'd, are Kaledek, Ubi Java, and Ubi Kastilia, the last two names meaning 'Java yam,' and 'Spanish yam,' and indicating the foreign origin of the vegetable. In India, at least in the Bengal Presidency, natives commonly call it shakar-kand, P.—Ar., literally 'sugar-candy,' a name equally suggesting that it is not indigenous among them. And in fact when we turn to Oviedo, we find the following distinct statement:

"Batatas are a staple food of the Indians, both in the Island of Spagnola and in the others . . . and a ripe Batata properly dressed is just as good as a marchpane twist of sugar and almonds, and better indeed. . . . When Batatas are well ripened, they are often carried to Spain, i.e., if the voyage be a quiet one; for if there be delay they get spoilt at sea. I myself have carried them from this city of S. Domingo to the city of Avila in Spain, and although they did not arrive as good as they should be, yet they were thought a great deal of, and reckoned a singular and precious kind of fruit." —In Ramusio, iii. f. 134.

It must be observed however that several distinct varieties are cultivated by the Pacific islanders even as far west as New Zealand. And Dr. Bretschneider is satisfied that the plant is described in Chinese books of the 3rd or 4th century, under the name of Kan-chu (the first syllable = 'sweet'). See B. on Chin. Botan. Words, p. 13. This is the only good argument we have seen for Asiatic origin. The whole matter is carefully dealt with by M. Alph. De Candolle (Origine des Plantes cultivées, pp. 43-49), concluding with the judgment: "Les motifs sont beaucoup plus forts, ce me semble, en faveur de l'origine américaine."

The "Sanskrit name" Ruktaloo, alleged by Mr. Piddington, is worthless. Ālā is properly an esculent Arum, but in modern use is the name of the common potato, and is sometimes used for the sweet potato. Raktālō, more commonly rat-ālīg, is in Bengal the usual name of the Yam, no doubt given first to a highly-coloured kind, such as Dioscorea purpurea, for rakt- or rat-ālī means simply 'red potato'; a name which might also be well applied to the batatas, as it is indeed, according to Forbes Watson, in the Deccan. There can be little doubt that this vegetable, or fruit as Oviedo calls it, having become known in Europe many years before the potato, the latter robbed it of its name, as has happened in the case of Brazilwood (q.v.). The batata is clearly the 'potato' of the fourth and others of the following quotations. [See Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 117 seqq.]

1519.—"At this place (in Brazil) we had refreshment of victuals, like fowls and meat of calves, also a variety of fruits, called batata, pigne (pine-apples), sweet, of singular goodness. . . ."—Pigafetta, E.T. by Lord Stanley of A., p. 43.

1540.—"The root which among the Indians of Spagnola Island is called Batata, the negroes of St. Thomè (C. Verde group) called Iguname, and they plant it as the chief staple of their maintenance; it is of a black colour, i.e. the outer skin is so, but inside it is white, and as big as a large turnip, with many branchlets; it has the taste of a chestnut, but much better."—Voyage to the I. of San Tomè under the Equinocial, Ramusio, i. 117v.

c. 1550.—"They have two other sorts of roots, one called batata . . . They generate windiness, and are commonly cooked in the embers. Some say they taste like almond cakes, or sugared chestnuts; but in my opinion chestnuts, even without sugar, are better."—Giról. Benzoní, Hak. Soc. 86.

1558.—"Wee met with sixee and seventee sayles of Canoes full of Sauages, who came off to Sea vnto vs, and brought with them in their Boates, Plantans, Cocos, Potato-roots, and fresh fish."—Voyage of Master Thomas Candesk, Purchas, i. 86.

1600. —"The Batatas are somewhat redder of colour, and in forme almost like Linnwass (see YAM), and taste like Earthnuts."—In Purchas, ii. 957.

1615.—"I took a garden this day, and planted it with Pottatos brought from the Liqueua, a thing not yet planted in Japan. I must pay a tax, or 5 shillings sterling, per annum for the garden."—Cocks's Diary, i. 11.

1645.—". . . patatate; c'est vne racine comme naeune, mais plus longue et de couleur rouge et jaune: cela est de tres-bon goust, mais si l'on en mange souuent, elle degouste fort, et est assez ventuse."—Moquet, Voyages, 83.

1764.—"Here let Potatos mantle o'er the ground, Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear."—Graining, Bk. iv.

SYCE, s. Hind. from Ar. sātś. A groom. It is the word in universal use in the Bengal Presidency. In the South horse-keeper is more common, and in Bombay a vernacular form of the latter, viz. ghorāviolā (see GORA-WALLAH). The Ar. verb, of which sātś is the participle, seems to be a loan-word from Syriac, sāwš, 'to coax.'

[1759.—In list of servants' wages: "Syce, Rs. 2."—In Long, 182.]

1779.—"The bearer and scise, when they returned, came to the place where I was, and laid hold of Mr. Ducarell. I took hold of Mr. Sheedy and cried him up. The bearer and scise took Mr. Ducarell out. Mr. Keeble was standing on his own house looking, and asked, 'What is the matter'
The bearer and sciss said to Mr. Keeble, ‘These gentlemen came into the house when my master was out.’—Evidence on Trial of Grand v. Francis, in Echoes of Old Calcutta, 230.

1810.—‘The syce, or groom, attends but one horse.’—Williamson, V.M. i. 254.

c. 1858 —

‘Tandis que les cais veillent les chiens rodeurs.’

Lecote de Liste.

SYCEE, s. In China applied to pure silver bullion in ingots, or shoes (q.v.). The origin of the name is said to be si (pron. at Canton sai and set) = se, i.e. fine silk; and we are told by Mr. Giles that it is so called because, if pure, it may be drawn out into fine threads. [Linschoten (1598) speaks of: ‘Peeces of cut silver, in which sort they pay and receive all their money’ (Hak. Soc. i. 132).]

1711.—‘Formerly they used to sell for Sisee, or Silver full fine; but of late the Method is alter’d.’—Lockyer, 135.

SYRAS, CYRUS. See under CYRUS.

SYRIAM. n.p. A place on the Pegu R., near its confluence with the Rangoon R., six miles E. of Rangoon, and very famous in the Portuguese dealings with Pegu. The Burmese form is Than-byang, but probably the Talaing name was nearer that which foreigners give it. [See Burma Gazetteer, ii. 672. Mr. St John (J. R. As. Soc., 1894, p. 151) suggests the Mwn word sarang or siring, ‘a swinging cradle.’] Syriam was the site of an English factory in the 17th century, of the history of which little is known. See the quotation from Dalrymple below.

1587.—‘To Cirion a Port of Pegu come ships from Mecca with woollen Cloth, Scarlets, Velvets, Opium, and such like.’—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 395.

1600.—‘I went thither with Philip Brito, and in fifteen days arrived at Sirian the chiefie Port in Pegu. It is a lamentable spectacle to see the bankes of the Rivers set with infinite fruit-bearing trees, now overwhelmed with ruins of gilded Temples, and noble edifices; the wayses and fields full of skulls and bones of wretched Peguans, killed or famished, and cast into the River in such numbers that the multitude of carkasses prohibith the way and passage of ships.’—The Jesuit Andrew Boves, in Purchas ii. 1748.

c. 1606.—‘Philip de Brito issued an order that a custom-house should be planted at Serian (Serito), at which duties should be paid by all the vessels of this State which went to trade with the kingdom of Pegu, and with the ports of Martavan, Tavay, Tenasserim, and Juncalon. Now certain merchants and shipowners from the Coast of Coromandel refused obedience, and this led Philip de Brito to send a squadron of 6 ships and galliots with an imposing and excellent force of soldiers on board, that they might cruise on the coast of Tenasserim, and compel all the vessels that they met to come and pay duty at the fortress of Serian.’—Boiarro, 135.

1635.—‘9th. That the Old house and Ground at Syrian, formerly belonging to the English Company, may still be continued to them, and that they may have liberty of building dwelling-houses, and warehouses, for the securing their Goods, as shall be necessary, and that more Ground be given them, if what they formerly had be not sufficient.’ Petition presented to the K. of Burma at Ava, by Ed. Fleetwood; in Dalrymple, O.R. ii. 374.

1728.—Zierjang (Syriam) in Valentinj, Choro, &c., 127.

1727.—‘About 60 Miles to the Eastward of China Backaar (see CHINA-BUCKER) is the Bar of Syrian, the only port now open for Trade in all the Pegu Dominions. . . . It was many Years in Possession of the Portuguese, till by their Insolence and Pride they were obliged to quit it.’—A. Hamilton, ii. 31-32; [ed. 1741].

SYUD, s. Ar. sayjid, ‘a lord.’ The designation in India of those who claim to be descendants of Mahommed. But the usage of Sayyid and Sharif varies in different parts of Mahommedan Asia. [‘As a rule (much disputed) the Sayyid is a descendant from Mahommed through his grandchild Hasan, and is a man of the pen; whereas the Sharif derives from Husayn and is a man of the sword’ (Burton, Ar. Nights, iv. 209).]

1404.—‘On this day the Lord played at chess, for a great while, with certain Zaytes; and Zaytes they call certain men who come of the lineage of Mahomad.’—Clavisio, § exiv. (Markham, p. 141-2).

1869.—‘Il y a dans l’Inde quatre classes de musulmans : les Sayyids ou descendants de Mahomet par Huçain, les Schaitiks ou Arabes, nommés vulgairement Maures, les Pathans ou Afgans, et les Mogols. Ces quatre classes ont chacune son ordre à la religion de saints personnages, qui sont souvent désignés par ces dénominations, et par d’autres spécialement consacrées à chacune d’elles, telles que Mir pour les Sayyids, Khânon pour les Pathans, Mirzâ, Beg, Agâ, et Khedja pour les Mogols.’—Garçin de Tassy, Religion Mus. dans l’Inde, 22.
The learned author is mistaken here in supposing that the obsolete term Moor was in India specially applied to Arabs. It was applied, following Portuguese custom, to all Mohammedans.

Tabasheer, s. 'Sugar of Bamboo.' A siliceous substance sometimes found in the joints of the bamboo, formerly prized as medicine, [also known in India as Bānslochan or Bānskātpār]. The word is Pers. tabāshīr, but that is from the Skt. name of the article, tvakkṣhīra, and tava-kṣhīra. The substance is often confounded, in name at least, by the old Materia Medica writers, with spodiūm, and is sometimes called ispodio di canna. See Ces. Federici below. Garcia De Orta goes at length into this subject (f. 193 seqq.). [See SUGAR.]

c. 1150.—"Tanah (miswritten Banah) est une jolie ville située sur un grand golfe. . . . Dans les montagnes environnantes croissent le . . . kana et le . . . tabāshīr. . . . Quant au tēbachir, on le fâsile en le mélangeant avec de la cendre d’ivoire; mais le véritable est celui qu’on extrait des racines du roseau dit . . . al Sharktī."—Ediri, i. 179.

1563.—"And much less are the roots of the cane tabaxer; so that according to both the translations Avicena is wrong; and Averrois says that it is charcoal from burning the canes of India, whence it appears that he never saw it, since he calls such a white substance charcoal."—Garcia, f. 159v.

c. 1570.—"Il Spodio si congela d’acqua in alcune canne, e io n’ho trovato assai nel Pegò quando facendo fabricar la mia casa,"—Ces. Federici, in Ranzo, iii. 397.

1578.—"The Spodiūm or Tabaxir of the Persians . . . was not known to the Greeks."—Aeosta, 295.

c. 1580.—"Spodium Tabaxir vocant, quo nomine vulgar pharmacopœorum Spodinum factitium, quippe metallicum, intelligent. At eruditiores viri eo nomine lacrymam quandam, ex caudice arboris procerae in India nascentis, albicantem, odoratam, facultatis refrigeratoriae, et cor maxime roborantis iidem intelligent."—Prosper Alpinus, Rever Amptguriam, Lib. III. vii.

1598.—". . . these Mambus have a certain Matter within them, which is (as it were) the pith of it. The Indians call it Sugar Mambu, which is as much as to say, as Sugar of Mambu, and is a very deep Medicinal thing much esteemed, and much sought for by the Arabians, Persians, and Moors, that call it Tabaxir."—Linschoten, p. 104; [Hak. Soc. ii. 56].

1837.—"Allied to these in a botanical point of view is Saccharum officinarum, which has needlessly been supposed not to have yielded saccharum, or the substance known by this name to the ancients; the same authors conjecturing this to be Tabasheer. . . . Considering that this substance is pure sīlac, it is not likely to have been arranged with the honeys and described under the head of pera Sākharōn melōn."—Royle on the Ant. of Hindoo Medicine, p. 83. This confirms the views expressed in the article SUGAR.

1854.—"In the cavity of these cylinders water is sometimes secreted, or, less commonly, an opaque white substance, becoming opaline when wetted, consisting of a flinty secretion, of which the plant divests itself, called Tabasheer, concerning the optical properties of which Sir David Brewster has made some curious discoveries."—Engl. Cyc. Nat. Hist. Section, article Bamboo.

Tabby, s. Not Anglo-Indian. A kind of watered silk stuff; Sp. and Port. tabó, Ital. tabino, Fr. tapis, from Ar. 'attābi, the name said to have been given to such stuffs from their being manufactured in early times in a quarter of Baghdad called al-āttābiyā; and this derived its name from a prince of the Omaniyat family called 'Attāb. [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ii. 371.]

12th cent.—"The 'Attābiyā . . . here are made the stuffs, called 'Attābiyā, which are silks and cottons of divers colours."—Ibn Jubair, p. 227.

[c. 1220.—"'Attabi." See under SUC-LAT.]

Taboot, s. The name applied in India to a kind of shrine, or model of a Mahomedan mausoleum, of flimsy material, intended to represent the tomb of Husain at Kerbela, which is carried in procession during the Moharram (see Herklotz, 2nd ed. 119 seqq., and Garcin de Tassy, Rel. Musulm. dans l’Inde, 36). [The word is Ar. tabāt, 'a wooden box, coffín.' The term used in N. India is toōziyā (see TAZEEA.).]

1856.—"There is generally over the vault in which the corpse is deposited an oblong monument of stone or brick (called 'tarkeebeh') or wood (in which case it is called 'taboot')."—Lane, Mod. Egypt., 5th ed. i. 200.]

Tack-Ravan, s. A litter carried on men's shoulders, used only by royal personages. It is Pers. takht-rāvdā, 'travelling-throne.' In the Hindi of Behar the word is corrupted into tartarván.

[c. 1660.—"... several articles of Chinese and Japan workmanship; among which were a pateky and a tact-ravan, or travelling throne, of exquisite beauty, and much admired."—Ierwier, ed. Constable, 125; in 370, tact-ravan.

[1753.—"Mahommed Shah, emperor of Hindostan, seated in a royal litter (tahkt raván, which signifies a moving throne) issued from his camp. ..."—Hawway, iv. 169.]

TAEL, s. This is the trade-name of the Chinese ounce, viz., ⅓ of a catty (q.v.); and also of the Chinese money of account, often called "the ounce of silver," but in Chinese called liang. The standard liang or taiel is, according to Dr. Wells Williams, =579.84 grs. troy. It was formerly equivalent to a string of 1000 tsien, or (according to the trade-name) cash (q.v.). The China tael used to be reckoned as worth 6s. 6d., but the rate really varied with the price of silver. In 1879 an article in the Fortnightly Review puts it at 5s. 7½d. (Sept. p. 362); the exchange at Shanghai in London by telegraphic transfer, April 13, 1885, was 4s. 9½d.; [on Oct. 3, 1901, 2s. 7½d.]. The word was apparently got from the Malays, among whom tail or tahil is the name of a weight; and this again, as Crawford indicates, is probably from the India tola (q.v.). [Mr. Pringle writes: "Sir H. Yule does not refer to such forms as tahé (see below), taies (plural in Fryer's New Account, p. 210, sub Machaó), Tayé (see quotation below from Saris), tayés (see quotation below from Moquet), or taey, and taeyés (Philip's translation of Linschoten, Hak. Soc. i. 149). These probably come through the medium of the Portuguese, in which the final l of the singular taél is changed into s in the plural. Such a form as taéis might easily suggest a singular wanting the final s, and from such a singular French and English plurals of the ordinary type would in turn be fashioned" (Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 126).]

The Chinese scale of weight, with their trade-names, runs: 16 taels = 1 catty, 100 catties = 1 pecul = 13⅓ lbs. avoird. Milburn gives the weights of Achin as 4 copangs (see KOPANG) = 1 mace, 5 mace = 1 mayam, 16 mayam = 1 tale (see TAEL), 5 tales = 1 buncal, 20 buncals = 1 catty, 200 catties = 1 bahar; and the catty of Achin as = 2 lbs. 1 oz. 13 dr. Of these names, mace, tale and bahar (qq.v.) seem to be of Indian origin, mayam, bangkat, and kati Malay.

1540.—"And those three junks which were then taken, according to the assertion of those who were aboard, had contained in silver alone 200,000 taels (tari), which are in our money 300,000 cruzadós, besides much else of value with which they were freighted."—Pinto, cap. xxxv.

1598.—"A Tael is a full ounce and a halfe Portingale weight."—Linschoten, 44; [Hak. Soc. i. 149].

1599.—"Est et ponders genus, quod Tael vocant in Malacea, Taél unum in Malacea pender 16 masas."—De Bry, ii. 64.

"Four hundred cashes make a coupur (see KOBANG). Four coupurs are one mas. Four masses make a Perdaw (see PARDAO). Four Perdaws make a Tayel."—Capt. T. Davis, in Purchas, i. 128.

c. 1608.—"Bezar stones are thus bought by the Taile ... which is one Ounce, and the third part English."—Saris, in do., 302.

1613.—"A Taye is five shillinge sterling."—Saris, in do. 369.

1643.—"Les Portugais sont fort desirieux de ces Chinois pour esclaves ... il y a des Chinois faictes à ce mestier ... quans ils voyent quelque beau petit garçon ou fille ... les eluent par force et les cachent ... puis viennent sur la rüe de la mer, ou ils s¢uant que sont les trafiquans à qui ils les vendent 12 et 15 tayes chacun, qui est enuiron 25 escus."—Moquet, 342.

1656.—"Un Religieux Chinois qui a esté surpris avec des femmes de debanché ... l'on a perçé le col avec vn fer chaud; à ce fer est attaché vn chaisin de fer d'environ dix brasses qu'il est obligé de traîner jusques à ce qu'il ait apporté au Couent trente theylas d'argent qu'il faut qu'il amasse en demandant l'amoinsse."—In Thévet, Divers Voyages, ii. 67.

[1683.—"The abovesaid Musk weyes Cattée 10: tahé 14: Mas 03. ..."—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Geo., 1st ser. ii. 34.]

TAHSEELDAR, s. The chief (native) revenue officer of a subdivision (taksid, conf. Pergunnah, Talook) of a district (see ZILLAH). Hind. from Pers. taksidar, and that from Ar. taksil, 'collection.' This is a term of the Mahommedan administration which we have adopted. It appears by the quotation from Williamson that the term was formerly employed in Calcutta to designate the cash-keeper in a firm or private establishment, but this use is long obsolete.
TALAING.

Possibly there was a confusion with Tahsildar, ‘a cashier.’

1772.—“Tahsildar, or Seeward, an officer employed for a monthly salary to collect the revenues.”—Glossary, in Verelst, View of Bengal, a.v.

1799.—“... He (Tippoo) divided his country into 37 Provinces under Dewans (see DEWAUN)... and he subdivided these again into 1025 inferior districts, having each a Tahsildar.”—Letter of Munro, in Life, i. 215.

1808.—“... he continues to this hour tehsildar of the petty pergunnah of Shekopore.”—Fifth Report, 583.

1810.—“... the sicerar, or tusseeldar (cash-keeper) receiving one key, and the master retaining the other.”—Williamson, V.M. i. 209.

1826.—“... I told him ... that I was the bearer of letters to his head collector or Thuseeldam (sic) there.”—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 155.

TAILOR-BIRD. s. This bird is so called from the fact that it is in the habit of drawing together “one leaf or more, generally two leaves, on each side of the nest, and stitches them together with cotton, either woven by itself, or cotton thread picked up; and after putting the thread through the leaf, it makes a knot at the end to fix it” (Jerdon). It is Orthotomos longicauda, Gmelin (sub-fam. Drymoicinæ).

1813.—“Equally curious in the structure of its nest, and far superior (to the baya) in the variety and elegance of its plumage, is the tailor-bird of Hindostan” (here follows a description of its nest).—Forbes, Or. Mem., 2nd ed. i. 33.

1883.—“Clear and loud above all ... sounds the to-whee, to-whee, to-whee of the tailor-bird, a most plain-looking little greenish thing, but a skilful workman and a very Beaconsfield in the matter of keeping its own counsel. Aided by its industrious spouse, it will, when the monsoon comes on, spin cotton, or steal thread from the durzee, and sew together two broad leaves of the laurel in the pot on your very doorstep, and when it has warmly lined the bag so formed it will bring up therein a large family of little tailors.”—Tribes on My Frontier, 115.

TAJ. s. Pers. tâj, ‘a crown.’ The most famous and beautiful mausoleum in Asia; the Taj Mahal at Agra, erected by Shah Jahan over the burial-place of his favourite wife Mumtâz-i-Mahal (‘Ornament of the Palace’) Banû Begam.

1663.—“I shall not stay to discourse of the Monument of Ekbar, because whatever beauty is there, is found in a far higher degree in that of Taj-Mahal, which I am now going to describe to you... judge whether I had reason to say that the Mausoleum, or Tomb of Taj-Mahal, is something worthy to be admired. For my part I do not yet well know, whether I am somewhat infected still with Indianisms; but I must needs say, that I believe it ought to be reckoned amongst the Wonders of the World...”—Bernier, E.T. 94-96; [ed. Constable, 293].

1865.—“Of all the Monuments that are to be seen at Agra, that of the Wife of Cha-Jehan is the most magnificent; she caused it to be set up on purpose near the Tasmacan, to which all strangers must come, that they should admire it. The Tasmacan ([Tâj-i-nûkân, ‘Place of the Taj’] is a great Bazar, or Market-place, comprised of six great courts, all encompass’d with Portico’s; under which there are Warehouses for Merchants. The Monument of this Beyam or Sultaness, stands on the East side of the City... I saw the beginning and compleating of this great work, that cost two and twenty years labour, and 20,000 men always at work.”—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 50; [ed. Ball, i. 109].

1856.—“... But far beyond compare, the glorious Taj, Seen from old Agra’s towering battlements, And mirrored clear in Jumna’s silent stream; Sun-lighted, like a pearly diadem Set royal on the melancholy brow Of withered Hindostan; but, when the moon Dims the white marble with a softer light, Like some queened maiden, veiled in dainty lace, And waiting for her bridegroom, stately, pale, But yet transcendent in her loveliness,” The Banyan Tree.

TALAING, n.p. The name by which the chief race inhabiting Pegu (or the Delta of the Irawadi) is known to the Burmese. The Talaings were long the rivals of the Burmese, alternately conquering and conquered, but the Burmese have, on the whole, so long predominated, even in the Delta, that the use of the Talaing language is now nearly extinct in Pegu proper, though it is still spoken in Martaban, and among the descendants of emigrants into Siamese territory. We have adopted the name from the Burmese to designate the race, but their own name for their people is Môn or Màn (see MONE).

Sir Arthur Phayre has regarded the name Talaing as almost undoubtedly a form of Telinga. The reasons given are plausible, and may be briefly stated in two extracts from his Essay On the History of Pegu (J. As. Soc. Beng., vol. xlii. Pt. i.): "The names given in the histories of Tha-htun and Pegu to the first Kings of those cities are Indian; but they cannot be accepted as historically true. The countries from which the Kings are said to have derived their origin may be recognised as Karnāta, Kalinga, Venga and Vizianagaram probably mistaken for the more famous Vijayanagar. The word Talingana never occurs in the Peguan histories, but only the more ancient name Kalinga" (op. cit. pp. 32-33). "The early settlement of a colony or city for trade, on the coast of Rāmānya by settlers from Talingana, satisfactorily accounts for the name Talaing, by which the people of Pegu are known to the Burmese and all peoples of the west. But the Peguans call themselves by a different name ... Mun, Mwn, or Mon" (ibid. p. 34).

Prof. Forchhammer, however, who has lately devoted much labour to the study of Talaing archaeology and literature, entirely rejects this view. He states that prior to the time of Alompra's conquest of Pegu (middle of 18th century) the name Talaing was entirely unknown as an appellation of the Muns, and that it nowhere occurs in either inscriptions or older palm-leaves, and that by all nations of Further India the people in question is known by names related to either Mun or Pegu. He goes on: "The word 'Talaing' is the term by which the Muns acknowledged their total defeat, their being vanquished and the slaves of their Burmese conqueror. They were no longer to bear the name of Muns or Peguans. Alompra stigmatized them with an appellation suggestive at once of their submission and disgrace. Talaing means" (in the Mun language) "'one who is trodden under foot, a slave.'... Alompra could not have devised more effective means to extirpate the national consciousness of a people than by burning their books, forbidding the use of their language, and by substituting a term of abject reproach for the name under which they had maintained themselves for nearly 2000 years in the marine provinces of Burma. The similarity of the two words 'Talaing' and 'Telingana' is purely accidental; and all deductions, historical or etymological ... from the resemblance ... must necessarily be void ab initio" (Notes on Early Hist. and Geog. of Br. Burma, Pt. ii. pp. 11-12, Rangoon, 1884).

Here we leave the question. It is not clear whether Prof. F. gives the story of Alompra as a historical fact, or as a probable explanation founded on the etymology. Till this be clear we cannot say that we are altogether satisfied. But the fact that we have been unable to find any occurrence of Talaing earlier than Symes's narrative is in favour of his view.

Of the relics of Talaing literature almost nothing is known. Much is to be hoped from the studies of Prof. Forchhammer himself.

There are linguistic reasons for connecting the Talaing or Mun people with the so-called Kolarian tribes of the interior of India, but the point is not yet a settled one. [Mr. Baines notes coincidences between the Mon and Munda languages, and accepts the connection of Talaing with Telinga (Census Report, 1891, i. p. 128).]

1795.—"The present King of the Birmans ... has abrogated some severe penal laws imposed by his predecessors on the Taliens, or native Peguers. Justice is now impartially distributed, and the only distinction at present between a Birman and a Talien, consists in the exclusion of the latter from places of public trust and power."—Symes, 183.

TALAPOIN, s. A word used by the Portuguese, and after them by French and other Continental writers, as well as by some English travellers of the 17th century, to designate the Buddhist monks of Ceylon and the Indo-Chinese countries. The origin of the expression is obscure. Monseigneur Fallegin, in his Desc. du Royaume Thaï ou Siam (ii. 23) says: "Les Européens les ont appelés talapoin, probablement du nom de l'éventail qu'ils tiennent à la main, lequel s'appelle talapet, qui signifie feuille de palmier." Childers gives Talapannam, Pali, 'a leaf used in writing, &c.' This at first sight seems to have nothing to support it except similarity of sound; but the quotations from Pinto throw some possible light, and afford probability to this origin, which is also accepted by TALAPOIN.

1818.—"A certain priest or Talapoin conceived an inordinate affection for a garment of an elegant shape, which he possessed, and which he diligently preserved to prevent its wearing out. He died without correcting his irregular affection, and immediately becoming a louse, took up his abode in his favourite garment."—Sangermano, p. 20.

1880.—"The Phongyes (Poonges), or Buddhist Monks, sometimes called Talapoins, a name given to them, and introduced into Europe by the Portuguese, from their carrying a fan formed of tala-pat, or palm-leaves."—Sayy. Rev., Feb. 21, p. 266, quoting Bp. Bigandet.

TALEE, s. Tam. tãli. A small trinket of gold which is fastened by a string round the neck of a married woman in S. India. It may be a curious question whether the word may not be an adaptation from the Ar. tahli, "qui signifie proprement: prononcer la formule la ïlaha ïllah ïllâk..." Cette formule, écrite sur un morceau de papier, servait d'amulet... le tout était renfermé dans un étui auquel on donnât le nom de tahli (Dozy & Engelmann, 346).

These Mahomedan tahlis were worn by a band, and were the origin of the Span. word tæli, 'a baldrick.' [But the talee is a Hindu, not a Mahomedan ornament, and there seems no

TALIPOT.

TALIPOT, TARRYAR. 892

The doubt that it takes its name from Skt. tala, 'the palmrya' (see TALIPOT), it being the original practice for women to wear this leaf dipped in saffron-water (Mad. Gloss, s.v. Logan, Malabar, i. 134).] The Indian word appears to occur first in Abraham Rogerius, but the custom is alluded to by early writers, e.g. Gouvea, Symodo, f. 43v.

1651.—"So the Bridegroom takes this Tali, and ties it round the neck of his bride."—Rogerius, 45.

1672.—"Among some of the Christians there is also an evil custom, that they for the greater tightening and fast-making of the marriage bond, allow the Bridegroom to tie a Tali or little band round the Bride's neck; although in my time this was as much as possible denounced, seeing that it is a custom derived from Heathenism."—Baldaeus, Zeylon (German), 408.

1674.—"The bridegroom attaches to the neck of the bride a line from which hang three little pieces of gold in honour of the three gods; and this they call Tale; and it is the sign of being a married woman."—Faria y Savia, Asia Port., ii. 707.

1704.—"Praeterea, quom moris hujus Regionis sit ut infantes sex vel septem annorum, interdum etiam in teneriori actate, ex genitorum consensu, matrimonium indissolubile de praesenti contrahant, per impositionem Tali, seu aureae tesserae nuptialis, uxorissi collo pensillis: missionarii mandamus ne hujusmodi irrita matrimonia inter Christianos fieri permittant."—Decree of Card. Tournon, in Norbert, Mem. Hist. i. 155.

1726.—"And on the betrothal day the Tale, or bride's betrothal band, is tied round her neck by the Brahman . . . and this she must not untie in her husband's life."—Valentijn, Chora. 51.

[1813.—". . . the tali, which is a ribbon with a gold head hanging to it, is held ready; and, being shown to the company, some prayers and blessings are pronounced; after which the bridegroom takes it, and hangs it about the bride's neck."—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 312.]

TALIPOT, TARRYAR, s. A watchman (S. India). Tam. talayyari, [from tala, 'head,' a chief watchman].

1680.—"The Peons and Tarryars sent in quest of two soldiers who had deserted . . . returned with answer that they could show light of them, whereupon the Peons were turned out of service, but upon Verona's intercession were taken in again and fined each one month's pay, and to repay the money paid them for Battee (see BATTA); also the Pedda Naigu was fined in like manner for his Tarryars."—Fort St. Geo. Cons., Feb. 10. In Notes and Ets., Madras, 1873, No. III. p. 3.

1693.—"Taliers and Peons appointed to watch the Black Town . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 267.

1707.—"Resolving to march 250 soldiers, 200 taliars, and 200 peons."—Ibid. ii. 74.

[1800.—"In every village a particular officer, called Taliiari, keeps watch at night, and is answerable for all that may be stolen."—Buchanan, Myore, i. 5.]

TALIPOT, s. The great-leaved fan-palm of S. India and Ceylon, Corypha umbraculifera, L. The name, from Skt. tala-pattra, Hind. talpat, 'leaf of the tala tree,' properly applies to the leaf of such a tree, or to the smaller leaf of the palmrya (Borassus flabeliformis), used for many purposes, e.g. for slips to write on, to make fans and umbrellas, &c. See OLLAH, PALMYRA, TALAPOIN. Sometimes we find the word used for an umbrella, but this is not common. The quotation from Jordamus, though using no name, refers to this tree. [Arrian says: "These trees were called in Indian speech tala, and there grew on them, as there grows at the tops of the palm-trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool" (Indika, vii.).]

c. 1328.—"In this India are certain trees which have leaves so big that five or six men can very well stand under the shade of one of them."—Fr. Jordamus, 29-30.

c. 1430.—"These leaves are used in this country for writing upon instead of paper, and in rainy weather are carried on the head as a covering, to keep off the wet. Three or four persons travelling together can be covered by one of these leaves stretched out." And again: "There is also a tree called tal, the leaves of which are extremely large, and upon which they write."—N. Conti, in India in the XV. Cent., 7 and 13.

1672.—"Talpets or sunshades."—Baldaeus, Dutch ed., 102.

1681.—"There are three other trees that must not be omitted. The first is Taliapot . . ."—Knox, 15.

"They (the priests) have the honour of carrying the Taliapot with the broad end over their heads foremost; which none but the King does."—Ibid. 74. [See TALAPOIN.]

1803.—"The talipot tree . . . affords a prodigious leaf, impenetrable to sun or rain, and large enough to shelter ten men. It is a natural umbrella, and is of as eminent service in that country as a great-coat tree would be in this. A leaf of the talipot-tree is a tent to the soldier, a parasol to the traveller, and a book to the scholar."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3rd ed. iii. 15.
1874.—"... dans les embrasures... s'étalaient des bananiers, des talipots..."—Franz, Souvenirs d'un Canaque, ch. iv.

1881.—"The lofty head of the talipot palm... the proud queen of the tribe in Ceylon, towers above the scrub on every side. Its trunk is perfectly straight and white, like a slender marble column, and often more than 100 feet high. Each of the fans that compose the crown of leaves covers a semi-circle of from 12 to 16 feet radius, a surface of 150 to 200 square feet."—Haecckel's Visit to Ceylon, E.T. p. 129.

TALISMAN, s. This word is used by many medieval and post-medieval writers for what we should now call a moollah, or the like, a member of the Mahommedan clergy, so to call them. It is doubtless the corruption of some Ar. term, but of what it is not easy to say. Qu. talāmīzu, 'disciples, students'? [See Burton, Ar. Nights, ix. 165.] On this Prof. Robertson Smith writes: "I have got some fresh light on your Talisman.

"W. Bedwell, the father of English Arabists, in his Catalogue of the Chapters of the Turkish Alcoran, published (1615) along with the Mahommadis Imposturis, and Arabian Trudyman, has the following, from Postellus de Orbis Concordia, i. 13: 'Haec precatio (the fātīḥa) illis est communis ut nobis dominica; et ita quibusdum ad battologiam usque re- citatur ut centies idem, ut duo aut tria vocabula repetant dicendo, Al-hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah, hamdu lillah; et cetera ejus vocabula eodem modo. Idque facit in publica oratione Taalima, id est sacrificium, pro his qui negligenter orant ut aiunt, ut ea repetitione suppleat eorum erroribus... . . . Quidam medio in campo tam assidu, ut defensi consendant; alii circum-girando corpus,' etc.

"Here then we have a form without the s, and one which from the vowels seem to be tēlima, 'a very learned man.' This, owing to the influence of the guttural, would sound in modern pronunciation nearly as Taalima. At the same time tēlima is not the name of an office, and prayers on behalf of others can be undertaken by any one who receives a mandate, and is paid for them; so it is very possible that Postellus, who was an Arabic scholar, made the pointing suit his idea of the word meant, and that the real word is talāmī, a shortened form, recognised by Jawhari, and other lexicographers, of talāmīdīh, 'disciples.' That students should turn a penny by saying prayers for others is very natural." This, therefore, confirms our conjecture of the origin.

1398.—"They treated me civilly, and set me in front of their mosque during their Easter; at which mosque, on account of its being their Easter, there were assembled from divers quarters a number of their Cadini, i.e. of their bishops, and of their Talismani, i.e. of their priests."—Letter of Friar Pascal, in Cathay, &c., p. 235.

TALOOK, s. This word, Ar. ta'āluk, from root 'alak, 'to hang or depend,' has various shades of meaning in different parts of India. In S. and W. India it is the subdivision of a district, presided over as regards revenue matters by a tahseeldar. In Bengal it is applied to tracts of proprietary land, sometimes not easily distinguished from Zemindaries, and sometimes subordinate to or dependent on Zemindars. In the N.W. Prov. and Oudh the ta'aluk is an estate the profits of which are divided between different proprietors, one being su-erior, the other inferior (see TALOOK-DAR). Ta'alluk is also used in Hind.
for 'department' of administration.

1885.—"In October, 1779, the Dacca Council were greatly disturbed in their minds by the appearance amongst them of John Doe, who was then still in his prime.
One Chundermone demised to John Doe and his assigns certain lands in the pergunnah Bullera . . . whereupon George III., by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth, commanded the Sheriff of Calcutta to give John Doe possession.
At this Mr. Shakespeare burst into fury, and language which must have surprised John Doe, proposed 'that a seawell be appointed for the collection of Patparrah Talook, with directions to pay the same into Bullera cutcherry.'"—Sir J. Stephen, Nawomar and Impey, ii. 139-60. A saizkward is 'an officer specially appointed to collect the revenue of an estate, from the management of which the owner or farmer has been removed."—(Wilson).

TALOOKDĀR, s. Hind. from Pers. ta'allukdār, 'the holder of a ta'alluk' (see TALOOK) in either of the senses of that word; i.e. either a Government officer collecting the revenue of a ta'alluk (though in this sense it is probably now obsolete everywhere), or the holder of an estate so designated. The famous Talookdārs of Oudh are large landowners, possessing both villages of which they are sole proprietors, and other villages, in which there are subordinate holders, in which the Talookdar is only the superior proprietor (see Carnegie, Ku-chari Technicalities).

1769.—" . . . intemates are frequently employed by the Talookdārs to augment the concourse to their lands."—Veredel, View of Bengal, App. 233. In his Glossary he defines "Talookdar, the Zemeen-dar of a small district."

TAMARIND, s. The pod of the tree which takes its name from that product, Tamarindus indica, L., N.O.
Leguminosae. It is a tree cultivated throughout India and Burma for the sake of the acid pulp of the pod, which is laxative and cooling, forming a most refreshing drink in fever. The tree is not believed by Dr. Brandis to be indigenous in India, but is supposed to be so in tropical Africa. The origin of the name is curious. It is Ar.
tamar-ul-Hind, 'date of India,' or perhaps rather in Persian form, tamar-ti-Hindi. It is possible that the original name may have been thamar,
'fruit' of India, rather than tamar,
'date.'

1298.—"When they have taken a merchant vessel, they force the merchants to swallow a stuff called Tamarindi, mixed in sea-water, which produces a violent purging."—Marco Polo, 2nd ed., ii. 338.

1385.—'L’arbre appelé hammar, c’est daire al-tamar-al-Hindi, est un arbre sauvage qui couvre les montagnes.'— Masudi-al-Asbār, in Not. et Ext. xiii. 175.

1563.—'It is called in Malavar pathi, in Guzerat ambili, and this is the name they have among all the other people of this India; and the Arab calls it tamariindi, because tamar, as you well know, is our tamara, or, as the Castilians say, datil [i.e.
date], so that tamariindi are 'dates of India.; and this was because the Arabs could not think of a name more appropriate on account of its having stones inside, and not because either the tree or the fruit had any resemblance."—Garcia, f. 200. [Puli is the Malayal. name; ambilīti is probably Hind. imītī, Skt. anātikā, 'the tamarind'.]

c. 1580.—"In febribus verò pestilentibus, atque omnibus aliis ex putridiis, exurentibus, aquam, in qua multa copia Tamarindorum infusa fuerit cum saccharo ebibunt."—Prosper Alpinus (De Plantis Aegypt.) ed. Lugd. Bat. 1756, ii. 20.

1582.—"They have a great store of Tamarindos . . ."—Castaño de, by N.L. f. 94.

[1598.—"Tamarinde is by the Egypţiâns called Dervâlide (qu. dērâl-ayyûda, 'Our Lady's tree')."—Linschoten, Hak. Sac. ii. 121.]

1611.—"That wood which we cut for firewood did all hang traced with cobs of greene fruit (as big as a Bean-cod in England) called Tamerim; it hath a very sour taste, and by the Apothecaries is held good against the Scurvy."—N. Donston, in Purchas, i. 277.

1829.—"A singularly beautiful Tamarind tree (ever the most graceful, and amongst the most magnificent of trees). . . ."—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 93.

1857.—"The natives have a saying that sleeping beneath the 'Date of Hind' gives you fever, which you cure by sleeping under a nīm tree (Melia azelirachda), the lilac of Persia."—Burton, Sind Revisited, i. 92. The nīm (see NEEM) (pace Capt. Burton) is not the 'lilac of Persia' (see BUCKYE). The prejudice against encamping or sleeping under a tamarind tree is general in India. But, curiously, Bp. Pallegoix speaks of it as the practice of the Siamese 'to rest and play under the beneficent shade of the Tamarind.'—(Desc. du Royaume Tha ou Siam, i. 193).

TAMARIND-FISH, s. This is an excellent zest, consisting, according to Dr. Balfour, of white pomfret, cut in transverse slices, and preserved in tamarinds. The following is a note kindly given by the highest authority on Indian fish matters, Dr. Francis Day:

"My account of Tamarind fish is very short, and in my Fishes of Malabar as follows:—

"The best Tamarind fish is prepared from the Seir fish (see SEER-FISH), and from the Lates calcarifer, known as Cockup in Calcutta; and a rather inferior quality from the Polyemmus (or Roe-ball, to which genus the Mango-fish belongs), and the more common from any kind of fish. The above refers to Malabar, and more especially to Cochin. Since I wrote my Fishes of Malabar I have made many inquiries as to Tamarind fish, and found that the white pomfret, where it is taken, appears to be the best for making the preparation."

TAMBERANE, s. Malayāl, tambrānī, 'Lord; God, or King.' It is a title of honour among the Nairs, and is also assumed by Saiva monks in the Tamil countries. [The word is derived from Mal. tam, 'one's own,' purdana, 'lord.' The junior male members of the Malayāl Raja's family, until they come of age, are called Tambānī, and after that Tambrānī. The female members are similarly styled Tambattī and Tamburattī (Logan, Malabar, iii. Gloss. s.v.).]

1510.—"Dice l'altro Tamara: zoae Per Dio! L'altro responde Tamaren: zoae Per Dio!"—Varthema, ed. 1517, f. 45.

[c. 1610.—"They (the Nairs) call the King in their language Tambiraine, meaning 'God.'"—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Sac. i. 357.]

TANA, TANNA, n.p. Thāna, a town on the Island of Salsette on the strait ('River of Tana') dividing that island from the mainland and 20 m. N.E. of Bombay, and in the early Middle Ages the seat of a Hindu kingdom of the Konkan (see CONCAN), as well as a seaport of importance. It is still a small port, and is the chief town of the District which bears its name.

c. 1200.—"From Dhār southwards to the river Narbudda, nine; thence to Maharatdes . . . eighteen; thence to Konkan, of which the capital is Tana, on the seashore, twenty-five parasangs."—Al-Birānī, in Elliot, i. 60.

[c. 1150.—"Tana," miswritten Banah. See under TABASHEER.]

1298.—"Tana is a great Kingdom lying towards the West. . . There is much traffic here, and many ships and merchants frequent the place."—Marco Polo, Bk. III. ch. 27.

1321.—"After their blessed martyrdom, which occurred on the Thursday before Palm Sunday in Thana of India, I baptised about 60 persons in a certain city called Parocco, ten days' journey distant therefrom, and I have since baptised more than twenty, besides thirty-five who were baptised between Thana and Supara (Supara)."

—Letter of Friar Jordanus, in Cathay, &c., 226.

c. 1323.—"And having thus embarked I passed over in 28 days to Tana, where for the faith of Christ four of our Minor Friars had suffered martyrdom. . . . The land is under the dominion of the Saracens. . . ."

—Fr. Odoric, Ibid. i. 57-58.
1516. — "25 leagues further on the coast is a fortress of the before-named king, called Tana-Mayambu" (this is perhaps rather Bombay). — Barboza, 98.

1529. — "And because the norwest winds blew strong, winds contrary to his course, after going a little way he turned and anchored in sight of the island, where were stationed the foists with their captain-in-chief Alixa, who seeing our fleet in motion put on his ears and assembled at the River of Tana, and when the wind came round our fleet made sail, and anchored at the mouth of the River of Tana, for the wind would not allow of its entering." — Correa, i. 290.

1673. — "The Chief City of this Island is called Tanaw; in which are Seven Churches and Colleges, the chiefest one of the Paulistanos (see Paulist). . . . Here are made good Stuff of Silk and Cotton." — Fryer, 73.

TANADA, THANADA. s. A Police station. Hind. thānā, thānād, [Skt. sthāna, 'a place of standing, a post']. From the quotation following it would seem that the term originally meant a fortified post, with its garrison, for the military occupation of the country; a meaning however closely allied to the present use.

c. 1640-50. — "Thānā means a corps of cavalry, matchblockmen, and archers, stationed within an enclosure. Their duty is to guard the roads, to hold the places surrounding the Thānāh, and to despatch provisions (rasad, see Russud) to the next Thānāh." — Padishāh nāmah, quoted by Blochmann, in Atn, 1. 345.

TANADAR, THANADAR. s. The chief of a police station (see TANA), Hind. thānādar. This word was adopted in a more military sense at an early date by the Portuguese, and is still in habitual use with us in the civil sense.

1516. — In a letter of 4th Feb. 1515 (i.e. 1516), the King Don Manoel constitutes João Machado to be Tanadar and captain of land forces in Goa. — Archiv. Port. Orient. fasc. 5, 1-3.

1519. — "Senhor Duarte Pereira; this is the manner in which you will exercise your office of Tanadar of this Isle of Typhoari (i.e. Goa), which the Senhor Capitão will not encharge you with." — Ibid., p. 35.

c. 1548. — "In Agaci is a great mosque (wizyutu), which is occupied by the tenadars, but which belongs to His Highness; and certain petayas, (yards?) in which bate (paddy) is collected, which also belong to His Highness." — Tombo in Subsidios, 216.

1602. — "So all the force went aboard of the light boats, and the Governor in his bastard-galley entered the river with a grand clangour of music, and when he was in mid-channel there came to his galley a boat, in which was the Tanadar of the City (Dabul), and going aboard the galley presented himself to the Governor with much humility, and begged pardon of his offences. . . ." — Conso, IV. i. 9.

[1513. — "The third in succession was a Tañdar, or petty officer of a district. . . ." — Fortes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. ii. 5.]

TANGA. s. Mahr. ūnā, Turki tanga. A denomination of coin which has been in use over a vast extent of territory, and has varied greatly in application. It is now chiefly used in Turkestan, where it is applied to a silver coin worth about 7/3d. And Mr. W. Erskine has stated that the word tanga or tanka is of Chagatay Turki origin, being derived from hang, which in that language means ‘white’ (H. of Barber and Humayun, i. 546).

Though one must hesitate in differing from one usually so accurate, we must do so here. He refers to Josafa Barbaro, who says this, viz. that certain silver coins are called by the Mingrelians tetari, by the Greeks aspri, by the Turks akha, and by the Zagas tconj, all of which words in the respective languages signify ‘white.’ We do not however find such a word in the dictionaries of either Vambery or of Pavet de Courteille; the latter only having tangah, ‘fer-blanc.’ And the obvious derivation is the Skt. tanka, ‘a weight (of silver) equal to 4 marshas . . . a stamped coin.’ The word in the forms takā (see TUCKA) and tanga (for these are apparently identical in origin) is, “in all dialects, laxly used for money in general” (Wilson).

In the Lahore coinage of Mahmud of Ghazni, a.h. 418-419 (A.D. 1027-28), we find on the Skt. legend of the reverse the word tanka in correspondence with the dīrham of the A. obverse (see Thomas, Pathan Kings, p. 49). Tanka or Tanga seems to have continued to be the popular name of the chief silver coin of the Delhi sovereigns during the 13th and first part of the 14th centuries, a coin which was substantially the same with the rupee (q.v.) of later days. In fact this application of the word in the form takā (see TUCKA) is usual in Bengal down to our own day. Ibn Batuta indeed, who was in India in the time of Mahommed Tughlak, 1333-1343 or thereabouts, always calls the gold coin then current a tanka or dinár of gold. It was, as he repeatedly states, the equivalent of 10 silver dinârs. These silver dinârs (or rupees) are called by the author of the Masâtîk-al-Abâr (c. 1340) the "silver tanka of India." The gold and silver tanka continue to be mentioned repeatedly in the history of Pernâ Shâh, the son of Mahomed (1351-1388), and apparently with the same value as before. At a later period under Sikandar Buhlool (1488-1517), we find black (or copper) tankas, of which 20 went to the old silver tanka.

We cannot say when the coin, or its name rather, first appeared in Turkestan.

But the name was also prevalent on the western coast of India as that of a low denomination of coin, as may be seen in the quotations from Lin schothen and Grose. Indeed the name still survives in Goa as that of a copper coin equivalent to 60 reis or about 2d. And in the 16th century also 60 reis appears from the papers of Gerson da Cunha to have been the equivalent of the silver tanga of Goa and Bassein, though all the equations that he gives suggest that the rei may have been more valuable then.

The denomination is also found in Russia under the form denga. See a quotation under COPECK, and compare PARDAO.

c. 1335.—"According to what I have heard from the Shaikh Mubarak, the red tak (see LACK) contains 100,000 gold tankahs, and the white tak 100,000 (silver) tankahs. The golden tanka, called in this country the red tanka, is equivalent to three mithkâls, and the silver tanka is equivalent to 8 haakhtân dirhams, this dirham being of the same weight as the silver dirham current in Egypt and Syria."—Masâtîk-al-Abâr, in Not. et Exts. xii. 211.

c. 1340.—"Then I returned home after sunset and found the money at my house. There were 3 bags containing in all 6233 tankas, i.e. the equivalent of the 55,000 dinârs (of silver) which was the amount of my debts, and of the 12,000 which the sultan had previously ordered to be paid me, after of course deducting the tenth part according to Indian custom. The value of the piece called tanka is 2,1,0,0 dinârs in gold of Barbary."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 426. (Here the gold tanga is spoken of.)

c. 1570.—"Sultân Firoz issued several varieties of coins. There was the gold tanka, and the silver tanka," &c.—Târikk-i-Firoz Shâh, in Elliot, iii. 357.

1516.—"... a round coin like ours, and with Moorish letters on both sides, and about the size of a finn (see PANAM) of Calicut, ... and its worth 55 maravedis; they call these tanga, and they are of very fine silver."—Barbosa, 45.

[1519.—Rules regulating ferry-dues at Goa: "they may demand for this one tangna only."—Archiv. Port. Orient. f. 5, p. 18.]

c. 1541.—"Todar ... fixed first a golden askra (see ASHRAFEE) as the enormous remuneration for one stone, which induced the thakrars to flock to him in such numbers that afterwards a stone was paid with a rupee, and this pay gradually fell to 5 tankas, till the fortress (Rohats) was completed."—Târik-k-i-Khân-Jahân Lodî, in Elliot, v. 115. (These are the Bahlîli or Sikandari tankas of copper, as are also those in the next quotation from Elliot.)

1559.—"The old Muscovite money is not round but oblong or egg-shaped, and is called denga. ... 100 of these coins make a Hungarian gold-piece; 6 dengas make an altîn; 50 a grafa; 100 a poltis; and 200 a jubel. Herwsten, in Remanist, ii. f. 156v.

1571.—"Gujarati tankehahs at 100 tankchahs to the rupee. At the present time the rupee is fixed at 40 danh. ... As the current value of the tankchah of Pattan, etc., was less than that of Gujarât."—Miral-i-Ahmadi, in Bâgley, Gujarât, pp. 6, 11.

[1591.—"Dingoes." See under RUBLE.]

1592-3.—"At the present time, namely, A.H. 1002, Hindustan contains 3200 towns, and upon each town are dependent 200, 500, 1000, or 1500 villages. The whole yields a revenue of 640 kroa (see CRORE) in gold tankas."—Tabâkât-i-Akhbâr, in Elliot, v. 186.

1598.—"There is also a kind of reckoning of money which is called Tangas, not that there is any such coin, but are so named only in telling. Five Tangas is one Parado (see PARDAO), or Xeraphin badde money, for you must understand that in telling they have two kinds of money, good and badde, for four Tangas good money are as much as five Tangas badde money."—Linschoten, ch. 32; [Hak. Soc. ii. 241.]

E. I. C. and the Rajah of Bootan, in Auchtison's Treaties, i. 144.

"... we were provided with two tængun ponies of a mean appearance, and were prejudiced against them unjustly. On better acquaintance they turned out patient, sure-footed, and could climb the Monument."—Booth's Narrative, in Markham, 17.

1780.—"... had purchased 35 Jhawah or young elephants, of 8 or 9 years old, 60 Tængun, or ponies of Manilla and Pegu."—H. of Hydar Nakh, 383.

"... small horses brought from the mountains on the eastern side of Bengal. These horses are called tanyans, and are mostly pyeald."—Hodges, Travels, 31.

1782.—"To be sold, a Phaeton, in good condition, with a pair of young Tanyan Horses, well broke."—India Gazette, Oct. 26.

1793.—"As to the Tunguns or Tanyans, so much esteemed in India for their hardiness, they come entirely from the Upper Tibet, and notwithstanding their make, are so sure footed that the people of Nepaul ride them without fear over very steep mountains, and along the brink of the deepest precipices."—Kirkpatrick's Nepaul, 135.

1854.—"These animals, called Tanyan, are wonderfully strong and enduring; they are never shod, and the hoof often cracks. ... The Tibetans give the feasts of value messes of pig's blood and raw liver, which they devour greedily, and it is said to strengthen them wonderfully; the custom is, I believe, general in Central Asia."—Hooker, Himalayan Journals, 1st ed. ii. 131.

[1816.—"The Tanjore Pill, it is said, is made use of with great success in India against the bite of mad dogs, and that of the most venomous serpents."—Asiatic Journal, ii. 381.]

TANK, s. A reservoir, an artificial pond or lake, made either by excavation or by damming. This is one of those perplexing words which seem to have a double origin, in this case one Indian, the other European.

As regards what appears to be the Indian word, Shakespeare gives: "Tænkē (in Guzerat), an underground reservoir for water." [And so Platts.] Wilson gives: "Tænken or tæken, Mahr... Tænhā (said to be Guzerā-thī)." A reservoir of water, an artificial pond, commonly known to Europeans in India as a Tank. Tænni, Guz. A reservoir of water; a small well." R. Drummond, in his Illustrations of Guzerattee, &c., gives: "Tænka (Mah.) and Tankoo (Guz.) Reservoirs, constructed of stone or brick or lime, of larger and lesser size, generally inside houses... They are almost entirely covered at top, having but a small aperture to let a pot or bucket down."... "In the towns of Bikaner," says Tod, "most families have large cisterns or reservoirs called Tænkas, filled by the rains" (Rajputana, ii. 203). Again, speaking of towns in the desert of Māwarz, he says; "they collect the rain water in reservoirs called Tanka, which they are obliged to use sparingly, as it is said to produce night blindness" (ii. 300). Again, Dr. Spilsbury (J.A.S.B. ix. pt. 2, 891), describing a journey in the Nerbuda Basin, cites the word, and notes: "I first heard this word used by a native in the Betoul district; on asking him if at the top of Bouvergurth there was any spring, he said No, but there was a Tanka or place made of pukka (stone and cement) for holding water." Once more, in an Appendix to the Report of the Survey of India for 1881-1882, Mr. G. A. MacGill, speaking of the rain cisterns in the driest part of Rajputana, says: "These cisterns or wells are called by the people támkás" (App. p. 12). See also quotation below from a Report by Major Strahan. It is not easy to doubt the genuineness of the word, which may possibly be from Skt. tādaga, tatāga, tatṭaka, "a pond, pool, or tank." Fr. Paolino, on the other hand, says the word tanku used by the Portuguese in India was Portoghesa corrotta, which is vague. But in fact tanku is a word which appears in all Portuguese dictionaries, and which is used by authors so early after the opening of communication with India (we do not know if there is an instance actually earlier) that we can hardly conceive it to have been borrowed from an Indian language, nor indeed it have been borrowed from Guzerat and Rajputāna, to which the quotations above ascribe the vernacular word. This Portuguese word best suits, and accounts for that application of tank to large sheets of water which is habitual in India. The indigenous Guzerati and Mahmatti word seems to belong rather to what we now call a tank in England; i.e. a small reservoir for a house or ship. Indeed the Port. tanku is no doubt a form of the Lat. stagnum, which gives It. stagna, Fr. old estang and estan, mod. étang, Sp. estanque, a word which we have also in old English and in Lowland Scotch, thus:

1589.—"They had in them stanges or pondes of water full of fish of sundrie sortes."—Parkes's Mendoza, Hak. Soc. ii. 46.

c. 1785.—"I never drank the Muses' stank, Castalia's burn and a' that; But there it streams, and richly reams, My Helicon I ca' that."—Burns.

It will be seen that Pyrard de Laval uses estang, as if specifically, for the tank of India.

1498.—"And many other saints were there painted on the walls of the church, and these wore diadems, and their portraiture was in a divers kind, for their teeth were so great that they stood an inch beyond the mouth, and every saint had 4 or 5 arms, and below the church stood a great tanque wrought in cut stone like many others that we had seen by the way."—Roteiro de Vasco da Gama, 57.

"So the Captain Major ordered Nicolas Coelho to go in an armed boat, and see where the water was, and he found in the said island (Anchediva) a building, a church of great ashlar work which had been destroyed by the Moors, as the country people said, only the chapel had been covered with straw, and they used to make their prayers to three black stones which stood in the midst of the body of the chapel. Moreover they found just beyond the church a tanque of wrought ashlar in which we took as much water as we wanted; and at the top of the whole island stood a great tanque of the depth of 4 fathoms, and moreover we found in front of the church a beach where we careened the ship Berrio."—Ibid. 95.

1510. —"Early in the morning these Pagans go to wash at a tank, which tank is a pond of still water (—id una Tancho il qual Tancho è una fossa d'acqua morta)."—Varthema, 149.

"Near to Calicut there is a temple in the midst of a tank, that is, in the middle of a pond of water."—Ibid. 175.

1553.—"In this place where the King (Bahadur Shāh) established his line of battle, on one side there was a great river, and on the other a tank (tanque) of water, such as they are used to make in those parts. For as there are few streams to collect the winter's waters, they make these tanks (which might be more properly called lakes), all lined with stone. They are so big that many are more than a league in compass."—Barros, IV. vi. 5.

c. 1610.—"Son logis estoit éloigné près d'une lieue du palais Royal, situé sur un estang, et basty de pierres, ayant bien demy lieue de tour, comme rous les autres estangs."—Pyrard de Laval, ed. 1679, i. 262; [Hak. Soc. i. 367].

[1615.—"I rode early ... to the tancke to take the ayre."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. i. 78.]

1616.—"Besides their Rivers ... they have many Ponds, which they call Tankes."—Terry, in Purchas, ii. 1470.

1638.—"A very faire Tanke, which is a square pit paved with gray marble."—W. Bruton, in Hakl. v. 50.

1648.—"... a standing water or Tanck. ..."—Van Twiet, Gen. Beachr. 11.

1672.—"Outside and round about Suratte, there are elegant and delightful houses for recreation, and stately cemeteries in the usual fashion of the Moors, and also divers Tanks and reservoirs built of hard and solid stone."—Baldwin, p. 12.

1673.—"Within a square Court, to which a stately Gate-house makes a Passage, in the middle whereof a Tank vaulted. . . ."—Frer, 27.

1754.—"The post in which the party intended to halt had formerly been one of those reservoirs of water called tanks, which occur so frequently in the arid plains of this country."—Orme, i. 354.

1799.—"One crop under a tank in Mysore or the Carnatic yields more than three here."
—T. Muir, in Life, i. 241.

1809.—"Water so cool and clear, the peasants drink not from the humble well.

Nor tanks of costliest masonry dispense to those in towns who dwell, the work of kings in their beneficence."—Kehama, xiii. 6.

1883.—"... all through sheets* 124, 125, 126, and 131, the only drinking water is from 'tanks,' or from 'tota.' The former are circular pits puddled with clay, and covered in with wattle and daub domes, in the top of which are small trap doors, which are kept locked; in these the villages store rain-water; the latter are small and somewhat deep ponds dug in the valleys where the soil is clayey, and are filled by the rain; these latter of course do not last long, and then the inhabitants are entirely dependent on their tanks, whilst their cattle migrate to places where the well-water is fit for use."—Report on Cent. Ind. and Rajputana Topogr. Survey (Bicknere and Jeysulmeer). By Major C. Strochan, R.E., in Report of the Survey in India, 1882-83, App. p. 4. [The writer in the Rajputana Gazetteer (Bikanir) (i. 182) calls these covered pits kund, and the simple excavations sār.]

TANOR, n.p. An ancient town and port about 22 miles south of Calicut. There is a considerable probability that it was the Tyndis of the Periplus. It was a small kingdom at the arrival of the Portuguese, in partial subjection to the Zamorin. [The name is Malayal. Tānūr, tannūr, the tree Terminalis bellerica, är, village.]

1516.—"Further on . . . are two places of Moors 5 leagues from one another. One is called Paravanor, and the other Tanor, and inland from these towns is a lord to whom they belong; and he has many Nairs, and sometimes he rebels against the King of Calicut. In these towns there is much shipping and trade, for these Moors are great merchants."—Barboza, Hak. Soc. 153.

1521.—"Cotate was a great man among the Moors, very rich, and lord of Tanor, who carried on a great sea-trade with many ships, which trafficked all about the coast of India with passes from our Governors, for he only dealt in wares of the country; and thus he was the greatest possible friend of the Portuguese, and those who went to his dwelling were entertained with the greatest honour, as if they had been his brothers. In fact for this purpose he kept houses fitted up, and both cots and bedsteads furnished in our fashion, with tables and chairs and casks of wine, with which he regaled our people, giving them entertainments and banquets, insomuch that it seemed as if he were going to become a Christian. . . ."—Correa, ii. 979.

1528.—"And in the year (A.H.) 935, a ship belonging to the Franks was wrecked off Tanor. . . . Now the Ray of that place afforded aid to the crew, the Zamorin sent a messenger to him demanding of him the surrender of the Franks who composed it, together with such parts of the cargo of the ship as had been saved, but that cheiftain having refused compliance with this demand, a treaty of peace was entered into with the Franks by him; and from this time the subjects of the Ray of Tanor traded under the protection of the passes of the Franks."—Tahfut-ul-Mujahidin, B.T. 124-125.

1558.—"For Lopo Soares having arrived at Cochin after his victory over the Çamorin, two days later the King of Tanor, the latter's vassal, sent (to Lopo) to complain against the Çamorin by ambassadors, begging for peace and help against him, having fallen out with him for reasons that touched the service of the King of Portugal."—Barros, i. 7. 10.

1727.—"Four leagues more southerly is Tannor, a Town of small Trade, inhabited by Mahometans."—A. Hamilton, i. 322; [ed. 1474].

TAPPAUL, s. The word used in S. India for 'post,' in all the senses in which dawk (q.v.) is used in Northern India. Its origin is obscure. C. P. Brown suggests connection with the Fr. étape (which is the same originally as the Eng. staple). It is sometimes found in the end of the 18th century written toppa or tappy. But this seems to have been derived from Telugu clerks, who sometimes write toppa as a singular of toppalu, taking the latter for a plural (C.F.B.). Wilson appears to give the word a southern origin. But though its use is confined to the South and West, Mr. Beames assigns to it an Aryan origin: "toppa 'post-office,' i.e. place where letters are stamped, tappal 'letter-post' (tappal + alpa = 'stamping-house'), connecting it radically with tāpā 'a coop', tāmā 'to tap', tātt 'flattens', tāl 'heat down', tapak 'a sledge hammer', tapanā 'to press', &c. [with which Platts agrees.]

1799.—"You will perceive that we have but a small chance of establishing the tappal to Poomah."—Wellington, i. 50.

1800.—"The Tappal does not go 30 miles a day."—T. Munro, in Life, i. 214.

1809.—"Requiring only two sets of bearers I knew I might go by tappal the whole way to Seringapatam."—Ed. Valentia, i. 385.

TAPTEE R., n.p. Tādī; also called Tāpī. [Skt. Tāpī, 'that which is hot',]. The river that runs by the city of Surat.

[1538.—"Tapi." See under GODAVARY.]

c. 1630.—"Swat is . . . watered with a sweet River named Tāppee (or Tidn), as broad as the Thames at Windsor."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1638, p. 36.

1813.—"The sacred groves of Pulpara are the general resort for all the Yogeeta (Jogeet), Senasssexes (Sunnyasset), and Hindoo pilgrims . . . the whole district is holy, and the Tapppee in that part has more than common sanctity."—Forbes, Or. Mem. i. 280; [2nd ed. i. 184, and compare i. 170].

"Tappe or Taptty."—Ibid. 244; [2nd ed. i. 146].

TARA, TARE, s. The name of a small silver coin current in S. India at the time of the arrival of the Portuguese. It seems to have survived longest in Calicut. The origin we have not traced. It is curious that the commonest silver coin in Sicily down to 1860, and worth about 43d, was a tari, generally considered to be a corruption of dirhem. I see Sir Walter Elliot has mooted this very question in his Coins of S. India (p. 138). [The word is certainly Malayal. tāram, defined in the Madras Gloss. as "a copper coin, value ½ piq." Mr. Gray in his note to the passage from Pyrard de Laval quoted below, suggests that it took its name from tāra, 'a star'.]

1412.—"They cast (at Vijayanagar), in pure silver a coin which is the sixth of the fanum, which they call tar."—Abdurrazak, in India in the XIV. Cent. 26.

1506.—(The Vicery, D. Francisco D'Almeida, wintering his fleet in Cochin. "As the people were numerous they made quite a big town with a number of houses covered with upper stories of timber, and streets also where the people of the country set up their stalls in which they sold plenty of victuals, and cheap. Thus for a vinten of silver you get in change 20 silver coins that they called taras, something like the scale of a sardine, and for such coin they gave you 12 or 15 targs, or 4 or 5 eggs, and for a single vinten 3 or 4 owls, and for one tara fish enough to fill two men's bellies, or rice enough for a day's victuals, dinner and supper too. Bread there was none, for there was no wheat except in the territory of the Moors."—Correa, i. 624.

1510.—The King of Narsinga (or Vija-yanagar) "coins a silver money called tare, and others of gold, twenty of which go to a pardao, and are called fanom. And of those small ones of silver, there go 16 to a fanom."—Vardeyga, 130.

[tc. 1610.—"Each man receives four tarenta, which is a small silver coin, each of the value of one-sixteenth of a larin."—Pyrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 344. Later on (i. 412) he says "16 tares go to a Phanan"].

1673.—(at Calicut). "Their coin admits no Copper; Silver Tars, 28 of which make a Fanam, passing instead thereof."—Fryer, 55.

*T "Calicut.

"Tars are the peculiar Coin, the rest are common to India."—Ibid. 297.

1727.—"Calicut . . . coins are 10, Tar to a Fanam, 4½ Panamas to a Rupee."—A. Hamilton, ii. 315; [ed. 1744].

1737.—"We are to allow each man 4 measures of rice and 1 tar per diem."—Agreement in Logan, Matabar, iii. 95, and see "tars" in iii. 192. Mr. Logan (vol. iii. Gloss. s.v.) defines the tara as equal to 2 pies.

TARE AND TRET. Whence comes this odd firm in the books of arithmetic? Both partners apparently through Italy. The first Fr. tare, It. tara, from Ar. tarafja, 'to reject,' as pointed out by Dozy. Tret is alleged to be from It. tritate, 'to crumble or grind, perhaps rather from trito, 'ground or triturated.' [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) derives it from Fr. truite, 'a draught,' and that from Lat. tractus, trahere, 'to draw']

TAREGA, s. This represents a word for a broker (or person analogous to the hong merchants of Canton in former days) in P eru, in the days of its prosperity. The word is from S. India. We have in Tel. taraga, 'the occupation of a broker'; Tam. taragari, 'a broker.'

1568.—"Sono in Pegu otto sensali del Re che si chiamano Tarege li quali sono TARIFF, s. This comes from Ar. tārīf, tarīfa, 'the making known.' Dozy states that it appears to be comparatively modern in Spanish and Port., and has come into Europe apparently through Italian.

[1591.]—"So that helping your memory with certain Tablei or Tarifas made of purpose to know the numbers of the soldiery that are to enter into ranke."—Garrard, Art Warre, p. 224 (Stow's Dict.).

[1617.]—"... a brief Tareg of Persia."—Birdwood, First Letter Book, 462.

TAROUK, TAROUP, n.p. Burm. Taruk, Tarup. This is the name given by the Burmese to the Chinese. Thus a point a little above the Delta of the Irrawadi, where the invading army of Kublai Khan (c. 1285) is said to have turned back, is called Taruk-mau, or Chinese Point. But the use of this name, according to Sir A. Phayre, dates only from the Middle Ages, and the invasion just mentioned. Before that the Chinese, as we understand him, are properly termed Tsin; though the coupled names Taruk and Taret, which are applied in the chronicles to early invaders, "may be considered as designations incorrectly applied by later copyists." And Sir A. Phayre thinks Taruk is a form of Türk, whilst Taret is now applied to the Manchus. It seems to us probable that Taruk and Taret are probably meant for 'Turk and Tartar' (see H. of Burma, pp. 8, 11, 56). [Mr. Scott (Upper Burma Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 193) suggests a connection with the Teru or Tero State, which developed about the 11th century, the race having been expelled from China in 778 A.D.]

TASHREEF, s. This is the Ar. tashrif, 'honouring'; and thus "confering honour upon anyone, as by paying him a visit, presenting a dress of honour, or any complimentary donation." (Wilson). In Northern India the general use of the word is as one of ceremonious politeness in speaking of a visit from a superior or from one who is treated in politeness as a superior; when such an one is invited to 'bring his tashrif,' i.e. 'to carry the honour of his presence,' 'to descend to visit'—. The word always implies superiority on the part of him to whom tashrif is attributed. It is constantly used by polite natives in addressing Europeans. But when the European in return says (as we have heard said, through ignorance of the real meaning of the phrase), 'I will bring my tashrif,' the effect is ludicrous in the extreme, though no native will betray his amusement. In S. India the word seems to be used for the dress of honour conferred, and in the old Madras records, rightly or wrongly, for any complimentary present, in fact a honorarium. Thus in Wheeler we find the following:

1674.—"He (Lingapa, naik of Poona-malee) had, he said, carried a tasheriff to the English, and they had refused to take it..."—Op. cit. i. 84.

1680.—"It being necessary to appoint one as the Company's Chief Merchant (Verona being deceased), resolved Bern Pedda Vincatadry, do succeed and the Tashersifs be given to him and the rest of the principal Merchants, viz., 3 yards Scarlet to Pedda Vincatadry, and 2½ yards each to four others..." The Governor being informed that Verona's young daughter was melancholy and would not eat because her husband had received no Tasheriff, he also is Tasherifd with 2½ yards Scarlet cloth."—Fort St. Geo. Consns., April 6. In Notes and Exts., Madras, 1873, p. 15.

1685.—"Gopall Pundit having been at great charge in coming hither with such a numerous retinue... that we may engage him... to continue his friendship, to attain some more and better privileges there (at Cuddalore) than we have as yet— It is ordered that he with his attendants be Tasherifd as followeth" (a list of presents follows).—In Wheeler, i. 148. [And see the same phrase in Pringle, Diary, &c., i. 1]

TATTOO, and abbreviated, TAT, s. A native-bred pony. Hind. tattā, [which Platts connects with Skt. tāra, 'passing over'].

c. 1324.—"Tughlak sent his son Mahommed to bring Khurā' back. Mahommed seized the latter and brought him to his father mounted on a 타투, i.e. a pack-horse."—Ibn Battuta, iii. 207.

1784.—"On their arrival at the Choultry they found a miserable dooley and 15 tattoo horses."—In Seton-Karr, i. 15.

1785.—"We also direct that strict injunctions be given to the baggage department, for sending all the lean Tatoos, bullocks, &c., to grass, the rainy season being now at hand."—Tippoo's Letters, 105.

1504.—"They can be got for 25 rupees each horseman upon an average; but, I believe, when they receive only this sum they must tattoo... From 30 to 35 rupees each horse is the sum paid to the best horsemen."—Wellington, i. 174.

1808.—"These tattoos are a breed of small ponies, and are the most useful and hardy little animals in India."—Broughton's Letters, 156; [ed. 1892, 117].

1810.—"Every servant... goes share in some tattoo... which conveys his luggage."—Williamson, V. M. i. 311.

1824.—"Tattoos. These are a kind of small, cat-hammed, and ill-looking ponies; but they are hardy and walk faster than oxen."—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. ii.

1826.—"... when mounted on my tattoo, or pony, I could at any time have commanded the attendance of a dozen grooms, so many pressed forward to offer me their services."—Pandurang Hori, 21; [ed. 1853, i. 29].

[1830.—"Mounting our tats, we were on the point of proceeding homewards..."

—Oriental Sport, Mag., ed. 1873, i. 487.]

c. 1831.—"... non tattu est fort au dessous de la taille d'un arabe..."—Jacquemont, Correspond. i. 347.

c. 1840.

"With its bright brass patent axles, and its little hog-hamned tattoo,
And its ever jetty harness, which was always made by Watts..."

_A few lines in honour of the late Mr. Simms, in Parker's Bole Ponjis,* 1831, ii. 215.

1853.—"... Smith's plucky proposal to run his notable tatt, Pickles."—Oakfield, i. 94.

1875.—"You young Gentlemen rode over on your tats, I suppose? The Subaltern's tat—that is the name, you know, they give to a pony in this country—is the most useful animal you can imagine."—The Dilemma, ch. ii.

TATTY, s. Hind. taṭṭi and ṭaṭ, [which Platts connects with Skt. tātra, 'a thread, the warp in a loom']. A screen or mat made of the roots of fragrant grass (see CUSCUS with which door or window openings are filled up in the season of hot winds. The screens being kept wet, their fragrant evaporation as the dry winds blow upon them cools and refreshes the house greatly, but they are only efficient when such winds are blowing. See also THERMANIDOTE. The principle of the tatty is involved in the quotation from Dr. Fryer, though he does not mention the grass-mats.

c. 1665.—"... or having in lieu of Cellarage certain Kus-Konas, that is, little Houses of Straw, or rather of odoriferous Roots, that are very nastily made, and commonly placed in the midst of a Parterre... that so the Servants may easily with their Pompin - bottles, water them from without."—Bernier, E.T. 79; [ed. Constable], 247.

1673.—"They keep close all day for 3 or 4 Months together... repelling the Heat by a coarse wet Cloth, continually hanging before the chamber-windows."—Fryer, 47.

[1789.—The introduction of tatties into Calcutta is mentioned in a letter from Dr. Campbell, dated May 10, 1789.—"We have had very hot winds and delightful cool houses. Everybody uses tatties now... Tatties are however dangerous when you are obliged to leave them and go abroad, the heat acts so powerfully on the body that you are commonly affected with a severe catarrh."—

In Carey, Good Old Days, i. 80.]

1808.—"... now, when the hot winds have set in, and we are obliged to make use of tatties, a kind of screens made of the roots of a coarse grass called Kus."—

Broughton's Letters, 110; [ed. 1892, p. 83].

1809.—"Our style of architecture is by no means adapted to the climate, and the large windows would be insufferable, were it not for the tatties which are easily applied to a house one story high."—Ed. Valenta, i. 191.

1810.—"During the hot winds tatt (a kind of mat), made of the root of the koosa grass, which has an agreeable smell, are placed against the doors and windows."—

Maria Graham, 125.

1814.—"Under the roof, throughout all the apartments, are iron rings, from which the tatties or screens of sweet scented grass, were suspended."—Forbes, Or. Mem., iv. 6; [2nd ed. ii. 392].

1828.—"An early breakfast was over; the well watered tatties were applied to the windows, and diffused through the apartment a cool and refreshing atmosphere which was most comfortably contrasted with the white heat and roar of the fierce wind without."—The Kuzzilbash, i. 2ii.

c. 1810.—"... in this district (Dinajpoor) large quantities of this cloth (Tat or Choti) are made..."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 851.

1820.—"... made into coarse cloth taut, by the Brinjaries and people who...
TAVOY, n.p. A town and district of what we call the Tenasserim Province of E. Burma. The Burmese call it Dha-ve; but our name is probably adopted from a Malay form. The original name is supposed to be Siam-ese. [The Burmah Gazetteer (ii. 681) gives the choice of three etymologies: 'landing-place of bamboo'; from its arms (dha, 'a sword,' way, 'to buy'); from Hwa-way, taken from a cross-legged Buddha.]

1553.—"The greater part of this tract is mountainous, and inhabited by the nation of Brannmès and Jangomas, who interpose on the east of this kingdom (Pegu) between it and the great kingdom of Siam; which kingdom of Siam borders the sea from the city of Tayav downwards."—Borros, III. i. 4.

1583.—"Also some of the rich people in a place subject to the Kingdom of Pegu, called Tavae, where is produced a quantity of what they call in their language Calain, but which in our language is called Caloa (see CALAY), in summer leave their houses and go into the country, where they make some sheds to cover them, and there they stop three months, leaving their usual dwellings with food in them for the devil, and this they do in order that in the other nine months he may give them no trouble, but rather be propitious and favourable to them."—G. Balsi, t. 125.

1587.—"... Island of Tavi, from which cometh great store of Tinne which serveth all India."—R. Fitch, in Hakl. ii. 395.

1695.—"10th. That your Majesty, of your wonted favour and charity to all distresses, would be pleased to look with Eyes of Pity, upon the poor English Captive, Thomas Bracue, who is the only one surviving of four that were accidentally drove into Taowvy by storm, as they were going for Atcheen about 10 years ago, in the service of the English Company."—Petition to the King of Burma, presented at Ava by Edward Fleetwood, in Dalrymple, Or. Reprt. ii. 574.

TAWEEZ, s. Ar. ta'wiz, lit. 'praying for protection by invoking God, or by uttering a charm'; then 'an amulet or phylactery'; and, as in the quotation from Herklot's, 'a structure of brick or stone-work over a tomb.'

1806.—"Let her who doth this Taweez wear, Guard against the Gossein's snare."—Pundwrang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 148.

1832.—"The generality of people have tombs made of mud or stone... forming first three square taweezes or platforms..."—Herklots, Qanoon-e-Islam, 2nd ed. 284.]

[TAZEE, s. Pers. tāzī, 'invading, invader,' from tāz, 'running.' A favourite variety of horse, usually of Indian breed. The word is also used of a variety of greyhound.

[c. 1590.—"Horses have been divided into seven classes... Arabs, Persian horses, Mughannas, Turkhii horses, Yabus (see YABOO) and Jungah horses... The last two classes are also mostly Indian breed. The best kind is called Tāzī. ..."]—Jin. i. 234-5.

1839.—"A good breed of the Indian kind, called Tazeez, is also found in Bunnoo and Damaun..."—Elphinstone, Cautul. ed. 1842, i. 189.

1853.—"The 'Tazees,' or greyhounds are not looked upon as unclean..."—Wills, Modern Persia, ed. 1891, p. 306.]

TAZEEA, n. A.—P.—H. ta'zā, 'mourning for the dead.' In India the word is applied to the taboot, or representations, in flimsy material, of the tombs of Hussein and Hassan which are carried about in the Muharram (see MOHURRUM) processions. In Persia it seems to be applied to the whole of the mystery-play which is presented at that season. At the close of the procession the tāzīyas must be thrown into water; if there be no sufficient mass of water they should be buried. [See Sir L. Pelly, The Miracle Play of Hasan and Husain.] The word has been carried to the W. Indies by the coolies, whose great festival (whether they be Mahomedans or Hindus) the Muharram has become. And the attempt to carry the Tazees through one of the towns of Trinidad, in spite of orders to the contrary, led in the end of 1884 to a sad catastrophe. [Mahomedean Lascars have an annual celebration at the London Docks.]

1809.—"There were more than a hundred Taziys, each followed by a long train of Fuqueers, dressed in the most extravagant manner, beating their breasts... such of the Mahatta Surdars as are not Brahmins frequently construct Taziys at their own tents, and expend large sums of money upon them."—Broughton, Letters, 72; [ed. 1892, 55].
1869. — "En lisant la description... de ces fêtes on croira souvent qu'il s'agit de fêtes hindoues. Telle est par exemple la solennité du ta'zia ou deval, établie en commémoration du martyre de Húcaín, laquelle est semblable en bien de points à celle du Durga-puja. Le ta'ziya dure dix jours comme le Durga-puja. La dixième jour, les Hindous précipitent dans la rivière la statue de la déesse au milieu d'une foule immense, avec un grand appareil et au son de mille instruments de musique; la même chose a lieu pour les représentations du tombeau de Húcaín."—Garcin de Tasse, Rel. Masuln. p. 11.

TEA.

Crawfurd alleges that we got this word in its various European forms from the Malay Te, the Chinese name being Chihá. The latter is indeed the pronunciation attached, when reading in the 'mandarin dialect,' to the character representing the tea-plant, and is the form which has accompanied the knowledge of tea to India, Persia, Portugal, Greece (tā́a) and Russia. But though it may be probable that Te, like several other names of articles of trade, may have come to us through the Malay, the word is not the less, originally Chinese, Te (or Tay as Medhurst writes it) being the utterance attached to the character in the Fuh-kien dialect. The original pronunciation, whether direct from Fuh-kien or through the Malay, accompanied the introduction of tea to England as well as other countries of Western Europe. This is shown by several couplets in Pope, e.g.

1711.—

"... There stands a structure of majestic frame
Which from the neighbouring Hampton takes its name.
* * * * *
Here thou, great Anna, whom three Realms obey, Dost sometimes counsel take, and sometimes tea."

_Rape of the Lock_, iii.

Here Tay was evidently the pronunciation, as in Fuh-kien. The _Rape of the Lock_ was published in 1711. In Gray's _Trivium_ published in 1720, we find tea rhyme to pay, in a passage needless to quote (ii. 206). Fifty years later there seems no room for doubt that the pronunciation had changed to that now in use, as is shown by Johnson's _exempirised_ verses (c. 1770):

"I therefore pray thee, Renny, dear,
That thou wilt give me
With cream and sugar soften'd well, Another dish of tea"—and so on.

The change must have taken place between 1720 and 1750, for about the latter date we find in the verses of Edward Moore:

"One day in July last at tea,
And in the house of Mrs. P."

_The Trial of Sarah, &c._

[But the two forms of pronunciation seem to have been in use earlier, as appears from the following advertisement in _The Gazette_ of Sept. 9, 1658 (quoted in 8 ser. N. & Q. vi. 266): "That excellent, and by all Physicians approved, China Drink, called by the Chinaens Toha, by other nations Tay, alias Tee, is sold at the Sultaness Head, a coffee house in Sweetings Rents by the Royal Exchange, London." And in Zedler's _Lexicon_ (1745) it is stated that the English write the word either Tee or Tea, but pronounce it Te, which seems to represent our modern pronunciation. ("Strange to say, the Italians, however, have two names for tea, _cia_ and _te_, the latter, of course, is from the Chinese word _te_, noticed above, while the former is derived from the word _ch'a_. It is curious to note in this connection that an early mention, if not the first notice, of the word in English is under the form _cha_ (in an English Glossary of A.D. 1671); we are also told that it was once spelt _tcha_—both evidently derived from the Cantonese form of the word: but 13 years later we have the word derived from the Fokienese _te_, but borrowed through the French and spelt as in the latter language _the_; the next change in the word is early in the following century when it drops the French spelling and adopts the present form of _tea_, though the Fokienese pronunciation, which the French still retain, is not dropped for the modern pronunciation of the now wholly Anglicised word _teat_ till comparatively lately. It will thus be seen that we, like the Italians, might have had two forms of the word, had we not discarded the first, which seemed to have made but little lodgement with us, for the second" (Bull, _Things Chinese_, 3rd ed. 583 seq.).]
Dr. Bretschneider states that the Tea-shrub is mentioned in the ancient Dictionary Rh.-ya, which is believed to date long before our era, under the names K'ia and K'un-tu (K'un = "bitter"), and a commentator on this work who wrote in the 4th century A.D. describes it, adding "From the leaves can be made by boiling a hot beverage." (On Chinese Botanical Works, &c., p. 13).

But the first distinct mention of tea-cultivation in Chinese history is said to be a record in the annals of the T'ang Dynasty under A.D. 793, which mentions the imposition in that year of a duty upon tea. And the first western mention of it occurs in the next century, in the notes of the Arab traders, which speak not only of tea, but of this fact of its being subject to a royal impost. Tea does not appear to be mentioned by the medieval Arab writers upon Materia Medica, nor (strange to say) do any of the European travellers to Cathay in the 13th and 14th centuries make mention of it. Nor is there any mention of it in the curious and interesting narrative of the Embassy sent by Shah Rukh, the son of the great Timur, to China (1419-21).* The first European work, so far as we are aware, in which tea is named, is Ramusio's (posthumous) Introduction to Marco Polo, in the second volume of his great collection of Navigazioni e Viaggi. In this he repeats the account of Cathay which he had heard from Hajji Mahommend, a Persian merchant who visited Venice. Among other matters the Hajji detailed the excellent properties of Chiai-Catai (i.e. Pers. Châi-i-Khitâi, 'Tea of China'), concluding with an assurance that if these were known in Persia and in Europe, traders would cease to purchase rhubarb, and would purchase this herb instead, a prophecy which has been very substantially verified. We find no mention of tea in the elaborate work of Mendoza on China. The earliest notices of which we are aware will be found below. Milburn gives some curious extracts from the E.I. Co.'s records as to the early importation of tea into England. Thus, 1666, June 30, among certain "rarëtrys," chiefly the production of China, provided by the Secretary of the Company for His Majesty, appear:

In 1667 the E.I. Co.'s first order for the importation of tea was issued to their agent at Bantam: "to send home by these ships 1001 lbs. weight of the best tey that you can get." The first importation actually made for the Co. was in 1669, when two canisters were received from Bantam, weighing 143 lbs. (Milburn, ii. 531.) [The earliest mention of tea in the Old Records of the India Office is in a letter from Mr. R. Wickham, the Company's Agent at Firando, in Japan, who, writing, June 27, 1615, to Mr. Eaton at Mioaco, asks for "a pt. of the best sort of chaw" (see Birdwood, Report on Old Records, 26, where the early references are collected].]

A.D. 851.—"The King (of China) reserves to himself . . . a duty on salt, and also on a certain herb which is drunk infused in hot water. This herb is sold in all the towns at high prices; it is called sâkh. It has more leaves than the ratô'dh (Medicago sativa recens) and something more of aroma, but its taste is bitter. Water is boiled and poured upon this herb. The drink so made is serviceable under all circumstances."—Relation, &c., trad. par Rowand, i. 40.

c. 1545.—"Moreover, seeing the great delight that I above the rest of the party took in this discourse of his, he (Chaggi Memet, i.e. Hajji Mahommed) told me that all over the country of Cathay they make use of another plant, that is of its leaves, which is called by those people Chiai Catai: it is produced in that district of Cathay which is called Cachanfu. It is a thing generally used and highly esteemed in all these regions. They take this plant whether dry or fresh, and boil it well in water, and of this decoction they take one or two cups on an empty stomach; it removes fever, headache, stomach-ache, pain in the side or joints; taking care to drink it as hot as you can bear; it is good also for many other ailmens which I can't now remember, but I know gout was one of them. And if any one chance to feel his stomach oppressed by overmuch food, if he will take a little of this decoction he will in a short time have digested it. And thus it is so precious and highly esteemed that every one going on a journey takes it with him,

* Mr. Major, in his Introduction to Parke's Mendoza for the Hak. Soc. says of this embassy, that at their halt in the desert 12 marches from Su-chan, they were regaled "with a variety of strong liquors, together with a pot of Chinese tea." It is not stated by Mr. Major whence he took the account; but there is nothing about tea in the translation of M. Quatremère (Not. et Ext. xiv. pt. 2), nor in the Persian text given by him, nor in the translation by Mr. Behatsek in the Ind. Ant. ii. 75 seqq.
and judging from what he said these people would at any time gladly swap a sack of rhubarb for an ounce of Chilai Cactai. 1726.—"I remember well how in 1681 I for the first time in my life drank thee at the house of an Indian Chaplain, and how I could not understand how sensible men could think it a treat to drink what tasted no better than hay-water."—Valentijn, v. 190.

1789.—"And now her vase a modest Naiad fills With liquid crystal from her pebbly rills; Flies the dry cedar round her silver urn, (Bright climbs the blaze, the crackling faggots burn), Culls the green herb of China's envy'd bowers,
In gaudy cups the steaming treasure pours;
And sweetly smiling, on her bended knee,
Presents the fragrant quintessence of Tea."
Darwin, Botanic Garden, Loves of the Plants, Canto ii.

1844.—"The Polish word for tea, Herbata, signifies more properly 'herb,' and in fact there is little more of the genuine Chinese beverage in the article itself than in its name, so that we often think with longing of the delightful Russian Tshai, genuine in word and fact."—J. I. Kohl, Austria, p. 444.

The following are some of the names given in the market to different kinds of tea, with their etymologies.

1. (TEA), BOHEA. This name is from the Wu-i (dialectically Bâ-d) Shan Mountains in the N.W. of Fuh-kien, one of the districts most famous for its black tea. In Pope's verse, as Crawfurd points out, Bohea stands for a tea in use among fashionable people. Thus:

"To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,
To muse, and spill her solitary tea."

[The earliest examples in the N.E.D. carry back the use of the word to the first years of the 18th century.]

1711.—"There is a parcel of extraordinary fine Bohee Tea to be sold at 29s. per Pound, at the sign of the Barber's Pole, next door to the Brazier's Shop in Southampton Street 'in the Strand.'"—Advt. in the Spectator of April 2, 1711.

1711.—"Oh had I rather unadmired remained On some lone isle or distant northern land;
Where the gilt chariot never marks the way,
Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste bohea."—Bolitude, in Rape of the Lock, iv. 153.

The last quotation, and indeed the first also, shows that the word was then pronounced Bohay. At a later date Bohea sank to be the market-name of one of the lowest qualities of tea, and we believe it has ceased altogether to be a name quoted in the tea-market. The following quotations seem to show that it was the general name for "black-tea."

1711.—"... Bohea is of little Worth among the Moors and Gentooos of India, Arrabs and Persians ... that of 45 Tale (see TAE L) would not fetch the Price of green Tea of 10 Tale a Pecull."—Lockyer, 116.

1721.—"Where Indus and the double Ganges flow,
On odorif'rous plains the leaves do grow,
Chief of the treat, a plant the boast of fame,
Sometimes called green, Bohea's the greater name."
Allan Ramsay's Poems, ed. 1800, i. 213-14.

1726.—"... Anno 1670 and 1680 there was knowledge only of Boey Tea and Green Tea, but later they speak of a variety of other sorts ... Congo ... Pego ... Tongue, Rosamyn Tea, rare and very dear."—Valentijn, iv. 14.

1727.—"... In September they strip the Bush of all its Leaves, and, for Want of warm dry Winds to cure it, are forced to lay it on warm Plates of Iron or Copper, and keep it stirring gently, till it is dry, and that Sort is called Bohea."—A. Hamilton, ii. 289; [ed. 1744, ii. 288].

But Zedler's Lexicon (1745) in a long article on Thee gives Thee Bohea as "the worst sort of all." The other European trade-names, according to Zedler, were Thee-Peco, Congo which the Dutch called the best, but Thee Cancho was better still and dearer, and Chaucon best of all.

2. (TEA) CAMPOY, a black tea also. Kam-pui, the Canton pron. of the characters Kien-pei, "select-dry (over a fire)."

3. (TEA) CONGOU (a black tea). This is Kang-fu (té) the Amoy pronunciation of the characters Kung-fu, 'work or labour.' [Mr. Pratt (9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 26) writes: "The N.E.D.-
under Congou derives it from the standard Chinese Kung-fu (which happens also to be the Cantonese spelling); 'the omission of the f,' we are told, 'is the foreigner's corruption.' It is nothing of the kind. The Amoy name for this tea is Kong-hu, so that the omission of the f is due to the local Chinese dialect.'"

4. HYSON (a green tea). This is He- (bei and ai in the south) -ch'un, 'bright spring,' [which Mr. Ball (Things Chinese, 586) writes yu-t'sin, 'before the rain'], characters which some say formed the hong name of a tea-merchant named Le, who was in the trade in the dist. of Hiu-ning (S.W. of Hang-chau) about 1700; others say that He-ch'un was Le's daughter, who was the first to separate the leaves, so as to make what is called Hyson. [Mr. Ball says that it is so called, "the young hyson being half-opened leaves plucked in April before the spring rains."]

c. 1772.—
"And Venus, goddess of the eternal smile, Knowing that stormy brows but ill become Fair patterns of her beauty, hath ordained Celestial Tea,—a fountain that can cure The ills of passion, and can free from frowns."

To her, ye fair! in adoration bow! Whether at blushing morn, or dewy eve, Her smoking cordials greet your fragrant board

* * * * *

With Hyson, or Bohea, or Congo crown'd."

R. Ferguson, Poems.

5. OOLONG (bl. tea). Wu-hung, 'black dragon'; respecting which there is a legend to account for the name. ["A black snake (and snakes are sometimes looked upon as dragons in China) was coiled round a plant of this tea, and hence the name." (Ball, op. cit. 586).]

6. PEKOE (do.). Pak-ho, Canton pron. of characters poh-hao, 'white-down.'

7. POUCHONG (do.). Pao-chung, 'fold-sort.' So called from its being packed in small paper packets, each of which is supposed to be the produce of one choice tea-plant. Also called Padre-souchong, because the priests in the Wu-i hills and other places prepare and pack it.

8. SOUCHONG (do.). Sii-chung, Canton for Siao-chung, 'little-sort.'

1781.—"Les Nations Européennes retirent de la Chine des thés connus sous les noms de thé bouy, the vert, et thé saothon."—Sonnerat, ii. 249.

9. TWANKAY (green tea). From Tun-kei, the name of a mart about 15 m. S.W. of Hwei-chau-fu in Ngan-hwei. Bp. Moule says (perhaps after W. Williams?) from Tun-kei, name of a stream near Yen-shau-fu in Chi-kiang. [Mr. Pratt (loc. cit.) writes; "The Amoy Tun-lei is nearer, and the Cantonese Tun-kei nearer still, its second syllable being absolutely the same in sound as the English. The Twankay is a stream in the E. of the province of Nanghwui, where Twankay tea grows." ] Twankay is used by Theodore Hook as a sort of slang for 'tea.'

10. YOUNG HYSON. This is called by the Chinese Yi-eh-sien, 'rain-before,' or 'Yu-before,' because picked before Kuh-ya, a term falling about 20th April (see HYSON above). According to Giles it was formerly called, in trade, Uchain, which seems to represent the Chinese name. In an "Account of the Prices at which Teas have been put up to Sale, that arrived in England in 1784, 1785" (MS. India Office Records) the Teas are (from cheaper to dearer):

Congou, | Souchong,
TEA-CADDY, s. This name, in common English use for a box to contain tea for the daily expenditure of the household, is probably corrupted, as Crawford suggests, from catty, a weight of 1½ lb. (q.v.). A 'catty-box,' meaning a box holding a catty, might easily serve this purpose and lead to the name. This view is corroborated by a quotation which we have given under caddy (q.v.) A friend adds the remark that in his youth 'Tea-caddy' was a Londoner's name for Harley Street, due to the number of E.I. Directors and proprietors supposed to inhabit that district.
TEAPOY. 910 TEAK.

TEAPOY, s. A small tripod table. This word is often in England imagined to have some connection with tea, and hence, in London shops for jpanned ware and the like, a teapoy means a tea-chest fixed on legs. But this is quite erroneous. Tıdpā is a Hindu-stani, or perhaps rather an Anglo-Hindustani word for a tripod, from Hind. t̄en, and Pers. pād, 'foot.' The legitimate word from the Persian is sipād (properly sīhpdya), and the legitimate Hindi word trīpad or tripad, but tıdpā or tepoy was probably originated by some European in analogy with the familiar charpoy (q.v.) or 'four-legs,' possibly from the desire to avoid confusion with another very familiar word sepoj, seapoy. [Platts, however, gives tıdpā as a regular Hind. word, Skt. tri-pād-ikā.] The word is applied in India not only to a three-legged table (or any small table, whatever number of legs it has), but to any tripod, as to the tripod-stands of surveying instruments, or to trestles in carpentry. Sīhpdya occurs in 'Ali of Yezd's history of Timur, as applied to the trestles used by Timur in bridging over the Indus (Elliot, iii. 482). A teapoy is called in Chinese by a name having reference to tea; viz. Ch'ạ-chê'r̃. It has 4 legs.

[c. 1809.—"(Dinajpound) Sepaya, a wooden stand for a lamp or candle with three feet."—Buchanan, Eastern India, ii. 945.]

1844.—"Well, to be sure, it does seem odd—very odd;—and the old gentleman chuckled,—'most odd to find a person who don't know what a tepoy is. . . . Well, then, a tepoy or limpoy is a thing with three feet, used in India to denote a little table, such as that just at your right.'

"'Why, that table has four legs,' cried Peregrine.

"'It's a tepoy all the same,' said Mr. Havethelacks."—Peregrine Pulteney, i. 112.

TEAK, s. The tree, and timber of the tree, known to botanists as Tectona grandis, L., N.O. Verbenaceae. The word is Malayāl. tekkā, Tam. tekkā. No doubt this name was adopted owing to the fact that Europeans first became acquainted with the wood in Malabar, which is still one of the two great sources of supply; Pegu being the other. The Skt. name of the tree is śaka, whence the modern Hind. name sdgwall or sdgān and the Mahr. sdāg. From this last probably was taken sāj, the name of teak in Arabic and Persian. And we have doubtless the same word in the sāgālāva of the Periplus, one of the exports from Western India, a form which may be illustrated by the Mahr. adj. sdgālī, 'made of the teak, belonging to teak.' The last fact shows, in some degree, how old the export of teak is from India. Teak beams, still undecayed, exist in the walls of the great palace of the Sassanid Kings at Seleucia or Ctesiphon, dating from the middle of the 6th century. [See Birdwood, First Letter Book, Intro. XXIX.] Teak has continued to recent times to be imported into Egypt. See Forskal, quoted by Royle (Hindu Medicine, 128). The gopher-wood of Genesis is translated sāj in the Arabic version of the Pentateuch (Royle). [It was probably cedar (see Encycl. Bibl. s.v.].

Teak seems to have been hardly known in Gangetic India in former days. We can find no mention of it in Baber (which however is indexless), and the only mention we can find in the Ain, is in a list of the weights of a cubic yard of 72 kinds of wood, where the name "Sdgaw" has not been recognised as teak by the learned translator (see Blochmann's E.T. i. p. 228).

c. A.D. 80.—"In the innermost part of this Gulf (the Persian) is the Port of Apo-logos, lying near Pasine Charax and the river Euphrates.

"Sailing past the mouth of the Gulf, after a course of 6 days you reach another port of Persia called Omama. Thither they are wont to despatch from Barygaza, to both these ports of Persia, great vessels with brass, and timbers and beams of teak (śuln sāgālāw kai bpdāw), and horns and spars of shisham (see SISSEO) (sāgālāw), and of ebony. . . ."—Peripl. Maris Erythr. § 35-36.

c. 880.—(under Hārin al Rashid) "Fażl continued his story . . . I heard loud wailing from the house of Abdallah . . . they told me he had been struck with the jādām, that his body was swollen and all black . . . I went to Rashid to tell him, but I had not finished when they came to say Abdallah was dead. Going out at once I ordered them to hasten the obsequies . . . I myself said the funeral prayer . . . As they let down the bier a slip took place, and the bier and earth fell in together; an intolerable stench arose . . . a second slip took place. I then called for planks of teak (sāj). . . ."—Quotation in Maj'ād, Pratīs d'Or, vi. 298-299.

c. 880.—"From Kol to Sindān, where they collect teak-wood (sāj) and cane, 18 far-sakhs."—Ibn Khurdalda, in J. As. S. VI. tom. v. 254.

c. 940.—"... The teak-tree (saj). This tree, which is taller than the date-palm, and more bulky than the walnut, can shelter under its branches a great number of men and cattle, and you may judge of its dimensions by the logs that arrive, of their natural length, at the depôts of Basra, of Trâk, and of Egypt. ..."—Mâs'ûdi, iii. 12.

Before 1200. — Abûl-dhâli the Sîndian, describing the regions of Hind, has these verses:

* * * * *

"By my life! it is a land where, when the rain falls, Jacinths and pears spring up for him who wants ornaments. There too they produce musk and camphor and ambergris and agil, ... And ivory there, and teak (al-saj) and aloeswood and sandal. ..."

Quoted by Kâzimî, in Gildemeister, 217-218.

The following order, in a King's Letter to the Goa Government, no doubt refers to Pegu teak, though not naming the particular timber:

1597.—"We enjoin you to be very vigilant not to allow the Turks to export any timber from the Kingdom of Pegu, nor from that of Achem (see ACHÉEN), and you must arrange how to treat this matter, particularly with the King of Achem."—In Archiv. Port. Orient. fase, ii. 669.

1602.—"... It was necessary in order to appease them, to give a promise in writing that the body should not be removed from the town, but should have public burial in our church in sight of everybody; and with this assurance it was taken in solemn procession and deposited in a box of teak (teca), which is a wood not subject to decay..."—Sousa, Oriente Conquist. (1710), i. 265.

[", "Of many of the roughest thickets of bamboos and of the largest and best wood in the world, that is teca."—Costa, Dec. VII. Bk. vi. ch. 6. He goes on to explain that all the ships and boats made either by Moors or Gentiles since the Portuguese came to India, were of this wood which came from the inexhaustible forests at the back of Damaun.]

1631.—Bontius gives a tolerable cut of the foliage, &c., of the Teak-tree, but writing in the Archipelago does not use that name, describing it under the title "Quercus Indica, Kiati Malasiae Nigritae." Li, vi. 10. On his Rheede, whose plate of the tree is, as usual, excellent (Hortus Malabaricus, iv. tab. 27), observes justly that the teak has no resemblance to an oak-tree, and also that the Malay name is not Kiati but Jati: Kiati seems to be a mistake of some kind growing out of Kayu-jati, 'Teak-wood.'

1644.—"Hâi nestas terras de Damam muyta e boa madeyra de Tecâ, a milhor de toda a India, e tambem de muyta parte do mundo, porque com ser muy facil de laurar he perdurável, e particularmente nam lhe tocaendo agua."—Boeçarro, MS.

1675.—"At Cock-crow we parted hence and observed that the Sheds here were round thatched and lined with broad Leaves of Teke (the Timber Ships are built with) in Fashion of a Bee-hive."—Fryer, 142.

", "... Teke by the Portuguese, Sogwan by the Moors, is the firmest Wood they have for Building... in Height the lofty Pine exceeds it not, nor the sturdy Oak in Bulk and Substance. ... This Prince of the Indian Forest was not so attractive, though mightily glorious, but that..."—Ibid., 178.

1727.—"Gandaver is next, where good Quantities of Teek Timber are cut, and exported, being of excellent Use in building of Houses or Ships."—A. Hamilton, i. 178; [ed. 1744].

1744.—"Tecka is the name of costly wood which is found in the Kingdom of Martaban in the East Indies, and which never decays."—Seidler, Unio. Lexicon, s.v.

1759.—"They had endeavoured to burn the Teak Timbers also, but they lying in a swampy place, could not take fire."—Capt. Alves, Report on Loss of Negrais, in Dalrymple, i. 349.

c. 1760.—"As to the wood it is a sort called Teeka, to the full as durable as oak."—Crose, i. 178.

1777.—"Experience hath long since shown, that ships built with oak, and joined together with wooden trunnels, are by no means so well calculated to resist the extremes of heat and damp, in the tropical latitudes of Asia, as the ships which are built in India of teke-wood, and bound with iron spikes and bolts."—Price's Treats, i. 191.

1793.—"The teek forests, from whence the marine yard at Bombay is furnished with that excellent species of ship-timber, lie along the western side of the Gault mountains... on the north and north-east of Basseen... I cannot close this subject without remarking the unpardonable negligence we are guilty of in delaying to build teak ships of war for the service of the Indian seas."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. 260.

[1800.—"Tayca, Tectona Robusta."—Buchanan, Mysore, i. 26.]

TEE, s. The metallic decoration, generally gilt and hung with tinkling bells, on the top of a dagoba in Indo-Chinese countries, which represents the chastras [chatteras] or umbrellas which in ancient times, as royal emblems, crowned these structures. Burm. hiti, 'an umbrella.'

1800.—"... In particular the Tee, or umbrella, which, composed of open iron-work, TELINGA.

(1) TELINGA, n.p. Hind. Tilanga, Skt. Tilanga. One of the people of the country east of the Deccan, and extending to the coast, often called, at least since the Middle Ages, Tilinjangana or Tilinjangana, sometimes Tiling or Tiling. Though it has not, perhaps, been absolutely established that this came from a form Trilinga, the habitual application of Tri-Kaliyang, apparently to the same region which in later days was called Tilinga, and the example of actual use of Trilinga, both by Ptolemy (though he carries us beyond the Ganges) and by a Tibetan author quoted below, do make this a reasonable supposition (see Bp. Caldwell's Dravidian Grammar, 2nd ed. Introd. pp. 30 seqq., and the article KLING in this book).

A.D. c. 150.—"Triγλυπτον, τὸ καὶ Τριλιγνον Βασιλείων...κ.τ., τ. λ."—Ptolemy, vi. 2, 23.

1309.—"On Saturday the 10th of Shab'an, the army marched from that spot, in order that the pure tree of Islam might be planted and flourish in the soil of Tiling, and the evil tree which had struck its roots deep, might be torn up by force.... When the blessed canopy had been fixed about a mile from Arangal (Warnagul, N.E. of Hyderabad), the tents around the fort were pitched so closely that the head of a needle could not get between them."—Mīr Khārīū, in Elliot, iii. 80.

1321.—"In the year 721 H. the Sultan (Ghiyāṣuddin) sent his eldest son, Ulugh Khān, with a canopy and an army against Arangal and Tiling."—Zia-ul-din Barna, Ibid. 231.

C. 1335.—"For every mile along the road there are three dams (post stations).... and so the road continues for six months' marching, till one reaches the countries of Tiling and Ma'bar."—Ibn Batuta, iii. 192.

In the list of provinces of India under the Sultan of Delhi, given by Shihāb-ud-din Dinīshkī, we find both Talang and Talanj, probably through some mistake.—Not. of Lists, Pt. 1, 170-171.

C. 1590.—"Sūba Barar. Its length from Bātāla (or Patāla) to Bairagār is 200 kilo (or kos); its breadth from Bidar to Hindia 180. On the east of Bairagār it marches with Basta; on the north with Hindia; on the south with Tilingāna; on the west with Mahakārābd...."—Ātā (orig.) i. 476; [ed. Jarrett, ii. 228; and see 230, 237].

TEEK.

adj. Exact, precise, punctual; also parsimonious, [a meaning which Plato does not record]. Used in N. India. Hind. thik.

[1803. —"They all feel that the good old rule of right (teek), as long as a man does his duty well, can no longer be relied upon."—G. W. Johnson, Stranger in India, i. 290.]

[1828. —"...it is necessary to send an explanation to the magistrate, and the return does not look so thik' (a word expressing all excellence)."—Life in the Mafussil, i. 253.]

TEERUT, TEERTHA, s. Skt. and Hind. tirtha, tirtha. A holy place of pilgrimage and of bathing for the good of the soul, such as Hurdwar, or the confluence at Praag (Allahabad).

[1623.—"The Gentiles call it Ramtirt, that is, Holy Water."—P. della Valle, Hak. Soc. ii. 205.]

c. 1790.—"Au temple l'enfant est reçu par les devéaschies (Devā-dasi) des mains de ses parents, et après l'avoir baigné dans le tirtha on étang du temple, elles lui mettent des vêtements neufs...."—Hauger, ii. 114.

[1858.—"He then summoned to the place no less than three crores and half, or thirty millions and half of teeruts, or angels (sic) who preside each over his special place of religious worship."—Steenman, Journey through Oudh, ii. 4.]

TEHR, TAIR, &c., s. The wild goat of the Himalaya; Hemitragus jemlaicus, Jerdon, [Blanford, Mammalia, 509]. In Nepāl it is called jhārol. (See SURROW).

TEJAPAT, s. Hind. tejpat, Skt. tejapatra, 'pungent leaf.' The native name for malabathrum.

1838.—"Last night as I was writing a long description of the téz-pat, the leaf of the cinnamon-tree, which humbly pickles beef, leaving the honour of crowning heroes to the Laurus nobilis. "..."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 278.

1872.—Tejpat is mentioned as sold by the village shopkeeper, in Govinda Samanta, i. 223.

1908.—"In the southern lands of India since the day when the Turushkas (Turks, i.e. Mahommedans) conquered Magadha, many abodes of Learning were founded; and though they were inaccessible, the continuance of instruction and exorcism was without interruption, and the Pandit who was called the Son of Men, dwelt in Kalinga, a part of Telinga."—Taranatha's II. of Buddhism (Germ. ed. of Schiefner), p. 294. See also 116, 158, 186.

1793.—"Tellingana, of which Warangoll was the capital, comprehended the tract lying between the Kistnah and Godavery Rivers, and east of Visiapour. . . ."—Rennell's Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [exi.]

(2) TELINGA, s. This term in the 18th century was frequently used in Bengal as synonymous with sepoy, or a native soldier disciplined and clothed in quasi-European fashion, [and is still commonly used by natives to indicate a sepoy or armed policeman in N. India], no doubt because the first soldiers of that type came to Bengal from what was considered to be the Telinga country, viz. Madras.

1758.—"... the latter commanded a body of Hindu soldiers, armed and accoutred and disciplined in the European manner of fighting; I mean those soldiers that are become so famous under the name of Talingas."—Sir Mutaghirin, ii. 92.

c. 1760.—"... Sepoys, sometimes called Tellingas."—Grose, in his Glossary, see vol. i. xiv.

1760.—"300 Telingees are run away, and entered into the Beerboom Rajah’s service."—In Long, 235; see also 236, 237, and (1701) p. 235, "Tellingers."

c. 1765.—"Somro’s force, which amounted to 15 or 16 field-pieces and 6000 or 7000 of those foot soldiers called Talinghas, and which are armed with flint muskets, and accoutred as well as disciplined in the Freehgi or European manner."—Sir Mutaghirin, ii. 254.

1786.—"... Gardi (see GARDEE), which is now the general name of Sipahies all over India, save Bengal... where they are stiled Talingas, because the first Sipahees that came in Bengal (and they were imported in 1757 by Colonel Clive) were all Talingas or Teloungous born... speaking hardly any language but their native..."—Note by Tr. of Sir Mutaghirin, ii. 93.

c. 1805.—"The battalions, according to the old mode of France, were called after the names of cities and forts. . . The Telingas, composed mostly of Hindoos, from Oude, were disciplined according to the old English exercise of 1750. . . ."—Sketch of the Regular Corps, &c., in Service of Native Princes, by Major Lewis Ferdinand Smith, p. 50.

1827.—"You are a Sahib Angrezee. . . I have been a Telinga... in the Company’s service, and have eaten their salt. I will do your errand."—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon’s Daughter, ch. xiii.

1833.—"We have heard from natives whose grandfathers lived in those times, that the Oriental portions of Clive’s army were known to the Bengalis of Nuddas as Telingas, because they came, or were supposed to have accompanied him from Telingana or Madras."—Saty. Review, Jan. 29, p. 120.

TELOGGOO, n.p. The first in point of diffusion, and the second in culture and copiousness, of the Dravidian languages of the Indian Peninsula. It is "spoken all along the eastern coast of the Peninsula, from the neighbourhood of Pulicat" (24 m. N. of Madras) "where it supersedes Tamil, to Chicacole, where it begins to yield to the Oriya (see OORIYA), and inland it prevails as far as the eastern boundary of the Maratha country and Mysore, including within its range the 'Ceded Districts' and Karnul (see KURNOO), a considerable part of the territories of the Nizam... and a portion of the Nagpur country and Goudvana." (Bp. Caldwell's Dravid. Gram. Introd. p. 29). Telugu is the name given to the language of the people themselves (other forms being, according to Bp. Caldwell, Telunga, Telinga, Tailinga, Tenugu, and Tenungu), as the language of Telingana (see TELINGA (1)). It is this language (as appears in the passage from Fryer) that used to be, perhaps sometimes is, called Gentoo at Madras. [Also see BADEGA.]

1673.—"Their Language they call generally Gentu... the peculiar name of their speech is Telinga."—Fryer, 38.

1793.—"The Telinga language is said to be in use, at present, from the River Pennar in the Carnatic, to Orissa, along the coast, and inland to a very considerable distance."—Rennell, Memoir, 3rd ed. p. [exi.]

TEMBOOL, Betel-leaf. Skt. tambil, adopted in Pers. as tambil, and in Ar. al-tambal. [It gives its name to the Tambolis or Tamolis, sellers of betel in the N. Indian bazaars.]

1298.—"All the people of this city, as well as the rest of India, have a custom of perpetually keeping in the mouth a certain leaf called Tembul. ..."—Marco Polo, ii. 358.

1498.—"And he held in his left hand a very great cup of gold as high as a half alwude pot ... into which he spat a certain herb which the men of this country chew for solace, and which they call atambor."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 59.

1510.—"He also eats certain leaves of herbs, which are like the leaves of the sour orange, called by some tamboli."—Varthema, 110.

1563. —"Only you should know that Avicenna calls the betre (Betel) tembul, which seems a word somewhat corrupted, since everybody pronounces it tambul, and not tembul."—Garcia, f. 37 h.

TENASSERIM. n.p. A city and territory on the coast of the Peninsula of Further India. It belonged to the ancient kingdom of Pegu, and fell with that to Ava. When we took from the latter the provinces east and south of the Delta of the Irawadi, after the war of 1824-26, these were officially known as "the Martaban and Tenasserim Province," or often as "the Tenasserim Provinces." We have the name probably from the Malay form Tanasari. We do not know to what language the name originally belongs. The Burmese call it Ta-nei-tha-rak. ["The name Tenasserim (Malay Tanah-sari), 'the land of happiness or delight,' was long ago given by the Malays to the Burma province, which still keeps it, the Burmese corruption being Tanang-sari" (Gray, on Pyrard de Laval, quoted below).]

c. 1430.—"Relicta Taprobane ad urbem Thenasserim supra ostium fluvii eodem nomine vocata diebus XVI temperata actus est. Quae regio et elephantis et verzano (brazil-wood) abundat."—Nic. Conti, in Poggio de Var. Fort. Lib. iv. 1442.—"The inhabitants of the shores of the Ocean come thither (to Hormuz) from the countries of Chin (China), Javah, Bangila, the cities of Zirbad (q.v.), of Tenaseri, of Sokotara, of Shahrinao (see SARNAU), of the Isles of Diwah Mahal (Maldive)."—Abdur-razaq, in Not. et Exs. xiv. 429.

1498.—"Tenazar is peopled by Christians, and the King is also a Christian ... in this land is much brassy, which makes a fine vermilion, as good as the grain, and it costs here 3 cruzados a bahar, whilst in Quayro (Cairo) it costs 60; also there is here aloes-wood, but not much."—Roteiro de V. da Gama, 110.

1501. —Tanaser appears in the list of places in the East Indies of which Amerigo Vespucci had heard from the Portuguese fleet at C. Verde. Printed in Baldeii Boni's Il Milione, pp. liii. seqq.

1506.—"At Tenazar grows all the versi (brazil), and it costs 1½ ducats the head (bahar), equal to 4 cantara. This place, though on the coast, is on the mainland. The King is a Gentile; and thence come pepper, cinnamon, galanga, camphor that is eaten, and camphor that is not eaten. ... This is indeed the first mart of spices in India."—Leonardo Cò Masser. in Archiv. Stor. Ital. p. 23.

1510.—"The city of Tannasar is situated near the sea, &c."—Varthema, 196. This adventurer's account of Tenasserim is an imposture. He describes it by implication as in India Proper, somewhere to the north of Coromandel.

1516.—"And from the Kingdom of Pegu as far as a city which has a seaport, and is named Tansery, there are a hundred leagues. ..."—Barbosa, 188.

1568.—"The Pilot told us that we were by his altitude not far from a city called Tenassary, in the Kingdom of Pegu."—C. Frederick, in Hakt. ii. 359. See Lancaster.

c. 1590.—"In Kambyat (Cambay) a Nákhu (Nacoda) gets 800 R. ... In Pegu and Dahnasari, he gets half as much again as in Cambay."—Ain, i. 281.

[1598. —"Betweene two Islands the coast runneth inwards like a bow, wherein lyeth the towne of Tanassarien."—Linschoten, Hakt. Soc. i. 103. In the same page he writes Tanassaria.

1608.—"The small quantities they have here come from Tanasserye."—Dayners, Letters, i. 22.

c. 1610. —"Some Indians call it (Ceylon) Tenasirin, signifying land of delights, or earthly paradise."—Pyrard de Laval, ii. 140, with Gray's note (Hakt. Soc.) quoted above.]

1727. —"Mr. Samuel White was made Shawbandaar (Shabunder) or Custom-Master at Merjee (Mergui) and Tanacerin, and Captain Williams was Admiral of the King's Navy."—A. Hamilton, ii. 64; [ed. 1744].

1783. —"Tanassamer ..."—Forrest V. to Mergui, 4.

TERAI, TERYE. s. Hind. tirāṭ, 'moist (land)' from tār, 'moist' or 'green.' [Others, however, connect it with tārā, talō, 'beneath the (Himālaya).'] The term is specially applied to a belt of marshy and jungly land which runs along the foot of the Himālaya north of the Ganges, being that zone in which the moisture which has sunk into the talus of porous material exudes. A tract on the south side of the Ganges, now part of Bhāgalpūr, was also formerly known as the Jungle-terry (q.v.).

1793.—"Helloura, though standing very little below the level of Cheeria Ghat's top is nevertheless comprehended in the Turry or Turryani of Nepal ... Turryani properly signifies low marshy lands, and is sometimes applied to the flats lying below the hills in the interior of Nepal, as well as the low tract bordering immediately on the Company's northern frontier."—Kirkpatrick's Nepal (1811), p. 40.

1824.—"Mr. Boulderson said he was sorry to learn from the rajah that he did not consider the unhealthy season of the Terrai yet over ... I asked Mr. B. if it were true that the monkeys forsook these woods during the unwholesome months. He answered that not the monkeys only, but everything which had the breath of life instinctively deserts them from the beginning of April to October. The tigers go up to the hills, the antelopes and wild hogs make incursions into the cultivated plain ... and not so much as a bird can be heard or seen in the frightful solitude."—Heber, ed. 1844, 250-251.

[The word is used as an adj. to describe a severe form of malarial fever, and also a sort of double felt hat, worn when the sun is not so powerful as to require the use of a sola topee.

[1879.—"Remittent has been called Jungle Fever, Terrai Fever, Bengal Fever, &c., from the locality in which it originated. ..."—Moore, Family Med. for India, 211.

[1880.—"A Terrai hat is sufficient for a Collector."—Ali Baba, 85.]

THAKOOR, s. Hind. thākur, from Skt. thākkura, 'an idol, a deity.' Used as a term of respect, Lord, Master, &c., but with a variety of specific applications, of which the most familiar is as the style of Rajput nobles. It is also in some parts the honorific designation of a barber, after the odd fashion which styles a tailor khalīja (see CALEFFA); a bhīshṭā, jama'īdār (see JEMADAR); a sweeper, mehtār. And in Bengal it is the name of a Brahman family, which its members have Anglicised as Tagore, of whom several have been men of character and note, the best known being Dwārakānāth Tagore, "a man of liberal opinions and enterprising character" (Wilson), who died in London in 1840.

[c. 1610.—"The nobles in blood (in the Mādīves) add to their name Tacourou."—Pyrrard de Laval, Hak. Soc. i. 217.

[1798.—"The Thacur (so Rajput chieftains are called) was naked from the waist upwards, except the sacrificial thread or scarf on his shoulders and a turban on his head."—L. of Colebrooke, 462.

[1831.—"After the sons have gone to their respective offices, the mother changing her clothes retires into the thakurghar (the place of worship), and goes through her morning service. ..."—S. C. Bose, The Hindoos as they are, 18.]

THERMANTIDOTE, s. This learned word ("heat-antidote") was applied originally, we believe, about 1830-32 to the invention of the instrument which it designates, or rather to the application of the instrument, which is in fact a winnowing machine fitted to a window aperture, and incased in wet tatties (q.v.), so as to drive a current of cooled air into a house during hot, dry weather. We have a dim remembrance that the invention was ascribed to Dr. Spilsbury.

1831.—"To the 21st of June, this oppressive weather held its sway; our only consolation grapes, iced-water, and the thermantidote, which answers admirably, almost too well, as on the 22d. I was laid up with rheumatic fever and lumbago, occasioned ... by standing or sleeping before it."—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 208.

[Mrs Parkes saw for the first time a thermantidote at Cawnpore in 1830. — Ibid. i. 134.]

1840.—"... The thermometer at 112° all day in our tents, notwithstanding tattles, phermantidotes," and every possible invention that was likely to lessen the stifling heat."—Osborne, Court and Camp of Ranjeet Singh, 132.

1853.—"... then came punkahs by day, and next punkahs by night, and then tattles, and then thermantidotes, till at last May came round again, and found the unhappy Anglo-Indian world once more surrounded with all the necessary but uncomfortable sweltering panoply of the hot weather."—Oakfield, 263-4.

1878.—"They now began (c. 1840) to have the benefit of thermantidotes, which however were first introduced in 1831; the name of the inventor is not recorded."—Calcutta Rev. xxiv. 718.

1880.—"... low and heavy punkahs swing overhead; a sweet breathing of wet khaskhas grass comes out of the thermantidote."—Sir Ali Baba, 112.

THUG, s. Hind. thag, Mahr. thak, Skt. sthaya, 'a cheat, a swindler.' And this is the only meaning given and illustrated in R. Drummond's Illustrations of Gujarattes, &c. (1808). But it has acquired a specific meaning, which cannot be exhibited more precisely or tersely than by Wilson:

* This book was printed in England, whilst the author was in India; doubtless he was innocent of this quaint error.
“Latterly applied to a robber and assassin of a peculiar class, who sallying forth in a gang . . . and in the character of wayfarers, either on business or pilgrimage, fall in with other travellers on the road, and having gained their confidence, take a favourable opportunity of strangling them by throwing their handkerchiefs round their necks, and then plundering them and burying their bodies.”

The proper specific designation of these criminals was phāṃśīgar or phāṃśīgar, from phāṃśi, ‘a noose.’

According to Mackenzie (in As. Res. xiii.) the existence of gangs of these murderers was unknown to Europeans till shortly after the capture of Seringapatam in 1799, when about 100 were apprehended in Bangalore. But Fryer had, a century earlier, described a similar gang caught and executed near Surat. The Phāṃśīgars (under that name) figured prominently in an Anglo-Indian novel called, we think, “The English in India,” which one of the present writers read in early boyhood, but cannot now trace. It must have been published between 1826 and 1830.

But the name of Thug first became thoroughly familiar not merely to that part of the British public taking an interest in Indian affairs, but even to the mass of Anglo-Indian society, through the publication of the late Sir William Sleeman’s book “Rama-seena; or a Vocabulary of the peculiar language used by the Thugs, with an Introduction and Appendix, descriptive of that Fraternity, and of the Measures which have been adopted by the Supreme Government of India for its Suppression,” Calcutta, 1836; and by an article on it which appeared in the Edinburgh Review, for Jan. 1837, (lxiv. 357). One of Col. Meadow’s Taylor’s Indian romances also, Memoirs of a Thug (1839), has served to make the name and system familiar. The suppression of the system, for there is every reason to believe that it was brought to an end, was organised in a masterly way by Sir W. (then Capt.) Sleeman, a wise and admirable man, under the government and support of Lord William Bentinck. [The question of the Thugs and their modern successors has been again discussed in the Quarterly Review, Oct. 1901.]

c. 1665.—“Les Voleurs de ce pais-là sont les plus adroits du monde; ils ont l’usage d’un certain lasso à noeuil coulant, qu’ils savent jeter si subtilement au col d’un homme, quand ils sont à sa portée, qu’ils ne le manquent jamais; en sorte qu’en un moment ils l’étrangent . . . .”—Thvenot, v. 123.

1675.—“They were Fifteen, all of a Gang, who used to lurk under Hedges in narrow Lanes, and as they found Opportunity, by a Device of a Weight tied to a Cotton Bow-string made of Guts . . . they used to throw it upon Passengers, so that wounding it about their Necks, they pulled them from their Beasts and dragging them upon the Ground strangled them, and possessed themselves of what they had . . . they were sentenced to Lex Talionis, to be hang’d; wherefore being delivered to the Catecal or Sheriff’s Men, they led them two Miles with Ropes round their Necks to some Wild Date-trees: In their way thither they were cheerful, and went singing, and smoaking Tobacco . . . as jolly as if going to a Wedding; and the Young Lad now ready to be tied up, boasted, That though he were not 14 Years of Age, he had killed his Fifteen Men . . . .”—Fryer, 97.

1785.—“Several men were taken up for a most cruel method of robbery and murder, practised on travellers, by a tribe called phāṃśīgars, or stranglers . . . under the pretence of travelling the same way, they enter into conversation with the strangers, share their sweetmeats, and pay them other little attentions, until an opportunity offers of suddenly throwing a rope round their necks with a slip-knot, by which they dexterously contrive to strangle them on the spot.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. iv. 13; [2nd ed. ii. 387].

1808.—“Phanseeo. A term of abuse in Guzerat, applied also, truly, to thieves or robbers who strangle children in secret or travellers on the road.”—R. Drummond, Illustrations, s.v.

1820.—“In the more northern parts of India these murderers are called Thugs, signifying deceivers.”—As. Res. xiii. 250.

1823.—“The Thugs are composed of all castes. Mahommedans even were admitted: but the great majority are Hindus; and among these the Brahmins, chiefly of the Bundelkund tribes, are in the greatest numbers, and generally direct the operations of the different bands.”—Malcolm, Central India, ii. 187.

1831.—“The inhabitants of Jubbulpore were this morning assembled to witness the execution of 25 Thugs . . . The number of Thugs in the neighbouring countries is enormous; 115, I believe, belonged to the party of which 25 were executed, and the remainder are to be transported; and report says there are as many in Sagar Jail.”—Wanderings of a Pilgrim, i. 201-202.

1845.—“It is by the command, and under the special protection of the most powerful goddesses that the Thugs join themselves to the unsuspecting traveller, make friends with him, slip the noose round his neck, plunge their knives in his eyes, hide him in the earth, and divide his money and baggage."—Macnaghten, Speech on Gates of Somnath.

1874.—"If a Thug makes strangling of travellers a part of his religion, we do not allow him the free exercise of it."—W. Newman, in Fortnightly Rev., N.S. xv. 181.

[Tavernier writes: "The remainder of the people, who do not belong to either of these four castes, are called Pauzecour." This word Mr. Ball (ii. 185) suggests to be equivalent to either pariah or phansigar. Here he is in error. Pauzecour is really Skt. Punche-Gauza, the five classes of northern Brahmans, for which see Wilson, (Indian Caste, ii. 124 seqq.).]

TIBET, n.p. The general name of the vast and lofty table-land of which the Himalaya forms the southern marginal range, and which may be said roughly to extend from the Indus elbow, N.W. of Kashmir, to the vicinity of Sining-fu in Kansuh (see Sling) and to Tatsienlu on the borders of Szechuen, the last a distance of 1800 miles. The origin of the name is obscure, but it came to Europe from the Mahommedans of Western Asia; its earliest appearance being in some of the Arab Geographies of the 9th century.

Names suggestive of Tibet are indeed used by the Chinese. The original form of these (according to our friend Prof. Terrien de la Cuypere) was Tu-pot; a name which is traced to a prince so called, whose family reigned at Liang-chau, north of the Yellow R. (in modern Kansuh), but who in the 5th century was driven far to the south-west, and established in eastern Tibet a State to which he gave the name of Tu-pot, afterwards corrupted into Tu-poh and Tu-fan. We are always on ticklish ground in dealing with derivations from or through the Chinese. But it is doubtless possible, perhaps even probable, that these names passed into the western form Tifel, through the communication of the Arabs in Turkestan with the tribes on their eastern border. This may have some corroboration from the prevalence of the name Tibet, or some proximate form, among the Mongols, as we may gather both from Carpani and Rubruck in the 13th century (quoted below), and from Sanang Setzen, and the Mongol version of the Bodhikarṇa several hundred years later. These latter write the name (as represented by I. J. Schmidt), Tibet and Tobt.

[c. 590.—"Tobbat." See under INDIA.]

551.—"On this side China are the countries of the Taghazghaz and the Khâqân of Tibet; and that is the termination of China on the side of the Turkes."—Relation, &c., tr. par Reinard, pt. i. p. 60.

c. 880.—"Quand un étranger arrive au Tibet (al-Tibbat), il éprouve, sans pouvoir s'en rendre compte, un sentiment de gaieté et de bien être qui persiste jusqu'au départ."—Ibn Khurdadhâbâ, in J. As. Ser. vi. tom. v. 522.

c. 910.—"The country in which lives the goat which produces the musk of China, and that which produces the musk of Tibet are one and the same; only the Chinese get into their hands the goats which are nearest their side, and the people of Tibet do likewise. The superiority of the musk of Tibet over that of China is due to two causes; first, that the musk-goat on the Tibbat side of the frontier finds aromatic plants, whilst the tracts on the Chinese side only produce plants of a common kind."—Relation, &c., pt. 2, pp. 114-115.

c. 930.—"This country has been named Tibet because of the establishment there of the Himyarites, the word thabant signifying to fix or establish oneself. That etymology is the most likely of all that have been proposed. And it is thus that Dībal, son of Ali-al-Khumri, vaunts this fact in a poem, in which when disputing with Al-Kumair he exalts the descendants of Kaṭāfān above those of Niẓār, saying:

"Tis they who have been famous by their writings at the gate of Morv, And who were writers at the gate of Chin, Tis they who have bestowed on Samarkand the name of Shamr, And who have transported thither the Tibetans" (Al-Tubbatâna).

Mos'ads, i. 352.

c. 976.—"From the sea to Tibet is 4 months' journey, and from the sea of Fars to the country of Kanauj is 3 months' journey."—Ibn Haukal, in Elitaut, i. 33.

* This refers to an Arab legend that Samarkand was founded in very remote times by Tobba' al-Aktar, Himyarite King of Yemen, (see e.g. Edrisi, Ibn Jabarti, ii. 139), and the following: "The author of the Treatise on the Figure of the Earth says on this subject: "This is what was told me by Abu-Bakr-Dimashi—"I have seen over the great gate of Samarkand an iron tablet bearing an inscription, which, according to the people of the place, was engraved in Himyarite characters, and as an old tradition related, had been the work of "Tobba."—Shkhabdî Dinması, in Not. et Ext. xiii. 224.

1165.—'This prince is called in Arabic Sultan-al-Pars-al-Kábar ... and his empire extends from the banks of the Shat-al-Arab to the City of Samarkand ... and reaches as far as Tibet, in the forests of which country that quadruped is found which yields the musk.' —Rabbi Benjamin, in Wright's Early Travels, 106.

c. 1200.—

'He went from Hindustan to the Tibet-land ... From Tibet he entered the boundaries of Chn.'

1217.—'Et dum reverteretur exercitus ille, videlicet Mongalorum, venit ad terram Buri-Thabet, quos bello vicerunt; qui sunt pagani. Qui consuetudinem mirabilem imo potius miserabilem habent: quia cum alii-cujus pater humanae naturae debitum solvit, nonem congregant parentelem ut comedant eundem sicut nobis dicebatur pro certo.' —Joan. de Plano Carpini, in Rec. de Voyages, iv. 658.

1223.—'Post istos sunt Tébet, homines solentes comedere parentes suos defunctos, ut causa pietatis non facerent alium sepulchrum eis nisi viscera sua.' —Rubrug, in Recueil de Voyages, &c. iv. 289.

1298.—'Tébet est une grandissime provence qve lengajes ont por elles, et sunt ydres. . . . . il sunt maint grant laironz . . . il sunt mau custumèz; il ont grandissimes chenz maitin qe sunt grant come asnes et sunt mout buen a prendre bestes sauvages.' —Marco Polo, Geog. Text. ch. cxvi.

1380.—'Passando esta provincia grande pervenii a un altro grand regno che si chiama Tibet, ch'ene ne confini d'India ed e tutta un gran Canè ... la gente di questa contrada dimora in tente che sono fatte di feltri neri. La principale cittade è fatta tutta di pietre bianche e nere, e tutte le vie lastricate. In questa cittade dimora il Atassi (Abassi?) che viene a dire in nostro modo il Papa.' —Fr. Odorico, Palatine MS., in Caithay, &c. App. p. lxi.

c. 1340.—'The said mountain (Karachî, the Himalaya) extends in length a space of 3 months' journey, and at the base is the country of Thabbat, which has the antelopes which give musk.' —Ibn Batuta, iii. 438-439.

TICAL, s. This (tikal) is a word which has long been in use by foreign traders to Burma, for the quasi-standard weight of (uncoined) current silver, and is still in general use in B. Burma as applied to that value. This weight is by the Burmese themselves called kyat, and is the hundredth part of the viss (q.v.), being thus equivalent to about 3 rupee in value. The origin of the word tikal is doubtful. Sir A. Playfair suggests that possibly it is a corruption of the Burmese words ta-kyat, "one kyat." On the other hand perhaps it is more probable that the word may have represented the Indian taka (see TUCKA). The word is also used by traders to Siam. But there likewise it is a foreign term; the Siamese word being bat. In Siam the tikal is according to Crawford a silver coin, as well as a weight equivalent to 225½ grs. English. In former days it was a short cylinder of silver bent double, and bearing two stamps, thus half-way between the Burmese bullion and proper coin.*

[1564.—"Ticals." See MACAO b. Also see VISS.]

1615.—'Cloth to the value of six cattles (Catty) less three tiggals.' —Foster, Letters, iv. 107.

[1639.—"Four Ticals make a Tayl (Tael)."—Mandelslo, E.T. ii. 130.]

1648.—'The proportion of their (Siamese) Money to ours is, that their Tical, which weighs no more than half a Crown, is yet worth three shillings and three half-pence.'

1727.—'2 Pegu Weight. 1 Veece is . . . . 39 ou. Troy, or 1 Veece . . . . 100 Teculs. 140 Veece . . . . a Bahaar (see BAHAR). The Bahaar is 3 Pecul China." —A. Hamilton, ii. 317; [ed. 1744].

1759.—". . . a dozen or 20 fowls may be bought for a Tical (little more than a Crown)." —In Dalrymple, Or. Rep. i. 121.

* [Col. Temple notes that the pronunciation has always been twofold. At present in Burma it is usual to pronounce it like tickle, and in Siam like tao-cuél. He regards it as certain that it comes from takél through Talaiing and Peguan t'ke.]
1775.—Stevens, New and Complete Guide to E.I. Trade, gives

" Pegu weight:
100 moe = 1 Tual (read Tical).
100 tual [Ticals] = 1 vis (see Viss) = 3 lb.
5 oz. 5 dr. avr.
150 vis = 1 candy."

And under Siam:

" 80 Tuals [Ticals] = 1 Catty.
50 Catties = 1 Peoul."

1783.—"The merchandize is sold for tee-calls, a round piece of silver, stamped and weighing about one rupee and a quarter."

—Forrest, V. to Mergui, p. viii.

TICCA, and vulg. TICKER, adj.

This is applied to any person or thing engaged by the job, or on contract. Thus a ticca garry is a hired carriage, a ticca doctor is a surgeon not in the regular service but temporarily engaged by Government. From Hind, thika, thikah, 'hire, fare, fixed price.'

[1813.—"Teecka, hire, fare, contract, job."—Gloss. to Fifth Report, s. v.]

1827.—"A Rule, Ordinance and Regulation for the good Order and Civil Government of the Settlement of Fort William in Bengal, and for regulating the number and fare of Teeka Palankeens, and Teeka Bearers in the Town of Calcutta . . . registered in the Supreme Court of Judicature, on the 27th June, 1827."—Bengal Regulations of 1827.

1875.—"Leaving our servants to jabber over our heavier baggage, we got into a ticca gharry, 'hired trap,' a bit of civilization I had hardly expected to find so far in the Mofussil."—Life in the Mofussil, ii. 94.

[TICKA, s. Hind. tikâ, Skt. tilaka, a mark on the forehead made with coloured earth or unguents, as an ornament, to mark sectarian distinction, accession to the throne, at betrothal, &c.; also a sort of spangle worn on the forehead by women. The word has now been given the additional meaning of the mark made in vaccination, and the tikavâlâ Sahib is the vaccination officer.

[c. 1796.—"... another was sent to Kutch to bring thence the tikâ. ..."—Mir Hussein Ali, Life of Tipu, 251]

[1832.—"In the centre of their foreheads is a teeka (or spot) of lamp-black."—Herklotz, Qaanaq-e-Islam, 2nd ed. 139.]

[c. 1873.—"When a sudden stampede of the children, accompanied by violent yells and sudden falls, has taken place as I entered a village, I have been informed, by way of apology, that it was not I whom the children feared, but that they supposed that I was the Tikawala Sahib."—Panjab Gazetteer, Rohtak, p. 9.]

TICKY-TOCK. This is an unmeaning refrain used in some French songs, and by foreign singing masters in their scales. It would appear from the following quotations to be of Indian origin.

C. 1755.—"These gentry (the band with nautch-girls) are called Tickytaw boys, from the two words Ticky and Taw, which they continually repeat, and which they chant with great vehemence."—Ives, 75.

[c. 1883.—"Each pair of boys then, having privately arranged to represent two separate articles . . . comes up to the captains, and one of the pair says dik dik, daun daun, which apparently has about as much meaning as the analogous English nursery saying, 'Dickory, dickory dock.'"—Panjab Gazetteer, Hogkidarpar, p. 36.]

[TIER-CUTTY, s. This is Malayal. tiyar-katti, the knife used by a Tiyan or tody-drawer for scarifying the palm-trees. The Tiyan caste take their title from Malayal. tiyyan, which again comes from Malayal. tiev, Skt. deîpa, 'an island,' and derive their name from their supposed origin in Ceylon.

[1792.—"12 Tier Cutties."—Account, in Logan, Malabar, iii. 169.

[1793.—"The negadee (naqdi, 'cash-payment') on houses, banksauls (see BANK-SHALL), Tiers' knives."—Ibid. III. 324.]

TIFFIN, s. Luncheon, Anglo-Indian and Hindustani, at least in English households. Also to Tiff, v. to take luncheon. Some have derived this word from Ar. tâfânum, 'diversion, amusement,' but without history, or evidence of such an application of the Arabic word. Others have derived it from Chinese chîh-fan, 'eatrice,' which is only an additional example that anything whatever may be plausibly resolved into Chinese monosyllables. We believe the word to be a local survival of an English colloquial or slang term. Thus we find in the Lexicon Balatronicum, compiled originally by Capt. Grose (1785): "Tiffing, eating or drinking out of meal-times," besides other meanings. Wright (Dict. of Obsolete and Provincial English) has: "Tiff, s. (1) A draught of liquor, (2) Small beer;" and Mr. Davies (Supplemental English Glossary) gives some good quotations both of this substantive and of a verb "to tiff," in the sense of 'take off a draught.' We should conjecture that Grose's sense was a modification of this one, that his "tiffin" was a participial noun from the verb to tiff, and that the Indian tiffin is identical with the participial noun. This has perhaps some corroboration both from the form "tiffin" used in some earlier Indian examples, and from the Indian use of the verb "to Tiff." [This view is accepted by Prof. Skeat, who derives tiff from Norweg. terv, 'a drawing in of the breath, sniff;' tewa, 'to sniff' (Concise Dict. s.v.; and see 9 ser. N. & Q. iv. 425, 460, 506; v. 13.) Rumphius has a curious passage which we have tried in vain to connect with the present word; nor can we find the words he mentions in either Portuguese or Dutch Dictionaries. Speaking of Teddy and the like he says:

"Homines autem qui eas (potiones) colognant ac praeparant, dicuntur Portuallse nomine Tiffadores, atque opus ipsum Tiffor; nostratibus Belgis tyferen" (Herb. Ambboinense, i. 5).

We may observe that the comparatively late appearance of the word tiffin in our documents is perhaps due to the fact that when dinner was early no lunch was customary. But the word, to have been used by an English novelist in 1811, could not then have been new in India.

We now give examples of the various uses:

Tiffin, s. In the old English senses (in which it occurs also in the form tip, and is probably allied to tippie and tipsy); [see Prof. Skeat, quoted above].

(1) For a draught:

1758.—"Monday ... Seven. Returned to my room. Made a tiff of warm punch, and to bed before nine."—Journal of a Senior Fellow, in the Idler, No. 33.

(2) For small beer:

1604.—

"... make waste more prodigal Than when our beer was good, that John may float
To Styx in beer, and lift up Charon's boat
With whalesome waves; and as the conduits ran
With claret at the Coronation,
So let your channels flow with single tiff,
For John I hope is crown'd."

On John Dawson, Butler of Christ Church, in Bishop Corbet's Poems, ed. 1807, pp. 207-8.

TO TIFF, v. in the sense of taking off a draught.

1812.—

"He tiff'd his punch and went to rest."—

Combe, Dr. Sytuzax, I. Canto v.

(This is quoted by Mr. Davies.)

Tiffin (the Indian substantive).

1807.—"Many persons are in the habit of sitting down to a repast at one o'clock, which is called tiffin, and is in fact an early dinner."—Cardiner's Ceylon, i. 83.

1810.—"The (Mohammedan) ladies, like ours, indulge in tiffings (slight repasts), it being delicate to eat but little before company."—Williamson, V. M. i. 352.

", (published 1812) "The dinner is scarcely touched, as every person eats a hearty meal called tiffin, at 2 o'clock, at home."—Maria Graham, 29.

1811.—"Gertrude was a little unfortunate in her situation, which was next below Mrs. Fashionist, and who ... detailed the delights of India, and the routine of its day; the changing linen, the curry-combing ... the idleness, the dissipation, the sleeping and the necessity of sleep, the gay tiffings, were all delightful to her in reciting. ..."—The Countess and Gertrude, or Modes of Discipline, by Laetitia Maria Hawkins, ii. 12.

1824.—"The entreaty of my friends compelled me to remain to breakfast and an early tiffin. ..."—Seely, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iii.

c. 1832.—"Reader! I, as well as Pliny, had an uncle, an East Indian Uncle ... everybody has an Indian Uncle ... He is not always so orientally rich as he is reputed; but he is always orientally munificent. Call upon him at any hour from two till five, he insists on your taking tiffin; and such a tiffin! The English corresponding term is luncheon; but how meagre a shadow is the European meal to its glowing Asiatic cousin."—De Quincey, Cassiulary of Roman Meals, in Works, iii. 259.

1847.—"Come home and have some tiffin, Dobbin," a voice cried behind him, as a pudgy hand was laid on his shoulder ... But the Captain had no heart to go a-feasting with Joe Sedley."—Vanity Fair, ed. 1867, i. 235.

1850.—"A vulgar man who enjoys a champagne tiffin and swindles his servants ... may be a pleasant companion to those who do not hold him in contempt as a vulgar knave, but he is not a gentleman."—Sir C. Napier, Farewell Address.

1853.—"This was the ease for the prosecution. The court now adjourned for tiffin."—Oakfield. 319.

1882.—"The last and most vulgar form of 'nobbling' the press is well known as the luncheon or tiffin trick. It used to be confined to advertising tradesmen and hotelkeepers, and was practised on newspaper reporters. Now it has been practised on a loftier scale. ..."—Saty. Rec., March 25, 357.
921.

TO TIFF, in the Indian sense.

1803.—"He hesitated, and we were interrupted by a summons to TIFF at Floyer's. After TIFF Close said he should be glad to go."—Elphinstone, in Life, i. 116.

1814.—"We found a pool of excellent water, which is scarce on the hills, and laid down to TIFF on a full soft bed, made by the grass of last year and this. After TIFFing I was cold and unwell."—Ibid. p. 288. TIFFing here is a participle, but its use shows how the noun TIFF would be originally formed.

1816.—"The huntsman now informed them all they were to TIFF at Bobby's Hall. Mounted again, the party starts, upsets the hackeries and carts, Hammels (see HUMMAUL) and panquins and doolies, Dolies (see DHOB) and burrawas (?) and coolies."

The Grand Master, or Adventures of Qui Hi, by Quiz (Canto viii.), [Burrawa is probably H. bhavā, 'a pander.]

1829.—"I was TIFFing with him one day, when the subject turned on the sagacity of elephants. . . ."

1830.—"Go home, Jack. I will TIFF with you to-day at half-past two."—J. Lang, Wanderings in India, p. 16.

The following, which has just met our eye, is bad grammar, according to Anglo-Indian use:

1885.—"Look here, RANDOLPH, don't you know,' said Sir PEEL, . . . 'Here you've been gallivanting through India, riding on elephants, and TIFFING with Rajahs. . . ."

—Punch, Essence of Parliament, April 25, p. 204.

TIGER, s. The royal tiger was apparently first known to the Greeks by the expedition of Alexander, and a little later by a live one which Seleucus sent to Athens. The animal became, under the Emperors, well known to the Romans, but fell out of the knowledge of Europe in later days, till it again became familiar in India. The Greek and Latin tigra, tigris, is said to be from the old Persian word for an arrow, tirga, which gives the modern Pers. (and Hind.) tir.*

* Sir H. Rawlinson gives tirga as old Persian for an arrow (see Herod. vol. iii. p. 509). Vullers seems to consider it rather an induction than a known word for an arrow. He says: "Besides the name of that river (Tigris) Arvand, which often occurs in the Skt. Aryan, and which properly signifies 'running' or 'swift; another Medo-peric name Tigris is found in the cuneiform inscriptions, and is cognate with the Zend word tedhara, tedhrara, and Pehlevi tedhara, i.e. 'a running river,' which is included in Anquetil's vocabulary. And these, along with the Persian tej 'an arrow,' tegh 'a sword,' teh and teg 'sharp,' are to be referred Pliny says of the River Tigris: "a celeritate Tigris incipit vocari. Ita appellant Medii sagittam" (vi. 27). In speaking of the animal and its "velocitatis tremendae," Pliny evidently glances at this etymology, real or imaginary. So does Pausanias probably, in his remarks on its colour. [This view of the origin of the name is accepted by Schrader (Prehist. Ant. of the Aryan Peoples, E.T. 250), who writes: "Nothing like so far back in the history of the Indo-Europeans does the lion's dreadful rival for supremacy over the beasts, the tiger, go. In India the songs of the Rigveda have nothing to say about him; his name (vṛṣṭhār) first occurs in the Atharvaveda, i.e. at a time when the Indian immigration must have extended much farther towards the Ganges; for it is in the reeds and grasses of Bengal that we have to look for the tiger's proper home. Nor is he mentioned among the beasts of prey in the Avesta. The district of Hycania, whose numerous tigers the later writers of antiquity speak of with especial frequency, was then called Vörkhanu, 'wolf-land. It is, therefore, not improbable that the tiger has spread in relatively late times from India over portions of W. and N. Asia."

C. B.C. 325.—"The Indians think the Tiger (τίγρας) a great deal strongener than the elephant. Nearchus says he saw the skin of a tiger, but did not see the beast itself, and that the Indians assert the tiger to be as big as the biggest horse; whilst in swiftness and strength there is no creature to be compared to him. And when he engages the elephant he springs on its head, and easily throttles it. Moreover, the creatures which we have seen and call tigers are only jackals which are dabped, and of a kind bigger than ordinary jackals."—Arrian, Indica, xv. We apprehend that this big dabped jackal (θος) is meant for a hyaena.

C. B.C. 322.—"In the island of Tylos . . . there is also another wonderful thing they say . . . for there is a certain tree, from which they cut sticks, and these are very handsome articles, having a certain variegated colour, like the skin of a tiger. The wood is very heavy; but if it is struck against any solid substance it shivers like a piece of to the Zend root tikkha, Skt. tij. 'to sharpen.' The Persian word tir, 'an arrow,' may be of the same origin, since its primitive form appears to be tigra, from which it seems to come by elision of the g, as the Skt. tir, 'arrow,' comes from tiga for tigra, where it seems to have taken the place of g. From the word tirga . . . seem also to be derived the usual names of the river Tigris, Pers. Dizka, Ar. Diflah." (Vullers, s.v. tir).

pottery."—Theophrastus, H. of Plants, Bk. v. c. 4.

c. b.c. 321.—"And Ulpianus ... said: 'Do we anywhere find the word used a masculine, τῶν τιγρέων? for I know that Philemon says thus in his Neera:

'A. We've seen the tigress (τῶν τιγρέων) that Seleucus sent us; Are we not bound to send Seleucus back Some beast in fair exchange? '

In Athenaeus, xiii. 57.

c. b.c. 320.—"According to Megasthenes, the largest tigers are found among the Prasi, almost twice the size of lions, and of such strength that a tame one led by four persons seized a mule by its hinder leg, overpowered it, and dragged it to him."—Strabo, xv. ch. 1, § 57 (Hamilton and Falconer's E.T. iii. 97).

c. b.c. 19.—"And Augustus came to Samos, and again passed the winter there ... and all sorts of embassies came to him; and the Indians who had previously sent messengers praying friendship, now sent to make a solemn treaty, with presents, and among other things including tigers, which were then seen for the first time by the Romans; and if I am not mistaken by the Greeks also."—Dio Cassius, liv. 9. [See Merivale, Hist. Romana, ed. 1865, iv. 176.]

c. b.c. 19.—

c. a.d. 70.—"The Emperor Augustus ... in the yeere that Q. Tubero and Fabius Maximus were Consuls together ... was the first of all others that showed a tame tygre within a cage: but the Emperor Claudius foure at once. ... Tygres are bred in Hircania and India: this beast is most dreadful for incomparable swiftness."—Pliny, by Ph. Holland, i. 204.

c. 80-90.—"Wherefore the land is called Dachenanabades (see DECCAN), for the South is called Dachanas in their tongue. And the land that lies in the interior above this towards the East embraces many tracts, some of them of deserts or of great mountains, with all kinds of wild beasts, panthers and tigers (τίγρεως) and elephants, and immense serpents (δράκωντας) and hyaenas (κοκκύτας) and cynocephala of many species, and many and populous nations till you come to the Ganges."—Periplus, § 60.

c. a.d. 180.—"That beast again, in the talk of Ctesias about the Indians, which is alleged to be called by them Martíca (Martichóra), and by the Greeks Androphagenus (Mam-eater), I am convinced is really the tiger (τίγρας). The story that he has a triple range of teeth in each jaw, and sharp pricks at the tip of his tail which he shoots at those who are at a distance, like the arrows of an archer,—I don't believe it to be true, but only to have been generated by the excessive fear which the beast inspires. They have been wrong also about his colour;—no doubt when they see him in the bright sunlight he takes that colour and looks red; or perhaps it may be because of his going so fast, and because even when not running he is constantly darting from side to side; and then (to be sure) it is always from a long way off that they see him."—Pausanias, xxi. 4. [See Frazer's tr. i. 470; v. 86. Martichora is here Pers. marundikakor, 'eater of men.]

1298.—"Enchose sachiés qe the Grant Sire a bien leopars aseu qe tuit sunt bon da chacér et da prendre bestes. ... Il ha plosors lyon grandissims, greignors aseu qe céle de Babilonie. Il sunt de molt biais poil et de molt biais colour, car il sunt tout vergés por lone, noir et vermil blanc. Il sunt aseu qe prante enguins sauvaç par leu sauvaç, et orse et asnes sauvaçs et cerf et cavirols et autres bestes."—Marco Polo, Geog. Text, ch. xci. Thus Marco Polo can only speak of this huge animal, striped black and red and white, as of a Lion. And a medieval Bestiary has a chapter on the Tigre which begins: "Une Beste est qui est appelée Tigre, c'est une maniere de serpent."—Cahier et Martin, Mélanges d'Antiquité, i. 140.

1474.—"This means while there came in certain men sent from a Prince of India, with certain strange beasts, the first whereof was a leona ledde in a chayne by one that had skyll, which they call in their language Babureth. She is like unto a lyonesse; but she is redde coloured, streaked all over with black strikes; her face is redde with certain white and blacque spots, the bealy white, and tayled like the lyon: seemingy to be a marivellouse fiers beast."—Josuá Barbero, Hak. Soc. pp. 63-54. Here again is an excellent description of a tiger, but that name seems unknown to the traveller. Babureth is in the Ital. original Baburth, Pers. babr, a tiger.

1553.—"... Beginning from the point of Çingapura and all the way to Pulcoamblam, i.e. the whole length of the Kingdom of Malaca ... there is no other town with a name except this City of Malaca, only some havens of fishermen, and in the interior a very few villages. And indeed the most of these wretched people sleep at the top of the highest trees they can find, for up to a height of 20 palms the tigers can seize them at a leap; and if anything saves the poor people from these beasts it is the bonfires they keep burning at night, which the tigers are much afraid of. In fact these are so numerous that many come into the city itself at night in search of prey. And it has happened, since we took the town, that a tiger leapte into a garden surrounded by a good high timber fence, and lifted a beam of wood with three slaves who were laid by the heels, and with these made a clean leap over the fence."—Barros, II. vi. 1. Lest I am doing the great historian wrong as to this Munchhausen—like story, I give the original: 'E já aconteceu ... saltar hum tigre em hum quintal cercado de madeira bem alta, a levar a hum tronco de madeira com tres (tres!) esvaios que estavam prezos nelle, com os quaes saltou de claro em claro per cima da cerca.' 1583.—“We also escaped the peril of the multitude of tigers which infest those tracts” (the Pegu delta) ‘and prey on whatever they can get at. And although we were on that account anchored in midstream, nevertheless it was observed that the ferocity of these animals was such that they would press even into the water to seize their prey.” —Gasparo Balbi, f. 94v.

1586.—“We went through the wilderness because the right way was full of thieves, when we passed the country of Gourer, where we found but few Villages, but almost all Wilderness, and saw many Buffes, Swine, and Deere, Grasse longer than a man, and very many Tigres.” —R. Fitch, in Purchas, ii. 1736.

1675.—“Going in quest whereof, one of our Soldiers, a Youth, killed a Tigre-Royal; it was brought home by 30 or 40 Cubbies (Koonbee), the Body tied to a long Bamboo, the Tail extended. . . . it was a Tigre of the Biggest and Noblest Kind, Five Feet in Length beside the Tail, Three and a Half in Height, it was of a light Yellow, streaked with Black, like a Tabby Cat . . . the Visage Fierce and Majestic, the Teeth gnashing.” —Fryer, 176.

1683.—“In ye afternoon they found a great Tiger, one of ye black men shot a barbed arrow into his Buttock. Mr. Frenchfeld and Capt. Raynes alighted off their horses and advanced towards the thickest where ye Tiger lay. The people making a great noise, ye Tiger flew out upon Mr. Frenchfeld, and he shot him with a brace of Bullets into ye breast: at which he made a great noise, and returned again to his den. The Black Men seeing of him wounded fell upon him, but the Tiger had so much strength as to kill 2 men, and wound a third, before he died. At Night ye Ragaee sent me the Tiger.” —Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 66-67.

1754.—“There was a Charter granted to the East India Company. Many Disputes arose about it, which came before Parliament; all Arts were used to corrupt or delude the Members; among others a Tiger was baited with Solomony, on the Day the great Question was to come on. This was such a Novelty, that several of the Members were drawn off from their Attendance, and absent on the Division . . .” —A Collection of Letters relating to the E.I. Company, &c. (Tract), 1754, p. 13.

1869.—“Les tigres et les léopards sont considérés, autant par les Hindous que par les musulmans, comme étant la propriété des pers (see BEE) ; aussi les natures du pays ne sympathisent pas avec les Européens pour la chasse du tigre.” —García de Tussy, Rel. Mus. p. 24.

1879.—“One of the Frontier Battalion soldiers approached me, running for his life. . . . This was his story:—

‘Sahib, I was going along with the letters . . . which I had received from your highness . . . a great tiger came out and stood in the path. Then I feared for my life; and the tiger stood, and I stood, and we looked at each other. I had no weapon but my kukri (Kookry) . . . and the Government letters. So I said, ‘My lord Tiger, here are the Government letters, the letters of the Honourable Kumpany Bahadur . . . and it is necessary for me to go on with them.’ The tiger never ceased looking at me, and when I had done speaking he growled, but he never offered to get out of the way. On this I was much more afraid, so I kneeled down and made obeisance to him; but he did not take any more notice of either, so at last I told him I should report the matter to the Sahib, and I threw down the letters in front of him, and came here as fast as I was able. Sahib, I now ask for your justice against that tiger.’ ” —I. T. Col. T. Leving, A Fly on the Wheel, p. 444.

TINCALL, s. Borax. Pers. tinkar, but apparently originally Skt. tankana, and perhaps from the people so called who may have supplied it, in the Hindālaya† Tāγγαν of Ptolemy. [Mr. Atkinson (Himalayan Gaz. ii. 357) connects the name of this people with that of the tanguin.]

1526.—“Tymquall, small, 60 tangas a maund.” —Lemmbranga, 50.

1563.—“It is called boraz and crisiocrata; and in Arabic tincar, and so the Guzeratis call it.” —Gardner, f. 78.

c. 1500.—“Having reduced the Kharal to small bits, he adds to every man of it 1 3/4 sers of tangar (borax) and 3 sers of pounded natrum, and kneads them together.” —Ain, i. 26.

(1757.—“A small quantity of Tuteneeg (Tootnague), Tinkal and Japan Copper was also found here. . . .” —Ives, 105.)

TINDAL, s. Malayil. tundal, Telug. tandelu, also in Mahr. and other vernaculars tandel, tandail, [which Platt connects with tanda, Skt. tantru, ‘a line of men,’ but the Madras Gloss. derives the S. Indian forms from Mal. tanda, ‘an ear, walls, ‘to pull.’ ] The head or commander of a body of men; but in ordinary specific application a native petty officer of lascars, whether on board ship (boatswain) or in the ordnance department, and sometimes the head of a gang of labourers on public works.

c. 1348. —“The second day after our arrival at the port of Kaliukari this prince invited the nakkodak (Nacoda) or owner of the ship, the kardai (see CRANNY) or clerk, the merchant, the persons of distinction, the tandil. . . .” — Ibn Batuta, iv. 250. The Moorish traveller explains the words as muk-adam (Mocuddum, q.v.) al-rajal, which the French translators render as ‘général des pistons,” but we may hazard the correction of “Master of the crew.”

1590.—“In large ships there are twelve classes. 1. The Nakudda, or owner of the ship. . . . 3. The Tandil, or chief of the khudris (see CLASSY) or sailors. . . .” —\(\text{\textit{Tu}},\) i. 289.

1673.—“The Captain is called Nuquedah, the boatswain Tindal. . . .” —\(\text{\textit{Fryer}},\) 107.

1758.—“One Tindal, or Corporal of Lascars.” —\(\text{\textit{Orme}},\) ii. 339.

[1826.—“I desired the tindal, or steersman to answer, ‘Bombay.'” —\(\text{\textit{Pandurong Hari}},\) ed. 1873, ii. 157.]

TINNEVELLY, n.p. A town and district of Southern India, probably Tiru-nel-elli, ‘Sacred Rice-hedge.' [The Madras Gloss. gives ‘Sacred Paddy-village.' ] The district formed the southern part of the Madura territory, and first became a distinct district about 1744, when the Madura Kingdom was incorporated with the territories under the Nawab of Arcot (Caldwell, H. of Tinnevelly).

TIPARRY, s. Beng. and Hind. tipāri, tepāri, the fruit of Physalis peruviana, L., N.O. Solanaceae. It is also known in India as ‘Cape gooseberry,’ [which is usually said to take its name from the Cape of Good Hope, but as it is a native of tropical America, Mr. Ferguson (8 ser. N. & O. xii, 106) suggests that the word may really be capé or capy, from the peculiarity of its structure noted below.] It is sometimes known as ‘Brazil cherry.’ It gets its generic name from the fact that the inflated calyx encloses the fruit as in a bag or bladder (góra). It has a slightly acid gooseberry flavour, and makes excellent jam. We have seen a suggestion somewhere that the Bengali name is connected with the word tepāri, ‘inflated,’ which gives its name to a species of tetrodon or globe-fish, a fish which has the power of dilating the oesophagus in a singular manner. The native name of the fruit in N.W. India is māk or mako, but tipāri is in general Anglo-Indian use. The use of an almost identical name for a gooseberry-like fruit, in a Polynesian Island (Kingsmill group) quoted below from Wilkes, is very curious, but we can say no more on the matter.

1845.—“On Makin they have a kind of fruit resembling the gooseberry, called by the natives ‘teiparu;' this they pound, after it is dried, and make with molasses into cakes, which are sweet and pleasant to the taste.” —\(\text{\textit{U.S. Expedition}},\) by C. Wilkes, U.S.N., v. 81.

TIPPOO SAHIB, n.p. The name of this famous enemy of the English power in India was, according to C. P. Brown, taken from that of Tipu Sultân, a saint whose tomb is near Hyderabad. [Wilks (Hist. Sketches, i. 522, ed. 1869), says that the tomb is at Arcot.]

TIRKUT, s. Foresail. Sea Hind. from Port. triquette (Roebuck).

TIYAN, n.p. Malayâl. Tiyan, or Tivan, pl. Týgar or Tývar. The name of what may be called the third caste (in rank) of Malabar. The word signifies ‘islander,' [from Mal. týva, Skt. dvípa, ‘an island’] and the people are supposed to have come from Ceylon (see TIER CUTTY).

1510.—“The third class of Pagans are called Tiva, who are artisans.” —\(\text{\textit{Varthema}},\) 142.

1516.—“The cleanest of these low and rustic people are called Tivas (read Tivas), who are great labourers, and their chief business is to look after the palm-trees, and gather their fruit, and carry everything . . . for hire, because there are no draught cattle in the country.” —\(\text{\textit{Barbou}},\) Lisbon ed. 395.

[1800.—“All Tirs can eat together, and intermarry. The proper duty of the cast is to extract the juice from palm-trees, to boil it down to Jaggery (Jaggery), and to distil it into spirituous liquors; but they are also very diligent as cultivators, porters, and cutters of firewood.” —\(\text{\textit{Buchanan, Myares}},\) ii. 415; and see Logan, Malabar, i. 116, 142.]

TOBACCO, s. On this subject we are not prepared to furnish any elaborate article, but merely to bring together a few quotations touching on the introduction of tobacco into India and the East, or otherwise of interest.

[? c. 1550.—“. . . Abû Kir would carry the cloth to the market-street and sell it, and with its price buy meat and vegetables and tobacco . . .” —\(\text{\textit{Burton, Arab. Nights}},\) vii. 210. The only mention in the Nights and the insertion of some scribe.]

”. . . It has happened to me several times, that going through the provinces of Guatemala and Nicaragua I have entered the house of an Indian who had taken this herb, which in the Mexican language is called tabacco, and immediately perceived the sharp fetid smell of this truly diabolical and stinking smoke, I was obliged to go away, and seek some other place."

"—Giovanni Benzoni, Hak. Soc. p. 81. [The word tobacco is from the language of Hayti, and meant, first, the pipe, secondly, the plant, thirdly, the sleep which followed its use (Mr. J. Platt, 9 ser. N. & Q. viii. 322).]

1555.—"Et hi" (viz. Ralph Lane and the first settlers in Virginia) "reduces Indicam illam plantam quam Tabacum vacant et Nicotiam, qua contra cruditates ab Indis edocit, usi erant, in Angliam primi, quod suam, intulerunt. Ex illo sano tempore usu coopit esse cereberrimo, et magno praetio, dum quam plurimi graveolentem illius fumum, alii lascivientes, alii valutudini consulent, per tubulum testaceum inexplebili aviditate passum haurnunt, et mox e maribus effluant; adeo ut tabernae Tabaccanae non minus quam cervisieriae et vinarine passim per oppida habentur, Ut Anglorum corpora (quod salse ille dixit) qui hae plantae tantopere delectantur in Barbarorum naturam degenerasse videantur; quam lisdem quibus Barbari delectentur et sanari se posse credant." —Gul. Camdeni, Annal. Kervum Anglicannm... regn. Elizabetha, ed. 1717, ii. 449.

1592.—"Into the woods thence forth in haste she went To seek for hearbes that mote him remedy; For shee of herbes had great intendment, Taught of the Nymphe which from her infancy Her nursed had in true Nobility: This whether yt divine Tobacco were, Or Panchaee, or Polygony, Shee found, and brought it to her patient deare Who al this while lay bleeding out his hart-blood neare." The Faerie Queen, III. v. 32.

1597.—"His Lordship" (E. of Essex at Villafranca) "made no answer, but called for tobacco, seeming to give but small credit to this alarm; and so on horseback, with these noblemen and gentlemen on foot beside him, took tobacco, whilst I was telling his Lordship of the men I had sent forth, and the order I had given them. Within some quarter of an hour, we might hear a good round volley of shot betwixt the 30 men I had sent to the chapel, and the enemy, which made his Lordship cast his pipe from him, and listen to the shooting." —Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, p. 62.

1598.—"Cob. Ods me I marle what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this roguish tobacco. It is good for nothing but to choke a man, and fill him full of smoking embres: there were four died out of one house last week with taking of it, and two more the boll went for yesternight; one of them they say will never scape it; he voided a bushel of sot yesterday upward and downward... its little better than rats-bane or rosaker." —Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

1604.—"Oct. 19. Demise to Tho. Lane and Ph. Bold of the new Impost of 6s. 8d., and the old Custom of 2s. per pound on tobacco." —Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, James I., p. 159.

1604 or 1605.—"In Bijaipur I had found some tobacco. Never having seen the like in India, I brought some with me, and prepared a handsome pipe of jewel work. ... His Majesty (Akbare) was enjoying himself after receiving my presents, and asking me how I had collected so many strange things in so short a time, when his eye fell upon the tray with the pipe and its appurtenances: he expressed great surprise and examined the tobacco, which was made up in pipprels; he inquired what it was, and where I had got it. The Nawab Khân-i-'Azam replied: 'This is tobacco, which is well known in Mecca and Medina, and this doctor has brought it as a medicine for your Majesty.' His Majesty looked at it, and ordered me to prepare and take him a pipprel. He began to smoke it, when his physicians and apothecaries had his doing so... (omitting much that is curious). As I had brought a large supply of tobacco and pipes, I sent some to several of the nobles, while others sent to ask for some; indeed all, without exception, wanted some, and the practice was introduced. After that the merchants began to sell it, so the custom of smoking spread rapidly."—Assal Beg, in Elliot, vi. 165-167.

1610.—"The Turks are also incredible takers of Opium... carrying it about with them both in peace and in warre, which they say expellet all feares, and makes them courageous; but I rather think giddily headed. ... And perhaps for the self same cause they also delight in Tobacco; they take it through reeds that have synoned unto them great heads of wood to containe it: I doubt not but lately taught them, as brought them by the English: and were it not sometimes looke into (for Moral Bassa is not long since commanded a pipe to be thrust through the nose of a Turk, and so to be led in derision through the Citie,) no question but it would prove a principall commodity. Nevertheless they will take it in corners, and are so ignorant therein, that that which in England is not saleable, doth passe here amongst them for most excellent."—Sandys, Journey, 96.

1615.—"Il tabacco ancora usano qui" (at Constantinople) "di piglier in conversazione per gusto: ma io non ho voluto mai provarne, e ne avera cognizione in Italia che molti ne pigliano, ed in particolare il signore cardinal Crescenzo qualche volta per medicamento insegnatogli dal Signor don Virgilio Orsino, che primo di tutti, se io non fallo, gli anni addietro lo portò in Roma d'Inghilterra."—P. della Valle, i. 76.

1616.—"Such is the miraculous omnipotence of our strong tasted Tobacco, as it cures al sorts of diseases (which neuer any druggue could do before) in all persons and at all times... It cures the gout in the feet (and which is miraculous) in that very instant when the smoke thereof, as light, flies up into the head, the virtue thereof, as heavy, runs down to the little toe. It helps all sorts of agues. It refreshes a weary man, and yet makes a man hungry. Being taken when they goe to bed, it makes one sleepe soundly, and yet being taken when a man is sleeptime and drowsie, it will, as they say, awake his braine, and quicken his understanding. . . . O omnipotent power of Tobacco! And if it could by the smoke thereof chase out deulis, as the smoke of Tobias fish did (which I am sure could smell no stronger) it would serve for a precious Relicke, both for the Superstitious Priests, and the insolent Puritaines, to cast out deulis withall."—K. James I., Counterblaste to Tobacco, in Works, pp. 219-220.

1617.—"As the smoking of tobacco (tambâkû) had taken very bad effect upon the health and mind of many persons, I ordered that no one should practise the habit. My brother Shîh 'Abbâs, also being aware of its evil effects, had issued a command against the use of it in Iran. But Khân-i-Âlam was so much addicted to smoking, that he could not abstain from it, and often smoked."—Memoirs of Jahangir, in Elliot, p. 501. See the same passage rendered by Blochmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 164.

1623.—"Incipi nostro seculo in immensus crescere uus Tobaco, atque affict homines occulta quidem delectatione, ut qui illi semel assueti sint, difficile postea abstinent."—Bacon, H. Vitae et Moritis, in B. Montague's ed. x. 189.

We are unable to give the date or Persian author of the following extract (though clearly of the 17th century), which with an introductory sentence we have found in a fragmentary note in the handwriting of the late Major William Yule, written in India about the beginning of last century: *

"Although Tobacco be the produce of an European Plant, it has nevertheless been in use by our Physicians medicinally for some time past. Nay, some creditable People even have been friendly to the use of it, though from its having been brought sparingly in the first instance from Europe, its rarity prevented it from coming into general use. The Culture of this Plant, however, became speedily almost universal, within a short period after its introduction into Hindostaun; and the produce of it rewarded the Cultivator far beyond every other article of Husbandry. This became more especially the case in the reign of Shah Jehan (commenced A.H. 1037) when the Practice of Smoking pervaded all Ranks and Classes within the Empire. Nobles and Beggars, Pious and Wicked, Devotees and Free-thinkers, poets, historians, rhetoricians, doctors and patients, high and low, rich and poor, all! all seemed intoxicated with a decided preference over every other luxury, may even often over the necessaries of life. To a stranger no offering was so acceptable as a Whiff, and to a friend one could produce nothing half so grateful as a Chillum. So rooted was the habit that the confirmed Smoker would abstain from Food and Drink rather than relinquish the gratification he derived from inhaling the Fumes of this delterious Plant! Nature recollects at the very idea of touching the Sallis of another Person, yet in the present instance our Tobacco smokers pass the moistened Tube from one mouth to another without hesitation on the one hand, and it is received with complacency on the other! The more acrid the Fumes so much the more grateful to the Palate of the Connois- seur. The Smoke is a Collyrium to the Eyes, whilst the Fire, they will tell you, supplies to the Body the waste of radical Heat. Without doubt the Hookah is a most pleasing Companion, whether to the Wayworn Traveller or to the solitary Hermit. It is a Friend in whose Bosom we may repose our most confidential Secrets; and a Councillor upon whose advice we may rely in our most important Concerns. It is an elegant Ornament in our private Appart- ments: it gives joy to the Beholder in our publick Places. The Music of its sound puts the warbling of the Nightingale to Shame, and the Fragrance of its Perfume brings a Blush on the Cheek of the Rose. Life in short is prolonged by the Fumes inhaled at each inspiration, whilst every expiration of them is accompanied with extatic de- light. . . ."—(cetera desunt).

c. 1760.—"Tambâkû. It is known from the Madoir-i-Rakhbar that the tobacco came from Europe to the Dakhin, and from the Dakhin to Upper India, during the reign of Akbar Shâh (1566-1605), since which time it has been in general use."—Bahr-i-Fajr, quoted by Blochmann, in Ind. Antiq. i. 164.

1875.—It appears from Miss Bird's Japan that tobacco was not cultivated in that country till 1605. In 1612 and 1615 the Shogun prohibited both culture and use of tabako. —See the work, i. 276-77. [According to Mr. Chamberlain (Things Japanese, 3rd ed. p. 402) by 1651 the law was so far relaxed that smoking was permitted, but only out-of-doors.]

TOBRA, s. Hind. tobrâ, [which, according to Platts, is Skt. prothâ, 'nose of a horse,' inverted]. The leather nose-bag in which a horse's feed is administered. "In the Ner- budda valley, in Central India, the women wear a profusion of toe-rings, some standing up an inch high. Their shoes are consequently curiously shaped, and are called tobras." (M.-Gen. R. H.}

* Some notice of Major Yule, whose valuable Oriental MSS. were presented to the British Mu- seum after his death, will be found in Dr. Rieu's Preface to the Catalogue of Persian MSS. (vol. iii. p. xviii.).
Keatinge). As we should say, 'buckets.' [The use of the nosebag is referred to by Sir T. Herbert (ed. 1634): 'The horses (of the Persians) feed usually of barley and chopt-straw put into a bag, and fastened about their heads, which implies the manger.' Also see TURA.]

1808.—"... stable-boys are apt to serve themselves to a part out of the poor beasts allowance; to prevent which a thrifty housewife sees it put into a tobra, or mouth bag, and spits thereon to make the Hostler lose the and leave it alone."—Drummond, Illustrations, &c.

[1875.—"One of the horsemen dropped his tobra or nose-bag."—Drew, Junimoa, 249.]

TODDY, s. A corruption of Hind. tārī, i.e. the fermented sap of the tār or palmyra, Skt. tāla, and also of other palms, such as the date, the coco-palm, and the Caryota urens; palm-wine. Toddy is generally the substance used in India as yeast, to leaven bread. The word, as is well known, has received a new application in Scotland, the immediate history of which we have not traced. The tāla-tree seems to be indicated, though confusingly, in this passage of Megasthenes from Arrian:

c. B.C. 320.—"Megasthenes tells us... the Indians were in old times nomad... were so barbarous that they wore the skins of such wild animals as they could kill, and subsisted (?) on the bark of trees; that these trees were called in the Indian speech tala, and that there grew on them as there grows at the tops of the (date) palm trees, a fruit resembling balls of wool."—Arrian, Indica, vii., tr. by McCrindle.

c. 1390.—"... There is another tree of a different species, which... gives all the year round a white liquor, pleasant to drink, which tree is called tari."—Fr. Jordanus, 16.

[1554.—"There is in Gujarat a tree of the palm-tribe, called tari agadji (millet tree). From its branches cups are suspended, and when the cut end of a branch is placed into one of these vessels, a sweet liquid, something of the nature of arrack, flows out in a continuous stream... and presently changes into a most wonderful wine."—Travels of Sidi Ali Rëis, trans. A. Vumbéry, p. 29.]

[1609-10. — "Tarree." See under SURA.]

1611.—"Palmiti Wine, which they call Taddy."—N. Doustoun, in Purchas, i. 298.

[1614.—"A sort of wine that distiloth out of the Palmetto trees, called Tadie."—Foster, Letters, iii. 4.]

1615.—"... And then more to glad yee Weele have a health to al our friends in Tades."—Verses to T. Coryat, in Crudities, iii. 47.

1623.—"... on board of which we stayed till nightfall, entertaining with conversation and drinking tari, a liquor which is drawn from the coco-nut trees, of a whitish colour, a little turbid, and of a somewhat rough taste, though with a blending in sweetness, and not unpalatable, something like one of our vinis piacenti. It will also intoxicate, like wine, if drunk over freely."—P. della Valle, ii. 590; [Hak. Soc. i. 62.]

[1634.—"The Toddy-tree is like the Date of Palm; the Wine called Toddy is got by winding and piercing the Tree, and putting a Jar or Pitcher under it, so as the Liquor may drop into it."—Sir T. Herbert, in Harris, i. 408.]

1648.—"The country... is planted with palmito-trees, from which a sap is drawn called Terry, that they very commonly drink."—Van Twist, 12.

1653.—"... le tari qui est le vin ordinaire des Indes."—De la Boullaye-le-Gonz, 246.

1673.—"The Natives singing and roaring all Night long; being drunk with Toddy, the Wine of the Cococe."—Fryer, 53.

"... As for the rest, they are very respectful, unless the Seamen and Soldiers get drunk, either with Toddy or Bang."—Ibid. 91.

1686.—"Besides the Liquor or Water in the Fruit, there is also a sort of Wine drawn from the Tree called Toddy, which looks like Whey."—Dampier, i. 293.

1705.—"... cette liqueur s'appelle tari."—Lullier, 43.

1710.—This word was in common use at Madras.—Wheeler, ii. 125.

1750.—"J. Was vor Leute trincken Taddy? C. Die Soldaten, die Land Portugiesen, die Parrier (see PARIAH) und Schiffeleute trincken diesen Taddy."—Madras, oder Fort St. George, &c., Halle, 1750.

1857.—"It is the unfermented juice of the Palmyra which is used as food: when allowed to ferment, which it will do before midday, if left to itself, it is changed into a sweet, intoxicating drink called 'kal' or toddy."—Bp. Caldwell, Lectures on Timewell Mission, p. 93.

"The Rat, returning home full of Toddy, said, If I meet the Cat, I will tear him in pieces."—Ceylon Proverb, in Ind. Antig. i. 99.

Of the Scotch application of the word we can find but one example in Burns, and, strange to say, no mention in Jameson's Dictionary:
1785.—

"The lads an' lasses, blythebly bent
To mind baith saul an' body,
Sit round the table, weel content
An' steer about the toddy..."

Burns, The Holy Fair.

1798.—"Action of the case, for giving her a dose in some toddy, to intoxicate and inflame her passions."—Roots' Reports, i. 80, 1804.

"... I've nae fear for't;
For siller, faith, ye ne'er did care for't,
Unless to help a needful body,
An' get an antrin glass o' toddy."

Tannahill, Epistle to James Barr.

TODDY-BIRD, s. We do not know for certain what bird is meant by this name in the quotation. The nest would seem to point to the Baya or Weaver-bird (Plœces Baya, Blyth): but the size alleged is absurd; it is probably a blunder. [Another bird, the Artamus fuscus, is, according to Balfour (Cyc. s.v.) called the toddy shrike.]

[1673.—"For here is a Bird (having its name from the Tree it chuses for its Sanctuary, the toddy-tree). ..."—Fryer, 76.]

| 1750-60. | "It is in this tree (see PALMYRA, BRAB) that the toddy-birds, so called from their attachment to that tree, make their exquisite curious nests, wrought out of the thinnest reeds and filaments of branches, with an inimitable mechanism, and are about the bigness of a partridge (?)... The birds themselves are of no value. ..."—Grose, i. 48. |

TODDY-CAT, s. This name is in S. India applied to the Paradoxurus Musanga, Jerdon: [the P. niger, the Indian Palm-Civet of Blanford (Manmalia, 106)]. It infests houses, especially where there is a ceiling of cloth (see CHUTT). Its name is given for its fondness, real or supposed, for palm-juice.

TOKO, s. Slang for 'a thrashing.' The word is imder, of Hind. tokṁa, 'to censure, blame,' and has been converted into a noun on the analogy of bunnow and other words of the same kind.

[1823.—"Toco for yam—Yams are food for negroes in the W. Indies... and it, instead of receiving his proper ration of these, blackee gets a whip (toco) about his back, why he's caught toco instead of yam."

—John Bee, Slang Dict.

1867.—"Toko for Yam. An expression peculiar to negroes for crying out before being hurt."—Smyth, Sailor's Word-Book, s.v.]

TOLA, s. An Indian weight (chiefly of gold or silver), not of extreme antiquity. Hind. told, Skt. tula, 'a balance,' tul, 'to lift up, to weigh.' The Hindu scale is 8 rattis (see RUTTEE) = 1 māsha, 12 māshas = 1 told. Thus the told was equal to 96 rattis. The proper weight of the ratti, which was the old Indian unit of weight, has been determined by Mr. E. Thomas as 1.75 grains, and the medieval tanga which was the prototype of the rupee was of 100 rattis weight. "But... the factitious ratti of the Muslims was merely an aliquot part—3/16 of the comparatively recent tola, and 1/16 of the newly devised rupee." By the Regulation VII. of 1833, putting the British India coinage on its present footing (see under SEER) the told weighing 180 grs., which is also the weight of the rupee, is established by the Regulation, as such the unit of the system of weights, 80 tolas = 1 ser, 40 sers = 1 Maund.

1563.—"I knew a secretary of Nizamoxa (see NIZAMALUCO), a native of Coraçon, who ate every day three tollas (of opium), which is the weight of ten cruzados and a half; but this Coraçonni (Khoraṣanī), though he was a man of letters and a great scribe and official, was always nodding or sleeping."—Garcia, i. 155b.

1610.—"A Tole is a rupee challany of silver, and ten of these Toles are the value of one of gold."—Hawkins, in Purchas, i. 217.

1615-16.—"Two tole and a half being an ounce."—Sir T. Roe, in Purchas, i. 545; [Hak. Soc. i. 183].

1676.—"Over all the Empire of the Great Mogul, all the Gold and Silver is weigh'd with Weights, which they call Tolla, which amounts to 9 deniers and eight grains of our weight."—Tavernier, E.T. ii. 18; [ed. Ball, t. 11].

TOMAUN, s. A Mongol word, signifying 10,000, and constantly used in the histories of the Mongol dynasties for a division of an army theoretically consisting of that number. But its modern application is to a Persian money, at the present time worth about 7s. 6d. [In 1899 the exchange was about 53 crans to the £1; 10 Crans = 1 tumăn.] Till recently it was only a money of account, representing 10,000 dīnārs; the latter also having been in Persia for centuries only a money of account, constantly degenerating in value. The tomaun in Fryer's time (1677) is reckoned by him as equal to £3, 6s. 8d. P. della Valle's estimate 60 years earlier would give about £4, 10s. 0d., and is perhaps loose and too high. Sir T. Herbert's valuation (5 x 13s. 8d.) is the same as Fryer's. In the first and third of the following quotations we have the word in the Tartar military sense, for a division of 10,000 men:

1209.—"You see when a Tartar prince goes forth to war, he takes with him, say, 100,000 horse . . . they call the corps of 100,000 men a Tuc; that of 10,000 they call a Toman."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 54.

c. 1340.—"Ces deux portions réunies formaient un total de 800 toumans, dont chacun vaut 10,000 dinars courants, et le dinar 6 dirhems."—Shikhuddin, Masalat-at Aosgar, in Not. et Ets. xiii. 194.

c. 1347.—"I was informed . . . that when the Kân assembled his troops, and called the array of his forces together, there were with him 100 divisions of horse, each composed of 10,000 men, the chief of whom was called Amir Tumân, or lord of 10,000."—Ima Batuta, iv. 299-300.

A form of the Tartar word seems to have passed into Russian:

c. 1550.—"One thousand in the language of the people is called Tisente: likewise ten thousand in a single word Tma: twenty thousand Duenlma: thirty thousand Tima."—Herberstein, Della Moscovia, Ramusio, iii. 159.

[c. 1590.—In the Sarks of Kandahâr "eighteen dinárs make a tumân, and each tumân is equivalent to 800 dâms. The tumân of Khurasân is equal in value to 30 rupees, and the tumân of Irâq to 40."—Tun, ed. Jurvan, ii. 393-94.]

1619.—"L'ambasciadoro Italiano . . . ordinò che donasse a tutti un tomano, cioè dieci zecchini per uno."—P. della Valle, ii. 22.

c. 1630.—"But how miserable so ever it seems to others, the Persian King makes many happy harvests; filling every yeare his insatiate coffers with above 350,000 Tomans (a Toman is five markes sterlins)."—Sir T. Herbert, p. 225.

[c. 1665.—In Persia "the abási is worth 4 shâhis, and the tomân 50 abási or 200 shâhis."—Parker, ed. Ital. i. 24.]

1677.—" . . . Receipt of Custom (at Gombroon) for which he pays the King yearly Twenty-two thousand Thomands, every Thomand making Three pound and a Noble in our Accoempt, Half which we have a Right to."—Fryer, 222.

1711.—"Camels, Houses, &c., are generally sold by the Tomand, which is 200 Shaehes or 50 Abassees; and they usually reckon their Estates that way; such a man is worth so many Tomands, as we reckon by Pounds in England."—Lockyer, 229.

[1858.—"Girwur Singh, Tomendar, came up with a detachment of the special police."—Steelman, Journey through Oudh, ii. 17.]

TOM-TOM. s. Tom-tom, a native drum. The word comes from India, and is chiefly used there. Forbes (Râs-Malâ, ii. 401) [ed. 1878, p. 665] says the thing is so called because used by criers who beat it tém-tém, 'place by place,' i.e. first at one place, then at another. But it is rather an onomatopoeia, not belonging to any language in particular. In Ceylon it takes the form tám-tám, in Tel. tappa, in Tam. tambattam; in Malay it is tó-tó, all with the same meaning. [When badminton was introduced at Satâra natives called it Tattam phâl khel, tám-tám meaning 'battledore,' and the shuttlecock looked like a flower (phâl). Tommy Atkins promptly turned this into "Tom Fool" (Calcutta Rev. xcv. 346).] In French the word tattam is used, not for a drum of any kind, but for a Chinese gong (q.v.). M. Littré, however, in the Supplement to his Dict., remarks that this use is erroneous.

1693.—"It is ordered that to-morrow morning the Choultry Justices do cause the Tom Tom to be beat through all the Streets of the Black Town . . ."—In Wheeler, i. 268.

1711.—"Their small Pipes, and Tom Toms, instead of Harmony made the Discord the greater."—Lockyer, 295.

1755.—In the Calcutta Mayor's expenses we find:

"Tom Tom, R. 1 1 0."—In Long, 56.

1764.—"You will give strict orders to the Zeinindars to furnish Oil and Mushtauks, and Tom Toms and Pikemen, &c., according to custom."—Ibid. 391.
1770.—"... An instrument of brass which the Europeans lately borrowed from the Turks to add to their military music, and which is called a tamb"!—Abbe Raynal, tr. 1777, i. 30.

1789.—"An harsh kind of music from a tom-tom or drum, accompanied by a loud rustic pipe, sounds from different parties throughout the throng. . . ."—Menno, Narrative, 78.

1804.—"I request that they may be hanged; and let the cause of their punishment be published in the bazar by beat of tom-tom."—Wellington, iii. 186.

1824.—"The Maharratis in my vicinity kept up such a confounded noise with the tamtams, cymbals, and pipes, that to sleep was impossible."—Secly, Wonders of Ellora, ch. iv.

1836.—For the use of the word by Dickens, see under GUM-GUM.

1862.—"The first musical instruments were without doubt percussive sticks, calabashes, tomtoms."—Herbert Spencer, First Principal, 306.

1881.—"The tom-tom is ubiquitous. It knows no rest. It is content with depriving man of his. It selects by preference the hours of the night as the time for its malignant influence to assert its most potent sway. It reverberates its dull unmeaning monotonies through the fitful dreams which sheer exhaustion brings. It inspires delusive hopes by a brief lull only to break forth with refreshed vigour into wilder ecstasies of maniacal fury—accompanied with nasal incantations and protracted howls. . . ."—Overland Times of India, April 14.

TONGA, s. A kind of light and small two-wheeled vehicle, Hind. tönóg, [Skt. tumanga, 'a platform']. The word has become familiar of late years, owing to the use of the tonga in a modified form on the roads leading up to Simla, Darjeeling, and other hill-stations. Tavernier speaks of a carriage of this kind, but does not use the word:

[c. 1665.—"They have also, for travelling, small, very light, carriages which contain two persons; but usually one travels alone . . . to which they harness a pair of oxen only. These carriages, which are provided, like ours, with curtains and cushions, are not slung. . . ."]—Tavernier, ed. Ball, i. 44.

1874.—"The villages in this part of the country are usually superior to those in Poona or Sholapur, and the people appear to be in good circumstances. . . . The custom too, which is common, of driving light Tongas drawn by ponies or oxen points to the same conclusion."—Settlement Report of Nâsk.

1879.—"A tongha dâk has at last been started between Rajpore and Dehra. The first tongha took only 54 hours from Rajpore to Saharanpore."—Pioneer Mail.

1880.—"In the (Times) of the 19th of April we are told that 'Syud Mohamed Padshah has repulsed the attack on his fort instigated by certain moolahs of tonga dâk.' . . . Is the relentless tonga a region of country or a religious organization? . . . The original telegram appears to have contemplated a full stop after 'certain moolahs.' Then came an independent sentence about the tonga dâk working admirably between Peshawur and Jellalabad, but the sub-editor of the Times, interpreting the message referred to, made sense of it in the way we have seen, associating the ominous mystery with the moolahs, and helping out the other sentence with some explanatory ideas of his own."—Pioneer Mail, June 10.

1881.—"Bearing in mind Mr. Framji's extraordinary services, notably those rendered during the mutiny, and . . . that he is crippled for life . . . by wounds received while gallantly defending the mail tonga cart in which he was travelling, when attacked by daccaits. . . ."—Letter from Bombay Govt. to Govt. of India, June 17, 1881.

TONICATCHY, TUNNYKETCH, s. In Madras this is the name of the domestic water-carrier, who is generally a woman, and acts as a kind of under-housemaid. It is a corr. of Tamil tunir-kâssi, tunikkârijeti, an abbreviation of tunir-kâssatî, 'water-woman.'

[...c. 1780.—"Voudrez-vous me permettre de faire ce trajet avec mes gens et mes bagages, qui ne consistent qu'en deux malles, quatre caisses de vin, deux ballots de toiles, et deux femmes, dont l'une est ma cuisinière, et l'autre, ma tannie karetje ou porteeuse d'eau."—Haasfuer, i. 212.

1792.—"The Armenian . . . now mounts a bit of blood . . . and . . . dashes the head about through the streets of the Black Princ, to the admiration and astonishment of the Tawny-keritches."—Madras Courier, April 26.

TONJON, and vulg. TOMJOHN, s. A sort of sedan or portable chair. It is (at least in the Bengal Presidency) carried like a palankin by a single pole and four bearers, whereas a jompôn (q.v.), for use in a hilly country, has two poles like a European sedan, each pair of bearers bearing it by a stick between the poles, to which the latter are slung. We cannot tell what the origin of this word is, nor explain the etymology given by Williamson below, unless it is intended for thâm-jângh, which might mean 'support-thigh.' Mr. Platts gives as forms in Hind. tâmjhâm and thâmijn. The word is perhaps adopted from some trans-gangetic language. A rude contrivance of this kind in Malabar is described by Col. Welsh under the name of a 'Tellicherry chair' (ii. 40).

c. 1804. — 'I had a tonjon, or open palanquin, in which I rode.'—Mrs. Sherwood, Autobiog. 283.

1810. — 'About Dacca, Chittagong, Tipperah, and other mountainous parts, a very light kind of conveyance is in use, called a taum-jaun, i.e. 'a support to the feet.'" —Williamson, V. M. i. 322-23.

', 'Some of the party at the tents sent a tonjon, or open chair, carried like a palanquin, to meet me.'—Maria Graham, 165.

[1827. — 'In accordance with Lady D'Oyly's earnest wish I go out every morning in her tonjon.'—Diary of Mrs. Fenton, 100.]

1829. — 'I had been conveyed to the hill in Hanson's tonjon, which differs only from a palanquin in being like the body of a gig with a head to it.'—Mem. of Col. Mountain, 88.

[1832. — '... I never seat myself in the palankeen or thonjum without a feeling bordering on self-reproach. '—Mrs. Meer Hassan Ali, Observations, i. 320.]

1839. — 'He reined up his ragged horse, facing me, and dancing about till I had passed; then he dashed past me at full gallop, wheeled round, and charged my tonjon, bending down to his saddlebow, pretending to throw a lance, showing his teeth, and uttering a loud quack!" —Letters From Madras, 200.

[1849. — 'We proceeded to Navabgunge, the minister riding out with me, for some miles, to take leave, as I sat in my tonjon.'—Steen, Journey through Oudh, i. 2.]

TOOLSY. s. The holy Basil of the Hindus (Ocimum sanctum, L.), Skt. tulasi or tulasî, frequently planted in a vase upon a pedestal of masonry in the vicinity of Hindu temples or dwellings. Sometimes the ashes of deceased relatives are preserved in these domestic shrines. The practice is alluded to by Fr. Odoric as in use at Tana, near Bombay (see Cathay, i. 59, c. 1322); and it is accurately described by the later ecclesiastical quoted below. See also Ward's Hindus, ii. 203. The plant has also a kind of sanctity in the Greek Church, and a character for sanitary value at least on the shores of the Mediterranean generally.

[c. 1650. — 'They who bear the tulasi round the neck... they are Vaishnavas, and sanctify the world.'—Bhakti Måla, in H. H. Wilson's Works, i. 41.]

1672. — 'Almost all the Hindus... adore a plant like our Basilico gentile, but of more pungent odour... Every one before his house has a little altar, gilt with a wall half an ell high, in the middle of which they erect certain pedestals like little towers, and in these the shrub is grown. They recite their prayers daily before it, with repeated prostrations, sprinklings of water, &c. There are also many of these maintained at the bathing-places, and in the courts of the pagodas.'—P. Vincenzo Maria, 300.

1673. — 'They plaster Cow-dung before their Doors; and so keep themselves clean, having a little place or two built up a Foot Square of Mud, where they plant Caturemuth, or (by them called) Tulce, which they worship every Morning, and tend with Diligence.'—Fryer, 199.

1842. — 'Venerate a planta chamanda Tuloose, por dizerem ê do pateo dos Deoses, e por isso ê commun no pateo de suas casas, e todas as manhãs lhe vão tributar veneração.'—Annaes Maritimos, iii. 455.

1872. — 'At the head of the ghat, on either side, is a sacred tulasi plant... placed on a high pedestal of masonry.'—Govinda Srimanta, 1, 18.

The following illustrates the esteem attached to Toolsy in S. Europe:

1885. — 'I have frequently realised how much prized the basil is in Greece for its mystic properties. The herb, which they say grew on Christ's grave, is almost worshipped in the Eastern Church. On St. Basil's day women take sprigs of this plant to be blessed in church. On returning home they cast some on the floor of the house, to secure luck for the ensuing year. They eat a little with their household, and no sickness, they maintain, will attack them for a year. Another bit they put in their cupboard, and firmly believe that their embroideries and silken raiment will be free from the visitation of rats, mice, and moths, for the same period.'—J. T. Bent, The Cyclades, p. 323.

TOOMONGONG. s. A Malay title, especially known as borne by one of the chiefs of Johor, from whom the Island of Singapore was purchased. The Sultans of Johor are the representatives of the old Mahommedan dynasty of Malacca, which took refuge in Johor, and the adjoining islands (including Bintang especially), when expelled by Albuquerque in 1511, whilst the Tuwangung was a minister who had in Pehwa fashion appropriated the power of the Sultan, with hereditary tenure: and this chief now lives, we believe, at Singapore. Crawford says: 'The word is most probably Javanese; and in Java is the title of a class of nobles, not of an office' (Malay Dict. s.v.) of J. Herbert, in Forrest, Bombay Letters, Home Series, ii. 438.

[1830.—"This (Bopúti, however, is rather a title of office than of mere rank, as these governors are sometimes Tumung guna, and of still inferior rank." — Raffles, Java, 2nd ed. i. 299.]

1854. — "Singapore had originally been purchased from two Malay chiefs; the Sultan and Tumung guna of Johore. The former, when Sir Stamford Raffles entered into the arrangement with them, was the titular sovereign, whilst the latter, who held an hereditary office, was the real ruler."—Cavenagh, Reminis. of an Indian Official, 273.

TOON-WOOD. s. The tree and timber of the Cedrela Toona, Roxb. N.O. Meliaceae. Hind. tun, tünn, Skt. tunna. The timber is like a poor mahogany, and it is commonly used for furniture and fine joiner's work in many parts of India. It is identified by Bentham with the Red Cedar of N.S. Wales and Queensland (Cedrela australis, F. Mueller). See Brandis, Forest Flora, 73. A sp. of the same genus (C. sinensis) is called in Chinese ch'ün, which looks like the same word.

1810.—"The toon, or country mahogany, which comes from Bengal..."—Maria Graham, 101.

1837.—"Rosellini informs us that there is an Egyptian harp at Florence, of which the wood is what is commonly called E. Indian mahogany (Atheneæum, July 22, 1837). This may be the Cedrela Toona."—Royte's Hindu Medicine, 30.

TOOKEY, s. A Turkī horse, i.e. from Turkestan. Marco Polo uses what is practically the same word for a horse from the Turcoman horse-breeders of Asia Minor.

1299.—"... the Turcomans... dwell among mountains and downs where they find good pasture, for their occupation is cattle-keeping. Excellent horses, known as Turquans, are reared in their country..."—Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 2.

This metal, in honour of the inventor, was called Tutinic, but which word, by one of the most absurd perversions of language ever known, became transferred into 'Tout and Egg,' the name by which it was almost uniformly recognised in the shops."—Quoted in 2 ser. 1797.—"Tu-te-nag is, properly speaking, zinc, extracted from a rich ore or calamine; the ore is powdered and mixed with charcoal dust, and placed in earthen jars over a slow fire, by means of which the metal rises in form of vapour, in a common distilling apparatus, and afterwards is condensed in water."—Stamton's Acct. of Lord Macartney's Embassy, 4to ed. ii. 540.

TOPAZ, TOPASS, &c., s. A name used in the 17th and 18th centuries for dark-skinned or half-caste claimants of Portuguese descent, and Christian profession. Its application is generally, though not universally, to soldiers of this class, and it is possible that it was originally a corruption of Pers. (from Turkish) top-châ, 'a gunner.' It may be a slight support to this derivation that Italians were employed to cast guns for the Zamorin at Calicut from a very early date in the 16th century, and are frequently mentioned in the annals of Correa between 1503 and 1510. Various other etymologies have however been given. That given by Orme below (and put forward doubtfully by Wilson) from topî, 'a hat,' has a good deal of plausibility, and even if the former etymology be the true origin, it is probable that this one was often in the minds of those using the term, as its true connotation. It may have some corroboration not only in the fact that Europeans are to this day often spoken of by natives (with a shade of disparagement) as Topeewalas (q.v.) or 'Hat-men,' but also in the pride commonly taken by all persons claiming European blood in wearing a hat; indeed Fra Paolino tells us that this class call themselves gente de chapeco (see also the quotation below from Ovington). Possibly however this was merely a misreading of topaz from the assumed etymology. The same Fra Paolino, with his usual fertility in error, pronounced in another passage that topaz is a corruption of do-bhadshiya, 'two-tongued' (in fact is another form of Dubash, q.v.), viz. using Portuguese and a debased vernacular (pp. 50 and 144). [The Madras Gloss, assumes Mal. topâši to be a corruption of dubash.] The Topaz on board ship is the sweeper, who is at sea frequently of this class.

1602.—"The 12th ditto we saw to seaward another Champaigne (Sampam) wherein were 20 men, Mesticos (see MUSTEES) and Touphas."—Van Spilbergen's Voyage, p. 34, pub. 1648.

1672.—"Toepasses." See under MADRAS.

1673.—"To the Fort then belonged 300 English, and 400 Topazes, or Portuguese Firemen.”—Fryer, 66. In his glossarial Index he gives “Topazes, Musketeers.”

1680.—“It is resolved and ordered to entertain about 100 Topasses, or Black Portuguese, into pay.”—In Wheeler, i. 121.

1686.—“It is resolved, as soon as English soldiers can be provided sufficient for the garrison, that all Topasses be disbanded, and no more entertained, since there is little dependence on them.”—In ditto, 159.

1690.—“A Report spread abroad, that a Rich Moor Ship belonging to one Abdul Ghaford, was taken by Hat-men, that is, in their (the Moors) Dialect, Europeans.”—Ovington, 411.

1705.—“. . . Topasses, qui sont des gens du pais qu'on eleve et qu'on habille a la Françoise, lesquels ont esté instruits dans la Religion Catholiqua par quelques uns de nos Missionnaires.”—Lwiller, 45-46.

1711.—“The Garrison consists of about 250 Soldiers, at 91 Fanhams, or 11. 2d. per Month, and 200 Topasses, or black Mungreds, or Portuguese, at 50, or 52 Fanhams per Month.”—Lockyer, 14.

1727.—“Some Portuguese are called Topasses . . . will be served by none but Portuguese Priests, because they indulge them more and their Villany.”—A. Hamilton, [ed. 1744, i. 326].

1745.—“Les Portugais et les autres Catholiques qu'on nomme Mestices (see MUSTEEs) et Topasses, également comme les naturels du Pays y viennent sans distinction pour assister aux Divins mystères.”—Norbert, ii. 31.

1747. — "The officers upon coming in report their People in general behaved very well, and could not do more than they did with such a handful of men against the Force the Enemy had, being as they believe at least to be one thousand Europeans, besides Topasses, Coffrees (see Caffer), and Seapoy (see Sepoy), altogether about Two Thousand (2000).”—M.S. Cons. at Ft. St. David, March 1. (In India Office).

1749.—“600 effective Europeans would not have cost more than that Crowd of useless Topasses and Poons of which the Major Part of our Military has of late been composed.”—In A Letter to a Proprietary of the E.I. Co. p. 57.

1756.—“The Topasses of which the major Part of the Garrison consisted, every one that knows Madras knows it to be a black, degenerate, wretched Race of the ancient Portuguese, as proud and bigotted as their Ancestors, lazy, idle, and vitious withal, and for the most Part as weak and feeble in Body as base in Mind, not one in ten possessed of any of the necessary Requisites of a Soldier.”—Ibid. App. p. 108.

1758.—“There is a distinction said to be made by you . . . which, in our opinion, does no way square with rules of justice and equity, and that is the exclusion of Portuguese topasses, and other Christian natives, from any share of the money granted by the Nawab.”—Court's Letter, in Long, 133.

1817.—“Topasses or persons whom we may denominate Indo-Portugese, either the mixed produce of Portuguese and Indian parents, or converts to the Portuguese, from the Indian, faith.”—J. Mill, Hist. iii. 19.

TOPE, s. This word is used in three quite distinct senses, from distinct origins.

a. Hind. top, 'a cannon.' This is Turkish topo, adopted into Persian and Hindustani. We cannot trace it further. [Mr. Platts regards T. tob, topo, as meaning originally 'a round mass,' from Skt. stūpa, for which see below.]

b. A grove or orchard, and in Upper India especially a mango-orchard. The word is in universal use by the English, but is quite unknown to the natives of Upper India. It is in fact Tam. tōppu, Tel. tōpu, [which the Madras Gloss, derives from Tam. topu, 'to collect,'] and must have been carried to Bengal by foreigners at an early period of European traffic. But Wilson is curiously mistaken in supposing it to be in common use in Hindustan by natives. The word used by them is bāgh.

c. An ancient Buddhist monument in the form of a solid dome. The word tōp is in local use in the N.W. Punjab, where ancient monuments of this kind occur, and appears to come from Skt. stūpa through the Pali or Prakrit thūpa. According to Sir H. Elliot (i. 505), Stūpa in Icelandic signifies 'a Tower.' We cannot find it in Cleasby. The word was first introduced to European knowledge by Mr. Elphinstone in his account of the Tope of Manikyala in the Rawul Pindi district.

a. —

[1858. — "The big gun near the Central Museum of Labor called the Zam-Zamah or Bhajanvarati top, seems to have held much the same place with the Sikhs as the Malik-i-Maidān held in Bijapur." — Bombay Gazetteer, xxiii. 612.]

b. — 1673. — "... flourish pleasant Tops of Plantains, Cocoos, Guavas." — Freyer, 40.

"... The Country is Sandy; yet plentiful in Provisions; in all places, Tops of Trees." — Ibid. 41.

1747. — "The Topes and Walks of Trees in and about the Bounds will furnish them with firewood to burn, and Clay for Bricks is almost everywhere." — Report of a Council of War at Pt. St. David, in Consul. of May 5, 1809, in India Office.

1754. — "A multitude of People set to the work finished in a few days an entrenchment, with a stout mud wall, at a place called Faquire's Tope, or the grove of the Faquire." — Orme, i. 273.

1790. — "Upon looking at the Tope as I came in just now, it appeared to me, that when you get possession of the bank of the Nullah, you have the Tope as a matter of course." — Wellington, Desp. i. 23.

1809. — "... behind that a rich country, covered with rice fields and topes." — Ld. Valentia, i. 557.

1814. — "It is a general practice when a plantation of mango trees is made, to dig a well on one side of it. The well and the tope are married, a ceremony at which all the village attends, and large sums are often expended." — Forbes, Or. Mem. iii. 56.

[1839. — "Tope is an expression used for a mound or barrow as far west as Peshawer. ..." — Elphinstone, Cutch., 2nd ed. i. 108.]

TOPE-KHANA, s. The Artillery, Artillery Park, or Ordnance Department, Turco-Pers. top-khana, 'cannon-house' or 'cannon-department.' The word is the same that appears so often in reports from Constantinople as the Topanah. Unless the traditions of Donna Tofana are historical, we are strongly disposed to suspect that Agua Tofana may have had its name from this word.

1857. — "The Topchi. These are Gunners, called so from the word Tope, which in Turkish signifies a Cannon, and are in number about 1200, distributed in 52 Chambers; their Quarters are at Topanah, or the place of Guns in the Suburbs of Constantinople." — Rycaut's Present State of the Ottoman Empire, p. 94.

1726. — "Isfandar Chan, chief of the Artillery (called the Daroger (see DAROGA) of the Topscanna)." — Valenti IV. (Suratte), 276.

1765. — "He and his troops knew that by the treachery of the Tope Khonnah Droger (see DAROGA), the cannon were loaded with powder only." — Holwell, Hist. Events, &c. i. 96.

TOPEE, s. A hat, Hind. top. This is sometimes referred to Port. topo, 'the top' (also tope, a 'top-knot,' and topete, a 'toupee'), which is probably identical with English and Dutch top, L. German topp, Fr. topet, &c. But there is also a simpler Hind, word top, for a helmet or hat, and the quotation from the Roteiro Vocabulary seems to show that the word existed in India when the Portuguese first arrived. With the usual tendency to specialize foreign words, we find this word becomes specialized in application to the sola hat.

1498. — In the vocabulary ("Este he a linguação de Calcut") we have: "barrete (i. e. a cap): toppy." — Roteiro, 118.

The following expression again, in the same work, seems to be Portuguese, and to refer to some mode in which the women's hair was dressed: "Trazem em moleura hums topetes por signall que sam Christiâos." — Ibid. 52.

1849. — "Our good friend Sol came down in right earnest on the waste, and there is need of many a fold of twisted muslin round the white topi, to keep off his importunacy." — Dry Leaves from Young Egypt, 2.

1883. — "Topee, a solar helmet." — Wills, Modern Persia, 263.

TOPEEWALA, s. Hind. topiward, 'one who wears a hat,' generally a European, or one claiming to be so. Formerly by Englishmen it was habitually applied to the dark descendants of the Portuguese. R. Drummond says that in his time (before 1808) Topewala and Puggrywa7a were used in Guzerat and the Mahratta country for 'Europeans' and 'natives.' [The S. Indian form is Toppikār.] The author of the Persian Life of Hydur Naik (Or. Tr. Fund, by Miles) calls European Kalath-posh, i.e. "hat-wearers" (p. 85).

1803.—"The descendants of the Portuguese... unfortunately the ideas of Christianity are so imperfect that the only mode they hit upon of displaying their faith is by wearing hats and breeches."—Sydney Smith, Works, 3d. ed. iii. 5.

[1826.—"It was now evident we should have to encounter the Topee wallas."—Pandurang Hari, ed. 1873, i. 71.]

1874.—"... you will see that he will not be able to protect us. All tōpiwāḷās... are brothers to each other. The magistrates and the judge will always decide in favour of their white brethren."—Govinda Samanta, ii. 211.

TORCULL, s. This word occurs only in Castanheda. It is the Malayālam tiru-kōyilt [Tam. tīru, Skt. śrī, 'holy'] kōyilt, 'temple']. See i. 253, 254; also the English Trans. of 1852, f. 151. In fact, in the 1st ed., of the 1st book of Castanheda turcull occurs where pagode is found in subsequent editions. [Tricalore in S. Arcot is in Tam. Tirukkōyilār, with the same meaning.]

TOSHACONNA, s.—H. toshakhdna. The repository of articles received as presents, or intended to be given as presents, attached to a government-office, or great man's establishment. The toshakhdna is a special department attached to the Foreign Secretariat of the Government of India.

[1616.—"Now indeed the atashckanno was become a right stage."—Sir T. Roe, Hak. Soc. ii. 300.]

[1742.—"... the Treasury, Jewels, toshik-khanna... that belonged to the Emperor..."—Fraser, H. of Nadir Shah, 178.]

1799.—"After the capture of Seringapatam, and before the country was given over to the Raja, some brass swamiles (q.v.), which were in the toshekānāh were given to the brahmins of different pagodas, by order of Meeleot and the General. The prize-agents require payment for them."—Wellington, i. 56.

[1885.—"When money is presented to the Viceroy, he always 'remits' it, but when presents of jewels, arms, stuffs, horses, or other things of value are given him, they are accepted, and are immediately handed over to the tosh khana or Government Treasury..."—Lady Dufferin, Viceroyal Life, 75.]

TOSTDAUN, s. Military Hind. tōsān for a cartouche-box. The word appears to be properly Pers. toshādan, 'provision-holder,' a wallet.

[1841.—"This last was, however, merely tōsān kee awaz'—a cartouch-box report—as our sepoy's oddly phrase a vague rumour."—Society in India, ii. 223.]

TOTY, s. Tam. tōtī, Canar. tōtīga, from Tam. tondu, 'to dig,' properly a low-caste labourer in S. India, and a low-caste man who in villages receives certain allowances for acting as messenger, &c., for the community, like the gorayt of N. India.

1730.—"Il y a dans chaque village un homme de service, appelé Totti, qui est chargé des impositions publiques."—Lett. Edif., xii. 371.

[1883.—"The name Toty being considered objectionable, the same officers in the new arrangements are called Talaiar (see TALLAR) when assigned to Police, and Vettians when employed in Revenue duties."—Le Funn, Man. of Salem, ii. 211.]

TOUCAN, s. This name is very generally misapplied by Europeans to the various species of Hornbill, formerly all styled Buceros, but now subdivided into various genera. Jerdon says: "They (the hornbills) are, indeed, popularly called Toucans throughout India; and this appears to be their name in some of the Malayan isles; the word signifying 'a worker,' from the noise they make." This would imply that the term did originally belong to a species of hornbill, and not to the S. American Rhamphastos or Zygodactyle. Tukang is really in Malay a 'craftsmen or artificer'; but the dictionaries show no application to the bird. We have here, in fact, a remarkable instance of the coincidences which often justly perplex etymologists, or would perplex them if it were not so much their habit to seize on one solution and despise the others. Not only is tukang in Malay 'an artificer,' but, as Willoughby tells us, the Spaniards called the real S. American toucan "carpintero" from the noise he makes. And yet there seems no doubt that Toucan is a Brazilian name for a Brazilian bird. See the quotations, and especially Thévet's, with its date.

The Toucan is described by Ovidio (c. 1535), but he mentions only the name by which "the Christians" called it,—in Ramusio's Italian Picuto (*Beccuto; Sommario, in Ramusio, iii. f. 60). [Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives only the Brazilian derivation.
The question is still further discussed, without any very definite result, save that it is probably an imitation of the cry of the bird, in N. & Q. 9 ser. vii. 486; viii. 22, 67, 85, 171, 250."

1556.—"Sur la côte de la marine, la plus fréquente marchandise est le plumage d’un oyeau, qu’ils appellent en leur langue Toucan, lequel descrivons sommairement puis qu’il vient à propos. C’est oyeau est de la grandeur d’un pigeon. . . Au reste c’est oyeau est merveilleusement différent et monstrueux, ayant le bec plus gros et plus long quasi que le reste du corps."—Les Singularités de la France Antarctique, autrement nommée Amérique. . . Par T. André Thévet, Natif d’Angoulême, Paris, 1558, f. 91.

See also (1599) Adrovarandas, Ornitholog. lib. xii. cap. 19, where the word is given toucham.

Here is an example of misapplication to the Hornbill, though the latter name is also given:

1885.—"Soopah (in N. Canara) is the only region in which I have met with the toucan or great hornbill. . . I saw the comical looking head with its huge aquiline beak, regarding me through a fork in the branch; and I account it one of the best shots I ever made, when I sent a ball. . . through the head just at its junction with the handsome orange-coloured helmet which surmounts it. Down came the toucan with outspreading wings, dead apparently; but when my peon Manoel raised him by the thick muscular neck, he fastened his great claws on his hand, and made the wood resound with a repetition of roars more like a bellow than a bird."—Gordon Forbes, Wild Life in Canara, &c. pp. 37-38.

TOWLEEA, s. Hind. taudiya, ‘a towel.’ This is a corruption, however, not of the English form, but rather of the Port. toalha (Panjab N. & Q., 1885, ii. 117).

TRAGA, s. [Molesworth gives "S. trága, Guz. trágu."; trága does not appear in Monier-Williams’s Skt. Dict., and Wilson queries the word as doubtful. Dr. Grierson writes: "I cannot trace its origin back to Skt. One is tempted to connect it with the Skt. root traî, or trā, ‘to protect,’ but the termination gā presents difficulties which I cannot get over. One would expect it to be derived from some Skt. word like trāka, but no such word exists.”] The extreme form of dhurna (q.v.) among the Râjpûts and connected tribes, in which the complainant gives himself, or some member of his family, to torture or death, as a mode for bringing vengeance on the oppressor. The tone adopted by some persons and papers at the time of the death of the great Charles Gordon, tended to imply their view that his death was a kind of traga intended to bring vengeance on those who had sacrificed him. [For a case in Greece, see Pausanias, X. i. 6. Another name for this self-sacrifice is Chânâdi, which is perhaps Skt. cāndu, ‘passionate’ (see Malcolm, Cent. India, 2nd ed. ii. 137). Also compare the jâhâr of the Râjpûts (Tod, Annals, Calcutta reprint, i. 74). And for Kûr, see As. Res. iv. 357 seqq.]

1803.—A case of traga is recorded in Sir Jasper Nicoll’s Journal, at the capture of Gawilgarh, by Sir A. Wellesley. See note to Wellington, ed. 1857, ii. 387.

1813.—"Every attempt to levy an assess ment is succeeded by the Tarakaw, a most horrid mode of murdering themselves and each other."—Forbes, Or. Mem. ii. 91; [2nd ed. i. 378; and see i. 241].

1819.—For an affecting story of Traga, see Macnward, in Bo. Lit. Soc. Trans. i. 281.

[TRANKEY, s. A kind of boat used in the Persian Gulf and adjoining seas. All attempts to connect it with any Indian or Persian word have been unsuccessful. It has been supposed to be connected with the Port. trînâdar, a sort of flat-bottomed coating vessel with a high stern, and with trançurt, a herring-boat used in the English Channel. Smyth (Sailor’s Word-book, s.v.) has: "Trankeh or Trankees, a large boat of the Gulf of Persia." See N. & Q. 8 ser. vii. 167, 376.]

[1554.—"He sent certain spies who went in Terranquins dressed as fishermen who caught fish inside the straits."—Conte, Dec. VI. Bk. x. ch. 20.

[1750.—". . . he remained some years in obscurity, till an Arab trankey being driven in there by stress of weather, he made himself known to his countrymen. . . ."—Grose, 1st ed. 25.

[1753.—"Taghi Khan . . . soon after embarked a great number of men in small vessels." In the note tarranquins.—Han- way, iv. 181.]
[1773.—"Accordingly we resolved to hire one of the common, but uncomfortable vessels of the Gulph, called a Trankey. . . ."
—Feas. 205.]

TRANQUEBAR, n.p. A seaport of S. India, which was in the possession of the Danes till 1807, when it was taken by England. It was restored to the Danes in 1814, and purchased from them, along with Serampore, in 1845. The true name is said to be Tarangambadî, "Sea-Town" or "Wave-Town"; [so the Madras Gloss; but in the Man. (ii. 216) it is interpreted 'Street of the Telegu people.]

1610.—"The members of the Company have petitioned me, that inasmuch as they have put a premium on service to God in their establishment at Negapatam, both among Portuguese and natives, and that there is a settlement of newly converted Christians who are looked after by the catechumens of the parish (freguezia) of Trangabar. . . ."—King's Letter, in Livros das Monções, p. 285.

[1683-4.—"This Morning the Portuguese ship that came from Vizagapatam Sailed hence for Trangambar."—Pringle, Diary, Pt. St. Geo. 1st ser. iii. 16.]

TRAVANCORE, n.p. The name of a village south of Trevandrum, from which the ruling dynasty of the kingdom which is known by the name has been called. The true name is said to be Tiru-vidân-kōdu, shortened to Tiruvâňkođu, [The Madras Gloss. gives Tiruvitâmkär, tiru, Skt. śrī, 'the goddess of prosperity,' vāzhū, 'to reside,' kār, 'part.']

[1514.—"As to the money due from the Raja of Travancor. . . ."—Albaquerque, Cartas, p. 270.]

1553.—"And at the place called Travancor, where this Kingdom of Coulam terminates, there begins another Kingdom, taking its name from this very Travancor, the king of which our people call the Rey Grande, because he is greater in his dominion, and in the state which he keeps, than those other princes of Malabar; and he is subject to the King of Narsinga."—Barros, I. ix. 1.

1609.—"The said Governor has written to me that most of the kings adjacent to our State, whom he advised of the coming of the rebels, had sent replies in a good spirit, with expressions of friendship, and with promises not to admit the rebels into their ports, all but him of Travancor, from whom no answer had yet come."—King of Spain's Letter, in Livros das Monções, p. 257.

TRIBENY, n.p. Skt. tri-veni, 'threefold braid'; a name which properly belongs to Prayâga (Allahâbâd), where the three holy rivers, Ganges, Jumna, and (unseen) Sarasvati are considered to unite. But local requirements have instituted another Tribeni in the Ganges Delta, by bestowing the name of Jumna and Sarasvati on two streams connected with the Hulgli. The Bengal Tribeni gives name to a village, which is a place of great sanctity, and to which the melas or religious fairs attract many visitors.

1852.—". . . if I refused to stay there he would certainly stop me again at Trippany some miles further up the River."—Hedges, Diary, Oct. 14; [Hak. Soc. i. 38.]

1705.—". . . pendant la Lune de Mars . . . il arrive la Fête de Tripigny, c'est un Dieu enfermé dans une manière de petite Mosquée, qui est dans le milieu d'une tres-grande plीne . . . au bord du Gange."—Luillier, 69.

1753.—"Au-dessous de Nudia, à Tripini, dont le nom signifie trois eaux, le Gange fait encore sortir du même côté un canal, qui par sa rentrée, forme une seconde ile renfermée dans la première."—D'Anville, 64.

TRICHIES, TRITCHIES, s. The familiar name of the cheroots made at Trichinopoly; long, and rudely made, with a straw inserted at the end for the mouth. They are (or were) cheap and coarse, but much liked by those used to them. Mr. C. P. Brown, referring to his etymology of Trichinopoly under the succeeding article, derives the word cheroot from the form of the name which he assigns. But this, like his etymology of the place-name, is entirely wrong (see Cheroot). Some excellent practical scholars seem to be entirely without the etymological sense.

1876. — "Between whiles we smoked, generally Manillas, now supplanted by foul Dindiguls and fetid Trichies."—Burtin, Sind Revisited, i. 7.

TRICHINOPOLY, n.p. A district and once famous rock-fort of S. India. The etymology and proper form of the name has been the subject of much difference. Mr. C. P. Brown gives the true name as Chiruta-palli, 'Little-Town.' But this may be safely rejected as mere guess, inconsistent with facts. The earliest occurrence of the name on an inscription is (about 1520) as Tiru-sêkla-palli, apparently 'Holy-rock-town.' In the Tevaram the place is said to be mentioned under the name of Sirapalli. Some derive it from Tri-sira-puram, 'Three-head-town,' with allusion to a 'three-headed demon.' [The Madras Gloss. gives Tiruttindappalli, tiru, 'holy,' shina, 'the plant cisampelos paretra, l. palli, 'village.'] 1677.—"Tritchenapalli."—A. Bossing, in Valentijn, v. (Ceylon), 300.

1741.—'The Maratas concluded the campaign by putting this whole Peninsula under conquest as far as C. Cumeram, attacking, conquering, and retaining the city of Tirucherapalli, capital of Madura, and taking prisoner the Nabab who governed it.'—Report of the Port. Vice-roy, in Bosquejo das Possessões, &c., Documentos, ed. 1858, iii. 19.

1753.—"Ces embouchures sont en grand nombre, y a la division de ce fleuve en différents bras ou canaux, à remonter jusqu'à Tiriszirapali, et à la pagode de Shringam.'—D'Anville, 115.

1761.—"After the battle Mahommed Ali Khan, son of the late nabob, fled to Truchinapoli, a place of great strength."—Complete Hist. of the War in India, 1751, p. 3.

TRINCOMALTEE, n.p. A well-known harbour on the N.E. coast of Ceylon. The proper name is doubtful. It is alleged to be Tirukkona-malai, or Taranaga-malai. The last ('Sea-Hill') seems conceived to fit our modern pronunciation, but not the older forms. It is perhaps Tri-kona-malai, for 'Three-peak Hill.' There is a shrine of Siva on the hill, called Trikoneswara; [so the Madras Man. (ii. 216)].

1553.—"And then along the coast towards the north, above Baticaloon, there is the kingdom of Triquinamalée."—Barros, ii. ii. cap. 1.

1602.—"This Prince having departed, made sail, and was driven by the winds unknowing whither he went. In a few days he came in sight of a desert island (being that of Ceylon), where he made the land at a haven called Fratru, between Triquenimalo and the point of Jafanapatam."—Corte, V. i. 5.

1672.—"Triquenemalé hath a surpassingly fine harbour, as may be seen from the draught thereof, yea one of the best and largest in all Ceylon, and better sheltered from the winds than the harbours of Belligamme, Gale, or Colombo."—Baldaevus, 413.

1675.—"The Cinghalese themselves oppose this, saying that they emigrated from another country . . . that some thousand years ago, a Prince of great piety, driven out of the land of Tanassery . . . came to land near the Hill of Tricenemalé with 1500 or 2000 men. . . ."—Ryklof van Goens, in Valentijn (Ceylon), 210.

1826.—"Trickenemalé, properly Tricenemalé" (i.e. Triquenamalé).—Valentijn (Ceylon), 19.

""Trikkenemalé . . .""—Ibid. 103.

1727.—". . . that vigilant Dutchman was soon after them with his Fleet, and forced them to fight disadvantageously in Trankamalaya Bay, wherein the French lost one half of their Fleet, being either sunk or burnt."—A. Hamilton, i. 343, [ed. 1744].

1761.—"We arrived at Triconomale in Ceylon (which is one of the finest, if not ye best and most capacious Harbours in ye World) the first of November, and employed that and part of the ensuing Month in preparing our Ships for ye next Campaign."—Ms. Letter of James Rennell, Jan. 31.

TRIPANG, s. The Sea-slug. This is the Malay name, tripang, tampilang. See SWALLOW, and BECHE-DE-MER.

[1817.—"Bich de mar is well known to be a dried sea-slug used in the dishes of the Chinese; it is known among the Malayan Islands by the name of Tripang . . ."—Raffles, H. of Java, 2nd ed. i. 292.]

TRIPLICANE, n.p. A suburb of Fort St. George; the part where the palace of the Nabob of the Carnatic is. It has been explained, questionably, as Tiru-vallikèdi, 'sacred-creeper-tank.' Seshagiri Sastri gives it as Tiru-altikèn, 'sacred lily.' (Nymphaea rubea) tank, [and so the Madras Gloss, giving the word as Triwallikkèn.]

1674.—"There is an absolute necessity to go on fortifying this place in the best manner we can, our enemies at sea and land being within less than musket shot, and better fortified in their camp at Trivelicane than we are here."—Fl. St. Geo. Consens. Feb. 2. In Notes and Exta., Madras, 1871, No. i. p. 28.

1679.—"The Didwan (Dewaun) from Conjeeveram, who pretends to have come from Court, having sent word from Treplicane that unless the Governor would come to the garden by the river side to receive the Phyrmaund he would carry it back to Court again, answer is returned that it hath not been accusatory for the Governours to go out to receive a bare Phyrmaund except there come therewith a Serpow (see SEERPAW) or a Tasherrif" (see TASHREEF).—Do., do., Dec. 2. Ibid. 1873, No. III. p. 40.

[1682-4.—"Trilbicane, Treblicane Tri- vety."—Diary Fl. St. Geo. ed. Pringle, i. 63; iii. 154.]

TRIVANDRUM, n.p. The modern capital of the State now known as Travancore (q.v.) Properly Tiru- (v)avanattai-puram, 'Sacred Vishnu-Town.'
TRUMPÁK, n.p. This is the name by which the site of the native suburb of the city of Ormus on the famous island of that name is known. The real name is shown by Lt. Stille's account of that island (Geogr. Mag. i. 13) to have been Turán-bagh, 'Garden of Túrún,' and it was properly the palace of the old Kings, of whom more than one bore the name of Túrún or Túrún Sháh.

1507.—"When the people of the city saw that they were so surrounded, that from no direction could water be brought, which was what they felt most of all, the principal Moors collected together and went to the king desiring him earnestly to provide a guard for the pools of Turumbaque, which were at the head of the island, lest the Portuguese should obtain possession of them...."—Comment. of Albuquerque, E.T. by Birch, i. 175.

"Meanwhile the Captain-Major ordered Afonso Lopes de Costa and João da Nova, and Manuel Teles with his people to proceed along the water's edge, whilst he with all the rest of the force would follow, and come to a place called Turumbaque, which is on the water's edge, in which there were some palm-trees, and wells of brackish water, which supplied the people of the city with drink when the water-boats were not arriving, as sometimes happened owing to a contrary wind."—Correa, i. 830.

1610.—"The island has no fresh water... only in Torunpague, which is a piece of white salt clay, at the extremity of the island, there is a well of fresh water, of which the King and the Wazir take advantage, to water the gardens which they have there, and which produce perfectly everything which is planted."—Teixeira, Rel. de los Reyes de Hormuz, 115.

1682.—"Behind the hills, to the S.S.W. and W.S.W. there is another part of the island, lying over against the anchorage that we have mentioned, and which includes the place called Turumkake... here one sees the ancient pleasure-house of the old Kings of Ormus, with a few small trees, and sundry date-palms. There are also here two great wells of water, called after the name of the place, 'The Wells of Turumkake'; which water is the most wholesome and the freshest in the whole island."—Nieuhof, Zee en Land-Reiz, i. 86.

TUAN, s. Malay tuan and tuwan, 'lord, master.' The word is used in the English and Dutch settlements of the Archipelago exactly as sahib is in India. [An early Chinese form of the word is referred to under SUMATRA.]

1553.—"Dom Paulo da Gama, who was a worthy son of his father in his zeal to do the King good service... equipped a good fleet, of which the King of Ugentana (see UJUNGTANAH) had presently notice, who in all speed set forth his own, consisting of 30 lancharas, with a large force on board, and in command of which he put a valiant Moor called Tuam-bár, to whom the King gave orders that as soon as our force had quitted the fortress (of Malaccan) not leaving enough people to defend it, he should attack the town of the Queleys (see KLING) and burn and destroy as much as he could."—Correa, iii. 486.

1553.—"For where this word Raja is used, derived from the kingly title, it attaches to a person on whom the King bestows the title, almost as among us that of Count, whilst the style Turumkake is like our Dom; only the latter of the two is put before the person's proper name, whilst the former is put after it, as we see in the names of these two Javanese, Vtimuti Raja, and Tuam Colasear."—Barros, ii. vi. 3.

[1893.—"... the coolly talked over the affairs of the Tuan Ingris (English gentleman) to a crowd of natives."—W. B. Worsfold, A Visit to Java, 145.]

TUCKA, s. Hind. taká, Beng. taká, [Skt. tankaka, 'stamped silver money']. This is the word commonly used among Bengalis for a rupee. But in other parts of India it (or at least taká) is used differently; as for aggregates of 4, or of 2 pice (generally in N.W.P. a pair taká paise = five pice of, 10 pice). Compare TANGA.

[1809.—"A requisition of a small house, or eight pice, is made upon each shop..."—Broughton, Letters from a Mahr. Camp, ed. 1892, p. 84.]

1874.—"... How much did my father pay for her?"—"He paid only ten tákás.

"I may state here that the word rupeýā or as it is commonly written rupee or rupi, is unknown to the peasantancy of Bengal, at least to Bengali Hindu peasants; the word the they invariably use is taká."—Govinda Sachar, i. 209.

TUCKÁVEE, s. Money advanced to a ryot by his superior to enable him to carry on his cultivation, and recoverable with his quota of revenue. It is Ar.—H. takávī, from Ar. āvī, 'strength,' thus literally 'a reinforcement.'

[1800.—"A great many of them, who have now been forced to work as labourers, would have thankfully received tācavy, to be repaid, by instalments, in the course of two or three years."—Buchanan, Mysore, ii. 185.]

1850.—"When the Sirkar disposed of lands which reverted to it... it sold them almost always for a nazárāa (see NUZZERANA). It sometimes gave them gratis, but it never paid money, and seldom or ever advanced \textit{takāvi} to the tenant or owner."
—\textit{Minutes of Sir T. Munro}, i. 71. These words are not in Munro's spelling. The Editor has reformed the orthography.

\textbf{TUCKEED.} s. An official reminder. Ar.—H. \textit{tækid}, 'emphasis, injunction,' and verb \textit{tækil kurnā}, 'to enjoin stringently, to insist.'

1862.—'I can hardly describe to you my life—work all day, English and Persian, scores of appeals and session cases, and a continual irritation of \textit{tuckeed} and offensive remarks... these take away all the enjoyment of doing one's duty, and make work a slavery.'—\textit{Letter from Col. J. R. Becher}, in (unpublished) \textit{Memorandum}, p. 28.

\textbf{TUCKAH,} s. Pers. \textit{takya}, literally 'a pillow or cushion'; but commonly used in the sense of a hut or hermitage occupied by a fakir or holy man.

[1800.—'He declared... that two of the people charged... had been at his \textit{tuckiah}.']—Wellington, \textit{Desp.}, i. 78.

[1847.—'In the centre of the wood was a Faqir's \textit{Talkiat} (sic) or Place of Prayer, situated on a little mound.']—\textit{Mrs. Mackenzie, Life in the Mission, &c. ii. 47.}

\textbf{TULWAUR,} s. Hind. \textit{tulvār} and \textit{tarvār}, 'a sabre.' Williams gives Skt. \textit{taravāri} and \textit{taravālikā}. ['\textit{Tulwar} is a general term applied to shorter or more or less curved side-arms, while those that are lighter and shorter still are often styled \textit{nīmchās} (\textit{Sir W. Elliot, in Ind. Antiq.}, xvi. 29). Also see \textit{Eyerton, Handbook}, 138.]

1853.—'The old native officer who carried the royal colour of the regiments was cut down by a blow of a Sikh \textit{tulwar}.'—\textit{Oakfield}, ii. 78.

\textbf{TUMASHA,} s. An entertainment, a \textit{spectacle} (in the French sense), a popular excitement. It is Ar. \textit{tamaší}, 'going about to look at anything entertaining.' The word is in use in Turkestan (see Schryer, below).

1610.—'Here are also the ruins of \textit{Ramchand} (\textit{q.v. Ramchand's?}) Castle and Houses which the Indians acknowledge for the great God, saying that he took flesh upon him to see the \textit{Tamasha} of the World.'—\textit{Fitch}, in \textit{Purchases}, i. 496.

1631.—'Hic quoque meridien \textit{prosipti}, ut spectet \textit{Thamasham} id est pugnas Elephantum Leonum Buffalorum et aliarum ferarum...
—\textit{De Laet, De Imperio Magni Mogolis}, 127. (For this quotation I am indebted to a communication from Mr. Archibald Constable of the Oudh and Rohilkund Railway.)

1705.—'\textit{Tamachars}. Ce sont des résolutions que les Gentils font en l'honneur de quelques-unes de leurs divinités.'—\textit{Luillier, Tab. des Matières}.

1840.—'Runjeet replied, 'Don't go yet; I am going myself in a few days, and then we will have \textit{burra tomachama}.'—\textit{Osborne, Court and Camp of Runjeet Singh}, 120-121.

1876.—'If you told them that you did not want to buy anything, but had merely come for \textit{tomasha}, or amusement, they were always ready to explain and show you everything you wished to see.'—\textit{Schryer's Turkestan}, i. 176.

\textbf{TUMLET,} s. Domestic Hind. \textit{tāmtel}, being a corruption of \textit{tumbler}.

\textbf{TUMLOOK,} n.p. A town, and anciently a sea-port and seat of Buddhist learning on the west of the Hoogly near its mouth, formerly called \textit{Tāmralipti} or \textit{-lipta}. It occurs in the Mahâbhârata and many other Sanskrit words. "In the \textit{Dasā Kumāra} and \textit{Vrihat Katha}, collections of tales written in the 9th and 12th centuries, it is always mentioned as a great port of Bengal, and the seat of an active and flourishing commerce with the countries and islands of the Bay of Bengal, and the Indian Ocean" (\textit{Prof. H. H. Wilson, in J. R. As. Soc. v. 135}). [Also see \textit{Cunningham, Anc. Geog.}, p. 504.]

p. 410.—'From this, continuing to go eastward nearly 50 \textit{gyānas}, we arrive at the Kingdom of \textit{Tamralipti}. Here it is the river (Ganges) empties itself into the sea. 1726.—"Tamboli and Banzi are two Portuguese villages, where they have their churches, and salt business."—Valentijn, v. 159.

[1753.—"Tombali." See under KEDGE-REE.]

TUMTUM, s. A dog-cart. We do not know the origin. [It is almost certainly a corr. of English tendem, the slang use of which in the sense of a conveyance (according to the Stann. Dict.) dates from 1807. Even now English-speaking natives often speak of a dog-cart with a single horse as a tendem.]

1866.—"We had only 3 coss to go, and we should have met a pair of tumtums which would have taken us on."—Trewellyan, The Dawk Bungulow, 384.

[1889.—"A G.B.T. cart once married a bathing-machine, and they called the child Tum-tum."—R. Kipling, The City of Dreadful Nights, 74.]

TUNCA, TUNCAW, &c., s. P.—H. tankhewd, pron. tankhâ. Properly an assignment on the revenue of a particular locality in favour of an individual; but in its most ordinary modern sense it is merely a word for the wages of a monthly servant. For a full account of the special older uses of the word see Wilson. In the second quotation the use is obscure; perhaps it means the villages on which assignments had been granted.

1758.—"Roydoolub . . . has taken the discharge of the tuncaws and the arrears of the Nabob's army upon himself."—Orme, iii. ; [ii. 361].

1760.—"You have been under the necessity of writing to Mr. Holwell (who was sent to collect in the tuncaus), . . . The low men that are employed in the tuncaus are not to be depended on."—The Narrac to the Prest. and Council of Ft. Wm., in Long, 233.

1778.—"These rescripts are called tuncaus, and entitle the holder to receive to the amount from the treasuries . . . as the revenues come in."—Orme, ii. 276.

[1823.—"The Grassiah or Rajpoot chiefs . . . were satisfied with a fixed and known tanka, or tribute from certain territories, on which they had a real or pretended claim."—Malcolm, Cent. India, 2nd. ed. i. 385.

[1851.—"The Sikh detachments . . . used to be paid by tumkhwâhs, or assignments of the provincial collectors of revenue."—Edwards, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 19.]

TURA, s. Or. Turk. tôra. This word is used in the Autobiography of Baber, and in other Mahomedan military narratives of the 16th century. It is admitted by the translators of Baber that it is rendered by them quite conjecturally, and we cannot but think that they have missed the truth. The explanation of tôr which they quote from Meninski is "reticulatus," and combining this with the manner in which the quotations show these tôras to have been employed, we cannot but think that the meaning which best suits is 'a gabion.' Sir H. Elliot, in referring to the first passage from Baber, adopts the reading tâbra, and says: "Tâbras are nose-bags, but . . . Badánni makes the meaning plain, by saying that they were filled with earth (Târitch-i-Badânni, f. 130). . . . The sacks used by Sher Shâh as temporary fortifications on his march towards Râjputâna were tâbras" (Elliot, vi. 469). It is evident, however, that Baber's tûras were no tobras, whilst a reference to the passage (Elliot, iv. 405) regarding Sher Shâh shows that the use of bags filled with sand on that occasion was regarded as a new contrivance. The tâbra of Badánni may therefore probably be a misreading; whilst the use of gabions implies necessarily that they would be filled with earth.

1526.—(At the Battle of Pânipat) "I directed that, according to the custom of Rûm, the gun-carriages should be connected together with twisted bull-hides as with chains. Between every two gun-carriages were 6 or 7 tûras (or breastworks). The matchlockmen stood behind these guns and tûras, and discharged their matchlocks. . . . It was settled, that as Pânipat was a considerable city, it would cover one of our flanks by its buildings and houses while we might fortify our front by tûras. . . ."—Baber, p. 304.
1528.—(At the siege of Chânderi) "overseers and pioneers were appointed to construct works on which the guns were to be planted. All the men of the army were directed to prepare turbas and scaling-ladders, and to serve the turbas which are used in attacking forts. . . ."—Ibid. p. 376.

The editor's note at the former passage is: "The meaning (viz. 'breastwork') assigned to Tûra here, and in several other places is merely conjectural, founded on Petis de la Croix's explanation, and on the meaning given by Moninski to Tûr, viz. reticulatus. The Turbas may have been formed by the branches of trees, interwoven like basket-work . . . or they may have been covered defences from arrows and missiles. . . ." Again: "These Turbas, so often mentioned, appear to have been a sort of testudo, under cover of which the assailants advanced, and sometimes breached the wall. . . ."

TURAKA, n.p. This word is applied both in Maharati and in Telugu to the Mahommedans (Turks). [The usual form in the inscriptions is Turushka (see Bombay Gazetteer, i. pt. i. 189.).] Like this is Turak (see TURUK) which the Burmese now apply to the Chinese.

TURBAN, s. Some have supposed this well-known English word to be a corruption of the P. — H. sirband, 'head-wrap,' as in the following:

1727.—"I bought a few seerbunds and sannoes there (at Cuttack) to know the difference of the prices." — A. Hamilton, i. 394 (see PIECE-GOODS).

This, however, is quite inconsistent with the history of the word. Wedgewood's suggestion that the word may be derived from Fr. turbin, 'a whirl,' is equally to be rejected. It is really a corruption of one which, though it seems to be out of use in modern Turkish, was evidently used by the Turks when Europe first became familiar with the Ottomans and their ways. This is set forth in the quotation below from Zedler's Lexicon, which is corroborated by those from Rycaut and from Galland, &c. The proper word was apparently dulband. Some modern Persian dictionaries give the only meaning of this as 'a sash.' But Meninski explains it as 'a cloth of fine white muslin; a wrapper for the head'; and Villers also gives it this meaning, as well as that of 'a sash or belt.'* In doing so he quotes Shakespeare's Dict., and marks the use as 'Hindustani-Persian.' But a merely Hindustani use of a Persian word could hardly have become habitual in Turkey in the 15th and 16th centuries. The use of dulband for a turban was probably genuine Persian, adopted by the Turks. Its etymology is apparently from Arab, dul, 'volvere,' admitting of application to either a girdle or a head-wrap. From the Turks it passed in the forms Tulipant, Toliban, Turban, &c., into European languages. And we believe that the flower tulip also has its name from its resemblance to the old Ottoman turban, [a view accepted by Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v. tulip, turban)].*

VIII. ch. viii. ed. Dupont (1843), ii. 456. Thus given in Danett's translation (1595): "These Estradiots are soldiers like to the Turkes Fanizaries, and attired both on foote and on horsebacke like to the Turks, save that they weare not vnpon their head such a great route of linne as the Turkes do called (sic) Tolliban."—p. 325.

TURKEY.

s. This fowl is called in Hindustani pera, very possibly an indication that it came to India, perhaps first to the Spanish settlements in the Archipelago, across the Pacific, as the red pepper known as Chili did.
In Tamil the bird is called van-karti, 'great fowl.' Our European names of it involve a complication of mistakes and confusions. We name it as if it came from the Levant. But the name turkey would appear to have been originally applied to another of the Pavoindae, the guinea-fowl, Meleagris of the ancients.
Minshew's explanations (quoted below) show strange confusions between the two birds. The French coq d'Inde or Dindon points only ambiguously to India, but the German Calcutatische Hahn and the Dutch Kalkoen (from Calicuit) are specific in error as indicating the origin of the Turkey in the East.
This misnomer may have arisen from the nearly simultaneous discovery of America and of the Cape route to Calicuit, by Spain and Portugal respectively. It may also have been connected with the fact that Malabar produced domestic fowls of extraordinary size. Of these Ibn Battatu (quoted below) makes quaint mention.
Zedler's great German Lexicon of Universal Knowledge, a work published as late as 1745, says that these birds (turkeys) were called Calcutische and Indische because they were brought by the Portuguese from the Malabar coast.
Dr. Caldwell cites a curious disproof of the antiquity of certain Tamil verses from their containing a simile of which the turkey forms the subject. And 1750-52.—"Some Germans call the turkeys Calcutta hens; for this reason I looked about for them here, and to the best of my remembrance I was told they were foreign."—Olof Torren, 199-200. We do not know whether the mistake of Calcutta for Calicut belongs to the original author or to the translator—probably to the proverbial traditore.

TURNEE, TUNNEE, s. An English supercargo, Sea-Hind, and probably a corruption of attorney. (Boebeck).

TURPAUL, s. Sea-Hind. A tarpaulin (vbid.). [The word tarpad has now come into common native use.]

TUSSAH, TUSSER, s. A kind of inferior silk, the tissues of which are now commonly exported to England. Anglo-Indians generally regard the termination of this word in r as a vulgarism, like the use of solar for sola (q.v.); but it is in fact correct. For though it is written by Millburn (1813) tusha, and tussah (ii. 158, 244), we find it in the Ain-i-Akbari as tassar, and in Dr. Buchanan as tasser (see below). The term is supposed to be adopted from Skt. tasara, trasara, Hind. tasser, 'a shuttle'; perhaps from the form of the cocoon? The moth whose worm produced this silk is generally identified with Antheraea paphia, but Capt. Hutton has shown that there are several species known as tassar worms. These are found almost throughout the whole extent of the forest tracts of India. But the chief seat of the manufacture of stuffs, wholly or partly of tasser silk, has long been Bhagalpur on the Ganges. [See also Allen, Mon. on Silk Cloths of Assam, 1899; Yussuf Ali, Silk Fabrics of N.W.P., 1900.] The first mention of tassar in English reports is said to be that by Michael Atkinson of Jangipur, as cited below in the Linear Transaction of 1804 by Dr. Roxburgh (see Official Report on Sericulture in India, by J. Geoghegan, Calcutta, 1872), and the elaborate article in Watt, Econ. Dict. vi. pt. iii. 96 seqq.]

TUTICORIN, n.p. A sea-port of Tinnevelly, and long the seat of pearl-fishery, in Tamil Tuttukkudil [which the Madras Gloss. derives from Tamil tuttu, 'to scatter,' kudi, 'habitation']. According to Fra Paolino the name is Tutukodi, 'a place where nets are washed,' but he is not to be trusted. Another etymology alleged is from tura, 'a bush.' But see Bp. Caldwell below.

TYOONNA, TYEKENA. s. A room in the basement or cellaring, or dug in the ground, in which it has in some parts of India been the practice to pass the hottest part of the day during the hottest season of the year. Pers. tah-ikhāna, 'nether-house,' i.e. 'subterraneous apartment.' ["In the centre of the court is an elevated platform, the roof of a subterraneous chamber called a zeera zemon, whither travellers retire during the great heats of the summer." (Morier, Journey through Persia, &c., 81). Another name for such a place is sardāb (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 314).]

TYPHOON, s. A tornado or cyclone-wind; a sudden storm, a 'norwester' (q.v.). Sir John Barrow (see Autobiog, 57) ridicules "learned antiquarians" for fancying that the Chinese took typhoon from the Egyptian Typhon, the word being, according to him, simply the Chinese syllables, ta-fung, 'Great Wind.' His ridicule is misplaced. With a monosyllabic language like the Chinese (as we have remarked elsewhere) you may construct a plausible etymology, to meet the requirements of the sound alone, from anything and for anything. And as there is no evidence that the word is in Chinese use at all, it would perhaps be as fair a suggestion to derive it from the English "tough' un," Mr. Giles, who seems to think that the balance of evidence is in favour of this (Barrow's) etymology, admits a serious objection to be that the Chinese have special names for the typhoon, and rarely, if ever, speak of it vaguely as a 'great wind.' The fact is that very few words of the class used by seafaring and trading people, even when they refer to Chinese objects, are directly taken from the Chinese language. E.g. Mandarin, págoda, chōp, cooly, tutenague; — none of these are Chinese. And the probability is that Vasco and his followers got the tufão, which our sailors made into touffon and then into typhoon, as they got the mônção which our sailors made into monsoon, direct from the Arab pilots.

The Arabic word is tūfān, which is used habitually in India for a sudden and violent storm. Lane defines it as meaning 'an overpowering rain,... Noah's flood,' etc. And there can be little doubt of its identity with the Greek τυφώς or τυφών. [But Burton (Av. Nights, iii. 257) alleges that it is pure Arabic, and comes from the root tuwf, 'going round.'] This word τυφών (the etymologists say, from τυφώ, 'I raise smoke') was applied to a demon-giant or Titan, and either directly from the etym. meaning or from the name of the Titan (as in India a whirlwind is called 'a Devil or Pisachee') to a 'waterspout,' and thence to analogous stormy phenomena. 'Waterspout' seems evidently the meaning of τυφών in the Meteorologiae of Aristotle (γένεται μέν ὂν τυφών... κ.τ.λ.) iii. 1; the passage is exceedingly difficult to render clearly); and also in the quotation which we give from Aulus Gellius. The word may have come to the Arabs either in maritime intercourse, or through the translations of Aristotle. It occurs (al-tūfān) several times in the Koran; thus in sura, vii, 134, for a flood or storm, one of the plagues of Egypt, and in s. xxix. 14 for the Deluge.

Dr. F. Hirth, again (Journ. R. Geog. Soc. i. 260), advocates the quasi-Chinese origin of the word. Dr. Hirth has found the word Tai (and also with the addition of fang, 'wind') to be really applied to a certain class of cyclonic winds, in a Chinese work on Formosa, which is a re-issue of a book originally published in 1694. Dr. Hirth thinks Tai as here used (which is not the Chinese word ta or tai, 'great,' and is expressed by a different character) to be a local Formosan term; and is of opinion that the combination tai-fang is "a sound so near that of typhoon as almost to exclude all other conjectures, if we consider that the writers using the term in European languages were travellers distinctly applying it to storms encountered in that part of the China Sea." Dr. Hirth also refers to F. Mendes Pinto and the passages (quoted below) in which he says tufão is the Chinese name for such storms.

Dr. Hirth's paper is certainly worthy of much more attention than the scornful assertion of Sir John Barrow, but it does not induce us to change our view as to the origin of typhoon.

Observe that the Port. tufão distinctly represents tāfān and not tā/fin, and the oldest English form 'tuffon' does the same, whilst it is not by any means unquestionable that these Portuguese and English forms were first applied in the China Sea, and not in the Indian Ocean. Observe also Lord Bacon’s use of the word typhones in his Latin below; also that tāfān is an Arabic word, at least as old as the Koran, and closely allied in sound and meaning to τυφῶν, whilst it is habitually used for a storm in Hindustani. This is shown by the quotations below (1810-1836); and Platts defines tāfān as “a violent storm of wind and rain, a tempest, a typhoon; a flood, deluge, inundation, the universal deluge” etc.; also tāfānī, “stormy, tempestuous . . . boisterous, quarrelsome, violent, noisy, riotous.”

Little importance is to be attached to Pinto’s linguistic remarks such as that quoted, or even to the like dropped by Couto. We apprehend that Pinto made exactly the same mistake that Sir John Barrow did; and we need not wonder at it, when so many of our countrymen in India have supposed hackery to be a Hindustani word, and when we find even the learned H. H. Wilson assuming top (in the sense of ‘grove’) to be in native Hindustani use. Many instances of such mistakes might be quoted. It is just possible, though not we think very probable, that some contact with the Formosan term may have influenced the modification of the old English form tuffon into typhoon. It is much more likely to have been influenced by the analogies of *monsoon, sīmōo*n; and it is quite possible that the Formosan mariners took up their (unexplained) tai-fung from the Dutch or Portuguese.

On the origin of the Ar. word the late Prof. Robertson-Smith forwarded the following note:

“The question of the origin of Tūfān appears to be somewhat tangled.

"Τυφῶν, ‘whirlwind, waterspout,’ connected with τυφῶν seems pure Greek; the combination in Baal-Zephon, Exod. xiv. 2, and Sephōn, the northern one, in Joel, ii. 20, suggested by Hitzig, appears to break down, for there is no proof of any Egyptian name for Set corresponding to Typhon.

"On the other hand Tūfān, the deluge, is plainly borrowed from the Aramaic. Tūfān, for Noah’s flood, is both Jewish, Aramaic and Syriac, and this form is not borrowed from the Greek, but comes from a true Semitic root tāf to overflow.

"But again, the sense of whirlwind is not recognised in classical Arabic. Even Dozy in his dictionary of later Arabic only cites a modern French-Arabic dictionary (Bochor’s) for the sense, Tourbillon, trombe. Bistain in the Mohít el Moháit does not give this sense, though he is pretty full in giving modern as well as old words and senses. In Arabic the root tāf means ‘to go round,’ and a combination of this idea with the sense of sudden disaster might conceivably have given the new meaning to the word. On the other hand it seems simpler to regard this sense as a late loan from some modern form of τυφῶν "typhoon, tifon, or tifone. But in order finally to settle the matter one wants examples of this sense of tūfān.

"[Prof. Skeat (Concise Dict. s.v.) gives: “Sometimes claimed as a Chinese word meaning ‘a great wind’ . . . but this seems to be a late mystification. In old authors the forms are tuffon, tufsson, tiphon, &c.—Arab. tūfān, a hurricane, storm. Gk. τυφῶν, better τυφός, a whirlwind. The close accidental coincidence of these words in sense and form is very remarkable, as Whitney notes.”]

The East Indies often times, there are not stormes as in other countreys; but every 10 or 12 yeere there are such tempestes and stormes that it is a thing incredible ... neither do they know certainly what yeere they will come."—Master Caesar Frederike, in Hâbl. ii. 370 [309].

1575.—"But when we approach'd unto it (Cyprus), a Hurricane arose suddenly, and blew so fiercely upon us, that it wound our great Sail round about our main Mast. ... These Winds arise from a Wind which is called by the Greeks Typhon; and Pliny calleth it Vertex and Vortice; but as dangerous as they are, as they arise suddenly, so quickly are they laid again also."—Ravettill's Travels, in Ray's Collection, ed. 1705, p. 320. Here the traveller seems to intimate (though we are not certain) that Typhon was then applied in the Levant to such winds; in any case it was exactly the ὑφάν of India.

1602.—"This Junk seeking to make the port of Chineoo met with a tremendous storm such as the natives call Tufão, a thing so overpowering and terrible, and bringing such violence, such earthquake as it were, that it appears as if all the running of the infernal world had got into the waves and seas, driving them in a whirl till their fury seems to raise a scud of flame, whilst in the space of one turning of the sand-glass the wind shall veer round to every point of the compass, seeming to blow more furiously from each in succession.

"Such is this phenomenon that the very birds of heaven, by some natural instinct, know of its coming days beforehand, and are seen to take their nests down from the tree-tops and hide them in crevices of rock. Eight days before, the clouds also are seen to float so low as almost to graze men's heads, whilst in these days the seas seem beaten down as it were, and of a deep blue colour. And before the storm breaks forth, the sky exhibits a token well-known to all, a great object which seamen call the Ox-Eye (Olho de Bo) all of different colours, but so gloomy and appalling that it strikes fear in all who see it. And as the Bow of Heaven, when it appears, is the token of fair weather, and calm, so this seems to portend the Wrath of God, as we may well call such a storm. ..."—Cotta, V. viii. 12.

Mr. Ruskin appears to have had no doubt as to the etymology of Typhoon, for the rain-cloud from this picture is engraved in Modern Painters, vol. iv. as "The Locks of Typhoon."—See Mr. Hamerton's Life of Turner, pp. 288, 291, 315.

Compare the next quotation, from the same writer, with that given above from Cuto respecting the Olio de Boi:

1885. — "The district was subject to cyclonic storms of incredible violence, fortunately lasting for a very short time, but which often caused much destruction. These storms were heralded by the appearance above the horizon of clouds known to the natives by the name of lady's eyebrows, so called from their being curved in a narrow black-arched wisp, and these most surely foretold the approach of the tornado."

UJUNGTANAH, n.p. This is the Malay name (nearly answering to 'Land's End,' from Ujung, 'point or promontory,' and tanah, 'land') of the extreme end of the Malay Peninsula terminating in what the maps call Pt. UMBRELLA, s. This word is of course not Indian or Anglo-Indian, but the thing is very prominent in India, and some interest attaches to the history of the word and thing in Europe. We shall collect here a few quotations bearing upon this. The knowledge and use of this serviceable instrument seems to have gone through extraordinary eclipses. It is frequent as an accompaniment of royalty in the Nineveh sculptures; it was in general Indian use in the time of Alexander;
it occurs in old Indian inscriptions, in Greek vases, and in Greek and Latin literature; it was in use at the court of Byzantium, and at that of the Great Khan in Mongolia, in medieval Venice, and more recently in the semi-savage courts of Madagascar and Ashantee. Yet it was evidently a strange object, needing particular description, to John Marignolli (c. 1350), Ruy Clavijo (c. 1404), Barbosa (1516),
John de Barros (1553), and Minshue
(1617). See also CHATTA, and SOM-

"The gentleman, who carried away a brown silk umbrella from the — Section yesterday, may have the cover belonging to it, which is of no further use to the Owner, by applying to the Porter at the Royal Hotel."—(From Personal Recollection.)—It is a curious parallel to the advertisement above from the Female Tatler.

UPAS, s. This word is now, like Juggernaut, chiefly used in English as a customary metaphor, and to indicate some institution that the speaker wishes to condemn in a compendious manner. The word upas is Javanese for poison; [Mr. Scott writes: 'The Malay word upas, means simply 'poison.' It is Javanese hupas, Sundanese upas, Balinese hupas, 'poison.' It commonly refers to vegetable poison, because such are more common. In the Lampong language upas means 'sickness.'] It became familiar in Europe in connection with exaggerated and fabulous stories regarding the extraordinary and deadly character of a tree in Java, alleged to be so called. There are several trees in the Malay Islands producing deadly poisons, but the particular tree to which such stories were attached is one which has in the last century been described under the name of Antiaris toxicaria, from the name given to the poison by the Javanese proper, viz. Antjar, or Anchir (the name of the tree all over Java), whilst it is known to the Malays and people of Western Java as Upas, and in Celebes and the Philippine Islands as Ipo or Hipo.
UPAS.  953

[According to Mr. Scott "the Malay name for the 'poison-tree,' or any poison-tree, is ḍōhun ṣēra, ḍōhun ṣēbas, represented in English by bohon-upas. The names of two poison-trees, the Javanese anchār (Malay also anchor) and chehik, appear occasionally in English books... The Sundanese name for the poison tree is buho oranga."] It was the poison commonly used by the natives of Celebes and other islands for poisoning the small bamboo darts which they used (and in some islands still use) to shoot from the blow-tube (see SUMPITAN, SARBATANE).

The story of some deadly poison in these islands is very old, and we find it in the Travels of Friar Odoric, accompanied by the mention of the disgusting antidote which was believed to be efficacious, a genuine Malay belief, and told by a variety of later and independent writers, such as Nieuhof, Saar, Tavenier, Clever, and Kaempfer.

The subject of this poison came especially to the notice of the Dutch in connection with its use to poison the arrows just alluded to, and some interesting particulars are given on the subject by Bontius, from whom a quotation is given below, with others. There is a notice of the poison in De Bry, in Sir T. Herbert (whencesoever he borrowed it), and in somewhat later authors about the middle of the 17th century. In March 1666 the subject came before the young Royal Society, and among a long list of subjects for inquiry in the East occur two questions pertaining to this matter.

The illustrious Rumphius in his Herbarium Amboinense goes into a good deal of detail on the subject, but the tree does not grow in Ambonaya where he wrote, and his account thus contains some ill-founded statements, which afterwards lent themselves to the fabulous history of which we shall have to speak presently. Rumphius however procured from Macassar specimens of the plant, and it was he who first gave the native name (Ipo, the Macassar form) and assigned a scientific name, Arbortoxicaria.* Passing over with simple mention the notices in the appendix to John Ray's Hist. Plantarum, and in Valentijn (from both of which extracts will be found below), we come to the curious compound of the loose statements of former writers magnified, of the popular stories current among Europeans in the Dutch colonies, and of pure romantic invention, which first appeared in 1783, in the London Magazine. The confessed author of this account was one Foersch, who had served as a junior surgeon in the Dutch East Indies.* This person describes the tree, called bohon-upas, as situated "about 27 leagues† from Batavia, 14 from Soura Karta, the seat of the Emperor, and between 18 and 20 leagues from Tinkjoe" (probably for Tjukjoe, i.e. Djokjo-Karta), "the present residence of the Sultan of Java." Within a radius of 15 to 18 miles round the tree no human creature, no living thing could exist. Condemned malefactors were employed to fetch the poison; they were protected by special arrangements, yet not more than 1 in 10 of them survived the adventure. Foersch also describes executions by means of the Upas poison, which he says he witnessed at Sura Karta in February 1776.

The whole paper is a very clever piece of sensational romance, and has impressed itself indelibly, it would seem, on the English language; for to it is undoubtedly due the adoption of that standing metaphor to which we have alluded at the beginning of this article. This effect may, however, have been due not so much directly to the article in the London Magazine as to the adoption of the fable by the famous ancestor of a man still more famous, Erasmus Darwin, in his poem of the Loves of the Plants. In that work not only is the essence of Foersch's story embodied in the verse, but the story itself is quoted at length in the notes. It is said that Darwin was warned of the worthlessness of the narrative, but was unwilling to rob his poem of so sensational an episode.

Nothing appears to be known of Foersch except that there was really a person of that name in the medical service in Java at the time indicated. In our article ANACONDA we have adduced some curious particulars of analogy between the Anaconda-myth and the Upas-myth, and intimated a suspicion that the same hand may have had to do with the spinning of both yarns.

The extraordinary éclat produced by the Foerschian fables led to the appointment of a committee of the Batavian Society to investigate the true facts, whose report was published in 1789. This we have not yet been able to see, for the report is not contained in the regular series of the Transactions of that Society; nor have we found a refutation of the fables by M. Charles Coquebert referred to by Leschenault in the paper which we are about to mention. The poison tree was observed in Java by Deschamps, naturalist with the expedition of D’Entreasteaux, and is the subject of a notice by him in the Annales de Voyages, vol. i., which goes into little detail, but appears to be correct as far as it goes, except in the statement that the Anchar was confined to Eastern Java. But the first thorough identification of the plant, and scientific account of the facts was that of M. Leschenault de la Tour. This French savant, when about to join a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, was recommended by Jussieu to take up the investigation of the Upas. On first enquiring at Batavia and Samarang, M. Leschenault heard only fables akin to Foersch’s romance, and it was at Sura Karta that he first got genuine information, which eventually enabled him to describe the tree from actual examination.

The tree from which he took his specimens was more than 100 ft. in height, with a girth of 18 ft. at the base. A Javanese who climbed it to procure the flowers had to make cuts in the stem in order to mount. After ascending some 25 feet the man felt so ill that he had to come down, and for some days he continued to suffer from nausea, vomiting, and vertigo. But another man climbed to the top of the tree without suffering at all. On another occasion Leschenault, having had a tree of 4 feet girth cut down, walked among its broken branches, and had face and hands besprinkled with the gum-resin, yet neither did he suffer; he adds, however, that he had washed immediately after. Lizards and insects were numerous on the trunk, and birds perched upon the branches. M. Leschenault gives details of the preparation of the poison as practised by the natives, and also particulars of its action, on which experiment was made in Paris with the material which he brought to Europe. He gave it the scientific name by which it continues to be known, viz. Antiaris toxicaria (N.O. Artocearpea).*

M. Leschenault also drew the attention of Dr. Horsfield, who had been engaged in the botanical exploration of Java some years before the British occupation, and continued it during that period, to the subject of the Upas, and he published a paper on it in the Batavian Transactions for 1813 (vol. vii.). His account seems entirely in accordance with that of Leschenault, but is more detailed and complete, with the result of numerous observations and experiments of his own. He saw the Antiaris first in the Province of Poegar, on his way to Banyuwangi. In Blambangan (eastern extremity of Java) he visited four or five trees; he afterwards found a very tall specimen growing at Passaruwang, on the borders of Malang, and again several young trees in the forests of Japara, and one near Onarang. In all these cases, scattered over the length of Java, the people knew the tree as Anchar.

Full articles on the subject are to be found (by Mr. J. J. Bennet) in Horsfield’s Plantae Javanicae Rariores, 1838-52, pp. 52 seqq., together with a figure of a flowering branch pl. xiii.; and in Blume’s Rumphia (Brussels, 1836), pp. 46 seqq., and pls. xxii., xxiii.; to both of which works we have been much indebted for guidance. Blume gives a drawing, for the truth of which he vouches, of a tall specimen of the trees. These he describes as “vostas, arduas, et a ceteris segregatae,”—solitary.

* Leschenault also gives the description of another and still more powerful poison, used in a similar way to that of the Antiaris, viz. the tiête, called sometimes Upas Rojo, the plant producing which is a Strychnos, and a creeper. Though, as we have said, the name Upas is generic, and is applied to this, it is not the Upas of English metaphor, and we are not concerned with it here. Both kinds are produced and prepared in Java. The Ipo (a form of Upas) of Macassar is the Antiaris; the Ipo of the Berneo Dayaks is the Tiente.
and eminent, on account of their great longevity, (possibly on account of their being spared by the axe?), but not for any such reason as the fables allege. There is no lack of adjoining vegetation; the spreading branches are clothed abundantly with parasitical plants, and numerous birds and squirrels frequent them. The stem throws out ‘wings’ or buttresses (see Horsfield in the Bat. Trans., and Blume’s Pl. like many of the forest trees of Further India. Blume refers, in connection with the origin of the prevalent fables, to the real existence of exhalations of carbonic acid gas in the volcanic tracts of Java, dangerous to animal life and producing sterility around, alluding particularly to a paper by M. Loudon in the Edinburgh New Phil. Journal for 1832, p. 102, containing a formidable description of the Guwo Upas or Poison Valley on the frontier of the Pekalongan and Banyumas provinces. We may observe, however, that, if we remember rightly, the exaggerations of Mr. Loudon have been exposed and ridiculed by Dr. Junghuhn, the author of "Java." And if the Foersch legend be compared with some of the particulars alleged by several of the older writers, e.g. Camell (in Ray), Valentinj, Spielman, Kaempfer, and Rumphius, it will be seen that the basis for a great part of that putida commentatio, as Blume calls it, is to be found in them.

George Colman the Younger founded on the Foerschian Upas-myth, a kind of melodrama, called the Law of Java, first acted at Covent Garden May 11, 1822. We give some quotations below.*

Lindley, in his Vegetable Kingdom, in a short notice of Aniaris toxicaria, says that, though the accounts are greatly exaggerated, yet the facts are notable enough. He says cloth made from the tough fibre is so acrid as to verify the Shirt of Nessus. My friend Gen. Maclagan, noticing Lindley’s remark to me, adds: "Do you remember in our High School days (at Edinburgh) a grand Diorama called The Upas Tree? It showed a large wild valley, with a single tree in the middle, and illustrated the safety of approach on the windward side, and the desolation it dealt on the other."

c. 1390.—"En queste isole sono molte cose maravigliose e strane. Onde alcuni aborli li sono . . . che fanno veleno pessimo . . . Quelli uomini sono quasi tutti corsali, e quando vanno a battaglia portano ciascuno una canna in mano, di lunghezza d’un braccio e pongono in capo de la canna uno ago di ferro atossato in quel veleno, e solano nella canna e l’ago vela e percutotelo dove vogliono, e non tentino quelli che il parossoro more. Ma egli hanno la tina piana di stero d’uomo e una iscodella di stero guarisce l’uomo da queste cotali ponture."—Storia di Friate Odorigo, from Palatina MS., in Cathay, &c., App., p. xlix.

c. 1630.—"And (in Makasser) which is no lesser infernal, the men use long cones or truncks (cold Sempitans—see Sumpitan), out of which they can (and use it) blow a little prickling quill, which if it draw the least drop of blood from any part of the body, makes him (though the strongest man living) die immediately; some venoms operate in an hour, others in a moment, the veynes and body (by the virulence of the poysom) corrupting and rotting presently, to any man’s terror and amazement, and feare to live where such abominations pre-dominete."—Sir T. Herbert, ed. 1693, p. 329.

c. 1631.—"I will now conclude, but first must say something of the poison used by the King of Macassar in the Island of Celebes to envenom those little arrows which they shoot through blowing-tubes, a poison so deadly that it causes death more rapidly than a dagger. For one wounded ever so lightly, be it but a scratch bringing blood, or a prick in the heel, immediately begins to nod like a drunken man, and falls dead to the ground. And within half an hour of death this putrescent poison so corrupts the flesh that it rots them like so much muce. And what seems still more marvellous, if a man (e.g.) be scratched in the thigh, or higher in the body, by another point which is not poisoned, and the still warm blood as it flows down to the feet be merely touched by one of these poisoned little arrows, swift as wind the pestilential influence ascends to the wound, and with the same swiftnes and other effects snatches the man from among the living.

"These are no idle tales, but the experience of eye-witnesses, not only among our countrymen, but among Danes and Englishmen."—Fac. Bontii, lib. v. cap. xxxiii.*

* I remember when a boy reading the whole of Foersch’s story in a fascinating book, called Wood’s Zoography, which I have not seen for half a century, and which, I should suppose from my recollection, was more sensational than scientific.
1646.—"Es wächst ein Baum auf Macasser, einer Olist auf der Insul Celebes, der ist trefflich getrostet, dass wann einer nur an einem Glied damit verletzet wird, und man solches nit alsdhals wegschlägt, der Gift geschwimt zum Hertzen ilet, und den Caraus machet" (then the antidote as before is mentioned). . . . "Mit solchem Gift schmiren die Bandaneesen Ihre lange Pfeil, die Sie von grossen Bögen, einer Mannsling hoch, hurtig schiessen; in Bande aber tähnten Ihre Weber grossen Schaden damit. Denn Sie sich auf die Baume setzten, und kleine Fischgerüht damit schmiernten, und durch ein gehöhlt Rührlein, von einem Baum, auf unser Volek schossen, mit grossen machtigen Schaden."

1682.—"The especial weapons of the Makassar soldiers, which they use against their enemies, are certain pointed arrowlets about a foot in length. At the foremost end these are fitted with a sharp, and pointed fish-tooth, and at the butt with a knob of spongy wood."

"The points of these arrows, long before they are to be used, are dipit in poison and then dried.

"This poison is a sap that drips from the bark of the branches of a certain tree, like resin, from pine-trees.

"The tree grows on the Island Makasser, in the interior, and on three or four islands of the Bugissus (see BUGIS), round about Makasser. It is about the height of the elephant, and has leaves very similar."

"The fresh sap of this tree is a very deadly poison; indeed its virulence is incurable.

"The arrowlets prepared with this poison are not, by the Makasser soldiers, shot with a bow, but blown from certain blow-pipes (wit zeker spatten gespat); just as here, in the country, people shoot birds by blowing round pellets of clay."

"The can with these in still weather hit their mark at a distance of 4 rods.

"They say the Makassers themselves know no remedy against this poison . . . for the poison presses swiftly into the blood and vital spirits, and causes a violent inflammation. They hold (however) that the surest remedy for this poison is . . ." (and so on, repeating the antidote already mentioned).

1683.—"Arbor Toxicaria, Ipo.

"I have never yet met with any poison more horrible and hateful, produced by any vegetable growth, than that which is derived from this laccaceous tree.

Moreover beneath this tree, and in its whole circumference to the distance of a stone-cast, no plant, no shrub, or herbage will grow; the soil beneath it is barren, blackened, and burnt as it were . . . and the atmosphere about it is so polluted and poisoned that the birds which alight upon its branches become giddy and fall dead.   all things perish which are touched by its emanations, insomuch that every animal shuns it and keeps away from it, and even the birds eschew flying by it.

"No man dares to approach the tree without having his arms, feet, and head wrapped round with linen . . . for Death seems to have planted his foot and his throne beside this tree." (He then tells of a venomous basilisk with two feet in front and fiery eyes, a crest, and a horn, that dwelt under this tree). ** **

"The Malays call it Caja Upas, but in Macassar and the rest of Celebes it is called Ipo.

  It grows in desert places, and amid bare hills, and is easily discerned from afar, there being no other tree near it."

---Rumphii, Herbarium Amboinense, ii. 263-268.

1685.—"I cannot omit to set forth here an account of the poisoned missiles of the Kingdom of Macassar, which the natives of that kingdom have used against our soldiers, bringing them to sudden death. It is extracted from the Journal of the illustrious and gallant admiral, H. Cornelius Spielman.

"The natives of the kingdom in question possess a singular art of shooting arrows by blowing through canes, and wounding with these, insomuch that if the skin be but slightly scratched the wounded die in a twinkling."

(Then the old story of the only antidote).

The account follows extracted from the Journal.

"There are but few among the Macassars and Bugis who possess the real knowledge needful for selecting the poison, so as to distinguish between what is worthless and what is highest quality. . . . From the princes (or Rajas) I have understood that the soil in which the trees affording the poison grow, for a great space round about produces no grass nor any other vegetable growth, and that the poison is properly a water or liquid, flowing from a bruise or cut made in the bark of those trees, oozing out as sap does from plants that afford milky juices. . . . When the liquid is being drawn from the wounded tree, no one should carelessly approach it so as to let the liquid touch his hands, for by such contact all the points become stiffened and contracted. For this reason the collectors make use of long bamboos, armed with sharp iron points. With these they stab the tree with great force, and so get the sap to flow into the canes, in which it 1726.—"But among all sorts of trees, that occur here, or heretobfore, I know of none more pernicious than the sap of the Macassar Poison tree * * * They say that there are only a few trees of this kind, occuring in the district of Tutatte on Celebes, and that none are employed except, at a certain time of the year when it is procurable, those who are condemned to death, to approach the trees and bring away the poison. The poison is procured with the greatest care in Bamboos, into which it drips slowly from the bark of the trees, and the persons collected for this purpose must first have their hands, heads, and all exposed parts, well wound round with cloths. ..." —Valentijn, iii. 218.

1783.—"The following description of the BOHON Upas, or Poison Tree, which grows in the Island of Java, and renders it un- wholesome by its noxious vapours, has been procured for the London Magazine, from Mr. Heydinger, who was employed to translate it from the original Dutch, by the author, Mr. Foebech, who, we are informed, is at present abroad, in the capacity of surgeon on board an English vessel. ..." —In the year 1774, I was stationed at Batavia, as a surgeon, in the service of the Dutch East India Company. During my residence there I received several different accounts of the Bohon-Upas, and the violent effects of its poison. They all then seemed incredible to me, but raised my curiosity in so high a degree, that I resolved to inves- tigate this subject thoroughly. ... I had procured a recommendation from an old Malayan priest to another priest, who lives on the nearest habitable spot to the tree, which is about fifteen or sixteen miles distant. The latter proved of great service to me in my undertaking, as that priest is employed by the Emperor to reside there, in order to prepare for eternity the souls of those who, for different crimes, are sen- tenced to approach the tree, and to procure the poison. ... Malefactors, who, for their crimes, are sentenced to die, are the only persons to fetch the poison; and this is the only chance they have of saving their lives. ... They are then provided with a silver or tortoise-shell box, in which they are to put the poisonous gum, and are properly instructed how to proceed, while they are upon their dangerous expedition. Among other particulars, they are always told to attend to the direction of the winds; as they are to go towards the tree before the wind, so that the efluvia from the tree are always blown from them. ... They are afterwards sent to the house of the old priest, to which place they are commonly attended by their friends and relations. Here they generally remain some days, in expectation of a favourable breeze. During that time the ecclesiastical prepares them for their future fate by prayers and admioni- tions. When the hour of their departure arrives the priest puts them on a long

I have been led to suppose that his literary abilities were as mean as his contempt for truth was consummate.

VARELLA. s. This is a term constantly applied by the old Portuguese writers to the pagodas of Indo-China and China. Of its origin we have no positive evidence. The most probable etymology is that it is the Malay barahal or brahahal, [in Wilkinson's Dict. bheraha], 'an idol.' An idol temple is ranaah-brahahal, 'a house of idols,' but brahahal alone may have been used elliptically by the Malavs or misunderstood by the Portuguese. We have an analogy in the double use of pagoda for temple and idol.

1555. — "Their temples are very large edifices, richly wrought, which they call Valeras, and which cost a great deal. . . ." —Account of China in a Jesuits's Letter appended to Fr. Alvarez H. of Ethiopia, translated by Mr. Major in his Introd. to Mendoza, Hak. Soc. i. xlvii.

1583. — "Gran quantità se ne consuma ancora in quel Regno nelle lor Varelle, che sono gli su' pagodi, de' quali ve n'e gran quantità di grandi e di piccole, e sono alcune montagnule fatte a mano, a guisa d'vn pan di zucaro, e alcune d'esse alte quanti il campanile di S. Marco di Venetia . . . si consuma in queste istesse varelle anco gran quantità di oro di foglia. . . ." — Ces. Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 395; [in Hakl. ii. 368.]

1588. — "navigammo fin la mattina, che ci trovammo alla Bara giusto di Negrais, che cossi si chiama in lor linguaggio il porto, che va in Pegu, oue discoprimmo a banda sinistra del rio vn pagoda, ower varella et tutta dorata, che vengono d'alto mare, et mas-sime quando il Sol percorse in quell' oro, che VEDAS. The Sacred Books of the Brahmans, Veda being 'knowledge.' Of these books there are nominally four, viz. the Rig, Yajur, Sama and Atharva Vedas.

The earliest direct intimation of knowledge of the existence of the Vedas appears to be in the book called De Tribus Impostoribus, said to have been printed in 1598, in which they are mentioned.† Possibly this know-

* Compare this vivid description with a modern notice of the same pagoda:

1855. "This meridian range . . . 700 miles from its origin in the Naga wilds . . . sinks in the sea hard by Negrais, its last bluf crowning by the golden Pagoda of Modain, gleaming far to seaward, a Burmese Sunnun." —Yule, Mission to Ava, 272. There is a small view of it in this work.

† So wrote A. B. I cannot find the book in the B. Museum Library.—F. (A bibliographical account of this book will be found in "La Tratté des Trois Imposteurs, et précédé d'une notice philo/

The passage above the Vedas seems to be the following: LeBron, Paris and Brussels, 1867. Also see 7 Ser. N. d. Q. viii. 440 seqq.; 9 Ser. ix. 56. The passage above the Vedas seems to be the following: "Et Securtar istorum, ut et Vedas et Brachmain-ororum ante MCCCC retro seculo obstant collectanea, ut de Sineusibus nihil dicam. Tu, qui in angulo Europae hic delitescis, ista neglegis, negas; quam bene vides ipsae. Eadem facilitate enim isti tua ledge came through the Arabs. Though thus we do not trace back any direct allusion to the Vedas in European books, beyond the year 1600 or thereabouts, there seems good reason to believe that the Jesuit missionaries had information on the subject at a much earlier date. St. Francis Xavier had frequent discussions with Brahmins, and one went so far as to communicate to him the mantra “Om ōm ōm ōm.” In 1559 a learned Brahman at Goa was converted by Father Belchior Carneyro, and baptized by the name of Manuel. He afterwards (with the Viceroy’s sanction!) went by night and robbed a Brahman on the mainland who had collected many MSS., and presented the spoils to the Fathers, with great satisfaction to himself and them (Sousa, Orient. Conquist. i. 151-2).

It is probable that the information concerning the Hindu religion and sacred books which was attained even in Europe by the end of the 16th century was greater than is commonly supposed, and greater than what we find in print would warrant us to assume. A quotation from San Roman below illustrates this in a general way. And in a constitution of Gregory XV. dated January 31, 1623, there is mention of rites called Haideres and Tandie, which doubtless represent the Vedic names Aittareya and Twadha (see Norbert, i. 39). Lucena’s allusion below to the “four parts” of Hindu doctrine must have reference to the Vedas, and his information must have come from reports and letters, as he never was in India. In course of time, however, what had been known seems to have been forgotten, and even Halhed (1776) could write about ‘Beids of the Shaster!’ (see Code, p. xiii.). This shows that though he speaks also of the ‘Four Beids’ (p. xxxi.) he had no precise knowledge.

In several of the earlier quotations of the word it will be seen that the form used is Vedam or Veidam. This is the Tamil form. And it became prevalent during the 18th century in France from Voltaire’s having constituted himself the advocate of a Sanskrit Poem, called by him V’Ezour Vedam, and which had its origin in S. India. This was in reality an imitation of an Indian Purāṇa, composed by some missionary in the 17th century (probably by R. de’ Nobili), to introduce Christian doctrines; but Voltaire supposed it to be really an ancient Indian book. Its real character was first explained by Sonnerat (see the Essay by F. W. Ellis, in As. Res. xi.). The first information regarding the real Vedas was given by Colebrooke in 1805 (As. Res. viii.). Orme and some authors of the 18th and early part of the 19th century write Bede, which represents the N. Indian vernacular form Bed. Both forms, Bed and Vedam, are known to Fleury, as we see below.

On the subject of the Vedas, see Weber’s Hist. of Indian Lit., Max Müller’s Ancient Sanskrit Lit., Whitney’s Oriental and Linguistic Studies, vol. i. [and Macdonell’s Hist. of Sanskrit Lit., pp. 29 seqq.].

VEDDAS, n.p. An aboriginal—or at least a forest—people of Ceylon.
The word is said to mean 'hunters,' [Tam. veda, 'hunting'].

VELLARD, s. This is a word apparently peculiar to the Island of Bombay, used in the sense which the quotation shows. We have failed to get any elucidation of it from local experience; but there can be little doubt that it is a corruption of the Port. vallado, 'a mound or embankment.' [It is generally known as 'Hornby's Vellard,' after the Governor of that name; but it seems to have been built about 1752, some 20 years before Hornby's time (see Douglas, Bombay and W. India, i. 140).]

1805.—"At the foot of the little hill of Sion is a causeway or vellard, which was built by Mr. Duncan, the present Governor, across a small arm of the sea, which separates Bombay from Salsette. The vellard was begun A.D. 1792, and finished in 1805, at an expense of 50,575 rupees."—Maria Graham, 8.

VELLORE, n.p. A town, and formerly a famous fortress in the district of N. Arcot, 80 m. W. of Madras. It often figures in the wars of the 18th century, but is best known in Europe for the mutiny of the Sepoys there in 1806. The etym. of the name Vellâr is unknown to us. Fra Paolino gives it as Velur, 'the Town of the Lance'; and Col. Branfill as 'Velur, from Vie, a benefit, benefaction.' [Cox-Stuart (Man. N. Arcot, ii. 417) and the writer of the Madras Gloss, agree in deriving it from Tam. vel, 'the babool tree, Acacia arabica,' and är, 'village.]

VENDU-MASTER, s. We know this word only from the notifications which we quote. It was probably taken from the name of some Portuguese office of the same kind. [In the quotation given below from Owen it seems that the word was in familiar use at Johanna, and the context shows that his duty was somewhat like that of the chowdry, as he provided fowls, cattle, fruit, &c., for the expedition.]

1781.—From an advertisement in the India Gazette of May 17th it appears to have been an euphemism for Auctioneer; [also see Hasted, Echoes of Old Calcutta, 3rd ed. p. 109].

"Mr. Donald ... begs leave to acquaint them that the Vendu business will in future be carried on by Robert Donald, and W. Williams."—India Gazette, July 28.

1783.—"The Governor-General is pleased to notify that Mr. Williamson as the Company's Vendu Master is to have the superintendence and management of all Sales at the Presidency."—In Selow-Kerr, ii. 90. At pp. 107, 114, also are notifications of sales by "G. Williamson, Vendu Master."

[1823.—"One of the chiefs, a crafty old rogue, commonly known by the name of 'Lord Rodney' ... acted as captain of the port, interpreter, Vendue-Master and master of the ceremonies. ..."—Owen, Narrative of Voyages to explore the shores of Africa, &c., i. 179.]

VENETIAN, s. This is sometimes in books of the 18th and preceding century used for Sequins. See under CHICK.

1542.—"At the bottom of the cargo (bà'òix), among the ballast, she carried 4 big guns (tiros), and others of smaller size, and 60,000 venetians in gold, which were destined for Coje Çafar, in order that with this money he should in all speed provide necessaries for the fleet which was coming."—Correa, iv. 250.

1675. — Fryer gives among coins and weights at Goa:

"The Venetian ... 18 Tangoes, 30 Rees."—p. 206.

1752.—"At this juncture a gold mohur is found to be worth 14 Arcot Rupees, and a Venetian 4½ Arcot Rupees."—In Long, p. 32.

VERANDA. s. An open pillared gallery round a house. This is one of the very perplexing words for which at least two origins may be maintained, on grounds equally plausible. Besides these two, which we shall immediately mention, a third has sometimes been alleged, which is thus put forward by a well-known French scholar:

"Ce mot (veranda) n'est lui-même qu'une transcription inexacte du Persan beramâda, perche, terrasse, balcon."—C. Defréreyny, in Revue Critique, 1869, 1st Sem. p. 64.

Plausible as this is, it may be rejected. Is it not, however, possible that barâmâda, the literal meaning of which is 'coming forward, projecting,' may be a Persian 'striving after meaning,' in explanation of the foreign word which they may have borrowed?

Williams, again, in his Skt. Dict. (1872) gives 'varanda ... a veranda, a portico ...' Moreover Beames in his Comparative Grammar of Modern Aryan Languages, gives Sansk. barânda, 'portico,' Bengali bârânda, Hind, 'varanda, adding: 'Most of our wise-acres literateurs (qu. littérateurs?) in Hindustan now-a-days consider this word to be derived from Pers. bārāmadah, and write it accordingly. It is, however, good Sanskrit" (i. 153). Fortunately we have in Bishop Caldwell a proof that comparative grammar does not preclude good manners. Mr. Beames was evidently in entire ignorance of the facts which render the origin of the Anglo-Indian word so curiously ambiguous; but we shall not call him the "wise-acer grammarian." Varanda, with the meaning in question, does not, it may be observed, belong to the older Sanskrit, but is only found in comparatively modern works.*

Littre also gives as follows (1874):

"ETYM. Varandeah, mot rapporté de l'Inde par les Anglais, est la simple dégénérescence, dans les langues modernes de l'Inde, du Sansc. veranda, colonnade, de var, couvrir."

That the word as used in England and in France was brought by the English from India need not be doubted. But either in the same sense, or in one closely analogous, it appears to have existed, quite independently, in Portuguese and Spanish; and the manner in which it occurs without explanation in the very earliest narrative of the adventure of the Portuguese in India, as quoted below, seems almost to preclude the possibility of their having learned it in that country for the first time; whilst its occurrence in P. de Alcaca can leave no doubt on the subject.

[Prof. Skeat says: "If of native Span. origin, it may be Span. vara a rod, rail. Cf. L. uarus, crooked." (Concise Dict. s.v.).] 1498.—"E vêo ter comnisco onde estavamos lançados, em huma varanda onde estava hum grande castilhão d'aramo que nos alumeava."—Roteiro da Viagem de Vasco da Gama, 2nd ed., 1861, p. 62, i.e. "... and came to join us where we had been put in a varanda, where there was a great candlestick of brass that gave us light. ..."

And Correa, speaking of the same historical passage, though writing at a later date, says: "When the Captain-Major arrived, he was conducted through many courts and verandas (muitos patios e varandas) to a dwelling opposite that in which the king was. ..."—Correa, by Stanley, 193, compared with original Lendas, i. 1. 98.

1505.—In Pedro de Alcaca's Spanish-

Arabic Vocabulary we have:

"Varandas—Târpuq. Varandas assi çâryaba, çâryab."

Interpreting these Arabic words, with the assistance of Prof. Robertson Smith, we find that târpuq is, according to Dozy (Supp. 1. 430), darbāsī, itself taken from darbātis (παρεκτόν), 'a stair-railing, fireguard, balcony, &c.;' whilst çâryab stands for sarjāb, a variant (Abul W., p. 735, i.) of the common sharjāb, 'a lattice, or anything lat-ticed," such as a window,—'a balcony, a balustrade.'

1540.—"This said, we entred with her into an outward court, all about invernoned with Galleries (veraado a roda de duas ordens de varandas) as if it had been a Cloister of Religious persons. ..."—Pinto (orig. cap. lxxiii.). in Cogax, 102.

c. 1760.—"... Small ranges of pillars that support a pent-house or shed, forming what is called, in the Portuguese language, Verandas."—Grose, i. 53.

1781.—"On met sur le devant une petite galerie appelée varangue, et formée par le toit."—Sonnerat, i. 54. There is a French nautical term, varangue, "the ribs or floor-timbers of a ship," which seems to have led this writer astray here.

1783.—"You are conducted by a pretty steep ascent up the side of a rock, to the door of the cave, which enters from the North. By it you are led first of all into a feerandah (1) or piazza which extends from East to West 60 feet."—Acct. of some Artificial Caves in the Neighbourhood of Bombay (Elephanta), by Mr. W. Hunter, Surgeon in the E. Indies. In Archaeologia, viii. 287.

..."The other gate leads to what in this country is called a veranda or feranda (printed seranda), which is a kind of piazza or landing-place before you enter the hall."—Letter (on Caves of Elephanta, &c.), from Hector Macneil, Esq., [ibid.], viii. 254.

1796.—"...Before the lowest (storey) there is generally a small hall supported by pillars of teka (Teak) wood, which is of a yellow colour and exceedingly hard. This hall is called varanda, and supplies the place of a parlour."—Fra Paolino, E.T.

1809.—"...In the same varandah are figures of natives of every cast and profession."—Ed. Valentia, i. 424.

1810.—"The varanda keeps off the too great glare of the sun, and affords a dry walk during the rainy season."—Maria Graham, 21.

c. 1816.—"...and when Sergeant Browne bethought himself of Mary, and looked to see where she was, she was conversing up and down the verandah, though it was Sunday, with most of the rude boys and girls of the barracks."—Mrs. Sherwood's Stories, p. 47, ed. 1879.

VERDURE, s. This word appears to have been used in the 18th century for vegetables, adapted from the Port. verduras.

1759.—Among minor items of revenue from duties in Calcutta we find:

RS. A. P.

"Verdure, fish pots, firewood 216 10 6."

—In Long, 35.

[VERGE, s. A term used in S. India for rice lands. It is the Port. Varsea, Varzia, Varjem, which Vieyra defines as 'a plain field, or a piece of level ground, that is sowed and cultivated."

[1749.—"...as well as vargems lands as hortas" (see OART).—Treaty, in Logas, Malayar, iii. 48.

[1772.—"The estates and verges not yet assessed must be taxed at 10 per cent."—Govt. Order, ibid. i. 421.]

VETTVYVER, s. This is the name generally used by the French for the fragrant grass which we call cuscus (q.v.). The word is Tamil vettiver, [from vetu, 'digging,' ver, 'root'].

1500.—"Europeans cool their apartments by means of wetted tatts (see TATT) made of straw or grass, and sometimes of the roots of the wettie waeroo, which, when wetted, exhales a pleasant but faint smell."—Heyne's Tracts, p. 11.

VIDANA, s. In Ceylon, the title of a village head man. "The person who conveys the orders of Government to the people" (Clough, s.v. vidán). It is apparently from the Skt. vadána, "...the act of speaking ...the mouth, face, countenance ...the front, point," &c. In Javanese vadana (or wadono, in Jav. pronunciation) is "the face, front, van; a chief of high rank: a Javanese title" (Crawfurd, s.v.). The Javanese title is, we imagine, now only traditional; the Ceylonese one has followed the usual downward track of high titles; we can hardly doubt the common Sanskrit origin of both (see Athenaeum, April 1, 1882, p. 413, and May 13, ibid. p. 602). The derivation given by Alwis is probably not inconsistent with this.

1681.—"The Dissauvas (see DISSAVE) by these Cocurí vidani their officers do oppress and squeeze the people, by laying Mulets upon them. ... In Ceylon this officer is the Dissauva's chief Substitute, who orders and manages all affairs incumbent upon his master."—Knox, 51.

1766.—"Vidanes, the overseers of villages, who are charged to see that no inhabitant suffers any injury, and that the Land is sown betimes. ..."—Valentinj (Ceylon), Names of Officers, &c., 11.

1756.—"Under each (chief) were placed different subordinate headmen, called Vidana-Aratchies and Vidans. The last is derived from the word (vidhas), 'commanding,' or 'ordering,' and means, as Clough (p. 647) defines it, the person who conveys the orders of the Government to the People."—J. de Alcém, in Ceylon Journal, 8, p. 287.
VIHARA, WIHARe. &c., s. In Ceylon a Buddhist temple. Skt. vihāra, a Buddhist convent, originally the hall where the monks met, and thence extended to the buildings generally of such an institution, and to the shrine which was attached to them, much as minister has come from the monasterium. Though there are now no Buddhist vihāras in India Proper, the former wide diffusion of such establishments has left its trace in the names of many noted places; e.g. Bihār, and the great province which takes its name; Kuch Behār; the Vihār water-works at Bombay; and most probably the City of Bokhārā itself. [Numerous ruins of such buildings have been unearthed in N. India, as, for instance, that at Sarnāth near Benares, of which an account is given by Gen. Cunningham (Arch. Rep. i. 121). An early use of the word (probably in the sense of a monastery) is found in the Mathura Jain inscription of the 2nd century, A.D. in the reign of Huvishka (ibid. iii. 39.)]

1681.—"The first and highest order of priests are the Turinmanes,* who are the priests of the Buddha God. Their temples are styled Vehars. . . These . . . only live in the Vihar, and enjoy great Revenues."—Knox, Ceylon, 74.

[1821.—"The Malwater and Angirie wihares . . . are the two heads of the Boodhaical establishment in Ceylon."—Davy, An Account of the Interior of Ceylon, 365.]

1877.—"Twice a month, when the rules of the order are read, a monk who had broken them is to confess his crime; if it be slight, some slight penance is laid upon him, to sweep the court-yard of the vihāra, sprinkle the dust round the sacred bo-tree."—Riky Davids, Buddhism, 169.

VISS. s. A weight used in S. India and in Burma; Tam. visai, 'division,' Skt. vihitā, 'distributed.' In Madras it was ¼ of a Madras maund, and =3lb. 2oz. avoirdupois. The old scale ran, 10 pagoda weights = 1 pollam, 40 pollams = 1 viis, 8 viiss = 1 maund (of 25lbs.), 20 maunds = 1 candy. In Burma the viiss = 100 tikals=3lbs. 5½.

Viss is used in Burma by foreigners, but the Burmese call the weight peiktta, probably a corruption of visai.

* [The first part of this word is thera, Skt. sthavira. Hardy (E. Monachism, p. 11) says the superior priests were called terunmānases, from Pali theru, 'an elder.]

1554.—"The baar (see BHAHAR) of Pegnu contains 120 biças; each biça weighs 49 ounces; the biça contains 100 ticals; the tical weighs 31 vihāras."—J. Nune, 38.

1568.—"This Ganza goeth by weight of Byze . . . and commonly a Byza of Ganza is worth (after our accoempt) half a ducat."—Cæsar Frederic, in Hist. ii. 367.

1626.—"In anno 1622 the Myne was shut up. . . the comming of the Mogull's Embassadour to this King's Court, with his peremptory demand of a Vyse of the fairest diamonds, caused the cessation."—Purchas, Pilgrimage, 1003.

[1727.—"Vicee." See under TICAL.

[1807.—"Visay." See under GARCE.]

1855.—"The King last year purchased 800,000 viis of lead, at 5 tikals (see TICAL) for 100 viis, and sold it at twenty tikals."—Faul, Mission to Ava, 256.

VIZIER, WUZEEER, s. Ar.—H. wazir, 'a minister,' and usually the principal minister, under a (Mahomedan) prince. [In the Koran (cap. xx. 30) Moses says: 'Give a wazir of my family, Harūn (Aaron) my brother.' In the Ain we have a distinction drawn between the Vakil, or prime minister, and the Vazir, or minister of finance (ed. Blochmann, i. 527.) In India the Nawāb of Oudh was long known as the Nawāb Wazir, the founder of the quasi-independent dynasty having been Sa'īdat Āli Khān, who became Sūlādar of Oudh, c. 1732, and was also Wazir of the Empire, a title which became hereditary in his family. The title of Nawāb Wazir merged in that of pādshāh, or King, assumed by Ghāzī-ud-dīn Haider in 1820, and up to his death still borne or claimed by the ex-King Wajīd Āli Shāh, under surveillance in Calcutta. As most titles degenerate, Wazir has in Spain become alguazil, 'a constable,' in Port. alvatii, 'an alderman."

[1612.—"Jeffer Basha Vizier and Viceroy of the Province."—Downes, Letters, i. 173.]

1614.—"Il primo visir, sopra ogni altro, che era allora Nasuh bascià, genero del Gran Signore, venne ultimo di tutti, con grandissima e ben adorna cavalcata, enfìn della quale andava egli solo con molta gravità."—P. della Valle (from Constantino- nople), i. 43.

W

[WACADASH, s. Japanese waki- zashi, 'a short sword.']

[ibid. ii. 20.]

[1898.—"There is also the wakizashi, or dirk of about nine and a half inches, with which harikari was committed."—Chambers' Stuff Japan, 3rd ed. 377.]

WALER, s. A horse imported from N. South Wales, or Australia in general.

1866.—"Well, young shaver, have you seen the horses? How is the Wal's off foreleg?"—Trevelyan, Duke Bengaloo, 223.

1873.—"For sale, a brown Walergelding," &c.—Madras Mail, June 25.

WALI, s. Two distinct words are occasionally written in the same way.

(a) Ar. wâli. A Mahommedan title corresponding to Governor; ["the term still in use for the Governor-General of a Province as opposed to the Mubâzî, or district-governor. In E. Arabia the Wali is the Civil Governor as opposed to the Amir or Military Commandant. Under the Caliphate the Wali acted also as Prefect of Police (the Indian Faujûdár)—see FOIJDAR, who is now called Zabit." (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 238). It became familiar years ago in connection with Kandahar. It stands properly for a governor of the highest class, in the Turkish system superior to a Pasha. Thus, to the common people in Egypt, the Khedive is still the Wâli.

1298.—"Whenever he knew of anyone who had a pretty daughter, certain ruffians of his would go to the father and say: 'What say you? Here is this pretty daughter of yours; give her in marriage to the Bailo of Achmath' (for they call him the Bailo, or, as we should say, 'the Viceregent')."—Marco Polo, i. 402.

1498.—"... e mandou hum homen que se chama Bale, o qual he como alquinde."—Rotário de V. da Gama, 54.

1727.—"As I was one morning walking in the Streets, I met accidentally the Governor of the City (Muscat), by them called the Wâsley."—A. Hamilton, i. 70; [ed. 1744, i. 71.]

[1753.—In Georgia. "Wali, a viceroy descended immediately from the sovereigns of the country over which he presides."—Haw- way, iii. 25.]

b. Ar. wâlé. This is much used in some Mahommedan countries (e.g. Egypt and Syria) for a saint, and by a. transfer for the shrine of such a saint. ["This would be a separate building like our family tomb and probably domed. . . Europeans usually call it a little Wali"; or, as they write it, 'Wely'; the contained for the container; the 'Santon' for the 'Santon's tomb" (Burton, Ar. Nights, i. 97).] See under PEER.

[e. 1599.—"The ascetics who are their repositories of learning, they style Wall, whose teaching they implicitly follow."—Ain, ed. Jarrett, ii. 119.]

1899.—"Quand on a titre de pie (see PEER) . . . il signifie proprement vieillard, mais il est pris dans cette circonstance pour désigner une dignité spirituelle équivalente à celle des Gourâd Hindous . . . Beaucoup de ces pirs sont à leur mort vénérés comme saints; de la le mot pîr est synonyme de Wali, et signifie Saint aussi bien que ce dernier mot."—García de Tasse, Rel. Mus. dans l'Inde, 23.

WALLA, s. This is a popular abridgment of Competition-walla, under which will be found remarks on the termination wâlît, and illustrations of its use.

WANDEROO, s. In Ceylon a large kind of monkey, originally described under this name by Knox (Presbytes urinans). The name is, however, the generic Singhalese word for a monkey (wanderu, wandaru), and the same with the Hind. bandar, Skt. vânara. Remarks on the disputed identity of Knox's wanderoo, and the different species to which the name has been applied, popularly, or by naturalists, will be found in Emerson Tennent, i. 129-130.

1851.—"Monkeys . . . Some so large as our English Spaniel Dogs, of a darkish gray colour, and black faces, with great white beards round from ear to ear, which makes them show just like old men. There is another sort just of the same bigness, but differ in colour, being milk white both in body and face, having great beards like the others . . . both these sorts do but little mischief. . . . This sort they call in their language Wanderoo."—Knox, Hist. Rel. of the I. of Ceylon, 26.

[1899.—"The wanderow is remarkable for its great white beard, which stretches quite from ear to ear across its black face, while the body is of a dark grey."—Percival, Br. Hist. of the I. of Ceylon, 290.]

1810.—"I saw one of the large baboons, called here Wanderows, on the top of a coco-nut tree, where he was gathering nuts. . . ."—Maria Graham, 87.
WANGHEE, WHANGEE. s. The trade name for a slender yellow bamboo with beautifully regular and short joints, imported from Japan. We cannot give the origin of the term with any conviction. The two following suggestions may embrace or indicate the origin. (1). Rumphius mentions a kind of bamboo called by him Arundinarbor fera, the native name of which is Bulul swangi (see in vol. iv. cap. vii. et seqq.). As bulul is Malay for bamboo, we presume that swangi is also Malay, but we do not know its meaning. (2). Our friend Professor Terrien de la Cousperie notes: “In the K'ang-hi tse-tien, 118, 119, the Huang-tchou is described as follows: ‘A species of bamboo, very hard, with the joints close together; the skin is as white as snow; the larger kind can be used for boats, and the smaller used for pipes, &c.’ See also Wells Williams, Syllabic Dict. of the Chinese Lang., p. 251.

[On this Professor Giles writes: “‘Whang’ clearly stands for ‘yellow,’ as in Whangpoo and like combinations. The difficulty is with ee, which should stand for some word of that sound in the Cantonese dialect. There is such a word in ‘clothes, skin, sheath’; and ‘yellow skin (or sheath)’ would form just such a combination as the Chinese would be likely to employ. The suggestion of Terrien de la Cousperie is not to the purpose.” So Mr. C. M. Gardner writes: “The word hwang has many meanings in Chinese according to the tone in which it is said. Hwang-chî têng or hwang-ee-têng might be ‘yellow-corticed cane.’ The word chuk means ‘bamboo,’ and hwang-chuk might be ‘yellow or Imperial bamboo.’ Wan means a ‘myriad,’ chî ‘utensil’: wan-chê têng might mean a kind of cane ‘good for all kinds of uses.’ Wan-chuk is a particular kind of bamboo from which paper is made in W. Hapei.”

Mr. Skeat writes: “‘Buluh swangi’ is correct Malay. Favre in his Malay-Fr. Dict. has *suwângi, esprit, spectre, esprit mauvais.’ ‘Buluh swangi’ does not appear in Ridley’s list as the name of a bamboo, but he does not profess to give all the Malay plant names.”

WATER CHESTNUT. The trapa bispinosa of Roxb.; Hind. singhârdī, ‘the horned fruit.’ See SINGARA.

WEAVER-BIRD, s. See BAYA.

WEST-COAST, n.p. This expression in India means the west coast of Sumatra. This seems also to have been the recognised meaning of the term at Madras in former days. See SLAVE.

[1655.—“Order’d that the following goods be laden aboard the Syam Merchant for the West Coast of Sumatra...”—Pringle, Diary Ft. St. Gro. 1st ser. IV. 196; also see 136, 138, 163, &c.]

1747.—“The Revd. Mr. Francis Fordyce being entered on the Establishment... and having several months’ allowance due to him for the West Coast, amounting to Pags. 371. 9...”—Fr. St. David’s Consn., April 30, MS. in India Office. The letter appended shows that the chaplain had been attached to Bencoolen. See also Wheeler, i. 148.

WHAMPOA, n.p. In former days the anchorage of European ships in the river of Canton, some distance below that city. [The name is pronounced Wonippo (Ball, Things Chinese, 3rd ed. 631.).]

1770.—“Now all European ships are obliged to anchor at Honang-poa, three leagues from the city” (Canton).—Reynal, tr. 1777, ii. 258.

WHISTLING TEAL, s. This in Jerdon is given as Dendrocyna Aurea of Sykes. Latin names given to birds and beasts might at least fulfil one object of Latin names, in being intelligible and pronounceable by foreign nations. We have seldom met with a more barbarous combination of impossible words than this. A numerous flock of these whistlers is sometimes seen in Bengal sitting in a tree, a curious habit for ducks.

WHITE ANTS. See ANTS, WHITE.

WHITE JACKET, s. The old custom in the hot weather, in the family or at bachelor parties, was to wear this at dinner; and one or more dozens of white jackets were a regular item in an Indian outfit. They are now, we believe, altogether, and for many years obsolete. [They certainly came again into common use some 20 years ago.] But though one reads under every generation of British India that they had gone out of use, they did actually survive to the middle of the last century, for I can remember a white-jacket dinner in Fort William in 1849. [The late Mr. Bridgman of Gorakhpur, whose recollection of India dated from the earlier part of the last century told me that in his younger days the rule at Calcutta was that the guest always arrived at his host's house in the full evening-dress of the time, on which his host meeting him at the door expressed his regret that he had not chosen a cooler dress; on which the guest's Bearer always, as if by accident, appeared from round the corner with a nankeen jacket, which was then and there put on. But it would have been opposed to etiquette for the guest to appear in such a dress without express invitation.]

1803.—"It was formerly the fashion for gentlemen to dress in white jackets on all occasions, which were well suited to the country, but being thought too much an undress for public occasions, they are now laid aside for English cloth."—Id. Valeria, p. 240.

[c. 1848.—"... a white jacket being evening dress for a dinner-party..."]—Berneastle, Voyage to China, including a Visit to the Bombay Pres. i. 93.]

WINTER. s. This term is constantly applied by the old writers to the rainy season, a usage now quite unknown to Anglo-Indians. It may have originated in the fact that winter is in many parts of the Mediterranean coast so frequently a season of rain, whilst rain is rare in summer. Compare the fact that skid in Arabic is indifferently 'winter,' or 'rain'; the winter season being the rainy season, Shita is the same word that appears in Canticles ii. 11: "The winter that sheth is past, the rain is over and gone."

1513.—"And so they set out, and they arrived at Surat (Carrate) in May, when the winter had already begun, so they went into winter-quarters (polo que envernarnao), and in September, when the winter was over, they went to Goa in two foists and other vessels, and in one of these was the ganda (rhinoceros), the sight of which made a great commotion when landed at Goa..."—Correa, ii. 373.

1563.—"R. ... In what time of the year does this disease (morzi, Mort-de-chien) mostly occur?"

"O. ... It occurs mostly in June and July (which is the winter-time in this country)."—Garcia, f. 76y.

c. 1567.—"Da Bezeneger a Goa sono d'estate otto giornate di viaggio: ma noi lo facessimo di mezzo l'inverno, il mese di Luglio."—Ovare Federici, in Ramusio, iii. 368.

1583.—"Il vero in questo paese è il Maggio, Giugno, Luglio e Agosto, e il resto della stagione state. Ma bene è da notare che qui la stagione nô si può chiamar vero rispetto al freddo, che nô vi regna mai, mà solo per cagione de' venti, e delle gran piogge..."—Gasparo Balbi, f. 67v.

1584.—"Note that the City of Goa is the principal place of all the Oriental India, and the winter thus beginneth the 15 of May, with very great rain."—Barret, in Hak. ii, 413.

[1592.—See under PENANG.]

1610.—"The Winter hoere beginneth about the first of June and dureth till the twentieth of September, but not with continual rains as at Goa, but for some six or seven days every change and full, with much wind, thunder and rain."—Findch, in Purchas, i. 423.

c. 1610.—"L'Hyver commence au mois d'Avril, et dure six mois."—Pyxaud de Laval, i. 78: [Hak. Soc. i. 104, and see i. 64, ii. 34].

1643.—"... des Galiottes qui sortent tous les ans pour faire la guerre aux Malabares...; et cela est ennuir la May-Septembre, lors que leur hyver est passé..."—Moguet, 347.

1653.—"Dans les Indes il y a deux Estez et deux Hyuers, ou pour mieux dire vu Printemps perpetuel, parce que les arbres y sont tousjours verds: Le premier Est commence au mois de Mars, et finit au mois de May, que est la commencement de l'Hyuer de pleuye, qui continue inuques en Septembre pleuant incessament ces quatre mois, en sorte que les Karaunnes, ny les Patmars (see PATTAMAR, a) ne vont ne viente: l'ay esté quarante iours sans pouvoir sortir de la maison... 1665.—"L'Hyver se sait sentir. El commença en Juin per quantité de pluies et de tonnerres."—Thevenot, v. 311.

1678.—"... In Winter (when they rarely stir) they have a Minjama, or Wax Cloth to throw over it..."—Pryer, 410.

1691.—"In orá Occidentali, quae Malabaroram est, hyems a mensae Aprilis in Septembrem usque dominatur: in littore vero Orientali, quod Hollandi ad finis bin Choromandi, Oram Coromandaliae vocant trans illos montes, in isdem latitudinis gradibus, contrariori planè modò ad Septembrì WOOD-APPLE, s. [According to the Madras Gloss. also known as Curr Fruit, Monkey Fruit, and Elephant Apple, because it is like an elephant's skin.] A wild fruit of the N.O. Aurantiaceae growing in all the drier parts of India (Feronia elephantum, Correa). It is somewhat like the bel (see BAEL) but with a still harder shell, and possesses some of its medicinal virtue. In the native pharmacopoeia it is sometimes substituted (Moodeen Sheriff, [Watt, Econ. Dict. iii. 324 seqq.). Buchanan-Hamilton calls it the Kot-bel (Kathbel), (Eastern India, ii. 787)]

1875.—"Once upon a time it was announced that the Pádsháh was about to pass through a certain remote village of Upper India. And the village heads gathered in pancháyat to consider what offering they could present on such an unexampled occasion. Two products only of the village lands were deemed fit to serve as nazrún. One was the custard-apple, the other was the wood-apple — a wild fruit with a very hard shelly rind, something like a large lemon or small citron converted into wood. After many pros and cons, the custard-apple carried the day, and the village elders accordingly, when the king appeared, made salám, and presented a large basket of custard-apples. His Majesty did not accept the offering graciously, but with much abusive language at being stopped to receive such trash, pelted the simpletons with their offering, till the whole basketful had been squeezed upon their venerable heads. They retired, abashed indeed, but devoutly thanking heaven that the offering had not been of wood-apples!"—Some Unscientific Notes on the History of Plants (by H. Y.) in Geog. Mag., 1875, pp. 49-50. The story was heard many years ago from Major William Yule, for whom see under TOBACCO.

WOOLock, Oolock, s. [Platts in his Hind. Dict. gives ulak, uláth, as Turkish, meaning 'a kind of small boat.' Mr. Grierson (Bihar Peasant Life, 42), among the larger kinds of boats, gives ulánk, 'which has a long narrow bow overhanging the water in front.' Both he and Mr. Grant (Rural Life in Bengal, 25) give drawings of this boat, and the latter writes: "First we have the bulky Oolok, or baggage boat of Bengal, sometimes as gigantic as the Putee (see PATTELLO), and used for much the same purposes. This last-named vessel is a clinker-built boat—that is having the planks overlapping each other, like those in a London wherry; whereas in the round smooth-sided oolok and most country boats, they are laid edge to edge, and fastened with iron clamps, having the appearance of being stitched."

[1683.—". . . 10 Ulocks for Souldiers, etc."—Hedges, Diary, Hak. Soc. i. 76.

[1680.—"20 Hoolucks 6 Oars at 28 Rs. per month."—In Long, 227.]

1764. — "Then the Manjoes went after him in a wollock to look after him."—Ibid. 383.

1783. — "The same day will be sold a twenty-oar'd Wollock-built Budgerow . . ." —India Gazette, April 14.

1799.—"We saw not less than 200 large boats at the different quays, which on an average might be reckoned each at 60 tons burthen, all provided with good roofs, and masted after the country manner. They seemed much better constructed than the unwieldy wullocks of Bengal." — Symes, Aea, 233.
WOON, s. Burm. *wu$n, 'a governor or officer of administration'; literally 'a burden,' hence presumably the 'Bearer of the Burden.' Of this there are various well-known compounds, e.g.:

Woon-gyee, i.e. 'Wun-gyi' or Great Minister, a member of the High Council of State or Cabinet, called the Hot-tan (see LOTOO).

Woon-douk, i.e. *Wun-dauk, lit. 'the prop of the War,' a sort of Adlatus, or Minister of an inferior class. We have recently seen a Burmese envoy to the French Government designated as 'M. Woondouk.'

Atwen-wun, Minister of the Interior (of the Court) or Household.

Myo-wun, Provincial Governor (May-roon of Symes).

Ye-wun, 'Water-Governor,' formerly Deputy of the Myo-wun of the Pr. of Pegu (Ray-roon of Symes).

Akaok-wun, Collector of Customs (Akaa-noon of Symes).

WOORDY-MAJOR, s. The title of a native adjutant in regiments of Indian Irregular Cavalry. Both the rationale of the compound title, and the etymology of wardi, are obscure. Platts gives Hind. *wardi or urdi, 'uniform of a soldier, badge or dress of office,' as the first part of the compound, with a questionable Skt. etymology, virula, 'crying, proclaiming, a panegyric.' But there is also Ar. *ward, 'a flight of birds,' and then also 'a troop or squadron,' which is perhaps as probable. [Others, again, as many military titles have come from S. India, connect it with Can. varadi, 'news, an order.]

[1784.-"... We made the wurdee wollah acquainted with the circumstance. ..."—Forrest, Bombay Letters, ii. 323.

[1861.—"The senior Ressaldar (native captain) and the Woordie Major (native adjutant) ... reported that the sepoys were trying to temper with his men."—Cave-Brown, Punjáb and Delhi, i. 120.]

WOOTZ, s. This is an odd name which has attached itself in books to the so-called 'natural steel' of S. India, made especially in Salem, and in some parts of Mysore. It is prepared from small bits of malleable iron (made from magnetic ore) which are packed in crucibles with pieces of a particular wood (Cassia auriculata), and covered with leaves and clay. The word first appears in a paper read before the Royal Society, June 11, 1795, called: "Experiments and observations to investigate the nature of a kind of Steel, manufactured at Bombay, and there-called Wootz ... by George Pearson, M.D." This paper is quoted below.

The word has never since been recognised as the name of steel in any language, and it would seem to have originated in some clerical error, or misreading, very possibly for *wook, representing the Canarese *ukku (pron. *wukku) 'steel.' Another suggestion has been made by Dr. Edward Balfour. He states that *ucheha and *nicha (Hind. *nicha-nicha, in reality for 'high' and 'low') are used in Canarese speaking districts to denote superior and inferior descriptions of an article, and supposes that wootz may have been a misunderstanding of *ucheha, 'of superior quality.' The former suggestion seems to us preferable. [The Madras Gloss. gives as local names of steel, Can. *ukku, Tel. *ukku, Tam. and Malayāl. urukku, and derives wootz from Skt. *vēca, whence comes H. *vēcha.]

The article was no doubt the famous 'Indian Steel,' the αίθρος Ινδικός καλ στέλβωμα of the Periplus, the material of the Indian swords celebrated in many an Arabic poem, the *ahinde of old Spanish, the ḫubwāni of the Persian traders, ondanique of Marco Polo, the iron exported by the Portuguese in the 16th century from Baticalá (see BATCUL) in Canara and other parts (see Correa passim). In a letter of the King to the Goa Government in 1591 he animadverts on the great amount of iron and steel permitted to be exported from Chaul, for sale on the African coast and to the Turks in the Red Sea (Archiv. Port. Orient., Fasc. 3, 318).

1795.—"Dr. Scott, of Bombay, in a letter to the President, acquainted him that he had sent over specimens of a substance known by the name of *Wootz; which is considered to be a kind of steel, and is in high esteem among the Indians."

—Phil. Trans. for 1795, Pt. ii. p. 322.

[1814.—See an account of wootz, in Heyne's Tracts, 362 seqq.]

1841.—"The cakes of steel are called Wootz; they differ materially in quality, according to the nature of the ore, but are generally very good steel, and are sent into Persia and Turkey. ... It may be rendered self-evident that the figure or pattern (of Damascus steel) so long sought after exists in the cakes of Wootz, and only requires to be produced by the action of diluted acids ... it is therefore highly probable that the ancient blades of Damaces) were made of this steel."—Wilkinson, Engineers of War, pp. 203-206.

1864. — "Damascus was long celebrated for the manufacture of its sword blades, which it has been conjectured were made from the wootz of India."—Percy's Metallurgy, Iron and Steel, 880.

WRITER, s.

(a). The rank and style of the junior grade of covenanted civil servants of the E.I. Company. Technically it has been obsolete since the abolition of the old grades in 1833. The term no doubt originally described the duty of these young men; they were the clerks of the factories.

(b). A copying clerk in an office, native or European.

1673.—"The whole Mass of the Company's Servants may be comprehended in these Classes, viz., Merchants, Factors, and Writers."—Fryer, 81.

[1675-6.—See under FACTOR.]

1679.—"There are some of the Writers who by their lives are not a little scandalous."—Letter from a Chaplain, in Wheeler, i. 64.

1683.—"Mr. Richard More, one that came out a Writer on ye Herbert, left this World for a better. Ye Lord prepare us all to follow him!"—Hodges, Diary, Aug. 22; [Hak. Soc. i. 105.]

1747.—"32. Mr. Robert Clive, Writer in the Service, being of a Military Disposition, and having acted as a Volunteer in our late Engagements, We have granted him an Ensign's Commission, upon his Application for the same."—Letter from the Council at Ft. St. David to the Honble. Court of Directors, dd. 2d. May, 1747 (MS. in India Office).

1758. —"As we are sensible that our junior servants of the rank of Writers at Bengal are not upon the whole on so good a footing as elsewhere, we do hereby direct that the future appointments to a Writer for salary, diet money, and all allowances whatever, be 400 Rupees per annum, which mark of our favour and attention, properly attended to, must prevent their reflections on what we shall further order in regard to them as having any other object or foundation than their particular interest and happiness."—Court's Letter, March 3, in Long, 129. (The 'further order' is the prohibition of palankins, &c.—see PALANKIN.)

b.—

1764.—"Resolutions and orders.—That no Moonshoe, Linguist, Banian (see BANYAN), or Writer be allowed to any officer except the Commander-in-Chief and the commanders of detachments. . . ."—Pt. William Conns. In Long, 352.

[1860.—"Following him are the krânees (see CRANNY), or writers, on salaries varying, according to their duties and abilities, from five to thirty rupees."—Grant, Rural L. in Bengal, 188-9.]

WUG, s. We give this Belúch word for loot on the high authority quoted. [On this Mr. M. L. Dames writes: "This is not, strictly speaking, a Balochi word, but Sindhi, in the form wug or wagu. The Balochi word is bag, but I cannot say for certain whether it is borrowed from Sindhi by Balochi, or vice versd. The meaning, however, is not loot, but 'a herd of camels.' It is probable that on the occasion referred to the loot consisted of a herd of camels, and this would easily give rise to the idea that the word meant loot. It is one of the commonest forms of plunder in those regions, and I have often heard Balochis, when narrating their raids, describe how they had carried off a 'bag.'"]

1845.—"In one hunt after wug, as the Belochees call plunder, 200 of that beautiful regiment, the 2nd Europeans, marched incessantly for 15 hours over such ground as I suppose the world cannot match for ravines, except in places where it is impossible to march at all."—Letter of Sir C. Napier, in Life, iii. 298.

XERAFINE, XERAFIM, &c., s.
The word in this form represents a silver coin formerly current at Goa and several other Eastern ports, in value somewhat less than 1s. 6d. It varied in Portuguese currency from 300 to 360 réis. But in this case as in so many others the term is a corruption applied to a degenerated value. The original is the Arabic ashrafi (see XERAFFEE) (or sharifi, 'noble'—compare the medieval coin so called), which was applied properly to the gold dinár, but was also used in India, and still is occasionally by natives, applied to the gold mohur. Ashrafi for a gold dinár (value in gold about 11s. 6d.) occurs frequently in the '1001 Nights,' as Dozy states, and he gives various other quotations of the word in different forms (pp. 353-354; [Burton, Ar. Nights, x. 160, 376]). Aygrefin, the name of a coin once known in France, is according to Littre also a corruption of ashrafi.

1498. — 'And (the King of Calicut) said that they should tell the Captain that if they wished to go he must give him 600 xarifes, and that soon, and that this was the custom of that country, and of those who came thither.'—Roteiro de V. da G. 79.

1510. — 'When a new Sultan succeeds to the throne, one of his lords, who are called Amirra (Ameer), says to him: 'Lord, I have been for so long a time your slave, give me Damacesus, and I will give you 100,000 or 200,000 teraphim of gold.'—Vartemus, 10.

"Every Mamuluke, great or little, has for his pay six saraphi per month."—Ibid. 13.

"Our captain sent for the superior of the said mosque, to whom he said: that he should show him the body of Nabí—this Nabi means the Prophet Mahomet—that he would give him 3000 seraphim of gold."—Ibid. 29. This one eccentric traveller gives thus three different forms.

1513. — 'Hunc regem Affonso idem, urbe opuléssima et praecepio emporio Armasio vi capto, quindecim milliú Seraphinorí, ea est auræ moneta ductitis equi-valés annuñ nobis tributarii effecerat."—Epistola Emmanuelis Regis, 26. In the preceding the word seems to apply to the gold dinár.

1525. — 'And by certain information of persons who knew the facts ... Antonio de Saldanha ... agreed with the said King Turuba (Túrín Sháh), ... that the said King ... should pay to the King Our lord 10,000 xarafins more yearly ... in all 25,000 xarafins.'—Tomba do Indus, Subsidios, 79. This is the gold mohur.

1540. — "This year there was such a famine in Choromandel, that it left nearly the whole land depopulated with the mortality, and people ate their fellow men. Such a thing never was heard of on that Coast, where formerly there was such an abundance of rice, that in the port of Nogapatam I have often seen more than 750,000 avies (the morgen = 29.39 bushels) of rice. ... This year of famine the Portuguese of the town of St. Thomé did much good to the people, helping them with quantities of rice and millet, and coco-nuts and jarga (see JAGGERY), which they imported in their vessels from other parts, and sold in retail to the people at far lower prices than they could have got if they wished it; and some rich people caused quantities of rice to be bought by the houses, and gave it boiled down in the water to the people to drink, all for the love of God. ... This famine lasted a whole year, and it spread to other parts, but was not so bad as in Choromandel. The King of Binsnagar, who was sovereign of that territory, heard of the humanity and beneficence of the Portuguese to the people of the country, and he was greatly pleased thereat, and sent an ola (see OLLAH) of thanks to the residents of St. Thomé. And this same year there was such a scarcity of provisions in the harbours of the Straits, that in Aden a load ('fardo) of rice fetched forty xarafins, each worth a cruzado. ..."—Correa, iv. 131-132.

1540. — "The chief and most common money (at Goa) is called Pardauna (Pardão) Xeraphin. It is of silver, but of small value. They strike it at Goa, and it is marked on one side with the image of St. Sebastian, on the other with 3 or 4 arrows in a sheaf. It is worth 3 testoons or 300 Reys (Reais) of Portugal, more or less."—Linschoten (from French ed. 71); [Hak. Soc. i. 241, and compare i. 190; see another version of the same passage under PARDAO].

1610. — "Inprimis of Seraffins Echeri, which be ten Rupias (Rupee) a piece, there are sixtie Leckes (Lack)."—Hauckins, in Purchas, i. 217. Here the gold mohur is meant.

c. 1610. — "Les pièces d'or sont cerafins à vingt-cinq sols pièce."—Puyrard de Lavaux, ii. 40; [Hak. Soc. ii. 90, reading cerafunis].

1655. — "Monnages courantes à Goa. 'Sequin de Venise ... 21 tungen (Tanga) * Reale d'Espagne ... 12 tungen. * *

Abassis de Perse ... 3 tungen. * *

Pardaux (Pardao) ... 5 tungen. * *

Scherephi ... 6 tungen. * *

Roupies (Rupee) du Magol ... 6 tungen. * *

Tangue ... 20 bousserouque (Budgrock)."

De la Boullaye-le-Gouz, 1657, 530.
YAK.

C. 1875. — "Coins . . . of Rajapore: Imaginary Coins. The Pagod (Pagoda) is 33 Rupees. 45 Juttas (see JEETUL) is one Pagod. 10 and 5 Rupees (Larin) is 1 Pagod. Zeraphins 5½, 1½ Dollar. "Coins and weights of Bombay. 3 Larees is 1 Zeraphin. 80 Ruas (Reas) 1 Laree. 1 Piece is 10 Ruas. The Ruas are imaginary. "Coins and weights in Goa . . . The Cruzado of gold, 12 Zeraphins. The Zeraphin, 5 Tangoes. The Tango (Tanga), 5 Vinteens. The Vinteen, 15 Basrooks (Budgrook), whereof 75 make a Tango. And 60 Reas make a Tango."—Pryer, 206.

1690.— dw. gr. "The Gold St. Thoma . . . 2 ½ The Silver. Sherephene . . . 7 4." Table of Coins, in Ovington.

1727.—"Their Soldiers Pay (at Goa) is very small and ill paid. They have but six Zeraphenes per Month, and two Suits of Calicoe, strict or chequered, in a Year . . . and a Xeraphen is worth about sixpence halfpenny. Ster."—A. Hamilton, i. 249; [ed. 1744, i. 252].

1760.—"You shall coin Gold and silver of equal weight and fineness with the Ashrefees (Ashrafse) and Rupees of Moorsheabad, in the name of Calcutta."—Narabal's Pervannah for Estabt, of a Mint in Calcutta, in Long, 227.

C. 1844,—"Sahibs now are very different from what they once were. When I was a young man with an officer in the camp of Lât Lîk Sâhib (Lord Lake) the sahibs would give an ashrafi (Ashrafse), when now they think twice before taking out a rupee." —Personal Reminiscences of an old Kha-soni's Conversation. Here the gold mohur is meant.

XERCANSOR, n.p. This is a curious example of the manner in which the Portuguese historians represent Mahommedan names. Xercansor does really very fairly represent phonetically the name of Sher Khân Sûr, the famous rival and dissembler of Humâyûn, under the title of Sher Shâh.

c. 1538.—"But the King of Bengal, seeing himself very powerful in the kingdom of the Patans, seized the king and took his kingdom from him . . . and made Governor of the kingdom a great lord, a vassal of his, called Cotoxa, and then leaving everything in good order, returned to Bengal. The administrator Cotoxa took the field with a great array, having with him a Patrien Captain called Xercansor, a valiant cavalier, much esteemed by all."—Correa, ii. 719.

The kingdom of the Patans appears to be Behar, where various Afghan chiefs tried to establish themselves after the conquest of Delhi by Baber. It would take more space than it is worth to elucidate the story as told by Correa, but see Elliot, iv. 333.

Cotoxa (Koto sha) appears to be Kutb Khân of the Mahommedan historian there.

Another curious example of Portuguese nomenclature is that given to the first Mahommedan king of Malacca by Barros, Xaquem Davzâ (I. vi. 1), by Alboquerque Xaquendarzâ (Comm. Pt. III. ch. 17). This name is rendered by Lassen's ponderous lore into Sakt. Sakendhâra, "a. h. Besitzer kräftiger Besinnungen" (or "Possessor, of strong recollections."—Ind. Alt. iv. 516), whereas it is simply the Portuguese way of writing Sikhâdur Shâh! [So Linschoten (Hak. Soc. ii. 183) writes Xatamas for Shâh Tamasg.] For other examples, see Codo- vascam, Idalcan.

YABOO, s. Pers. yâbû, which is perhaps a corruption of Ar. yâbû, defined by Johnson as 'a swift and long horse.' A nag such as we call 'a galloway,' a large pony or small hardy horse; the term in India is generally applied to a very useful class of animals brought from Afghanistan.

[c. 1590.—"The fifth class (yâbû horses) are bred in this country, but fall short in strength and size. Their performances also are mostly bad. They are the offspring of Turki horses with an inferior breed."—Ani, ed. Blockmann, i. 284.]

1754.—"There are in the highland country of Kandahar and Cabul a small kind of horses called Yabouis, which are very serviceable."—Hawney, Travels, ii. 367.

[1839.—"A very strong and useful breed of ponies, called Yaboes, is however reared, especially about Baumunin. They are used to carry baggage, and can bear a great load, but do not stand a long continuance of hard work so well as mules."—Elphinstone, Cabul, ed. 1842, i. 189.]

YAK, s. The Tibetan ox (Bos grunniens, L., Poephagus of Gray), belonging to the Bisontine group of Bovinae. It is spoken of in Bogle's Journal under the odd name of the "cow-tailed cow," which is a literal sort of translation of the Hind, name chôtori gôô, chôtoris (see CHOWRY), having been usually called "cow-tails" in the 18th century. [The usual native name for the beast in N. India is suragdo, which comes from Skt. surabhi, 'pleasing.' ] The name yak does not appear in Buffon, who calls it the 'Tartarian cow,' nor is it found in the 3rd ed. of Pennant's H. of Quad-rupeds (1793), though there is a fair account of the animal as *Bos grunnien*s of Lin., and a poor engraving. Although the word occurs in Della Penna's account of Tibet, written in 1730, as quoted below, as far as we can ascertain, in Turner's Mission to Tibet. It is the Tib. qYak, Jäsché's Dict. guag. The animal is mentioned twice, though in a confused and inaccurate manner, by Aelian; and somewhat more correctly by Cosmas. Both have got the same fable about it. It is in medieval times described by Rubruck. The domestic yak is in Tibet the ordinary beast of burden, and is much ridden. Its hair is woven into tents, and spun into ropes; its milk a staple of diet, and its dung of fuel. The wild yak is a magnificent animal, standing sometimes 18 hands high, and weighing 1600 to 1800 lbs., and multiplies to an astonishing extent on the high plateaux of Tibet. The use of the tame yak extends from the highlands of Khokand to Kukukhotan or Kwei-hwaching, near the great northern bend of the Yellow River.

C. A.D. 250. — "The Indians (at times) carry as presents to their King tame tigers, trained panthers, four-horned oryxes, and cattle of two different races, one kind of great swiftness,* and another kind that are terribly wild, that kind of cattle from (the tails of which they make fly-flaps. . . ."

Again:

"There is in India a grass-eating animal, which is double the size of the horse, and which has a very bushy tail very black in colour.† The hairs of the tail are finer than human hair, and the Indian women set great store by its possession. . . . When it perceives that it is on the point of being caught, it hides its tail in some thicket . . . and thinks that since its tail is not seen, it will not be regarded as of any value, for it knows that the tail is the great object of fancy."— Ibid. xvi. 11.

C. 545.— "This Wild Ox is a great beast of India, and from it is got the thing called Tupha, with which officers in the field adorn their horses and panions. They tell of this beast that if its tail catches on a tree he will not budge but stands stock-still, being horribly vexed at losing a single hair of its tail; so the natives come and cut his tail off,* Πυγγάδος, whence no doubt Gray took his name for the genus.

† The tails usually brought for sale are those of the tame yak, and are white. The tail of the wild yak is black, and of much greater size.

and then when he has lost it altogether, he makes his escape."— Cosmas Indicopleustes, Bk. xi. Transl. in Cathay, &c., p. cxxiv.

[c. 1590.—In a list of things imported from the "northern mountains" into Oudh, we have "tails of the Kota cow."— *Ain., ed. Jurvent, ii. 172; and see 290."

1730.—"Dopo di che per circa 40 giorni di cammino non si trova più abitazioni di case, ma solo alcune tende con quantità di mandrie di yak, ossiamo bovi pelosi, pecore, cavalli, . . . ."

— Fra Orzorio della Penna di Billy, Breve Notizia del Tibet (published by Klaproth in Journ. As. 2d. ser.) p. 17.

1783.—". . . on the opposite side saw several of the black chowry-tailed cattle. . . . This very singular and curious animal deserves a particular description. . . . The Yak of Tartary, called Soorea Guy in Hindostan. . . .—Turner's Embassy (pubd. 1800), 155-6. [Sir H. Yule identifies Soorea Guy with Ovibos Gai; but, as will be seen above, the H. name is erradya."

In the publication at the latter date appears the latter date appears the following plate after Stubbs, called "the *Yak of Tartary," still the standard representation of the animal. [Also see Turner's paper (1781) in the As. Res., London reprint of 1788, iv. 365 seq.]

Though the two following quotations from Abbé Huc do not contain the word yak, they are pictures by that clever artist which we can hardly omit to reproduce:

1851.—" Les bœufs à long poils étaient de véritables caricatures; impossible de figurer rien de plus drôle; ils marchaient les jambes écartées, et portaient péniblement un énorme système de stalactites, qui leur pendait sous le ventre jusqu'à terre. Ces pauvres bêtes étaient si informes et tellement recouvertes de glacons qu'il semblait qu'on les eût tout entiers confiés dans du quere cend. . . ."— H. T. Stubbs, Observations d'un Voyage, &c., ii. 201; [E.T. ii. 108].

. . . "Au moment où nous passâmes le Mouroui Oussou sur la glace, un spectacle assez bizarre s'offrit à nos yeux. Déjà nous avions remarqué de loin . . . des objets inconnus et noircis rangés en file en travers de ce grand fleuve. . . . Ce fût seulement quand nous fûmes tout près, que nous primes reconnaître plus de 50 bœufs sauvages incrustés dans la glace. Ils avaient voulu, sans doute, traverser le fleuve à la nage, au moment de la congélation des eaux, et ils s'étaient trouvés pris par les glacons sans avoir la force de s'en débarrasser et de continuer leur route. Leur belle tête, surmontée de grandes cornes, était encore à découvrir; mais la reste du corps était pris dans la glace, qui était si transparente qu'on pouvait distinguer facilement la position de ces imprudentes bêtes; on était dit qu'elles étaient encore à nager. Les aigles et les corbeaux leur avaient arraché les yeux."— Ibid. ii. 219; [E.T. ii. 119 seq. and for a further account of the animal see ii. 81].
YAM, s. This general name in English of the large edible tuber Dioscorea seems to be a corruption of the name used in the W. Indies at the time of the discovery. [Mr. Platt (9 ser. N. & Q. v. 226 seq.) suggests that the original form was nyam or nyami, in the sense of 'food,' nyami meaning 'to eat' in the Fulah language of Senegal. The cannibal Nyam-Nyam, of whom Miss Kingsley gives an account (Travels in W. Africa, 330 seq.) appear to take their name from the same word.]

1600.—"There are great store of Iniamas growing in Guinea, in great fields."—Purchas, ii. 957.

1613.—'* . . . Moreover it produces great abundance of inhames, or large subterranean tubers, of which there are many kinds, like the camotes of America, and these inhames boiled or roasted serve in place of bread.'—Godinho de Erada, 19.

1764.—"Tis known the Yam will noter to bigness swell."—Granger, Bk. i.

Z

ZABITA, s. Hind. from Ar. zabita. An exact rule, a canon, but in the following it seems to be used for a tariff of assessment:

1799.—"I have established the Zabeta for the shops in the Fort as fixed by Macleod. It is to be paid annually."—Wellington, i. 49.

ZAMORIN, s. The title for many centuries of the Hindu sovereign of Calicut and the country round. The word is Malayal. Sāmāṭiri, Sāmāri, Tāmāṭiri, Tāmāri, a tadbhava (or vernacular) modification of Skt. Sāmudrī, 'the Sea-King.' (See also Wilson, Mackenzie MSS. i. xvii.) [Mr. Logan (Malabar, iii. Gloss, s.v.) suggests that the title Samudri is a translation of the Rāja's ancient Malayal. title of Kunnalakkon, i.e. 'King (kon) of the hills (kunu) and waves (ala).'] The name has recently become familiar in reference to the curious custom by which the Zamorin was attacked by one of the candidates for his throne (see the account by A. Hamilton (ed. 1744, i. 309 seq. Pinkerton, viii. 374) quoted by Mr.

Frazer (Golden Bough, 2nd ed. ii. 14 seq.).]

c. 1343.—"The sultan is a Kāfir called the Sāmāri . . . When the time of our departure for China came, the sultan, the Sāmāri equipped for us one of the 13 junks which were lying in the port of Calicut."— Ibn Batuta, iv. 89-94.

1442.—"I saw a man with his body naked like the rest of the Hindus. The sovereign of this city (Calicut) bears the title of Sāmāri. When he dies it is his sister's son who succeeds him."—Abderrazzāk, in India in the XVth. Cent. 17.

1510.—"Now I will speak of the King here in Calicut, because he is the most important King of all those before mentioned, and is called Samory, which in the Pagan language means God on earth."—Varthema, 134. The traveller confounds the word with tamburrān, which does mean 'Lord.' [Forbes (see below) makes the same mistake.]

1516.—"This city of Calicut is very large. . . This King became greater and more powerful than all the others: he took the name of Zomodi, which is a point of honour above all other Kings."—Barbosa, 103.

[1552.—"Samarao." See under CELEBES.]

1553.—"The most powerful Prince of this Malebar was the King of Calicut, who par excellence was called Camarij, which among them is as among us the title Emperor."—Barros, i. iv. 7.

[1554.—Speaking of the Moluccas, "Camaraq, which in their language means Admiral."—Castanheda, Bk. vi. ch. 66.]

. . . "I wrote him a letter to tell him . . . that, please God, in a short time the imperial fleet would come from Egypt to the Sāmari, and deliver the country from the hands of the infidels."—Sidi 'Ali, p. 83. [Vambéry, who in his translation betrays a remarkable ignorance of Indian geography, speaks (p. 24) of "Samiri, the ruler of Calcutta, by which he means Calicut."]

1563.—"And when the King of Calicut (who has for title Samorim or Emperor) besieged Cochín . . ."—García, t. 568.

1572.—"Sentado o Gama junto ao rico leito Oa seus mais affastados, prompto em vista Estava o Samori no trajo, e geyto Da gente, nunca dantes della vista."—Camões, vii. 59.

By Burton:

"When near that splendid couch took place the guest and others further off, prompt glance and keen the Samorim cast on folk whose garb and gest were like to nothing he had ever seen."
1616.—Under this year there is a note of a letter from Underoecon-Chete to the Great Samorin or K. of Calicut to K. James.—Sainsbury, i. 462.

1617.—“Indeed it is pleasantly situated under trees, and it is the Holy See of their Zamerhin or Pope.”—Fryer, 52.

1781.—“Their (the Christians’) hereditary privileges were respected by the Zamorin himself.”—Gibbon, ch. xlvii.

1785.—A letter of Tippoo’s applies the term to a tribe or class, speaking of ‘2000 Samories’; who are these!—Select Letters, 274.

1787.—“The Zamorin is the only ancient sovereign in the South of India.”—T. Munro, in Life, i. 59.

1810.—“On our way we saw one of the Zamorin’s houses, but he was absent at a more favoured residence of Paniany.”—María Graham, 110.

[1814.—“The King of Calicut was, in the Mahbar language, called Samory, or Zamorine, that is to say, God on the earth.”—Forbes, Or. Mem. 2nd ed. i. 263. See quotation above from Varthema.]

... nor did the conqueror (Hyder Ali) take any notice of the Zamorine’s complaints and supplications. The unfortunate prince, after fasting three days, and finding all remonstrance vain, set fire to his palace, and was burned, with some of his women and their brambhins.”—Ibid. iv. 207–8; [2nd ed. ii. 477]. This was a case of Traga.

[1900.—“The Zamorin of Calicut who succeeded to the gadi (Guddy) three months ago, has died.”—Pioneer Mail, April 13.

ZANZIBAR, n.p. This name was originally general, and applied widely to the East African coast, at least south of the River Jubb, and as far as the Arab traffic extended. But it was also specifically applied to the island on which the Sultan of Zanzibar now lives (and to which we now generally restrict the name); and this was the case at least since the 15th century, as we see from the Roteiro. The Pers. Zangi-bār, ‘Region of the Blacks,’ was known to the ancients in the form Zingis (Ptolemy, i. 17, 9; iv. 7, 11) and Zingum. The Arab softening of the g made the name into Zanjibar, and this the Portuguese made into Zanzibar.

c. 545.—“And those who navigate the Indian Sea are aware that Zingium, as it is called, lies beyond the country where the incense grows, which is called Barbary.”—Cosmas, in Cosmography, &c., clxxiv.

c. 940.—“The land of the Zanj begins at the channel issuing from the Upper Nile” (by this the Jubb seems meant) “and extends to the country of Sofāla and of the Wak-wak.”—Maynadie, Piards d’Or, iii. 7.

c. 1190.—Alexander having eaten what was pretended to be the head of a black captive says:

Their hair is as black as pepper, and so frizzly that even with water you can scarcely straighten it.” &c., &c.—Marco Polo, ii. 215. Marco Polo regards the coast of Zanzibar as belonging to a great island like Madagascar.

1440.—“Kalikut is a very safe haven ... where one finds in abundance the precious objects brought from maritime countries, especially from Habshah (see HUBSHEE, ABYSSINIA), Zirbad, and Zanzibar.” Abdurrazzak, in Not. et Extas., xiv. 436.

1498.—“And when the morning came, we found we had arrived at a very great island called Jamgiber, peopled with many Moors, and standing good ten leagues from the coast.”—Roteiro, 105.

1516.—“Between this island of San Lorenzo (i.e. Madagascar) and the continent, not very far from it are three islands, which are called one Manifa, another Zanzibar, and the other Penda; these are inhabited by Moors; they are very fertile islands.”—Barboss, 11.

1553.—“And from the streams of this river Quillimance towards the west, as far as the Cape of Currents, up to which the Moors of that coast do navigate, all that region, and that still further west towards the Cape of Good Hope (as we call it), the Arabians and Persians of those parts call Zangueba, and the inhabitants they call Zanguy.”—Barros, i. viii. 4.

A few pages later we have “Isles of Pemba, Zanzibar, Monfia, Comoro,” showing apparently that a difference had grown up, at least among the Portuguese, distinguishing Zanguebar the continental region from Zanzibar the Island.

ZEDOARY, and ZERUMBET, ss.

These are two aromatic roots, once famous in pharmacy and often coupled together. The former is often mentioned in medieval literature. The former is Arabic jadwar, the latter Pers. zarombed. There seems some doubt about the scientific discrimination of the two. Mooden Sheriff says that Zedoary (Ceratonia zedoaria) is sold in most bazars under the name of ainbehali, whilst jadwar, or zhadwar, is the bazar name of roots of various non-poisonous aconites. There has been considerable confusion in the nomenclature of these drugs [see Watt, Econ. Dict. ii. 655, 670]. Dr. Royle, in his most interesting discourse on the Antiquity of Hindo Medicine (p. 77), transcribes the following prescription of the physician Actius, in which the name of Zedoary first occurs, along with many other Indian drugs:

c. A.D. 540.—"Zador (i.e. zedoaria), galangae, ligustici, seselis, cardamomi, piperis longi, piperis albi, cinnamomi, zingiberis, seminis Smyrnii, carophylli, phylli, stachyos, myrobalani, phu, casti, scoridi, silphii vel laserpetii, rhei barbarici, poconiaei; ali etiam arboris nucum visum et paluri semem, itemque saxifragum ac casam addunt; ex his singulis stateres duos commisceant.

1861.—"Nous savons donc positivement qu'à une époque où l'occident était encore couvert de forêts, l'orient, déjà civilisé, pos-sédait déjà le bœuf et le Zebu; et par conséquent c'est de l'orient que ces animaux sont sortis, pour devenir, l'un (le bœuf) cosmopolite, l'autre commun à presque toute l'Asie et à une grande partie de l'Afrique."—Geoffroy St. Hilaire (work above referred to, 4th ed. 1861).

[1888.—"I have seen a herd of Zebras (sic) or Indian humped cattle, but cannot say where they are kept."—In 9 ser. N. & Q. i. 468.]

ZEDOARY. s. This whimsical name, applied in zoological books, English as well as French, to the humped domestic ox (or Brahminy bull) of India, was taken by Buffon from the exhibitors of such a beast at a French fair, who perhaps invented the word, but who told him the beast had been brought from Africa, where it was called by that name. We have been able to discover no justification for this in African dialects, though our friend Mr. R. Cust has kindly made search, and sought information from other philologists on our account. Zebu passes, however, with most people as an Indian word; thus Webster's Dictionary, says "Zebu, the native Indian name." The only word at all like it that we can discover is zofo (q.v.) or zhobo, applied in the semi-Tibetan regions of the Himalaya to a useful hybrid, called in Ladak by the slightly modified form dsomo. In Jäschke's Tibetan Dict. we find "Ze'-ba ... l hump of a camel, zebu, etc." This is curious, but, we should think, only one of those coincidences which we have had so often to notice.

Isidore Geoffroy de St. Hilaire, in his work Acclimation et Domestication des Animaux Utiles, considers the ox and the zebu to be two distinct species. Both are figured on the Assyrian monuments, and both on those of ancient Egypt. The humped ox also exists in Southern Persia, as Marco Polo mentions. Still, the great naturalist to whose work we have referred is hardly justified in the statement quoted below, that the "zebu" is common to "almost the whole of Asia" with a great part of Africa. [Mr. Blanford writes: "The origin of Bos indicus (sometimes called zebu by European naturalists) is unknown, but it was in all probability tropical or sub-tropical, and was regarded by Blyth as probably African. No ancestral form has been discovered among Indian fossil bovines, which ... comprise species allied to the gaur and 'buffalo" (Mammalia, 483 seq.).]

c. 1772.—"We have seen this small hunched ox alive ... It was shown at the fair in Paris in 1752 (sic, but a transcript from the French edition of 1837 gives 1772) under the name of Zebu; which we have adopted to describe the animal by, for it is a particular breed of the ox, and not a ZEMINDAR, s. Pers. zamín-dár, 'landholder.' One holding land on which he pays revenue to the Government direct, and not to any intermediate superior. In Bengal Proper the zemindars hold generally considerable tracts, on a permanent settlement of the amount to be paid to Government. In the N.W. Provinces there are often a great many zemindars in a village, holding by a common settlement, periodically renewable. In the N.W. Provinces the rustic pronunciation of the word zamín-dár is hardly distinguishable from the ordinary Anglo-Indian pronunciation of jumal-dár (see JEMADAR), and the form given to zamín-dár in early English records shows that this pronunciation prevailed in Bengal more than two centuries ago.

In the preceding extracts the De prefixed to Calcutta is Pers. deh, 'village,' or 'township,' a common term in the language of Indian Revenue administration. An 'Explanation of Terms' furnished by W. Hastings to the Fort William Council in 1759 thus explains the word:

ZENANA, s. Pers. zanana, from zan, 'woman'; the apartments of a house in which the women of the family are secluded. This Mahomedan custom has been largely adopted by the Hindus of Bengal and the Mahrattas. Zanana is also used for the women of the family themselves. The growth of the admirable Zenana Missions has of late years made this word more familiar in England. But we have heard of more than one instance in which the objects of this Christian enterprise have been taken to be an amiable aboriginal tribe—"the Zena-

ZEND, ZENDAVESTA, s. Zend is the name which has been commonly applied, for more than a hundred years to that dialect of the ancient Persian (or Persian) language in which the Avesta or Sacred Books of Zoroastrianism or the old Persian religion are written. The application of the name in this way was quite erroneous, as the word Zend when used alone in the Persian books indicates a 'commentary or explanation,' and is in fact applied only to some Pahlavi translation, commentary, or gloss. If the name Zend were now to be used as the designation of any language it would more justly apply to the Pahlavi itself. At the same time Haug thinks it probable that the term Zand was originally applied to a commentary written in the same language as the Avesta itself, for in the Pahlavi translations of the Yasna, a part of the Avesta, where the scriptures are mentioned, Avesta and Zend are coupled together, as of equal authority, which could hardly have been the case if by Zend the translator meant his own work. No name for the language of the ancient scriptures has been found in the Parsi books; and Avesta itself has been adopted by scholars in speaking of the language. The fragments of these scriptures are written in two dialects of the Eastern Iranian, one, the more ancient, in which the Gathas or hymns are written; and a later one which was for many centuries the spoken and written language of Bactria.

The word Zand, in Haug's view, may be referred to the root zan, 'to know'; Skt. jna, Gr. γνω, Lat. gno (as in agnosco, cognosco), so that its meaning is 'knowledge.' Prof. J. Oppert, on the other hand, identifies it with old Pers. zannda, 'prayer.'

Zendavesta is the name which has been by Europeans popularly applied to the books just spoken of as the Avesta. The term is undoubtedly an inversion, as, according to Haug, "the Pahlavi books always style them Avestak va Zand (Avesta and Zend)" i.e. the Law with its traditional and authoritative explanation. Abastâ, in the sense of law, occurs in the funeral inscription of Darius at Behistûn; and this seems now the most generally accepted origin of the term in its application to the Parsi sacred books. (This is not, however, the explanation given by Haug.) Thus, 'Avesta and Zend' signify together 'The Law and the Commentary.'

The Avesta was originally much more extensive than the texts which now exist, which are only fragments. The Parzí tradition is that there were twenty - one books called Nashta, the greater part of which were burnt by Alexander in his conquest of Persia; possibly true, as we know that Alexander did burn the palace at Persepolis. The collection of fragments which remains, and is known as the Zend-avesta, is divided, in its usual form, into two parts. I. The Avesta properly so called, containing (a) the Zendâdâd, a compilation of religious laws and of mythical tales; (b) the Visphrâd, a collection of litanies for the sacrifice; and (c) the Yasna, composed of similar litanies and of 5 hymns or Gathas in an old dialect. II. The Khorda, or small, Avesta, composed of short prayers for recitation by the faithful at certain moments of the day, month, or year, and in presence of the different elements, with which certain other hymns and fragments are usually included.

The term Zendavesta, though used, as we see below, by Lord in 1630, first became familiar in Europe through the labours of Anquetil du Perron, and his publication of 1771. [The Zend-Avesta has now been translated in Sacred Books of the East, by J. Darmesteter, L. H. Mills; Pahlavi Texts, by E. W. West.]

ZILLAH, s. This word is properly Ar. (in Indian pron.) zila, 'a rib,' thence 'a side,' a district. It is the technical name for the administrative districts into which British India is divided, each of which has in the older provinces a Collector, or Collector and Magistrate combined, a Sessions Judge, &c., and in the newer provinces, such as the Punjab and B. Burna, a Deputy Commissioner.

1817.—"In each district, that is in the language of the country, each Zilah . . . a Zilah Court was established."—Mill's Hist. v. 422.

ZINGARI, n.p. This is of course not Anglo-Indian, but the name applied in various countries of Europe, and in various modifications, zinca, zingare, zincali, chingari, zigeuner, &c., to the gypsies.

Various suggestions as to its derivation have been made on the supposition that it is of Indian origin. Borrow has explained the word as 'a person of mixt blood,' deriving it from the Skt. sankara, 'made up.' It is true that varia sankara is used for an admixture of castes and races (e.g. in Bhagavad Gita, i. 41, &c.), but it is not the name of any caste, nor would people to whom such an opprobrious epithet had been applied be likely to carry it with them to distant lands.

A writer in the Saturday Review once suggested the Pers. zingar, 'a saddler.' Not at all probable. In Sleeman's Ramaseeana or Vocabulary of the peculiar Language used by the Thugs (Calcutta, 1836), p. 85, we find:

"Chingaree, a class of Multani Thugs, sometimes called Naiks, of the Mussulman faith. They proceed on their expeditions in the character of Brinjars, with cows and bullocks laden with merchandise, which they expose for sale at their encampments, and thereby attract their victims. They use the rope of their bullocks instead of the normal in strangling. They are an ancient tribe of Thugs, and take their wives and children on their expeditions."

[These are the Chângârs of whom Mr. Ibbetson (Panjub Ethnog. 308) gives an account. A full description of them has been given by Dr. G. W. Leitner (A Sketch of the Chângârs and of their Dialect, Lahore, 1880), in which he shows reason to doubt any connection between them and the Zingari.]

De Goeje (Contributions to the Hist. of the Gypsies) regards that people as the Indian Zoî (i.e. Jatt of Sind). He suggests as possible origins of the name first shikârtî (see SHIKAREE), and then Pers. changî, 'harper,' from which a plural changân actually occurs in Lane's Arabian Nights, iii. 730, note 22. [These are the Al-Jink, male dancers (see Burton, Ar. Nights, viii. 18).]

If the name is to be derived from India, the term in Sleeman's Vocabulary seems a more probable origin than the others mentioned here. But is it not more likely that zingâri, like Gypsy and Bohemian, would be a name given ab extra on their appearing in the West, and not carried with them from Asia?

ZIRBAD, n.p. Pers. zîr-bâd, 'below the wind,' i.e. leeward. This is a phrase derived from nautical use, and applied to the countries eastward of India. It appears to be adopted with reference to the S.W. Monsoon. Thus by the extracts from the Mohit or 'Ocean' of Sidi 'Ali Kapudân (1554), translated by Joseph V. Hammer in the Journ. As. Soc. Bengal, we find that one chapter (unfortunately not given) treats 'Of the Indian Islands above and below the wind.' The islands 'above the wind' were probably Ceylon, the Maldives, Socotra, &c., but we find no extract with precise indication of them. We find however indicated as the "tracts situated below the wind" Malacca, Sumatra, Tenasserim, Bengal, Martaban, Pegu. The phrase is one which naturally acquires a specific meaning among sea-faring folk, of which we have an instance in the Windward and Leeward Islands of the W. Indies. But probably it was adopted from the Malays, who make use of the same nomenclature, as the quotations show.

Before the foundation of Malaca, in this Cingapura... met all the navigators of the seas to the West of India and of those to the East of it, which last embrace the regions of Siam, China, Champa, Cambuja, and the many thousand islands that lie in that Orient. And these two quarters the natives of the land distinguish as Dyanangumi (di-bawa-angin) and Attâ Angumi (átsang angîn) which are as much as to say 'below the winds' and 'above the winds,' below being West and above East."—Barros, Dec. II. Liv. vi. cap. i. In this passage De Barros goes unusually astray, for the use of the Malay expressions which he quotes, bawa-angin (or di-bawa) 'below the wind,' and átsang (or di-átsang) angí, 'above the wind,' is just the reverse of his explanation, the former meaning the east, and the latter the west (see below).

c. 1590.—"Kalambak (see CALAMBK) is the wood of a tree brought from Zirbad (!)—Afû, i. 81. A mistaken explanation is given in the foot-note from a native authority, but this is corrected by Prof. Biochmann at p. 616.

1726.—"The Malayars are also commonly called Orang di Bavah Angin, or 'people beneath the wind,' otherwise Basterlings, as those of the West, and particularly the Arabs, are called Orang Átás Angin, or 'people above the wind,' and known as Westerlings."—Valentijn, v. 310.

"... 'The land of the Peninsula, &c., was called by the geographers Zierbaad, meaning in Persian 'beneath the wind.'"—Ibid. 317.

1856.—"There is a peculiar idiom of the Malay language, connected with the monsoons... The Malays call all countries west of their own 'countries above the wind,' and their own and all countries east of it 'countries below the wind.'... The origin of the phrase admits of no explanation, unless it have reference to the most important of the two monsoons, the western, that which brought to the Malayan countries the traders of India."—Crawford's Desc. Dict. 288.

ZOBO, ZHOBO, DSOMO, &c., s. Names used in the semi-Tibetan tracts of the Himalaya for hybrids between the yak bull and the ordinary hill cow, much used in transport and agriculture. See quotation under ZEBU.

The following are the connected Tibetan terms, according to Jaeschke's Dict. (p. 463): "mdzo, a mongrel bred of Yak bull and common cow; bri-mdzo, a mongrel bred of common bull and yak cow; mdzo-po, a male; mdzo-mo, a female animal of the kind, both valued as domestic cattle." [Writing of the Lower Himalaya, Mr. Atkinson says: "When the sire is a yak and the dam a hill cow, the hybrid is called jubu; when the parentage is reversed, the produce is called garjo. The jubu is found more valuable than the other hybrid or than either of the pure stocks." (Himalayan Gazetteer, ii. 38). Also see Aina, ed. Jarret, ii. 350.]

1298. —"There are wild cattle in that country almost as big as elephants, splendid creatures, covered everywhere but in the back with shaggy hair a good four palms long. They are partly black, partly white, and really wonderfully fine creatures, and the hair or wool is extremely fine and white, finer and whiter than silk. Messer Marco brought some to Venice as a great curiosity, and so it was reckoned by those who saw it. There are also plenty of them tame, which have been caught young. They also cross these with the common cow, and the cattle from this cross are wonderful beasts, and better for work than other animals. These the people use commonly for burden and general work, and in the plough as well; and at the latter they will do twice as much work as any other cattle, being such very strong beasts." —Marco Polo, Bk. i. ch. 57.

1534. —"The Zobo, or cross between the yak and the hill-cow (much resembling the English cow) is but rarely seen in these mountains (Sikkim), though common in the N.W. Himalaya." —Hooker's Him. Journals, 2d ed. i. 203.

[1871. —"The plough in Lahonl . . . is worked by a pair of dzos (hybrids between the cow and yak)."—Harcourt, Him. Dists of Kooloo, Lahonl, and Spiti, 180.

[1875. —"Ploughing is done chiefly with the hybrid of the yak bull and the common cow: this they call zo if male and zomo if female."—Drewh, Jemmuu and Kashmir, 246.]

ZOUAVE, s. This modern French term is applied to certain regiments of light infantry in a quasi-Oriental costume, recruited originally in Algeria, and from various races, but now only consisting of Frenchmen. The name Zouave, Zouaoua, was, according to Littre, that of a Kabyle tribe of the Jurjura which furnished the first soldiers so called.

[ZUBT, ZUBTEE, adj. and s. of which the corrupted forms are JUBTEE, JUPTEE. Ar. zaby, lit. 'keeping, guarding,' but more generally in India, in the sense of 'seizure, confiscation.' In the Aina it is used in the sense which is still in use in the N.W.P., 'cash rents on the more valuable crops, such as sugar-cane, tobacco, etc., in those districts where rents in kind are generally paid.'

[1813. —"Zept . . . restraint, confiscation, sequestration. Zebty. Relating to restraint or confiscation; what has been confiscated. . . . Lands resumed by Jaffier Khan which had been appropriated in Jughirc (see JAGHEER)."—Glossary to Fifth Report.

[1851. —"You put down one hundred rupees. If the water of your land does not come . . . then my money shall be confiscated to the Sibib. If it does then your money shall be zupt (confiscated)."—Edwards, A Year on the Punjab Frontier, i. 278.]

ZUMBOORUCK, s. Ar. Turk. Pers. zambarak (spelt zambarak), a small gun or swivel usually carried on a camel, and mounted on a saddle; a falconet. [See a drawing in R. Kipling's Beast and Man in India, 255.]

It was, however, before the use of gunpowder came in, the name applied sometimes to a cross-bow, and sometimes to the quarrel or bolt shot from such a weapon. The word is in form a Turkish diminutive from Ar. zum-bär, 'a hornet'; much as 'musket' comes from mosqueta. Quatemère thinks the name was given from the twang of the cross-bow at the moment of discharge (see H. des Mongols, 285-6; see also Dozy, Supp't. s.v.). This older meaning is the subject of our first quotation:

1848. —"Les écrivains arabes qui ont traité des guerres des croisades, donnent à l'arbalette, telle que l'employait les chrétiens, le nom de zenbourekk. La première fois qu'ils en font mention, c'est en parlant du siège de Tyr par Saladin en 1187. . . . Suivant l'histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie, le zenbourekk était une flèche de l'épaveur du ponce, de la longueur d'une coude, qui avait quatre faces . . . il traversait quelquefois au même coup deux hommes placés l’un derrière l’autre. . . . Les musulmans paraissent n’avoir fait usage qu’assez tard du zumbourak. Djémal-Eddin est, à ma connaissance, le premier écrivain arabe qui, sous la date 643 (1245 de J.C.), cite cette arme comme servant aux guerriers de l’Islamisme; c’est à propos du siège d’Ascalon par le sultan d’Egypte. . . . Mais bientôt l’usage du zumbourak devint commun en Orient, et dans la suite des Turks ottomans entretinrent dans leurs armées un corps de soldats appelés zumbourakdja. Maintenant . . . ce mot a tout à fait changé d’acception, et l’on donne en Perse le nom de zumbourak à une petite pièce d’artillerie légère.”

1707.—“Prince Bedar Bakht . . . was killed by a cannon-ball, and many of his followers also fell. . . . His younger brother Waldjar was killed by a ball from a zambourak.”—Khajfi Khân, in Elliot, vii. 398.

c. 1764.—“Mirza Nedjef Khan, who was preceded by some Zembracka, ordered that kind of artillery to stand in the middle of the water and to fire on the eminence.”—Seir Mutaqherin, iii. 250.

1825.—“The reign of Futeh Allee Shah has been far from remarkable for its military splendour. . . . He has rarely been exposed to danger in action, but, early in his reign . . . he appeared in the field, . . . till at last one or two shots from zumbourucks dropping among them, he fell from his horse in a swoon of terror. . . .”—J. B. Fraser, Journey into Khorasan in 1821-22, pp. 197-8.

[1829.—“He had no cannon; but was furnished with a description of ordnance, or swivels, called zumbouruk, which were mounted on camels; and which, though useful in action, could make no impression on the slightest walls. . . .”—Malcolm, H. of Persia, i. 419.]

1846.—“So hot was the fire of cannon, musquetry, and zambouraks, kept up by the Khalsa troops, that it seemed for some moments impossible that the entrenchments could be won under it.”—Sir Hugh Gough’s desp. on the Battle of Sobroon, dd. Feb 13.

“‘The flank in question (at Sobraon) was mainly guarded by a line of two hundred zumbouruks, or falconets; but it derived some support from a salient battery, and from the heavy guns retained on the opposite bank of the river.’—Cunningham’s H. of the Sikhs, 322.
